
Re SHEPHEARD'S SETTLED ESTATE.

Settled Estates Act—Devise in trust to manage estate—Ultimate gift to children—Title.

When an estate is devised as to part by way of succession, and as to the other part there is a trust preventing it coming into possession until a certain period, the whole is a "settled estate" within the meaning of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, and the 28*th section gives a purchaser a safe title.*

In this case certain property devised to trustees, by the will of Samuel Shepheard, had been made the subject of a petition under the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120), and sold; and the purchaser raised the question whether it was a settled estate within the Act, and that was now the question brought before the court upon summons.

The testator by his will dated the 12th Nov. 1858 devised the property in question to trustees and their heirs upon trust to let and manage the same to the greatest advantage, as they should think fit, in their discretion, during his wife's lifetime, and during the infancy of any of his children; also upon trust to pay to or permit his wife to receive one moiety of the clear rents and profits (deducting for repairs and insurances) for her life, and then in trust for all the children equally in fee simple as tenants in common.

Upon the testator's death in 1866 there were three children, two still under age; and the widow, the trustees, and the child who had attained twenty-one presented a petition, in which all the children concurred, the infants by their guardian, under the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act, for a sale. That sale took place under an order made on the petition; but on the question of title an objection was taken, on behalf of the purchaser, that one moiety of the estate was not settled within the Act—namely, that portion which was given in trust for the children in fee, subject to the trust for management, until they attained twenty-one.

Upon the objection being taken in chambers, the petitioners took out the present summons to decide the question.

W. W. Cooper appeared in support of the summons, and contended that this was a "settled estate" within the meaning of the Act, there being a limitation as to half by way of succession, the children not being entitled as to the other moiety until they were all of age. There was no one to dispute the sale, and under the 28th section a perfect title could be made:

Re Thompson's Settled Estates, John. 418;
Beisley v. Carter, L. Rep. 4 Eq. 230; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 472;

The case was therefore free from difficulty.

A. C. Humphreys, for the purchaser, insisted that half of this property was not "settled" within the meaning of the Act; and the court therefore could not order a sale. The trust for the children, with trusts for their benefit whilst under age, was not within the Act: (Re Burden's Will, 28 L. J. 840, Ch.) The conveyance did not preclude the purchaser from calling in question the jurisdiction.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—In this case certain property is devised by the will of Samuel Shepheard upon trusts, as to one moiety for the wife and children, and subject thereto upon trust for the children in fee equally. A petition was presented under the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act for a sale, and an order was made, and the estate sold accordingly. The purchaser has now bonâ fide raised the question which has been argued, and not, as I understood it, merely by way of captious objection. Now the trustees have the legal estate devised to them of the whole estate, to manage it during the life of the widow and the infancy of the children, and pay a moiety of the net rents to the widow for life; this moiety, therefore, is no doubt a "settled estate." Then, subject thereto, there is a trust for the children in fee equally. As to the other moiety, therefore, there is no estate in possession of the children until they are all twenty-one. That also, in my opinion, constitutes a limitation in succession under the Act, and the will operates as a settlement under the Act. I consider that this statute should have a liberal construction put upon it, having regard to what the intention of the Legislature was. It was to make all real estate (except those the subject of private Acts, such as the estates of the Dukes of Marlborough and Wellington) capable of sale, as under proper powers in settlements, and I think that if there be an undivided share of an estate subject to a settlement, the whole ought to be so subject and considered as a settled estate. Here the whole estate is so subject, as I have decided. This question, however, is not a material one to a purchaser, for under the 28th section of the Act the sale, once made, cannot be called in question on the ground that there is no jurisdiction, except as to some person who was not present, and whose concurrence was necessary. Here all concur; those sui juris in person, the others by their proper guardian. He will therefore here get a perfectly good title. Re Thompson (sup.) is distinguishable from this case, there being, as to part of the estate, parties absolutely entitled in possession. Beisley v. Carter (sup.) confirms my view of the 28th section. Re Burden's Will (sup.) is not now an authority, the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 45 limiting the question of settlement to the period when it comes into operation.

Solicitors for the petitioners, Cualiffe and Beaumont.

Solicitors for the purchaser, Harrison, Beal, and Co.

Saturday, Dec. 11.

DUGDALE v. DUGDALE.

Practice—Marshalling assets—Deficient personalty—Abatement by pecuniary legatee and real estate rateably.

A testator gave 500*l.* and specific articles to his wife, and a moiety of his real estate to her for life, or during her widowhood, and subject thereto to his children. The personalty, including the proceeds of an advowson directed to be sold to pay debts, &c., proved insufficient to pay such debts, legacies, and funeral expenses, and it was proposed in the minutes to insert a declaration that the 500*l.* legacy, and the specific gift in the real estate should make up the deficiency rateably, following Hensman v. Fryer, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 420; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 394.

The court refused to allow it to be inserted.

This was an administration suit with reference to the estate of Henry Dugdale, who, by his will (which was of some length) gave in substance (after a legacy of 500*l.* and a specific bequest to his wife, Grace Dugdale), all his real estate to Adam Dugdale and Thomas Dugdale, upon trust as to one moiety thereof to his wife, Grace Dugdale, for her natural life, and during her widowhood, and subject thereto to his children. The testator's personal property, including the proceeds of an advowson directed to be sold to pay debts, &c., was insufficient to pay his debts, and the legacies given by his will, and it was proposed in the minutes of decree, which had been prepared (the cause coming on as a short cause), to insert a declaration that the deficiency ought to be raised and paid out of the legacy of 500*l.* to the wife, and the real estate rateably. This was following the rule laid down in the case of Hensman v. Fryer, decided originally by Kindersley, V.C. and on appeal by Lord Chelmsford, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 420; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 394. The clause in the minutes was as follows: "And it appearing that the testator's personal estate and the proceeds arising from the sale of the advowson of Anthorne in the will mentioned, and thereby devised in trust to pay the testator's debts, legacies, and funeral expenses, will not be sufficient for the payment of such debts, legacies, and funeral expenses, declare that the personal estate of the testator not specifically bequeathed, and the proceeds arising from the sale of the said advowson, form together the primary fund out of which the testator's debts, legacies, and funeral expenses ought to be paid, and that the deficiency ought, as between the defendant Grace Dugdale, who is entitled under the said will to a legacy of 500*l.*, and is also entitled to the use for her life of certain specifically bequeathed articles of furniture, and other personal estate in the will particularly described, on the one hand; and the person entitled under the general devise of the real estate contained in the said will, on the other, to be raised and paid out of the said legacy of 500*l.* and out of the said furniture, and other personal effects so specifically bequeathed and out of the general real estate of the testator rateably in proportion to the respective value."

Digitized by Google

J. Pearson, Q. C. and Bedwell appeared for the plaintiffs.

Ford for the widow.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I consider the decision in the case of Hensman v. Fryer (sup.) upon this question of marshalling is founded on a misapprehension of the decision of Tombs v. Stocks, 2 Coll. 502. I cannot, therefore, allow the proposed declaration to be inserted in these minutes. But I do not mean to decide that question now; for it is one which ought to be raised when this cause comes on upon further consideration.

Solicitors, N. C. and C. Milne.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, Nov. 18.

CHESTER v. CHESTER.

*Practice—Death of the plaintiff—Revivor—*15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 52.

An interested person in a suit, who had liberty to attend the proceedings, and had been served with a copy of the decree, applied on the death of a sole plaintiff to revive the suit:

Held, that he was entitled to do so, and order to revive made.

This was a motion to revive a suit in consequence of the death of the sole plaintiff. The suit was one for the administration of the real and personal estate of one Wm. Mann, deceased. The usual decree had been pronounced in June 1865. The churchwardens and overseers of St. Mary, Newington, were interested in the division of the testator's estate.

The sole plaintiff died on the 15th Sept. 1869.

Dauney, on behalf of the churchwardens and overseers of the parish, moved for an order to revive, and that the parish officers might have the future conduct of the cause.

Methold for a defendant, one of the executors of testator's will.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR made the order asked for, to be in the same form as if a supplemental suit had been instituted with liberty to serve copies on the other parties interested in the cause.

Solicitors: Chester and Co.; J. and W. Butler.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, Nov. 19.

PEACOCK v. YOUNG AND ANOTHER.

Trespass—Liability for act which tends to incite to the doing of damage—"Natural consequence" of act.

Y., a candidate for election as member of Parliament, was accompanied through a borough by a crowd of persons forming a procession in his honour. The windows of certain houses, belonging to members of the opposite political party, were broken by the mob in their course; and Y., standing up in a carriage, waved his hat in the air, but with no intention of encouraging the mob in their acts of violence, and made no attempt to leave the carriage or stop the procession, though he remonstrated with those who could hear him on the disgraceful character of their proceedings:

Held that, under these circumstances, Y. was not liable for the damage caused by the breaking of the windows.

This was an appeal from the decision of a deputy of the judge of the County Court of Wisbeach, and the following is the case as stated by the judge who tried the cause:—

This was a plaint before me sitting as judge in the County Court in Cambridgeshire, at Wisbeach, by which the plaintiff claimed the sum of 10*l.* for damage done by the defendants to his windows and furniture.

This the defendants denied.

The facts as they appeared before me were as follows:

1. In September last, the time in question, the plaintiff was a furniture dealer, having a house and shop, where he carried on his business, in a main street of Wisbeach, and the defendant Young was one of the members of Parliament for the county of Cambridge, and a candidate for re-election at the recent general election for that county. He had been five times mayor of the borough of Wisbeach, was a town councillor, borough magistrate, a large shipowner and merchant, and a person of great influence in Wisbeach where he resided. The defendant Robert White was a labourer or mechanic.

2. On Sept. 28 there were four candidates seeking election for the county, viz., Lords Royston and Manners, supported by what was called the Pink and White, and the defendant and Mr. Brand by what was called the Blue party. For some days previous to that day it was known in Wisbeach that Lords Royston and Manners would come accompanied by an escort from the surrounding country, and address the electors at Wisbeach. A committee had been there formed for promoting the election of the defendant and Mr. Brand, and with a knowledge of the intended visit of Lords Royston and Manners, the defendant's committee in Wisbeach invited Mr. Brand to visit the town on the same day, for the alleged purpose "that he might accompany the defendant in quiet canvass in the rural districts."

3. On the morning of that day the defendant was in the town, and passing the plaintiff's shop, observed some pink and white flags exhibited there, as they were at various other houses, and exclaimed to a witness standing at the shop door, "That fellow Peacock promised me his vote."

4. The cavalcade accompanying the Lords Royston and Manners, consisting mainly of horsemen, soon after arrived at the outskirts of the town, where they were met, and their progress impeded, by an organised body of men and boys, provided with blue flags and wisps of straw, by the aid of which, and shouting, and loud noises, they tried to frighten the horses, and so drive back the processsion. The conduct of the mob, when in conflict with the horsemen, was witnessed by the defendant Young, who describes it as the most painful scene he ever witnessed. The cavalcade, however, forced its way through the crowd, and proceeded to an hotel in the town, in which Lords Royston and Manners addressed them.

5. Very soon after the cavalcade had forced its way through the mob, the defendant Young drove his carriage through the mob to the Midland Railway Station, where he met his colleague, and mentioned to him that "there had been a tremendous row in the town."

6. Instead of proceeding to the rural district the carriage returned with them to the old market place in the town, where the mob were waiting. The horses were immediately taken from the carriage, and it was drawn by the mob over the river through the High-street to the timber market where the horsemen were stationed listening to the speeches of the other candidates. Another conflict then ensued; the carriage was dragged through the concourse of horsemen, and thence along the streets to a house known as Toomey's, at the other end of the town near another railway station. At this point the carriage was turned round and brought back by the same route to the defendant Young's committee-room, where he and his colleague proceeded to address the assemblage in front of it. After this they went to the defendant Young's house, and neither candidate canvassed any rural district that day. Throughout the entire progress from the old market place to Toomey's, and thence to the committee-room, the conduct of the mob was of the most disorderly character. The windows of every known opponent of the blue party and of anyone who exhibited a pink and white flag or colour were smashed with stones and missiles, and the inmates of those houses hooted at. In passing the plaintiff's house the damage complained of was proved to have been done, a portion of it occurring on the return of the carriage. The defendant White was identified as one of the crowd who had tried to turn the horsemen back, and broke some panes of glass.

8. The windows of the houses along the line of this procession were filled with ladies and gentlemen, and others of their adherents, who had evidently assembled in expectation of it. Throughout the entire journey to and from Toomey's the defendant Young and his colleague stood up in the carriage waving their hats in the air, as stated by several witnesses, during the smashing of the windows, amid a continued uproar of shouting and cheering, which would effectually prevent anything they said being heard. In order to rest the persons drawing the carriage the procession halted several times.

9. When the defendant addressed the assembly fron his committee room he expressed his regret that so many windows had been destroyed, adding, "that those of any poor person should be paid for," and said, "that though he had had quieter and quicker rides through the town, he had never experienced a pleasanter one."

10. On behalf of the defendant Young it was deposed that "notwithstanding his position and influence he was unable to extricate himself from the mob, that when the horses were removed from the carriage against his will, finding the mob determined he submitted himself to them;" that he repeatedly begged the mob to desist from breaking the windows, that though his hat was waved continually during their forced journey, it was not to encourage the rioters, "but intended for ladies and gentlemen of his party by whom the windows of the houses of his friends were crowded;" that he had not hired or paid money to any of the mob, and that the remark about the plaintiff's promise was not addressed to any person, but made in a loud remark to himself "when riding down the street on horseback."

11. Upon this evidence I was satisfied, although it was not shown to me that the mob had been hired or paid by the defendant Young, and I accepted his statement that he was unexpectedly dragged through the cavalcade of horsemen down to and from Toomey's; that the waving of his hat in the air while standing up in the carriage was not intended by him to encourage the mob in continued acts of damage, and he did repeatedly tell those near him that the acts of damage were disgraceful, and ought not to be repeated, and he regretted their occurrence, yet that the great tumult and noise prevented these remonstrances being heard by the crowd; that he made no attempt to leave his carriage or stop the procession when he found that they were not attended to. That the mob were evidently organised by some one or more in his interest to arrest the progress of the cavalcade, and make the counter demonstration of this procession, and that he accepted their services for the latter purpose. That considering his influence and position, had he left his carriage, which I had no doubt he could have done, at all events at Toomey's, or threatened to do so if more windows were broken, he could have restrained the mob so organised and disposed to promote his interest from committing further damage, That the standing up in the carriage and waving his hat in the air, though this may have been intended only for the persons at the windows, were voluntary acts improper under the circumstances, as they were calculated to incite and encourage the mob to continued acts of violence, and induced them to suppose that what they were doing was acceptable to him whose election they combined to promote.

12. Under these circumstances, believing that the defendant Young was a person of intelligence fully capable of appreciating the effects of his own acts, and that the defendant White had taken an active part in the entire proceedings of the mob, I held that the defendants were liable for the damage done, and gave a verdict for plaintiff, but gave the defendant Young leave to appeal against the decision if wrong in point of law.

The question for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench is whether under the circumstances proved the defendant Young was liable in point of law for the damage sustained by the plaintiff. If the Court of Queen's Bench should be of opinion that the defendant is so liable, then the judgment of the County Court is to be confirmed, but if the Court of Queen's Bench should be of opinion that the defendant is not liable then the judgment of the County Court is to be reversed.

A rule nisi had been obtained in the case calling on the judge of the County Court to show cause why the case, as stated by him, should not be amended by adding certain evidence, which it was alleged he had not set forth in the case. This rule, it appears, had been served personally on the judge.

Dowdeswell, Q. C. on behalf of the County Court judge, showed cause against the rule, and complained of the unusual procedure adopted in calling on the judge to show cause, the ordinary course being to call on the respondent to do so, notice being given to the judge. The evidence alleged to be omitted was contained substantially in the case as stated by the learned County Court judge.

Hawkins, Q. C. (with whom was Cotterell), in support of the rule, urged that the County Court judge had no locus standi, as the intention was that the respondent alone should be called on to show cause on notice being given to the judge. [BLACKBURN, J.—It may have been unintentional, but the rule does call on the County Court to show cause, and in the same form in which it calls on the plaintiff to do so. COCKBURN, C. J.—And in that respect it departs from the ordinary course.]

By the COURT.—Everything which the appellant wishes to have stated in evidence is substantially contained in the case as stated by the County Court judge, he having completely exonerated Mr. Young from any suspicion of having organised or paid the mob, or incited them to violence. The rule will therefore be discharged with costs.

Hawkins, Q. C. (with him Cotterell) then argued in support of the appeal. There was no evidence which would render Mr. Young liable for the wrongful acts of the mob in breaking the windows of the plaintiff. There was no contract between the mob and Mr. Young, who did all he could to quiet them. No one can be liable for a wrongful act unless he expressly or impliedly authorises it; and there is nothing whatever to show any authorisation by Mr. Young of the wrongful acts of the mob.

Digitized by Google

Mellish, Q. C. (with him Mereweather) on behalf of the respondent.—The appeal is only on the point of law involved in the case; this court being bound by the facts, and even by the inferences of fact drawn by the County Court judge. Now it is found by the judge that the defendant did, though unintentionally, acts "improper under the circumstances," which were calculated to and did incite and encourage the mob to continue their acts of violence;" and it is a principle of law that every man is liable for the natural consequences of his acts, even though he does not intend or desire that those consequences should follow. The respondent, doubtless, did not wish the windows to be broken; but hearing windows being broken as he went in procession through the town, he came back again in the same manner, and waved his hat to persons in the windows. Such an act was improper, and had a direct tendency to encourage the mob, and the respondent is found by the judge to have been "a person of intelligence fully capable of appreciating the effects of his own acts." [BLACKBURN, J.—He merely did an act which under the circumstances it was imprudent to do; but he did not intend the wrong which was done in consequence,] He is responsible for what was the natural consequence of his imprudence. [COCKBURN, C. J.—It is not a natural consequence of a person's waving his hat that windows should be broken.] Where the mob assembling to honour the respondent had already been breaking windows, it was a natural consequence of waving his hat that they should continue to break them; and he is liable for it however he may have disapproved of it. In Gregory v. Piper, 9 B. & C. 591, where a master ordered a servant to lay down a quantity of rubbish near his neighbour's wall, but so that it might not touch the same, and the servant used ordinary care in executing his master's orders, but some of the rubbish naturally ran against the wall, it was held that the master was liable in trespass, though he had given orders that the work should be done so that the rubbish should not touch the wall. [BLACKBURN, J.—Was not the ratio decidendi in that case that the act of the servant was done in carrying out his master's orders?] In M'Laughlin v. Pryor, 4 M. & G. 56, Tindal, C. J. says, "The general rule is that all persons acting together at the time of the commission of a wrongful act are presumed to assent thereto, and are considered in law as equally trespassers, and are all looked upon as principals. The inquiry is, not whether the act was wilful, but whether it was wrongful, and an immediate injury resulted from it; any inquiry into the intention of the party is quite unnecessary," and Lord Ellenborough, in giving judgment in Leame v. Bray, 3 East, 593, said: "The true criterion seems to be according to what Lord De Grey, C.J., says in Scott v. Shepherd, whether the plaintiff received an injury by force from the defendant. If the injurious act be the immediate result of the force originally applied by the defendant, and the plaintiff be injured by it, it is the subject of an action of trespass vi et armis, by all the cases both ancient and modern. It is immaterial whether the injury be wilful or not." Where a person converted his premises near a highway into a shooting ground, where persons came to shoot at pigeons which frequently escaped, and persons collected outside of the ground and in the neighbouring fields to shoot at them as they strayed, causing a great noise and disturbance, and doing mischief by the shot, it was held in Rex v. Moore, 3 B. & Ad. 184, that evidence of this supported an indictment against the owner of the premises for having caused such persons to assemble, discharge fire-arms, &c., inasmuch as their so doing was a probable consequence of his keeping ground for shooting pigeons in such a place. Littledale, J. said: "It has been contended that to render the defendant liable, it must be his object to create a nuisance, or else that that must be the necessary and inevitable result of his act. No doubt it was not his object, but I do not agree with the other position; because if it be the probable consequence of his act, he is answerable as if it were his actual object. If the experience of mankind must lead anyone to expect the result, he will be answerable for it." And in America it has been held that where the defendant foolishly went up in a balloon which descended into the plaintiff's garden and attracted a crowd, who trod down the plaintiff's vegetables and flowers, the defendant was answerable for the injury done by the crowd as well as by himself.

Guille v. Swann, 19 I. Rep. 381 cited in Sedgwick on Damages, 4th edit. p. 87.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think the whole question in this case turns on the finding of the County Court judge, and I take the effect of his finding to be on the whole this, that Mr. Young accepted the services of a crowd of people to drag him in triumph through the streets, and in the course of their progress windows were broken by the crowd, which was in favour of, and was accompanying, Mr. Young; but Mr. Young, while on the one hand he remonstrated with the crowd as far as language could go, and endeavoured to put a stop to their proceedings, on the other did one or two things which a prudent man would under the circumstances have abstained from doing. In the first place, in answer to the greetings of his partisans of both sexes, he waved his hat; and the judge has found that that was calculated to have, and did have, the effect of encouraging the mob. The judge says that if he had stopped the procession and got out of his carriage, there might have been an end put to the whole proceedings of the mob. I may take it, therefore, as found that Mr. Young was guilty of an act of imprudence, and that is all that is found. But I cannot see, because a gentlemen canvassing in the course of his electioneering is accompanied by a crowd of people, that they are therefore his agents, he doing nothing intentionally to encourage them. If he does some act which is no more than an imprudence, he cannot be held responsible for what the mob may do in consequence, in an action of trespass, which this is substantially.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case coming before the County Court judge without pleadings, if it appeared that the defendant was in any way liable for the damage sustained by the plaintiff, it would be proper to find against the defendant. The judge has found against the defendant, and has stated for us the facts on which he has so found. I quite agree with Mr. Mellish that when a person is a party to such proceedings as took place on this occasion, he is responsible for the effects of them, and that if a person causes people to form a procession with the object of glorifying his own party, and does so or causes it to be done under circumstances which would lead to the windows being broken, even though he does not wish them to be broken, this would be evidence to show that he was a party to the breaking. But that is not the case with regard to the defendant on the finding here. The County Court judge finds in effect that Mr. Young was not a party to the breaking in that sense, giving credence to Mr. Young's statement. He then goes on further to state the grounds on which he does think Mr. Young liable, and I can find no other ground than this, that if Mr. Young had got out of his carriage there was a high probability that the disturbances would have ceased, that a prudent man would have known that, and also the effect that taking off his hat would have, and that Mr. Young had in this way neglected his duty. But this does not make him in an action of trespass a party to what was done. Can we see then that there was a legal duty on the part of Mr. Young not to remain in his carriage under the circumstances of the case? I do not think so. The judge has acquitted Mr. Young in trespass, which would have been a good ground of liability, and found him guilty of negligence under what would have been a bad count in an action for negligence.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I entertained considerable doubt at one time as to the defendant's liability, owing to the finding of the County Court judge. But, taking the whole of the judge's finding together, the conduct of Mr. Young is not to be taken as amounting to an incitement of the mob, but consisting only in doing an act by lifting his hat, which was calculated to, and did, excite the mob in their acts of violence, an act perfectly innocent in itself, but one which was likely to excite the mob. That is, I think, the utmost which is found by the learned judge, and on such a finding I think the judgment cannot be sustained, and must be reversed.

Judgment of the County Court judge reversed.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, and H. H. HOCKING, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, Nov. 19.

HORSEY v. GRAHAM.

Agreement to procure transfer of lease—Statute of Frauds, sect. 4—Non-production of necessary document on motion for a rule—Costs.

An agreement by the defendant to procure for the plaintiff the transfer or sale of the unexpired term of a lease for 13 years of a public-house, was Held to be a contract as to an interest in lands within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds. (Keating, J., dubitante.)

If on a motion for a rule the production of a document is necessary, and proper notice to produce it has been given by the other side, the attorney, who neglects to produce it, will have to pay the costs of the motion.

The declaration stated that before and at the time of the making the agreement declared upon a certain public-house was held by one Carlton, as tenant under a lease, for an unexpired term of 13 years at a rent of 40*l.* per annum, granted by Messrs. Mann, Crossman, and Co., in which public-house were things relating to the trade of a public-house keeper; that the plaintiff was desirous of purchasing the said term and things, and of carrying on in the said house the trade of a public-house keeper, as the defendant well knew; that certain negotiations had been carried on between the plaintiff and the defendant for the purchase by the plaintiff of the said term and things, and the plaintiff had deposited with the defendant 10*l.* in part payment of the purchase-money, should these negotiations terminate in such purchase, but otherwise to be returned by the defendant to the plaintiff; and that thereupon it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that the defendant should and would procure a sale, assignment and transfer, to the plaintiff of the said unexpired term, and everything to, in, upon, and annexed to the said public-house as aforesaid, for the sum of 60*l.*, to be paid by the plaintiff for the same, that the plaintiff would purchase the same, and take such transfer and assignment at and for the price of 60*l.*, that the aforesaid sum of 10*l.* should be retained by the defendant as a deposit, and in part payment by the plaintiff of the said 60*l.*, that the plaintiff should then pay to the defendant a further sum of 10*l.* as further deposit and part payment, and should pay the residue of the said sum of 60*l.* on the completion of the said assignment and transfer, and all conditions, &c., were performed, &c.; yet the defendant did not nor would procure the sale, &c. of the said term and things, but failed and refused to do so, and would be henceforth unable to obtain such sale, &c., whereby the said deposits were lost to and other damage was incurred by the plaintiff. And the declaration also contained counts for money had and received, and on accounts stated.

The pleas were, traverses of the agreement and the breach of it, and (to the second count), except as to 20*l.*, never indebted.

Joinder of issue on the pleas.

In this case the plaintiff wanted to get the lease of a public-house, the Builders' Arms, in the Bermondsey-new-road, and having seen in the window the notice, "This house to let, apply to Mr. Graham," he applied to the defendant, an auctioneer and agent, accordingly. At that time the public-house was occupied by Carlton, who had a lease of it, from the brewers, Messrs. Mann, Crossman, and Co., of which a term of thirteen years was unexpired.

Graham told the plaintiff that he could get the house for him, and the following document, signed by Graham's son, was given to the plaintiff:

Auction, Estate, House, and General Agency Offices, Kennington-green, March 10, 1869.

Received from Mr. Henry Horsey 10*l.* (by cheque) as a deposit on the Builders' Arms, Bermondsey-new-road, subject to my being able to obtain lease, fixtures, utensils, and possession with 50*l.* cash, otherwise the deposit aforesaid to be returned. JOHNSTON GRAHAM, (for J. M. G.)

The plaintiff again called at the defendant's offices, and saw his son, who told him that his father would want 60*l.* in order to get the house. The plaintiff assented to this, and paid another 10*l.* on deposit, for which he had the following receipt:

Auction Estate, &c. Agency Offices, March 15, 1869.

Messrs. Mann, Crossman, and Co. having refused to see Mr. Horsey into the Builders' Arms, Bermondsey New-road, for 50*l.* cash, Mr. Horsey now informs me that he can muster 60*l.* cash. Such being the case I hereby agree to get the lease and everything for such sum of 60*l.* cash. Mr. H. has this day paid a further deposit of 10*l.*

JOHNSTON GRAHAM, (for J. M. G.)

On this occasion the defendant's son made an addition to an indorsement which had, on the former occasion been made on the receipt then given. This indorsement was as follows:—

Cash (by cheque)	£10
To be found	40
	£50	J. G.
Further deposit (gold)	10
	£60	J. G.

On March 17 the defendant wrote plaintiff a letter, saying: "Consider your matter settled; I will let you know early next week what day change is arranged for."

The plaintiff, relying on this letter, sold the business of a fishmonger that he was then carrying on, and prepared to take possession of the Builders' Arms. The lease, however, was transferred to some one else, and the plaintiff then brought this action.

At the trial the words "subject to my being able," in the receipt of March 10, appeared to have been erased, and the evidence was contradictory as to the time at which this erasure was made.

Digitized by Google

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 50*l.*, for the loss of the public-house, and 20*l.* 1*s.* on the money counts.

Garth, Q. C., for the defendant, subsequently moved for and obtained a rule, pursuant to leave reserved, to set aside the verdict and enter a verdict for the defendant on the first count, on the ground that there was no sufficient evidence within the Statute of Frauds to support the plaintiff's case; or for a new trial, on the ground that the judge misdirected the jury in telling them that they might find a verdict for the plaintiff, upon the parol evidence, in not leaving to the jury the point whether the defendant contracted as principal or agent, and in not requiring the jury to say at what time the erasure above referred to was made.

Francis Turner (with whom was Henry James, Q. C.) showed cause against the rule.—When the rule was granted, the receipt, in which the erasure is said to have occurred, was not produced by us, and its non-production was remarked by the court. We had not received proper notice to produce it. [BOVILL, C. J.—That then is a sufficient answer. But attorneys ought to understand distinctly that, where on a motion for a rule the production of a document is necessary, and proper notice for its production is given to the other side, if it be not produced, the attorney will have to pay the costs of the motion.] The jury have found a parol agreement by the defendant to get the public-house for the plaintiff, and such agreement was enough. This agreement was not within sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds, and writing was therefore unnecessary. But if writing was necessary, then it is submitted that there was a sufficient memorandum according to the statute. The statute was intended to apply only where the contractor has some interest in land, which he agrees to give up; not to such a case as the present where the agreement was to use best endeavours and influence with the landlord in order to procure the interest in land from a third party. In Cocking v. Ward, 1 C. B. 868; 15 L. J. 245, C. P., it was agreed between the plaintiff, who was the tenant of a farm, and the defendant, that the plaintiff should surrender his tenancy and prevail on the landlord to accept the defendant as tenant in his place, and that the defendant should then pay him for so doing 100*l.*; and it was held that the contract amounted to a sale of an interest in land within the statute. But there part of the contract was the surrender of the tenancy which the plaintiff then had. So, too, in Hodgson v. Johnson, E. B. & E. 689; 28 L. J. 88, Q. B., the agreement held within the statute, was that the defendant should give up his tenancy of a brickyard, and should endeavour to induce the landlord to accept plaintiff as a tenant in his (plaintiff's) place. In Wright v. Stavert, 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 175; 29 L. J. 161, Q B., the defendant agreed by parol with the plaintiff, who kept a boarding-house, to pay for the board and lodging of himself and servant, and accommodation for a horse, 200*l.* a year from a given day, terminable by either party, by a quarter's notice. The defendant having refused to enter on the occupation, it was held that this was not a contract of an interest in or concerning land within sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds. Crompton, J. said, "the argument amounts to no more than that the defendant should become an inmate of the plaintiff's establishment; and no contract was shown for the entire and exclusive possession of any particular piece of land. . . . . The cases relied upon by the defendant, as explained by Bayley, J. in Edge v. Strafford, 1 Cr. & J. 391; 9 L. J. 101, Ex. are at once distinguishable, viz., that as soon as the argument was come to there was created an interesse termini, and it would amount to a demise as soon as executed by the entry of the proposed occupier. I agree with the Chief Justice (Cockburn) that the cases (on the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds) have been carried far enough." The plaintiff is at any rate entitled to succeed on the count for money had and received, for as to this the consideration was executed. In Griffith v. Young, 12 East. 513, a tenant agreed with his landlady that if she would accept another for her tenant in his place (he being restrained from assigning the lease without her consent) he would pay her 40*l.* out of 100*l.* which he was to receive for the goodwill, if her consent were obtained. It was held that the old tenant having received the 100*l.* from the new tenant was liable in an action for money, had and received, the consideration being executed and the case therefore taken out of the Statute of Frauds. And in Savage v. Canning, 1 Ir. Com. Law Rep., where a special oral contract was entered into between plaintiff and defendant, one term of which fell within the Statute of Frauds, it was held that the special contract could not be enforced, yet that the entire work and labour to be done under the contract having been performed, and the benefit of it accepted by the defendant, the plaintiff could recover the value of the work and labour on the common counts, although up to trial the special contract was relied on. Morris, J. (at p. 446) said, "Suppose a party has executed work and labour under contract, and that the equivalent he is to get is something which it is impossible for him to enforce against the defendant for want of compliance with the Statute of Frauds, can he recover no compensation whatever, because he cannot recover the precise amount of remuneration for which he stipulated? . . . I think the plaintiff can bring an action for work and labour done by him, and the benefit of which the defendant has enjoyed, notwithstanding the existence of a special contract, bad by the Statute of Frauds, under which the work has been done." The case of Rein v. Lane, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 466; 8 B. & S. 83, was also referred to.

Garth, Q.C. (A. L. Smith with him) in support of the rule.—This contract was within the Statute of Frauds. Rein v. Lane (ubi sup.) is not in point, for that was decided on consideration of the purpose of the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79 as to stamps on charter-parties, a consideration which would not apply to the Statute of Frauds. The case of Kelly v. Webster, 12 C. B. 283 is directly in point. There the judge of a County Court held that an agreement to pay a sum of money in consideration of the giving up of a tenancy under a parol agreement for a lease was not within the Statute of Frauds. That judgment was reversed on appeal; and Maule, J. said, "When anything is done which substantially amounts to a sale or parting with an interest in land, the contract is 'for or relating to the sale of an interest in or concerning lands, tenements, and hereditaments' within sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds. After the decision of this court in Cocking v. Ward, I think it is impossible to say that the ruling of the County Court judge was right."

BOVILL, C. J.—The action in this case was brought on a contract by the defendant to procure for the plaintiff the transfer to him of the unexpired term of a public-house called the Builders' Arms. It seems to me clear that it would be trifling with the words of sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds, to say that this is not an interest in or concerning lands, for an interest in land was contracted to be conveyed to the plaintiff. It is said, however, on the other side, that as the defendant had no interest in the land at the time the contract was made, that therefore the 4th section does not apply. But it must be remembered that in such a contract, there is also an implied contract that the defendant will deduce a good title; it is not alleged in the declaration that the defendant has any interest in the premises, but that he will procure a transfer of the premises, and deduce a good title by obtaining the concurrence of all necessary parties. Now, if this had been an action by a purchaser against a vendor of land, there would not have been any doubt about the matter, although at the time of the contract the vendor had not a good title; the contract in that case would have been that the vendor would deduce a good title. The very object of the Statute of Frauds would be defeated if we were not to hold that this contract came within it. The Statute of Frauds, by sect. 17, applies also to the sale of goods and a guarantee for the price of goods would be within the statute, and require writing. A guarantee on the sale of goods has, however, for the purposes of the Stamp Acts, been held to be within the exemption in 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, sched. part 1, title "Agreement," as a "memorandum, letter, or agreement made for or relating to the sale of any goods, wares, or merchandise." Yet, in the case of Rein v. Lane (ubi sup.), decided on the stat. 5 & 6 Vict. c. 69, s. 2, and schedule, it was held that a guarantee for the due fulfilment of a charter-party, was not a "memorandum, letter, or other writing . . . for or relating to the carriage of goods on board ship," which by the above statute would have been required to be stamped as a charter-party. It was argued in Rein v. Lane that the words of the above statute, being similar, ought to receive the same construction. Blackburn, J., however, explains why this should not be. He says: "No doubt, in one sense this guarantee is a writing 'relating to' the charter-party, as a guarantee for the payment of the price of the goods sold is an instrument 'relating to' the sale of goods; and if the two clauses occurred in enactments on the same subject, they ought to receive the same construction. But the exempting clause in 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, was introduced for the purpose of encouraging the sale of goods, and, as Lord Ellenborough said in Warrington v. Furber, 8 East, 245, was to be liberally construed; it includes every instrument 'whereof the sale of goods is the primary object,' as was said in Smith v. Cator, 2 B. & A. 781, when, but for that instrument, the contract of sale would not have been entered into, and the sale would not have taken place, so that it is the meritorious cause of that which the Legislature wished to encourage. On the other hand, the clause in question (that of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79) imposes a tax, and the construction of it is the reverse to that of an exempting clause; the object is indeed to reach all documents which are in substance and effect charter-parties, but not to clog the making of them by imposing the same stamp on collateral instruments." Considering the object of the Statute of Frauds, we must hold that the present agreement was one that was thereby required to be in writing. In Seaman v. Price (ubi sup.) it was assumed that such an agreement as the present must be in writing. As it is uncertain, on the finding of the jury, which of these documents is the real contract, and as the jury have not found when the erasure was made, there must be a rule for a new trial.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion that there should be a rule for a new trial. I have some doubt how far this contract is within sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds. I do not intend, however, formally to dissent from the opinion of the rest of the court. I should be more clear about it if any distinct authority had been produced. My doubt is whether the words "contract, or sale of lands, or any interest in, or concerning them," can be intended to apply to a case like the present, where one of the contracting parties has not any interest to part with under the contract. But my doubt is not sufficient to justify me in dissenting from the rest of the court, especially as the Chief Justice thinks the point so clear.

BRETT, J.—Proof only of a verbal contract is not sufficient to support an action upon any contract or sale of lands, or any interest in or concerning them. Supposing in the present action, to put the converse case, the defendant had sued the plaintiff for not accepting the lease of the public-house, obtained for him by the defendant in pursuance of the contract. Could it then have been contended that the contract was not within the Statute of Frauds, as being only with reference to work and labour to be given by the defendant in procuring the lease? It could not. In the Irish case, cited in argument, the plaintiff relied on the money counts in order to recover his commission. I think there ought to be a new trial.

BYLES, J. concurred.

Attorney for the plaintiff, Brady.

Attorneys for the defendant, Shum and Crossman.

Tuesday, Nov. 23.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

KIRTON v. DEAR.

County vote—Incumbent of district church—Fees on marriages, baptisms, and churchings performed within the church—Stipend paid by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the treasurer of Queen Anne's Bounty —8 Hen. 6, c. 7.

K., as incumbent of the district church of St. A., in the parish of B., in the county of M., had a freehold for life in the said church and churchyard. By orders in council the sums of 150*l. and* 50*l. were ordered to be paid annually to the incumbent of the said church by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of England and the treasurer of the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty respectively. Under and by virtue of an order in council, K., as such incumbent, was entitled to and in receipt of the fees paid in respect of marriages, baptisms, and churchings performed in the said church, and the income arising from these fees exceeded* 40*s. per annum. It was proved that K., as incumbent, was in receipt of fees paid in respect of burials of persons dying within the district attached to the said church, though the said burials took place in another parish; these fees amounted to more than* 40*s. a year. No evidence, however, was given of his right or title to these fees. No assignment of pew rents had been made, nor was K. in receipt of any income from pew rents:*

Held, that K. was not entitled to a vote for the county of M. in respect of the church, as the church was not itself worth, nor could K. make it worth, 40*s. a year to him, and the fees and other emoluments, which he was as incumbent entitled to and in receipt of, could not be considered as giving the church a value.*

On appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for Middlesex, the following case was stated for the opinion of the court:—

Charles Kirton duly claimed to have his name inserted on the list of voters for the county of Middlesex, and Dear duly objected to his name being inserted therein.

The facts of the case are as follows: The said Charles Kirton duly claimed in respect of a freehold benefice situate in the polling district of Bethnal-green, in the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, in the said county, such freehold benefice being known or distinguished by the name or title of St. Andrew, Bethnal-green.

It was proved before the revising barrister that the said Charles Kirton was duly appointed by licence of the Bishop of London, dated the 10th June 1864, to the office of perpetual curate or incumbent of the church of the perpetual curacy of St. Andrew, Bethnal-green, in the said county, and he was by the said licence authorised to receive and enjoy all and singular the stipends, profits, and advantages whatsoever belonging to the said office.

The district chapelry attached to the said church of St. Andrew was assigned to the said church by an order of Her Majesty in Council, dated the 3rd April 1843, made on the recommendation of the Church Building Commissioners, and under and by virtue of the several statutes next hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, (1) the 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, (2) the 59 Geo. 3, c. 134, (3) the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 72, and (4) the 1 Vict. c. 75, and which said order in council was published in the London Gazette of the 16th June 1843. That by another Order of Her Majesty in Council, dated 10th June 1843, and published in the London Gazette of the 16th June 1843, and made on the recommendation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England and under and by virtue of the statutes next hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, and the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 39, the annual sum of 150*l.* was ordered to be paid by the said Ecclesiastical Commissioners to the incumbent for the time being of the said Church of St. Andrew, Bethnal-green, by equal half-yearly payments, as therein mentioned.

That by another Order of Her Majesty in Council, dated the 8th Aug. 1853. and published in the London Gazette of the 9th Aug. 1853, and made on the recommendation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, and under and by virtue of the several statutes next hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, and the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 49, it was ordered that the annual sum of 50*l.* should be paid to the incumbent of the said church of St. Andrew, Bethnal-green, by the treasurer of the governors of the Bounty of Queen Anne out of a sum of 475*l.* charged, as therein mentioned, on the tithes or payments in lieu thereof, part of the revenue of the rectory of St. Andrew Undershaft with St. Mary Axe in the city of London.

That under and by virtue of the hereinbefore mentioned Order in Council of the 3rd April 1843, the said C. Kirton as the incumbent for the time being of the said church of St. Andrew, Bethnal-green, is entitled to and in receipt of, the fees paid in respect of marriages, baptisms, and churchings performed in the said church, and that the income arising from such fees is more than 40*s.* per annum over and above all rents and charges payable out of or in respect of the same.

That the said C. Kirton is in the receipt of fees paid in respect of burials in Bow Cemetery of persons dying within the said district attached to the said church of St. Andrew, but no evidence was furnished of right or title of the said C. Kirton to such fees, or of the persons from whom the same were received.

The income from such burial fees amounts to more than 40*s.* a year over and above all rents and charges payable out of or in respect of the same.

That no assignment of pew rents has at any time been made to the said C. Kirton under or by virtue of any of the Acts in that behalf made and provided, and that the said C. Kirton is not in receipt of any income from pew rents or the letting of pews.

The revising barrister was of opinion that the said C. Kirton was not, in right of his said office of perpetual curate or incumbent of the said church of the perpetual curacy of St. Andrew, Bethnal-green (irrespective of the source from which the income as coming to him in right of his said office was derived), entitled to have his name inserted in the list of voters for the said county. He was also of opinion that the said C. Kirton was not by virtue of his office seised of or entitled, either at law or in equity, to a freehold estate in lands or tenements in the same county and in the same parish as that for which he claimed to be registered, of the clear yearly value of 40*s.*, over and above all rents and charges payable out of or in respect of the same.

He therefore disallowed the claim of the said C. Kirton to have his name inserted in the list of voters for the said county.

If the court should be of opinion that his decision was wrong, the register was to be amended by inserting the name of the said C. Kirton, with his place of abode and the particulars of his qualifications in the said list.

Sir John Karslake, Q. C. (Morgan Howard with him) for the appellant.—There is no question as to Mr. Kirton being seised in fee of his church. By stat. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, a common fund was created which is distributed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. From this fund Mr. Kirton receives 150*l.* a year, and he receives 50*l.* a year from Queen Anne's Bounty. His benefice then is worth more than 40*s.* per annum. By Order in Council, dated 3rd April 1843, the incumbent is entitled to fees on baptisms, marriages, and churchings performed in the church. These fees are of more than 40*s.* annual value. The burial fees also are of more than that value. In point of value the site and fabric of the church are worth more than 40*s.*, independently of the church being a source of income. The claim is made under 8 Hen. 6, c. 7. We need not look at the Reform Acts. If it be said that the two sums of 150*l.* and 50*l.*, each of which is derived from land though not within the parish, cannot be said to make the benefice in which he has a freehold of the requisite value, then surely Mr. Kirton may rely upon the fees which he receives as holder of the benefice, and for services performed within the church. These fees make up part of the value of the church. [BRETT, J.—Supposing that Mr. Kirton were entitled to these fees as incumbent, but not for services performed in the church.] I might then be met by saying that the services might be performed out of the parish. If a man has a freehold office connected, as this is, with the tenure of land, it is sufficient that his office produces 40*s.*, and immaterial that this 40*s.* is not produced from the land. [KEATING, J.—If Mr. Kirton received 50*s.* a year from personal property as his only emolument, but still held the church, would he be entitled to a vote?] The question is difficult to answer; but I contend that if the office cannot he held without the right to receive money, then by virtue of his office alone he is entitled to a vote. Then, again, Mr. Kirton might, no doubt, get an assignment of pew-rents; he only forbears to do so on account of the poverty of the parish. That ought to be taken into account in estimating the value of the church. Thus in Astbury v. Henderson, 24 L. J. 20, C. P.; 15 C. B. 251; K. & G. 6, it was held that where a man had been offered 15*l.* a year for a plot of building ground, but in fact the land in its then state was not worth 40*s.* a year, he was held entitled to a vote. [BOVILL, C. J.—It is sufficient to say that, as matters stand, Mr. Kirton has no power to receive pew-rents.]

Simon, Serjt. (Michael with him) for the respondent.—The question is whether Mr. Kirton's office is one, the emoluments of which are derived out of land. It is contended on behalf of Mr. Kirton, first that the benefice, qud benefice, entitles him to a vote; and, secondly, that, if that is not so, the fees and other payments made to him as incumbent, connected with the site of the church, give a vote. But I contend that this benefice is not one of the old type; it has not existed from time immemorial, nor has it any glebe attached to it. What is meant by a benefice? not the land attached to an office, but the office itself. In this sense it is used in Acts of Parliament. If then a benefice is an office, the claimant must show that its duties are paid by at least 40*s.* a year arising out of land within the county. A freehold office of the value of 40*s.* is not sufficient. This was decided in Hall v. Lewis, 31 L. J. 45, C.P.; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491; Bushell v. Easter, 31 L. J. 44, C. P.; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 580); in a case also of a clerk of the peace (Middlesex, 2 Peck. Selby's case), and in that of the masters in Chancery (2 Peck. 93). Then as to the two sums of 150*l.* and 50*l.* a year, they are not shown to arise from land within the county. As to the intrinsic value of the church and land, that has nothing to do with the question; suffice it to say that the claimant has not and cannot get 40*s.* a year out of the land. Then as to the fees, they are not paid except for services rendered. The fee is not for the use of the church, but for the services of the clergyman. There is no common law right to those fees. Even in the ecclesiastical courts, it has been held that they are for services done, and irrespective of the church.

Burdeaux v. Lancaster, 1 Salk. 332;
Patten v. Castleman, 1 Lee Eccl. Cas. 387;
Topsall v. Ferrers, Hob. 175.

[BRETT, J.—How has that been since Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act? On a marriage, if another clergyman perform the ceremony, the rector of the parish in whose church the ceremony is performed, has a right to a fee. If so, what is that but a payment for the use of the church?] He has no right to a fee under such circumstances. A clergyman is entitled to a fee on performing the baptismal or matrimonial service in a private house, just as much as if he had performed the ceremony in the church.

Sir J. Karslake, Q. C. in reply.—As to the burial fees, it is true that they are not derived from land within the parish; still it must be remembered that they are given to the incumbent by an Act of Parliament, which substitutes them for fees, which, but for the Act, would have been payable to the incumbent in respect of the churchyard of his own church. The incumbent ought not to be put in a worse position by reason of an Act of Parliament saying that no further interments shall take place in his churchyard. Then as to the fees on baptisms, marriages, and churchings, the barrister has found that Mr. Kirton "is entitled to and in receipt of" them. It is said that these ceremonies may be performed out of the church; but the case finds that the fees in question are paid in respect of marriages, &c., which, as a matter of fact, are performed within the church. These fees are so connected with the church as to give a value to it. In the cases cited, the offices and the emoluments are wholly unconnected with land.

BOVILL, C. J.—It is not disputed that Mr. Kirton, as incumbent of the church of St. Andrew, Bethnal-green, has a freehold office, and is entitled to the freehold of the land on which the church stands. In that capacity, and as freeholder of the church, he is entitled to certain emoluments. As incumbent he is entitled to the land and building. As incumbent, he is entitled, under an Order in Council dated the 16th June 1843, to 150*l.* a year, and also to receive a further sum of 50*l.* a year from the treasurer of the Governors of Queen Anne's bounty. As incumbent, he is also entitled to certain fees for baptisms, marriages, and churchings; and as incumbent he is also entitled to certain payments by the Act of Parliament establishing the cemetery at Bow. All these separate emoluments accrue to him in his character of incumbent, and by reason of his office. But we are asked to hold not only that he enjoys these emoluments in right of his office, but that he derives them from land, and that, too, land within the parish. As to the church itself, as a church, it is not found that it has any value for letting, or that it produces any income. No assignment of pew-rents has been made, and no emoluments are derived from either church or land, nor has the incumbent any power to obtain profit from either. He has no power to let it, and it has no value for occupation. Then as to the stipend from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, it is not to be contended that that is derived from land. It is derived from a common fund, and created by Act of Parliament, and in no sense or shape can it be said to be derived from land within the county to which the incumbent is entitled. The same remark applies to the stipend from Queen Anne's Bounty and to the payments made in respect of burials under the Act. The only part of the claim as to which Mr. Kirton seems to me to have a chance of success is that relating to the fees on baptisms, marriages, and churchings. But then can it be said that these fees arise from the land, or that the land in respect of them becomes of 40*s.* value. These fees are paid when services are performed, and seem to me to have no connection with the land. The right to the fees depends either on custom or Act of Parliament. They do not arise from either ownership or use of land. It seems to me that they are paid for services performed in the church; and although it is true that some of these ceremonies must by law be performed in the church, still some, perhaps, need not be. On these grounds I think that Mr. Kirton is not shown to have any source of income from land within the parish, and consequently that the decision of the revising barrister must stand.

WILLES, J.—As I have not heard all the arguments, I give no judgment.

KEATING, J.—I also think that the revising barrister was right. The only point that has been seriously insisted on in support of the claim is, that as the incumbent is entitled to fees on baptisms, marriages, and churchings performed within the church, the church thereby becomes of 40*s.* value; in other words, that, inasmuch as these ceremonies take place within the church, and Mr. Kirton has by virtue of his office a freehold in the church, they enhance the value of the church. But I think that my brother Simon has assigned to these fees their proper character. These fees are not payable by common right. Whatever proceedings may have taken place in the ecclesiastical courts, a court of common law will not countenance them unless the right to them be founded on immemorial custom or Act of Parliament. This was very clearly laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Bryant v. Foot, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 161; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 55, which was affirmed afterwards in the Exchequer Chamber, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 578; L. Rep. 3 Q B. 497, and is now law. That case decides in the strongest way that, when the fee claimed is so large that it could not possibly have been paid in the reign of Richard I., that is evidence that it cannot be claimed by immemorial custom; and as it was not claimed by Act of Parliament, it was disallowed altogether. My brother Simon is right in saying that the fee is paid only for services performed, and it is wholly irrespective of land or of the place where the ceremony is performed. No doubt the Act of Parliament says that marriages are to take place in the church; but the annexation of personal services to a particular place does not make the reward for those services a freehold. On these grounds I, too, think that the decision of the revising barrister must be affirmed.

BRETT, J.—Since the Registration Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18) a man who claims a county vote as a 40s. freeholder, must show that he has land of that value, not only within the county, but within the parish. As I understand this case, the question is not whether Mr. Kirton has a freehold within the parish, but, assuming that he has one, is it of 40s. value? I think that the revising barrister has made a right estimate of the value of the church. As to the two sums payable to the incumbent, the one from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the other from the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, I may say that, even if those sums do arise from land, it is not land within the parish. Then again as to the cemetery fees, even if we were to hold that they are payable in respect of the use of the cemetery, the cemetery is not within the parish. The only point that can be relied on is the claim to the fees for marriages, baptisms, and churchings, which take place within the church of which Mr. Kirton has the freehold. But the cases clearly show, that before Lord Hardwicke's time these fees were paid only in respect of personal services, and indeed before his time it was not to be argued that they were payable in respect of the use of the church. The question then arises, whether in consequence of Lord Hardwicke's Act providing that some of these ceremonies shall take place within the church, that can be said to have made the fees arise out of the church, and depend more on the use of the church than they did before. I think not. The payments are claimable by custom for personal acts; they are made for services performed in the church, but not for the use of the church or anything belonging to it. Thus they do not add to the value of the land, and thus the claimant has not shown himself to be possessed of lands and tenements of the value of 40s. All that can be said of him is that he has land, and that he performs services on it which bring him in 40s. On these grounds I also am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister must be affirmed.

Simon, Serjt., asked for costs.

Decision affirmed with costs against the appellant.

Marriott, Jordan, and Cooper, attorneys for appellant.

William Gardiner, attorney for the respondent.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, Nov. 8.

MAXSTED v. MORRIS.

Stock exchange—Sale of shares to jobber—Name ticket—Transfer not executed by or brought to knowledge of nominee—Carrying over without nominee's authority—Bankruptcy of nominee—Ratification of authority—Repudiation of transfer—Liability of jobber to indemnify vendor from calls.

On the 14th June 1866, the plaintiff's brokers sold for him to the defendant, a jobber on the Stock Exchange, twenty O. and G. shares (15l. paid up) at 16½ discount, and received from the defendant a name ticket, in which the name of E. S. was inserted as the purchaser at one-eighth, and the consideration stated to be 2l. 10s., whereupon the transfer was completed, by inserting therein the consideration (2l. 10s.) and the name of E. S. as the purchaser, in accordance with the ticket, and was executed by the plaintiff and handed by his brokers to P. and Co., the London brokers of E. S., but it was never executed by E. S., nor sent to him, nor was he aware that any transfer had been executed; and the shares remained on the register in the plaintiff's name as holder. Previously to this, on the 29th April 1866, E. S. had, through M., a country broker, instructed P. and Co. to purchase for him, which they accordingly did, 1000 O. and G. shares for the account day of the 15th May. This transaction was a mere speculation on the part of E. S., and he never intended to take a transfer to himself, as was known from the first to M., but not to P. and Co. until after the purchase was made by them, and shortly before the account day of the 15th May; on the 10th May O. and G. stopped payment, and E. S. was applied to by M. for money to take up the shares, or to carry them over, but he did not pay or provide any money for that purpose, nor did he give authority to M. or to P. and Co. to carry the shares over beyond the 15th May; nor was he consulted by them, nor did he do or say anything further in the matter. On the 14th May M. wrote to P. and Co. informing them that E. S. could not meet his engagements as regarded the shares, and that M. could not meet them either, and therefore authorising P. and Co. to do "whatever they thought best." Thereupon P. and Co. carried over the contract in respect of a portion of the said 1000 shares to the then next account day on the 30th May, and again subsequently from that day to the account day of 14th June, on which last mentioned day they gave E. S.'s name for twenty of these shares, by means of the before mentioned name ticket which was then handed by the defendant to the plaintiff's brokers, as above mentioned; M. being aware and approving of what P. and Co. had so done. Two calls were made on the said shares by the liquidators in Aug. and Oct. 1866 respectively, and were paid by the plaintiff. In Oct. 1866, E. S. was declared bankrupt, and the plaintiff proved for the amount of the first call, on which a dividend was declared, but was never received by him. P. and Co. proved and received a dividend on the amount of the purchase money of the 1000 shares, but both plaintiff and defendant were, at the time of the bankruptcy proceedings, ignorant of the before mentioned transactions between E. S., M., and P. and Co.

In an action by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant, as on a contract of indemnity as purchaser of the shares, the amount paid by the plaintiff for the above mentioned calls, it was Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C. B., and Channell, Pigott, and Cleasby, BB.), giving judgment for the plaintiff on a special case, that the shares having been carried over from the 15th May without any authority, express or implied, from E. S. for so doing, the contract was at an end so far as E. S. was concerned on that day; and that the contract of the 14th June, therefore, was not binding on him, and therefore the defendant, not having given to the plaintiff a contract binding on E. S. as the ultimate purchaser, had not discharged himself from the responsibility which, by the usage of the Stock Exchange, rests on the jobber, under such circumstances, as the purchaser, and so remained liable to indemnify the plaintiff against the calls, according to the rule laid down in Maxsted v. Paine (1st action), 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 34; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 81; 31 L. J. 41, Ex.

Held, also, that neither the taking no notice by E. S. of M.'s application for money to take up or carry over the shares, nor the proceedings in bankruptcy, amounted to a ratification by E. S. of the carrying over the share on the 15th and 30th May, and the giving in his name on the 14th June, or by the plaintiff of the acceptance of such name as that of the actual purchaser; and that no repudiation of the transfer on the part of E. S. was necessary.

This was a special case stated for the opinion of the court pursuant to an order of Nisi Prius, dated the 23rd March 1868.

The action was brought to recover from the defendant the sum of 400*l.* and interest, the amount of two calls of 10*l.* per share upon twenty shares in Overend, Gurney, and Co. (Limited), under the circumstances hereinafter set forth.

The pleadings are annexed to and form part of the case.

The cause was set down for trial, at the Spring Assizes held at Kingston, for the county of Surrey, on Monday, the 23rd March 1868, and a verdict was entered by consent for the plaintiff, and the above-mentioned order was made; and it was agreed that judgment should be entered up according to the opinion of the court upon the following

SPECIAL CASE.

1. The plaintiff is a gentleman residing at Hull, in Yorkshire, and the defendant is a stock and share dealer or jobber, and is a member of the Stock Exchange, and carries on business on the London Stock Exchange, and at No. 2, Hercules-passage, Old Broad-street, in the City of London.

2. The plaintiff was, at the time of the sale to the defendant hereinafter mentioned, the owner and original allottee of twenty shares in Overend, Gurney, and Co. (Limited), for which he paid 300*l.* These shares were 50*l.* shares, with 15*l.* paid-up.

3. Overend, Gurney, and Co. stopped payment on the 10th May 1866, and on the 11th of the following June the company passed a resolution to wind-up voluntarily, and on the 22nd June 1866 an order was made by Kindersley, V.C. to continue the voluntary liquidation under the supervision of the Court of Chancery, and William Turquand and Robert Palmer Harding, public accountants, were appointed the liquidators.

4. On the 13th June 1866, the plaintiff instructed his stockbrokers, Messrs. Sandeman, Dobree, and Co., to sell the said twenty shares for him, and on the following day, the 14th June, Messrs. Sandeman, and Co., in pursuance of their instructions, sold to the defendant on the Stock Exchange, in the ordinary course of business as a stockjobber, the said twenty shares at 16½ discount per share, that being the market price of the day.

5. The following entry of the sale was made in Messrs. Sandeman, Dobree, and Co.'s bargain book: "20 Overends, 16½, June 14, N. Morris, E. P. Maxsted." A similar entry being also made by them in their checking book, and the following entry was made by the defendant in his checking book: "14th June, Overend Gurneys 20, Sandeman and Co., 16½, 14th June." Messrs. Sandeman and Co. handed to the plaintiff the following account or sold note, and on the 24th June 1866 received from him 31*l.* 5*s.* in payment.

2, Royal Exchange Buildings, London, 14th June 1866.

	£
Shares, 15*l.* paid, at 16½ dis.	£30	0	0
Brokerage	1	5	0
	£31	5	0

Norman Morris. SANDEMAN, DOBREE and Co.

6. The sale and purchase of shares on the Stock Exchange is either for cash, in which case the transaction is supposed to be settled on the day it is entered into, or for "the account," the "account" being a day fixed by the committee of the Stock Exchange on which all transactions entered into since the previous account are completed; and the practice of the Stock Exchange in carrying out the transaction is this:—The broker of a buyer, who intends to become a transferee of shares, draws a ticket stating the name and address of the buyer, the price at which he buys, and the name of the buyer's broker, and delivers it to the jobber, from whom he has purchased, such jobber passes it on to the person from whom he has purchased, and the same ticket is again passed on, until it again reaches the hands of the broker for the original seller. This broker procures a transfer to be executed by his principal in favour of the ultimate buyer, or person named in the ticket. On the day on which the purchase is to be completed, the broker for the original seller takes a ticket, and a transfer of the shares, to the broker who issued the ticket, and from his hand receives, from the ultimate buyer, the consideration money stated on the ticket. The differences between the amount actually paid, and the prices of the intermediate bargains, are then paid and received by the several jobbers and brokers through whom the transaction was passed.

7. The 14th June 1866, the day on which the plaintiff's shares were sold to the defendant, was the first "account" day in Overend, Gurney, and Co. shares for that month, and the defendant on that day handed to Messrs. Sandeman, Dobree, and Co., the following "name ticket:"

Consideration 2*l.* 10*s.*

Ticket No. 472. Twenty Overend, Gurney, and Co. shares at one-eighth to Edward Smith, of Norwich, M.D.
Pater and Co., 75, Old Broad-street, 13th June 1866.

8. Messrs. Sandeman and Co. filled in the transfer of the shares by inserting therein the said consideration. and the name of the said Edward Smith, in accordance with the above-named ticket, which transfer was duly executed by the plaintiff, a copy of the transfer as filled up is annexed, and marked B.

9. On the 18th June Messrs. Sandeman and Co., in accordance with the practice of the Stock Exchange, handed this transfer along with the certificates of the shares, and the said name ticket to Messrs. Pater and Co., the persons whose names appear on that ticket as the said Edward Smith's stockbrokers, and in exchange for these documents received from them the sum of 2*l.* 10*s.*, being the consideration stated in the said ticket, which amount Messrs. Sandeman and Co. placed to the credit of the defendant, along with the 30*l.* payable to him in respect of the sale to him of the said twenty shares, but the said transfer was never executed by the said Edward Smith, nor sent to him, nor was he aware that any transfer to him had been executed, and the plaintiff's name remained on the register of shares in Overend, Gurney, and Co. as holder of the said twenty shares.

10. The said Edward Smith, through Edward Morgan, a broker, at Norwich, had given three orders to the said Messrs. Pater and Co., dated respectively 19th, 26th, and 27th April, 1866, for the purchase in the whole of 1000 shares in Overend, Gurney, and Co., at the market price of the day, for the account of the 15th May.

11. The transaction, so far as the said Edward Smith was concerned, was a mere speculation in the rise or fall of the market, and he never intended to take a transfer of the said shares, or of any of them, to himself; this was known from the first to Morgan, but was not known to Pater and Co. until after the purchase next mentioned, and Pater and Co. were not aware who Morgan's principal was until a day or two before the said 15th May, and after all the shares had been purchased.

12. Until Morgan applied to Smith for money, as hereinafter mentioned, Morgan believed Smith to be a person of considerable property.

13. Upon the receipt of the said orders, Messrs. Pater and Co. bought shares, in accordance with the said orders, to the number in the whole of 1000. The contracts, in respect of a portion of the said

1000 shares, were closed on the said 15th May; the contracts in respect of another portion were carried over to the next account day, the 30th May, and from that day again to the following account day, namely, the 14th June, under the circumstances mentioned in paragraphs fourteen and seventeen.

14. After the said purchase, and shortly before the 10th May, the said Edward Smith was applied to by his said broker, Morgan, to furnish money for the purpose of either taking up the said contracts, or carrying them over, the market having gone down since the said purchase.

15. The said Edward Smith did not pay the consideration money for the shares which were so purchased on his behalf, or for any of them, nor did he provide any of the money so required for taking up or carrying over the said contracts; he did not give any express authority either to Morgan or to Pater and Co. to carry over the contracts, or any of them beyond the 15th May; he was not consulted by either Morgan or Pater and Co, nor did he do anything further in the matter after being applied to by Morgan as mentioned in paragraph 14.

16. Messrs. Pater and Co., on the 14th May, had been informed by Morgan that Smith was Morgan's principal, and was without any means of taking up or carrying over the contracts for the shares.

17. On the 14th May 1866, Pater and Co. received a letter from Morgan in the following terms:—"Our client cannot meet his engagement as regards the 1000 Overends, and we unfortunately cannot meet them, therefore we authorise you to do whatever you think best." On the receipt of this letter, Pater and Co. gave Morgan's name for 880 of the 1000 shares (a), and carried over contracts in respect of 120 of the said shares to subsequent account days as before mentioned.

18. On the account day of June 14, contracts in respect of the greater portion of the 120 shares being still open, Pater and and Co. gave Smith's name for twenty shares by means of the ticket mentioned in paragraph 7, and also for other of the 120 shares which they did not succeed in carrying over beyond the account of June 14. Morgan was at the time aware and approved of their doing so.

19. There is no custom of the Stock Exchange that, in case of a purchase of shares by a broker for a principal, for the next account, the broker may, without express authority, carry the shares over, if the principal do not when the day arrives, give a name for them, or provide him with funds for taking them up. The usual and proper course in such a case is for the broker to submit to have the shares sold out against him in the market by the official broker, a person appointed for the purpose by the committee of the Stock Exchange. The buyer from the official broker thereupon gives a name, and the broker of the defaulting principal pays to the person from whom he bought, the loss, if any, occasioned by the transaction; but the name of the defaulting principal does not appear in any way in the market.

20. A broker of the London Stock Exchange, who receives instructions from a country broker, looks to the latter only, and not to the client of the country broker, as his principal; but there is no rule or custom of the Stock Exchange which forbids his giving the name of the client of the country brokers under the circumstances mentioned in the preceding paragraphs 10 to 18.

21. The statement of the practice and usage of the Stock Exchange, as printed in the report of the case Grissell v. Bristowe, in the L. Rep. 3 C. P. 112, is to be taken for the purpose of this case to be correct and to form part of this case: (See report of the case also 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 564.)

(a) See the report of the case of Street v. Morgan, ante p. 432.

22. Both the plaintiff and the defendant were, at the time of the proceedings in the bankruptcy of the said Edward Smith hereinafter referred to, altogether ignorant of the existence of the abovementioned transactions between Smith, Morgan, and Pater and Co.

23. On the 20th Aug. the liquidators of Overend, Gurney, and Co. (Limited) made a call of 10*l.* per share, payable on the 15th Sept., and the plaintiff paid the said call on the said twenty shares, amounting to 200*l.*, on the 25th Oct. 1866; and on the 10th June 1867 the court made a second call of 10*l.* per share, payable on the 25th June, and the plaintiff paid the said second call, amounting to 200*l.*, on the 25th Aug. 1867. It is admitted for the purposes of this case that both calls were properly paid by the plaintiff.

24. The said Edward Smith, the alleged transferee of the said shares, was declared bankrupt on the 15th Oct. 1866, and one James Pope Kitchen, as representing the said Messrs. Pater and Co., was subsequently appointed the creditors' assignee.

25. The plaintiff afterwards, on the 21st Jan. 1867, tendered a proof against the estate of the said Edward Smith for 200*l.*, the amount of the first call of 10*l.* per share on the said twenty shares paid by the plaintiff. The proof was opposed by the creditors' assignee, and was, in the first instance, admitted as a claim only. The claim was afterwards, on the 22nd Feb. 1867, admitted as a proof, but without prejudice to the right of the assignees to apply to expunge the same if so advised.

26. The plaintiff's name appears in the list of creditors entitled to a dividend of 5*d.* and one-sixteenth of a penny on 200*l.*, that is to 4*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*, declared in March 1867, but the plaintiff has never received any dividend in respect of the said proof. No proof in respect of the second call hereinbefore mentioned has been tendered.

27. The said James Pope Kitchen proved, on behalf of the said Messrs. Pater and Co., against the estate of the said Edward Smith for the sum of 14,679*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.*, being the purchase-money for the said 1000 shares, and the said Messrs. Pater and Co. received a dividend of 5*d.* 1-16 in the pound upon the said proof.

28. The defendant repudiates all liability in respect of the said shares sold to him, and has refused to pay the plaintiff the amount of the said calls, or to indemnify him.

29. The printed rules of the Stock Exchange and the memorandum and articles of association of Overend, Gurney, and Co. (Limited), may be referred to by the court and either party for the purpose of this case.

30. The correspondence between Morgan and his solicitor (Mr. Tillett) on the one side, and Pater and Co., and Kitchen, who represented them, on the other side, is set out in the appendix, and may be referred to by either party on the argument of the case, subject to any objections to the admissibility of any portion of it, as evidence in this action.

31. The court is to be at liberty to make any amendments in the pleadings on such terms as to the court shall seem proper, and also to draw any inferences of fact.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether under the circumstances above stated the defendant is liable to pay the amount of the above calls on the said twenty shares. If the judgment of the court is in favour of the plaintiff, then judgment is to be entered up for the plaintiff for 400*l.* and interest from the time the calls were paid at 5*l.* per cent. per annum and costs: if the judgment of the court is in favour of the defendant, then judgment is to be entered up for the defendant with costs.

The following extract, from the correspondence and telegrams set out in the appendix to the case, and referred to in the argument of counsel and the judgments of the court, are material.

11th May 1866. Letter.—Morgan and Co. to Pater and Co.—"We have yours of yesterday, and transfer of five Overends, as to which should have thought, under the circumstances, that the settlement in Overends as to carrying over or otherwise would have to be postponed till next week. Please let us know to-morrow. One thousand of the Overends are bought by one man, and suppose by your wires no carrying over can be done; if they must be taken up, we hear his bankers may be induced to assist him, which would probably depend much upon whether Overends do or do not resume business. It is confidently expected here (Norwich) that they will do so, and that the suspension is only temporary. Name for the odd twenty, or we will send you to-morrow if necessary. The panic has been truly fearful."

Same date. Letter.—Pater and Co. to Morgan.—"We note by your wire to-day that you would send instructions as to Gurneys to-night. We fear we shall have to take up the whole or nearly so, and, if so, must of course ask you to let us have a credit here not later than Tuesday morning, and if any are carried over, please send the difference on them directly."

12th May 1866. Telegram.—Morgan to Pater.—"Should have wired sooner, but occupied in the matter. Most deeply grieved to find buyer can do nothing without assistance from his bankers. If Overends open again, they may possibly take the whole up for him. Buyer, within the year, was worth 30,000*l.* or 40,000*l.*, and we believe he was at date of transaction. Has still large income from profession. He has fearfully and fraudulently deceived us."

Same date. Letter.—Morgan to Pater.—"Our client cannot meet his engagements as regards the 1000 Overends, and we unfortunately cannot meet them; therefore we authorise you to do whatever you think best. Mr. Brown will explain the reasons for our not writing more fully."

14th May 1866. Letter.—Morgan to Pater.—"The transaction, so far as the buyer is concerned, is nothing more nor less than a complete swindle, and he shall be dealt with accordingly. My solicitor thinks it comes legally so entirely within the term I have used, that he shall be able to make him set aside a larger portion of his income to meet his liability to us. The history of the transaction is this," &c.

Same date. Letter.—Pater to Morgan.—"We have been compelled to-day to pass your name for 900 of the Gurneys, as we could not sell them on so short a notice, and, besides, that would involve an immense sacrifice, which neither your client, nor yourself nor ourselves, are in a position to bear."

15th May, 1866. Telegram.—Morgan's solicitor to Pater and Co.—"Morgan has placed your letter of the 14th in my hand. I must request that Morgan's name be immediately withdrawn in respect of all the Overends, and Edward Smith, of Norwich, M.D., be substituted. I am responsible for this advice."

Same date. Letter from same to same.—"I am decidedly of opinion that Smith's name must be passed, and must object against Morgan's name being used."

Same date. Letter.—Pater and Co. to Morgan.—"We were surprised and pained at receiving a message from your solicitor that you refused to allow us your name for the 880 Gurneys, though you had given our Mr. Brown a written authority to do what was best for all our interests."

6th June, 1866. Morgan to Pater and Co.—"In reference to yours of the 1st inst., it appears to us, as regards Dr. Smith, he is not in a position to free himself from his liabilities. The transaction is of such a swindling character that if he was opposed he would certainly not, we imagine, get his certificate; and the Bankruptcy Court, we apprehend, would put him in no better position than he is now in."

12th June, 1866. Letter.—Pater and Co. to Morgan.—"We have carried over thirty of the 100 Gurneys still open, and we are afraid we shall have to pass Dr. Smith's name for them, or yours."

The plaintiff's points for argument: First, that as the defendant was the original purchaser of the shares from the plaintiff he is bound to indemnify the plaintiff against all future liabilities upon them. Secondly, that the defendant was bound to furnish the plaintiff with the name of a bonâ fide and responsible purchaser for the shares, or to take them himself; and that in the absence of his doing so he is liable to indemnify the plaintiff against subsequent calls. Thirdly, that no transfer of the shares having been ever accepted by the defendant's nominee the defendant remains liable to the plaintiff. Fourthly, that the defendant had no power or authority to pass the name of Smith as the purchaser, as Smith never did in fact become the purchaser or transferee of the shares in question. Fifthly, that nothing has taken place to divest the defendant of his original and primary liability to indemnify the plaintiff against further liability on the said shares.

The defendant's points for argument: First, that the defendant is not liable for the amount of the call, as the contract for the purchase of the twenty shares referred to in the case was made by him as a jobber in his regular course of business, in accordance with the usages and customs of the London Stock-Exchange. Secondly, and also for that the plaintiff accepted the defendant's nominee as a transferee, and executed a transfer of the said shares to such nominee, which was received and accepted by him. Thirdly, and also for that the plaintiff for the amount of the calls paid by him proved against the estate of such transferee after such transferee had been adjudicated a bankrupt. Fourthly, that it appears upon the case that the defendant had done everything that he was under any liability to do, with respect to the twenty shares referred to in the case when the call was made, and that it does not appear by any statement in the case, that the defendant has incurred any liability to pay to the plaintiff the amount of the call, or to show that the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant any part of the amount paid by the plaintiff in respect of the said call.

Pollock, Q. C. (with him Watkin Williams) for the plaintiff.—The rights and liabilities of Smith and of the defendant also were determined on the 15th May, and it is clear that Smith, who is now put forward by the defendant as liable, would, by reason of the difference in the price of the shares, be prejudiced by the carrying over from that date to the 14th June. Moreover, Morgan had no authority from Smith for so carrying them over, but it was done by Morgan and Pater without authority for the purpose of staving off the evil day from themselves. Paragraph 20 will be relied on by the defendant, and it is not denied on the plaintiff's part that the custom there mentioned may be a wholesome one in any question as to commission between a town and country broker, but it has no bearing on the question in this case. The name given as the ultimate purchaser must be that of a bonâ fide purchaser, and when Smith's name was given he was not a purchaser; true he was originally a purchaser for the 15th May, but having given no authority to carry over, his liability as purchaser ceased on the 15th May. For that, the decision of this court in the first action of Maxsted v. Paine, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 34; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 81; 38 L. J. 41, Ex., is an authority. Looking at the question in the light of the decisions in the Exchequer Chamber, in Grissell v. Bristowe, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 390; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 36; 38 L. J. 10, C. P., and by Lord Cairns L. C., in Coles v. Bristowe, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 403; L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 3; 38 L. J. 81, Ch., the alternative custom is for the broker to give either his own name or that of a real purchaser. Whatever name is put in the ticket, through whatever channel or number of brokers it may come, the name ultimately given must be that of the real purchaser, so that it is a binding contract on him to take these shares. But on the 14th June, when his name was given, Smith was not a purchaser. The correspondence, set out in the appendix to the case, between Morgan and Pater shows the nature of the transaction as regards Smith between them and him. Under no circumstances can Smith be considered a buyer. The decisions in Grissell v. Bristowe, in the Exchequer Chamber (ubi sup.), and Coles v. Bristowe, in Chancery (ubi sup.), do not govern the present case, which, as well as Maxsted v. Paine, No. 1 (ubi sup.), is distinguishable therefrom. Without some such limitation of the rule as to the liability attached to the name handed in as the buyer, as is found in Maxsted v. Paine (No. 1), there would be no protection against a man's being held liable for an indefinite period. No doubt there are facts in Maxsted v. Paine (No. 1), (ubi sup), which go beyond the present case, but the governing fact there was, as in the present case, the carrying over without authority. With regard to the plaintiff's proving against Smith's estate, which will be relied on by the defendant, he did it in ignorance of the facts. But he has received no dividend, and has since withdrawn. A man proving against the estate of a person called "George Jones," and finding out afterwards that it was not the "George Jones" who was his debtor, would not be estopped from afterwards proving against the right "George Jones." So here, Smith turns out not to be a person liable to the plaintiff, and the latter, therefore, cannot be answered by the doctrine of election. It was a mistake of facts and not of law. The plaintiff, it is submitted, is entitled to be indemnified by the defendant against the calls.

Digitized by Google

Mellish, Q.C. for the defendant.—The real question is, did Smith authorise the name ticket, and was he then a purchaser? Not such a purchaser probably, as the plaintiff was bound to accept had he objected; because, doubtless, if the plaintiff's broker had inquired into the transaction during the ten days allowed by the rules of the Stock Exchange, it may be the plaintiff would have objected, and would not have been bound to execute the transfer to Smith; but he has executed and delivered it, and it was subsequently acted on by all parties as a valid transfer. The plaintiff acted on it by proving against Smith's estate for the first calls, and Pater and Co. by proving for the purchase money; and neither Smith nor his assignees, nor any of the creditors, have made any objection to the transaction, but all was carried out on the assumption that the transfer was valid. Were Overend and Gurneys to be re-established, and these shares to become highly valuable, neither the plaintiff who had executed the transfer and proved for the call, nor the defendant who had given in Smith's name could say that either Smith or his assignees were not entitled to the shares, and to all profits accruing or arising from them. It is now too late, therefore, for the plaintiff to fall back upon or to set up a claim against the defendant; the transaction as to the jobber has been completed. All that the jobber agrees to do is to find a proper purchaser, and if he gives in the name of one, and the transfer is executed without inquiry, and is not repudiated by the transferee, the matter is at an end. [KELLY, C. B.—All that may be conceded, but it comes at last to the question in the special case, was there any authority by Smith to the defendant to make Smith liable as the ultimate purchaser of these shares on the 14th June?] The shares having been bought originally by Smith's order for the 15th May, the crash occurred before that day arrived, when the money must have been provided by somebody, or the shares would have been lost or sold at an enormous loss. Neither Smith, Morgan, nor Pater could find the money for the 15th May. Smith, on being applied to for it, does the most natural and wisest thing in his position, namely, nothing; he neither sends money nor instructions, but is silent. A purchaser by his own order cannot so escape from his liability. As Smith neither sent money nor instructions, and neither Morgan nor Pater could find it, Morgan, Smith's broker, gave instructions to Pater to carry these shares over. Can this be said then to be entirely without authority? The first case of Maxsted v. Paine (ubi sup.) differs from the present case in two respects; first, there was there no transferee or purchaser at all, whilst here Smith was the original purchaser by his own orders; and, secondly, there was there a direct repudiation of the transfer by Maxwell, whilst here Smith has never repudiated at all. The second case of Maxsted v. Paine, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 748; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 203; 38 L. J. 129, Ex., is a direct authority that, if the seller accepts the transferee and does not repudiate the contract, though he might have done so at the time, he cannot afterwards fall back upon the broker. By executing the transfer the seller, as was put by Cockburn, C. J. in the Exchequer Chamber in Grissell v. Bristowe (ubi sup.), deprives himself of the power of delivering the shares to the jobber. The shares are now vested in Smith or his assignees, for good or evil, and the plaintiff cannot transfer the beneficial interest in them to the defendant. That is the test. It is too late now for Smith to repudiate. His conduct at the time was an implied authority, and his subsequent bankruptcy a ratification of it. It is submitted first that there was originally a sufficient authority by Smith for the purchase, and, under the circumstances, an implied authority to the broker to deal with the shares in the best way for his own protection, as between him and the person giving the original order, and so a sufficient authority as against Smith for carrying them over. And, secondly, if there were not an authority originally, yet he had allowed himself to be made bankrupt on the footing of these transfers being valid, and had allowed the call and the price of the original purchase-money to be proved for against his estate, and had not, up to this moment, repudiated any part of the transaction, and it would now be too late to do so; and the beneficial interest having passed to Smith, a purchaser has been procured with the plaintiff's consent, and it is now too late for him to bring this action against the defendant. He cited also Paine v. Hutchinson, before the Lords Justices, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 380; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 388; 37 L. J. 485, Ch.

Pollock, Q. C. was not called on to reply.

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the judgment of the court. The plaintiff had entered into a contract with the defendant for the sale to him of twenty shares in the Overend and Gurney company, and the contract took place, and was to be executed and carried into effect on the 14th June. The plaintiff having sold the shares to the defendant, and the defendant having purchased them of the plaintiff, became, upon the authority of decisions both in the Exchequer Chamber and in the Court of Chancery, bound to indemnify the plaintiff, the seller, against any calls which might thereafter be made. Two calls have been made since this contract was entered into, and the plaintiff has been called upon under them to pay the sums of money specified in the case, and this action is brought to recover back those sums from the defendant, as the purchaser of the shares. Upon the facts, so far as I have now stated them, he, having been the purchaser of those shares, is no doubt bound to indemnify the plaintiff against these calls, and the plaintiff therefore is entitled to judgment. But it is contended on the part of the defendant that, although he was the original purchaser of the shares, yet under and according to the usage of the Stock Exchange he has given in the name of another person, in due time on the name day, and therefore that person has become liable to the claim of the plaintiff, and that he, the defendant, is discharged. Now the custom is in effect this, that if the purchaser of shares within the time when the contract is to be carried into effect, and the shares transferred by the seller, and accepted by the purchaser, gives in the name of another person as the ultimate purchaser, with the authority of that other person, and that other person is accepted by the seller as the ultimate purchaser, the jobber or the original purchaser is discharged. Has this been done in this case? The circumstances of the case are these. First, negatively, Dr. Smith whose name was given, certainly never authorised the defendant to purchase any shares or to give in his name as the purchaser of any shares, on the 14th June; he never, directly or indirectly, authorised the defendant to enter into the contract, for his benefit or on his behalf, which the defendant has entered into with the plaintiff; but what he did was this: In the month of April he authorised one Morgan, a broker at Norwich, and Morgan authorised Pater, his London broker, and it may be taken, if necessary, that Pater had authorised the defendant, to contract for the purchase of a thousand shares of Overend, Gurney, and Co., for the then next account day, which was the 15th May; and there can be no doubt that if, on the 15th May, it turned out that the plaintiff had been the seller of any or all of these shares, and that the defendant had on that day given in the name of Smith, and the plaintiff had accepted that name as the purchaser, Smith would have been bound to complete that purchase and accept the transfer; and if he had been unable to pay the purchase-money, or had refused to accept the transfer, still he would have been liable at law to be deemed the purchaser, and liable from that time forth to indemnify the plaintiff against any calls which might be made in respect of the shares so purchased. But it turned out on the 15th May, the account-day, and when the liability of Smith accrued to accept the 1000 shares which had been purchased on his behalf, that he was unable to find the money, and Morgan gave certain instructions to Pater and Co., and some communication or other seems to have been made to the brokers of the seller of the 1000 shares which had been purchased, under which a settlement took place (to which it is unnecessary to refer) of, I think, 880 shares. But as to 120 of the shares, the contract was carried on, or forward as it is called, according to the usage of the Stock Exchange, until the 30th May, and then again until the 14th June, when the shares in question were ready to be transferred by the plaintiff into the name of Smith. Now, in order to discharge the defendant from the performance of the contract into which he had entered, two circumstances must concur. First of all, having given in the name of Smith, Smith must have been accepted and adopted by the plaintiff as the ultimate purchaser of the shares, and that appears to have taken place—it is unnecessary to consider what steps might have been taken during the ten days either to object to or reject the proposed ultimate purchaser. Here, without availing himself of any such custom or privilege, the plaintiff at once appears to have accepted Smith as the purchaser, and to have executed the transfer to him. But the other circumstance which must occur in a case like this to entitle the plaintiff to treat the nominee as the purchaser, is that the nominee, who is sought to be treated as the ultimate purchaser, must have given the requisite authority to the broker or jobber, to give in his name as the ultimate purchaser, under the contract which has been entered into with the seller. Has that been done? Clearly it was not done. No authority had been given to enter into a contract to be executed on the 14th June; an authority had been given and was executed to purchase, on behalf of Smith, the 1000 shares, but it was for the 15th May. On the 15th May, what were the rights and liabilities of the parties? The broker or the jobber who represented Smith, had a right to call upon Smith to pay the price of the shares and to accept the transfer, and, if he was unable to do so, or refused to do so, then, according to the usage of the Stock Exchange, the broker or jobber, or the representative of Smith, was entitled to take the shares. He should have allowed the seller to sell the shares as against him, to use the language of the Stock Exchange, and the person who is called the "official broker" to become the purchaser; then the nominee, who has given the authority for the shares to be purchased in his name, would have become liable upon that sale, or upon the resale of the shares as against the purchaser, to make good to the seller, or the jobber or broker, the difference between the price which he had contracted to pay and the price which had been realised by the sale. This custom was disregarded. No sale of the shares as against the defendant, or as against the broker or jobber of Smith, or as against Smith himself, took place according to the custom, or in any other way. But what was done was this, the representative of Smith took upon himself to carry forward the contract from the 15th May to the 30th May, and afterwards from the 30th May to the 14th June. If Smith had authorised him to do this, Smith would have been liable on the 30th May, or again on the 14th June, to accept the transfer, and in all respects to execute the contract as purchaser, and to carry it into effect; but he has given no such authority, and it seems to me manifest that to hold that he became liable to accept the purchase and the transfer, and to become the purchaser or to pay the difference upon the 14th June, would be in direct derogation of the contract into which he had entered; and would expose him to a liability which he had never incurred, the liability to allow the shares to be sold as against him on the 14th June. Just let us see what would be the effect of a transaction of this nature, if Smith were bound by it, having given no authority to carry forward the contract from the 15th May against the usual rule, or indeed to make any contract, or to carry any contract into effect except one for the 15th May. Let us suppose that Smith had originally contracted for the purchase at 15*l.* a share. On the 15th May, according to the usage of the Stock Exchange, the shares might have been sold against him, and they would on that day have sold for 1*l.*, that is 14*l.* discount; there are several prices mentioned, but I will take it, in this case, that the shares might then have been sold at 14*l.* discount, or in other words, at 1*l.* a share, and the loss of Smith upon that transaction would have been the 14*l.* a share, namely, the difference between the 15*l.* per share contract price and the 1*l.* a share realised upon the sale of the shares that day. When we arrive at the 14th June the shares were not only at a discount of 15*l.*, the original price at par, but they were at a further discount of 30*s.* a share. The loss, consequently, upon the 1000 shares of Smith, if he had been bound to carry the contract into effect, as the ultimate purchaser on the 14th June, or to allow the shares to be sold against him, would have been 2*l.* 10*s.* a share, instead of 1*l.*, to which alone he would have been liable and have been the loser of on the 15th May. It is impossible, to say that this, having been done without Smith's authority, is a contract binding upon him, and it is only by giving to the plaintiff, the seller, a contract binding upon Smith as the ultimate purchaser that the defendant, the real and original purchaser, can be discharged. That raises the question whether, upon the whole of the facts here, Smith can be deemed to have given any authority to the broker, or jobber, or whoever represented him on the occasion, to carry forward the contract from the 15th May to the 30th, and from thence to the 14th June? Now, in the first place, it is expressly found by the case that, although it is the usage of the Stock Exchange that, on the account day, without any express authority, or without any authority at all on the part of the ultimate seller or the nominee, the shares may be sold as against him, no custom exists on the Stock Exchange under which, without the authority of the nominee, and without the authority of persons sought to be charged, the ultimate purchaser, the broker, or anyone can carry forward the contract. Then is there any authority to be implied from the facts here? It is contended by the defendant that if an individual, who becomes a purchaser of shares in a particular name, is unable to perform his contract by finding the money to pay the price of them, the broker is authorised to do anything that he may think best for the interest of all parties; but I am clearly of opinion that that is not so. The whole question of this expressed or implied authority which is given, is to allow the shares to be sold as against the ultimate purchaser, and then either the seller or the broker will have a claim as against the ultimate purchaser; and if that course had been adopted on the 15th May, either the seller or the broker would have had a claim against Smith for the difference between the price at which he had contracted to purchase, and the price which would have been realised upon sale of the shares on the 15th May. But I am clearly of opinion upon every principle of reason and justice as well as of common sense, that no broker or jobber has authority to carry forward the contract, that is, to appoint another and a distant day for the execution of the contract, by which his principal may be largely prejudiced without that principal's authority. Here Smith, the principal, would have been largely prejudiced, to the extent I have pointed out, of 2*l.* 10*s.* a share by carrying over his contract from the 15th May to the 14th June. Having given no authority to the broker to carry forward, there was no contract, and the broker having carried forward, cannot therefore make Smith, his principal, liable to carry that contract into effect on the 14th June, and consequently has not brought himself within the practice and usage of the Stock Exchange of substituting another nominee for himself, with power to the seller to resort to any remedy against the nominee which the law would have given him against the original purchaser. He therefore must be taken to be the original purchaser, and must be liable to indemnify the plaintiff against calls. It has, indeed, been argued by Mr. Mellish that, the transfer having been made by the plaintiff, and the instrument of transfer having been executed by him to and in the name of Smith, some repudiation on Smith's part is necessary to do away with the effect of that instrument. I am again clearly of opinion that no such repudiation is necessary, and that it is not competent to any body, by the execution of an instrument purporting to transfer property or shares to another person, to impose upon that other, the transferee or grantee, the obligation to do any act whatever. The name of any gentleman in this court, or of one of the Rothschilds, might have been given as the purchaser of these shares, but no one would say that the obligation is imposed upon them to inquire into the transaction, and to repudiate a transfer which they had given no authority to anyone to make for them. The instrument, therefore, is a document brought into existence under a mistake. The broker having given in that name, the seller was led to suppose that it was given with the authority of the person named. It turns out that it was not given with that person's authority. I am of opinion, therefore, that the transfer which was executed under those circumstances was mere waste paper, and is absolutely null and void. But it has also been contended that the plaintiff, by proving under Smith's bankruptcy, has adopted Smith as the purchaser, and cannot now insist upon treating the defendant, the original purchaser, as being liable to this demand. It appears to me, however, that the question is, not whether the plaintiff may have claimed this sum of money, or proved for it, under the bankruptcy against Smith, but whether Smith is liable, or whether the plaintiff has by law a demand against Smith, which is capable of being enforced in law or in equity, which he now seeks to enforce against the defendant; and on the ground I have already stated I am of opinion that that is not so. Then it is said that Pater and Co. have either petitioned for this bankruptcy, or that they have proved under it for the amount in question, and against the estate of Smith. But, again, I am of opinion that nothing that Pater and Co. could do would affect the rights of Smith, or nothing that Smith's assignees could do; nothing that could have taken place, in any way, in relation to this transaction between Pater and Smith, can at all render Smith liable to this demand, unless Smith had given authority which, on the ground already stated, I am clearly of opinion he never has given, for the carrying over of this contract from the 15th May to the 14th June. It remains only to observe that, upon principle, this is the decision which I do not hesitate to pronounce in this case. I must say I think that the case of Maxsted v. Paine (No. 1), L. Rep. 4 Ex. 81; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 34; 38 L. J. 41, Ex., is clear and decisive upon the very point now before the court for decision, and I am, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the judgment of the court to be indemnified against the calls which have been made upon him.

Digitized by Google

CHANNELL, B.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment, and that upon the ground so fully stated by my Lord Chief Baron. There is no doubt, according to the decisions, as I understand them, that the defendant, the jobber, comes under the primary liability to the plaintiff; the liability from which, in a given event, he would be discharged. The question is whether what has taken place in this case shows that the defendant has given in the name of a person, with that person's authority, so that the shares should all vest in Smith the transferee so as to discharge the defendant? Now, in the first place, I entertain very grave doubt whether the transfer was worth anything at all. It was not made on the 15th May, nor on the 30th May, nor until the 14th June, and the defendant had given no authority, according to the usage of the Stock Exchange, for a transfer to him with reference to the account being wound-up and settled on the 14th June. And, taking it to be the fact that there has been a transfer executed in point of form and of fact, I am yet to see whether the defendant's nominee has authorised the carrying it out on the 14th June. It appears to me that a very few facts, stated in the special case, put an end to this inquiry. The case clearly shows the authority which Smith originally gave, and then it goes on to say that he did not pay the consideration money for the shares which were so purchased on his behalf, or for any of them, nor did he provide any of the money as required for taking up or carrying over the contract. He did not give any express authority either to Morgan or to Pater and Co. to carry over the contracts, or any of them, beyond the 15th May. He was not consulted by either Morgan or Pater and Co., nor did he do anything further in the matter. So that, according to the case, there was no express authority on his part; he was not even consulted, and he did nothing. Now paragraph 19 says, "There is no custom of the Stock Exchange that, in the case of a purchase of shares by a broker for a principal for the next account, the broker may without express authority carry the shares over if the principal do not, when the day arrives, give a name for them or provide him with funds for taking them up." And it goes on further to say, "The usual and proper course in such a case is for the broker to have the shares sold out against him in the market by the official broker." Now I find there is no express authority, and that nothing was done at all on the part of Smith, and he was not even consulted. Further than that, I find that the case states, not only in the absence of express authority, but affirmatively states, what is the proper course to be taken under such circumstances. I cannot conceive that paragraph 20, which Mr. Mellish has called our attention to very properly, is strong enough. It is as follows:—"A broker of the London Stock Exchange who receives instructions from a country broker, looks to the latter only, and not to the client of the country broker, as his principal, but there is no rule or custom of the Stock Exchange which forbids his giving the name of the client of the country broker under the circumstances mentioned in the preceding paragraphs, 10 to 18." Under these circumstances, it appears to me that there is an absence of any authority as against Smith, and that there was no giving in the name of a purchaser so as to exonerate the defendant, and that under these circumstances the rule laid down in this court in the case of Maxsted v. Paine, No. 1 (ubi sup.), applies, and that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

Digitized by Google

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the reasons given by my Lord Chief Baron and my brother Channell, for the judgments at which they have arrived, and I think the defendant is liable to make good the 400*l.* to the plaintiff for the calls upon these shares. There is no doubt, upon the facts, that the defendant did purchase these shares of the plaintiff on the 14th June. Therefore his duty upon that contract was, either to pay these calls, or to give the name of a person who was willing to take the shares from the plaintiff. Now the name that he gave is that of Dr. Smith. What is the history of this Dr. Smith, and of his liability to take the transfer? It is this. In the month of April he had given authority to a broker of the name of Morgan to purchase a thousand shares for the account day of the 15th May, and it seems that he was unable to take them up; and on the 14th May, Pater and Co., who handed his name to the present plaintiff, were informed, first of all, that Smith was without any means of taking up or carrying over the contracts for the shares. A previous paragraph (No. 15) to that which my brother Channell has read shows that there was no express authority by him to have these shares carried over from the 14th May until the day in question, the 14th June, or the intermediate settling-day, the 30th May; and, secondly, it appears that, so far from there being any implied authority to carry them over, he, instead of being on the 14th June a purchaser, was, what I think we may rather call, according to paragraphs 16 and 17, a defaulter of at least a month's standing with regard to the shares which he had, a month before that time, authorised to be purchased in his name. No doubt paragraph 17 contains an authority from his broker to Pater and Co. to do as they pleased or thought best; yet that cannot be said to be an authority by him, because Morgan was giving it on his own account, and it was given for 880 shares, and did not in any way emanate from Smith. But it appears to me that the express authority to carry these shares over is negatived. Implied authority there is none; the evidence goes on to negative the implied authority also. Then what is there to show that Smith was the name a person who was accepted by the plaintiff, and so exonerated the defendant from liability? I can find nothing in the way of ratification, except that the plaintiff, no doubt, executed the transfer; but it was in ignorance of all these facts, and under a mistake of facts with reference to Smith being a voluntary purchaser. Further, Mr. Mellish has urged that Smith's bankruptcy, and the non-repudiation of the proof by the plaintiff were some evidence that Smith authorised, or ratified rather, the giving in his name, as being properly given. It seems to me that it is nothing more, when you look at it, than a bankruptcy, and the bankrupt taking no part, doing nothing as far as we know, and not being aware of this proof being entered against the estate. It would be impossible, upon such facts as these, to eke out a ratification which would bind the present plaintiff. Whatever effect it might have had as regards Smith, it cannot bind the plaintiff, who was ignorant of all these circumstances which I have alluded to, nor the parties who signed the transfer in ignorance of them. It seems to me that the defendant has not gotten rid of the liability which devolved upon him from the purchase, and he has not paid these calls, nor found a name, and therefore that he is liable to pay.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. The contract for these shares was made on the 14th June. At that time, it is true, no order had been made by the Court of Chancery for the winding-up of the Overend and Gurney estate, but it is pretty obvious that it had been pending, and one cannot help looking at the real nature and effect of such a contract. It is not a contract by which it is intended that any property in shares should pass by way of transfer, which could not take place after the order, which was on the 22nd June; but, substantially it was a mere contract of indemnity, thus: "You give me 30*s.* per share, and I will indemnify you from the calls, and I am to be entitled to any benefit that may result from the shares when the whole of the account is taken by the Court of Chancery." That would have been the necessary effect of it after the 22nd June. Previous to that time it had not exactly that effect; but, substantially, it was that sort of contract which was contemplated. Therefore it was a contract peculiarly of a personal nature, as regards the person agreeing to indemnify, because, as the name upon the register could not be transferred after the winding-up, without the consent of the Court of Chancery, the plaintiff would necessarily remain liable for all calls. He would have to look to the personal responsibility of the person with whom he made the contract. That being so, one cannot help being a little startled at finding, upon a personal contract of this nature, on the 14th June, a man who on the 14th May had been declared to be "a swindler." The whole transaction as regards Smith had, on the 14th May been declared to be "a swindle," yet on the 14th June it is proposed that his name should be given by way of substitution for the name of Morris, the defendant. That however is not the question in the present case. The question here is this, was the condition performed which, according to the rules of the Stock Exchange, absolved the defendant from the performance of his contract? There is no doubt that he entered into the contract to accept the shares and indemnify the plaintiff. Did he absolve himself from it? That depends upon this: There is a transfer tendered purporting to be made to a man of the name of Smith. That transfer is at one-eighth, and it was executed by the plaintiff; and, according to the decisions, if he executed a transfer to Smith at one-eighth with the assent, and by the authority of Smith, and Smith having agreed to be bound by a contract to buy at one-eighth, then, subject of course to any objection being taken, the jobber Morris would be absolved. But that is just where this case fails altogether. It is only where a contract is executed by which the transferee is bound by law that that result follows. Therefore it is on the defendant to show that Smith was under an obligation, from what had occurred, to execute this transfer and to get it registered,—at that time a registry being possible. But upon this point the evidence fails entirely. It appears that Smith had entered into a contract to buy for the account day on the 15th May. It is true that, in this case, the difference in price between the two periods is small, but that makes no real difference. It might have been very large indeed; ten times as great as it is, or even much more, and might have involved the whole amount between the parties. Therefore, unless it can be shown that the authority to buy for the account on the 15th May involved an authority to carry over to subsequent account days, and then involved an authority to give in the name of Smith as a purchaser, not at the price at which he had bought, but at the price upon the third account day, the condition, it appears clear to me, has not been performed. The evidence upon that subject has been fully referred to by my Lord, and therefore I will not futher advert to it. Suffice it to say that, in my opinion, it negatives that authority; and as regards any ratification by Smith, the case states that the transfer never was executed by him, nor sent to him, nor was he even aware that any transfer to him had ever been executed. Unless, therefore, he had given authority—which, as he never knew of the transfer, he could not have done—he cannot be said to have ratified it. That seems to me to dispose, with the assistance of Maxsted v. Paine, No. 1 (ubi sup.), of that part of the case. But then it is said by Mr. Mellish that something has taken place since, in this case, which prevents the plaintiff from relying upon the decision in that case. Now the plaintiff tendered a proof against Smith. The proof was not admitted, except conditionally. That really carries the case no further. It is the same thing over again as to the execution of the transfer. Then, as regards what Pater did afterwards, that can have no effect upon the right of the present plaintiff. It has nothing to do with it. We are left very much in the dark as to the proper effect to be given to that proof. I cannot but think that there has been some mistake, when it is said that Pater proved for the price of the whole of the shares. But nothing turns upon the question as to the proof with respect to the 1000 shares. Whatever Pater proved for it can really make no difference as regards the plaintiff. When it is said that the defendant Morris cannot have the benefit of these shares in consequence of what has taken place with Smith, I dissent from that altogether. I have no doubt that if Morris's name were entered on the transfer, and presented to the Court of Chancery, with a request to be allowed to have his name placed there in lieu of that of the present plaintiff, the court would, upon his being shown to be a responsible man, allow his name to be so placed. We must go back, therefore, to see who was the proper person to be placed on the register as to these shares. If the name is to be changed, it may, under the circumstances, be the name of Morris. I feel, therefore, fully justified in agreeing with the rest of the court in the opinion which they have formed and expressed.

Digitized by Google

Judgment for the plaintiff. (a)

Attorneys: Freshfields; G. B. Lefroy.

(a) See a recent case of Sheppard v. Murphy, before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and the Lord Justice of Appeal, 2 Ir. Ch. Rep. (May and Woodlock's edition) 544.

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Reported by JOHN THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, Nov. 13.

(Before KELLY, C. B., MARTIN, B., BLACKBURN, LUSH, and BRETT, JJ.)

REG. v. MACGRATH.

Larceny—Obtaining money under influence of a threat —Mock auction.

A woman went into a mock auction room, where the prisoner pretended to act as auctioneer. Some cloth was put up by auction, for which a person in the room bid 25s. A man standing between the woman and the door said to the prisoner that she had bid 26s. for it, upon which the prisoner knocked it down to the woman. She said she had not bid for it, and would not pay for it, and turned to go out. The prisoner said she must pay for it before she would be allowed to go out, and she was prevented from going out. She then paid 26s. to the prisoner because she was afraid, and left with the cloth:

Held, that these facts were sufficient to sustain a conviction for larceny.

Case reserved for the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved.

At the Court of Quarter Sessions for the borough of Liverpool on the 30th Aug. 1869 Peter Mac Grath was tried upon an indictment which charged him with feloniously stealing twenty six shillings of the moneys and property of Peter Powell.

It was proved at the trial that on the 26th Aug. 1869 Jane Powell, the wife of the prosecutor Peter Powell, between three and four o'clock in the afternoon, passed a sale room, and upon being invited to enter, did so. There were about one dozen persons in the sale room, and the prisoner was acting as auctioneer, and selling table cloths and other articles.

After two tablecloths had been sold and purchased by two women who were present a piece of cloth was put up for sale by auction, the prisoner acting as auctioneer. A man bid 25s. for it, when another man standing between Jane Powell and the door said to the prisoner that she had bid 26s. for it, upon which the prisoner knocked it down to her.

The witness, Jane Powell, said:

I had not bid for it, nor made any sign. I told the prisoner I had not bid; he said I did. I said I did not and would not pay for it. I said this several times. I went to go out. The prisoner said I had bid for it and must pay before I would be allowed to go out. I was then prevented going out by the man who had said I had bid for it. He stood between me and the door, and said I must pay for it. I wanted to go out and the man prevented me. I then paid 26s. to the prisoner. I paid the money because I was afraid. The piece of cloth was then given to me and I took it away.

In about an hour after she returned and saw the prisoner, and told him she could not keep the cloth as she had not bid for it. He told her he could not give the money back, but if she came the following week he would exchange it.

The next day the place was closed when Peter Powell and his wife went to call there about the cloth; but close by in the street the prisoner and the man who said she had bid, and another man by whom Jane Powell had been invited on the first occasion into the sale-room, were seen together and immediately separate and go different ways.

Peter Powell followed the prisoner, and said to him, "I believe you are the man who forced my wife to pay for a piece of cloth she never bid for." Upon which he replied, "I told her to come to the house on Monday." After some little struggle and endeavour to escape on the part of the prisoner, he was given into custody.

Digitized by Google

When charged, he said to the policeman, "She cannot lock me up, she paid me the money."

Mr. Commins, counsel for the prisoner, objected that the facts did not prove a larceny.

I directed the jury, that if the prisoner had the intention to deprive her of her money, and in order to obtain it was guilty of a trick and artifice, by fraudulently asserting that she had made a bid, when she had not, as he well knew, and that he obtained the money by such means, he was guilty of the offence charged.

The jury found that no bid had been made by Jane Powell, which the prisoner knew, and that he obtained the money from her by a trick and artifice mentioned above.

A verdict of guilty was then entered.

I postponed passing sentence, and remanded the prisoner back to gaol, and reserved the question, Whether the facts proved a larceny? and also the question, Whether I rightly directed the jury, for the decision and opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal. Leofric Temple,

Assistant Barrister to the Recorder of Liverpool.

Commins for the prisoner.—This was not larceny, but a robbery if anything. It is similar to the case of Rex v. Woods, 2 Leach, 721, where the prosecutrix was threatened by some persons at a mock auction to be sent to Bow-street, and from thence to Newgate, unless she paid for an article they pretended was knocked down to her, although she never bid for it; and they accordingly called in a pretended constable, who told her that, unless she gave him a shilling she must go with him; and thereupon she gave him a shilling, not from apprehension of personal danger, but from fear of being taken to prison, and it was held that this was not sufficient to constitute the offence of robbery, and that it was only a simple duress. So here all that the prosecutrix was told was that she must pay for the cloth before she would be allowed to go out. [Blackburn, J.—Robbery is larceny and something more. Brett, J.—In Wood's case the prisoner was indicted for robbery.] Secondly. The property must be obtained by a trick or artifice which the prosecutrix believed. [Blackburn, J.—That would be so upon an indictment for false pretences, but not for larceny.] Thirdly. This was not larceny, because the prosecutrix intended to part with her money. She accepted the piece of cloth, paid her money for it, and took it away. Rex v. Wilson, 8 C. & P. 111, was like this: there the prisoner pretended to pick up a purse containing, as he said, a gold chain and seals, and induced the prosecutor to buy the chain and seals for 7*l.*, which were worth a few shillings only, and it was held not to be larceny, because the prosecutor intended to part with his money. Lastly, judge misdirected the jury; he should have told them to find whether the woman parted with her money in consequence of the threat or voluntarily.

McConnell, for the prosecution.—This was larceny. The prisoner's intention at the time of obtaining the money is material. Where the prosecutor was decoyed into a public-house, and the play of cutting cards was introduced, and he did not play on his own account, but was prevailed upon to cut the cards for one of the prisoners, and then, under pretence that the prosecutor had cut the cards for himself and had lost, his money was swept off the table and carried away, it was held that it was for the jury to say quo animo the money was obtained, and that it would be larceny if there was a preconcerted plan to steal it: (R x v. Homer, 1 Leach, 270.) In this case the money was not voluntarily parted with, there was no intention to buy the cloth, and the trick and threat both operated on the prosecutrix's mind, and induced her to part with her money. Where the prisoners got the prosecutrix to open her hand and let them have some money, and, having obtained it, they refused to give up a dress they had promised on that condition, it was held to be larceny: (Reg v. Morgan, Dears C. C. 395.) Money may be obtained in such a way as to amount to larceny, although it may be obtained with force and menaces:

Reg. v. Walton, 9 Cox C. C. 268; L. & C. 483.

Kelly, C. B.—I am of opinion that this conviction should be affirmed. It appears that the prisoner pretended to act as an auctioneer, and to sell table cloths and other things by auction, that a piece of cloth was put up for sale by auction, and that a man bid 20s. for it, when another man standing near the prosecutrix said to the prisoner that the prosecutrix had bid 26s. for it, upon which the prisoner knocked it down to the prosecutrix. An altercation then took place, and the prosecutrix said she had not bid for it. The prisoner said she did. She said she did not, and would not pay for it, and then went to go out of the room. The prisoner said she must pay for it before she would be allowed to leave, and stood between her and the door, and prevented her leaving. She then paid 26s. to the prisoner as she said, because she was afraid, and took the piece of cloth away with her. The jury found that she paid the money against her will. The prisoner, in fact, obtained the money by a subterfuge, and also by what amounted to a threat of personal violence, and under these influences the prosecutrix parted with her money against her will. The case falls within the definition of larceny given by Bracton "Furtum est secundum leges contractatio rei alienæ fraudulenta cum animo furandi, invito illo domino cujus res illa fuerit." Mr. East, P. C. 553, defines larceny to be the wrongful or fraudulent taking of another's goods with a felonious intent to convert them to the taker's own use and make them his own property. That definition has been adopted by Parke, B., Eyre, C. J., and other judges. The present case comes within that definition. And I find the following definition given by the Criminal Law Commissioners, who were men of great learning: "The taking and carrying away are felonious where the goods are taken against the will of the owner, either in his absence or in a clandestine manner, or when possession is obtained either by force or surprise, or by any trick, device, or fraudulent expedient, the owner not voluntarily parting with his entire interest in the goods, and where the taker intends in any such case fraudulently to deprive the owner of the entire interest in the property against his will": (Roscoe Crim. Ev. 569.) The money was taken in this case against the will of the owner, for it cannot be contended for a moment that she paid with it voluntarily. And it was also obtained by a trick, device, or false expedient, not so much a false pretence as a false expedient of another kind, the prisoner pretending that something had taken place which he knew had not. And he also operated on her fears by threats. It was further argued that the learned deputy recorder had misdirected the jury. It may be that it would have been better if he had directed them to consider whether the money was not obtained by threats, which the prosecutrix might construe into threats of personal violence; but that is not the question reserved for us. For the above reasons I think a larceny was proved, and that the conviction must be affirmed.

Martin, B.—I am of opinion that a larceny was proved, but I think that the facts would have proved a robbery also.

Blackburn, J.—I also think the conviction must be affirmed. What we are to see is whether the direction to the jury was right. To constitute larceny there must be the animus furandi, and the property must be taken against the will of the person from whom it is taken. The ingredients that act on the will of the party must be to a certain extent the same both in the case of robbery and larceny, and in both the property must be taken against the will of the person. It would be a great scandal if taking money out of a person's pocket were to be larceny, but not to be so if the person was frightened into giving up her money against her will. No point was reserved as to whether or not the money was obtained from the prosecutrix against her will, but the evidence shows a preconcerted intention to take the money from her against her will, and there was abundant evidence of the animus furandi in the conduct of the parties.

Digitized by Google

LUSH, J.—I doubted at first whether there was a sufficient fraudulent taking to constitute larceny, but upon consideration I think there was, and that the money was demanded by the prisoner animo furandi, and obtained from her against her will.

BRETT, J.—I also have had doubts whether there was sufficient evidence to support a conviction in this case. If the case had rested on the principle of the money having been obtained by a trick, I should have thought that there was not. The case, if so put, would have failed in this, that if the woman by the trick was induced to part with her money she did so willingly, and in this case with intent that it should be taken away by the prisoner. But, upon consideration, I think that this conviction may be supported on the ground that the woman parted with her money against her will, by reason of unlawful violence used and threatened by the prisoner. I had doubts whether the threat of imprisonment was sufficient; but upon consideration I think that a threat of immediate personal restraint made by a person present, and having power to carry such threat into execution may reasonably be said to cause a person to do what this woman did against her will, and that is sufficient to make the giving up of property such a taking of property by a prisoner as to constitute the crime of larceny.

Conviction affirmed.

Equity Courts.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, Nov. 18.

Re POTTERIES RAILWAY COMPANY.

Injunction—Railway Companies' Act 1867—Scheme—Judgment by mortgagee and execution—Costs.

A mortgagee of a railway company obtained judgment and issued execution with a return of nulla bona. A scheme was arranged and confirmed, the mortgagee dissenting and subsequently levying execution and seizing plant, &c.

Held, that the mortgagee was bound by the scheme, and the sheriff must be restrained from selling and continuing in possession, but that the company must pay the creditor's costs at law up to the issuing execution, and their own, the sheriff's to be paid by the creditor.

Osborne, Q. C., and Dryden moved in this matter on behalf of the Potteries Railway Company for an injunction to restrain the Sheriff of Chester from continuing in possession of and selling certain plant and property of the company which he had taken under a writ of ca. sa. under these circumstances. A gentleman named Minor was a mortgagee, and obtained a judgment against the company in February 1867, and at once levied execution on such judgment; but there was a return of nulla bona. A scheme of arrangement was then entered into under the Railway Companies Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127) with their creditors, which was assented to by the requisite number and confirmed by the Vice-Chancellor in May, and in July Mr. Minor challenged it as not binding upon him, he never having assented to it, and under that scheme the mortgages were exchanged for debenture stock. Matters went on under the scheme, and Mr Minor had recently (in the Long Vacation) caused another execution to issue under his judgment, and the sheriff had seized certain plant and property of the company and was proceeding to sell it. Upon this an application was made ex parte to the vacation judge (James, V.C.) for an injunction to restrain the sheriff from continuing in possession and from selling under the suit, and James, V.C. made an order to restrain the sheriff from selling, but not from continuing in possession, and put the company on an undertaking to give notice of motion. Mr. Minor on having this notice served upon him caused a cross notice of motion to be served upon the company for leave to make his judgment available, and the motion for the injunction against the sheriff was now made.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR stopped counsel for the company, and called on those appearing for the judgment-creditor.

Glasse, Q. C., and C. Locock Webb for Mr. Minor opposed the motion on the ground that judgment having been obtained and execution issued before the date of the scheme, and Mr. Minor being a judgment-creditor who had not assented to it, the Act of 1867 did not apply to this case. The judgment-creditor, because he happened to be a mortgagee, ought not to be placed in a worse position than a judgment-creditor who was not a mortgagee. It had been held in the case of The Cambrian Railways, L. Rep. 3, Ch App. 278, that a scheme did not bind general creditors. He was not now seeking to enforce his claim as mortgagee, but rested solely on his judgment, and he ought not to be prejudiced and his legal right affected except under an express provision of the statute; and there was nothing in the Act of 1867 which could be said to meet his case. Mr. Minor also now moved for leave to make his judgment available.

Railway Companies Act 1817, ss. 4, 10, and 18;
Bowen v. Brecon Railway Company, L. Rep. 3 Eq 541;
East and West Junction Railway Companies, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 99.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The question is, whether a person who has obtained judgment, and who holds a mortgage, is anything more than a mortgagee? When he obtained judgment, I do not think that he lost any of his rights as mortgagee. The 10th article of the scheme provides that mortgagees of the company should be bound by the scheme, and, as far as he is a mortgagee, of course he must take the provision made for him by the scheme; the 4th article providing that mortgages shall be exchanged for debenture stock, this creditor has elected to treat himself as a mortgagee, and, so far, properly proceeded to sue out execution on his judgment. The directing the sheriff to enter and levy is, in fact, making his judgment available, and the issuing execution is putting the company to great inconvenience and damage. I am of opinion, that the judgment-creditor was wrong the moment he directed the sheriff to enter and levy, and from that time he must pay the costs. There must be an injunction to restrain the sheriff from selling and continuing in possession; and so far as the present question is concerned, I consider that Mr. Minor is bound by the scheme, it having been assented to by the requisite number of mortgagees. But I must put the company on an undertaking to pay the costs of the judgment-creditor at law, up to the time of issuing execution; and I shall give no costs on either side otherwise.

Digitized by Google

Bedwell, for the sheriff, asked for an order to give up possession, and for his costs.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The company must not pay the sheriff's costs, but bear their own. The sheriff must have his from the person who put him in motion.

Solicitor for the company: D. Noyes.

For the creditor: D. Aston.

For the sheriff: Francis and Bazalgette.

Thursday, Dec. 9.

LEE v. HALEY.

Injunction—Trade mark—Use of name with reputed addition—Deception of customers—False statement in circular—Title to relief.

L. and Co., coal merchants, established a branch business, and carried it on in Pall Mall as the "Guinea Coal Company." H. was their manager, known personally and by his peculiar handwriting to their customers. He left their service, and set up as "The Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company" in the Strand, and on being remonstrated with added "N.B. No connection with L. and Co." Subsequently H. removed to Pall Mall, with "Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company" on his blind, and numerous instances were in evidence of persons giving orders at his office for that of L. and Co. H. claimed the right to use the name "Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company."

On motion to restrain the use of the name "Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company," injunction granted.

G. O. Morgan, Q.C., and Cadman Jones moved in this case to restrain the defendant from using the name "Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company," and from exhibiting and using any other name being a colourable imitation of the name "Guinea Coal Company," or using it so as to deceive the public, and lead them to believe that the business of the plaintiffs was carried on by the defendant. It appeared that the plaintiffs had carried on the business of coal merchants under the firm of "Lee and Jerdein" for some years, and in 1858 they commenced a branch business in Catherine-street, in the Strand, as "The Guinea Coal Company" for the supply of Wallsend coals at the uniform rate of one guinea per ton throughout the year. In 1863 they removed to 22, Pall-mall, and were known, as they alleged, to their customers as the "Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company," although they only used the title of "Guinea Coal Company," and letters addressed "The Guinea Coal Company, London," found their way to their office. The defendant was their manager in Pall-mall, and was well known to their customers, not only by name and person, but from his peculiar handwriting. On the 18th January 1869, the defendant voluntarily left the plaintiffs' service, writing to say that he should leave, and giving no other notice. In March the plaintiffs saw an advertisement of the defendant's, who had taken an office at 11, Beaufort-buildings, Strand, calling himself "The Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company." On remonstrating with him, he added "N.B. That his company had no connection with the Guinea Coal Company in Pall-mall, which was carried on by Messrs. Lee and Jerdein." Upon this the plaintiffs were satisfied, and matters went on until the 30th of August, when the N.B. was discontinued in the circulars, and defendant removed to No. 46, Pall-mall, twenty-four doors from the plaintiffs' office, and on a wire blind, in gilt letters, were the words, "Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company." It was in evidence not only that the man who made this blind, brought it by mistake first to the plaintiffs' office, and insisted on leaving it, but that in twenty-four other instances customers of the plaintiffs, persons of rank and others, had been actually deceived; and having gone to the defendants' instead of the plaintiffs' office, and seen him, and remarked that he had removed, he simply answered "Yes," without stating that he had left the plaintiffs' service. Glenny v. Smith, 2 Dr. & Sm. 476, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 11, was a case where the defendant had used the names of his former employers, in prominent letters so as to induce persons to believe that they had removed to the place where he carried on business, and the court interfered. The defendant had made a long affidavit in which he charged the plaintiffs with supplying bad coal and short weight, stating that he had constantly remonstrated with them and referred to the complaints of customers, and that it caused him to leave. He also disclaimed any wrong intention. Upon these grounds it was contended that the case came within the well-known doctrine of this court, that wherever advantage was taken unfairly of the name of another person, or of a particular firm or business, so as to deceive the public and cause them to mistake one for the other, this court would interfere. The object here was palpable; and it had eminently succeeded, and the defendant had added to his offence by setting up a contention of the basest kind, charging the plaintiffs with dishonesty.

Glasse, Q.C., and Nalder, for the defendant, contended that the plaintiffs being perfectly aware of what had occurred, and of the defendant's intention in February, acquiesced from March last until they filed the bill in November, without any notice. The defendant had as much right to use the title as the plaintiffs, and if he had been asked would have changed it. Advertisements of the plaintiffs' and defendant's companies had appeared in the public prints side by side. There were many other companies with a like, and two with the same simple title, "The Guinea Coal Company." The defendant's affidavit went to this, that the plaintiffs' business had fallen off, which led to his leaving; he had remonstrated with the plaintiffs as to the complaints of customers. The word "Pall-mall" was objected to, but there was no trade mark in that. The plaintiffs did not use the name "Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company," but the defendant did. The reason why the advertisement in question did not contain the disclaimer was that the editor refused to insert it. The colour and appearance of the circulars were different. The court could not restrain going into the same street. Assuming a right to the name as a trade mark, any misrepresentation in selling a thing which was not what it was represented to be disentitled a party to relief. The plaintiffs purported to sell Wallsend coal, and did not do so, but Derbyshire, and short weight. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—That charge is totally irrelevant.] The misrepresentation disentitled the plaintiffs to relief, because it was done systematically, and when complained of the order was not to supply that customer again. The defendant had taken every means to let the public know that his was a separate business, continuing to this time. The defendant had offered 1000*l.* for the purchase of the plaintiffs' office, and had, moreover, when he left given them notice that he intended to set up in the same trade.

Digitized by Google

Croft v. Day, 7 Beav., 84.
Marshall v. Ross, W. N. 1869, p. 217.
Kerr on Injunctions, 481.
Morgan v. M'Adam, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 340.
Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav., 16.
Piddy v. Howe, 2 Sim., 477.

Chitty, as amicus curiæ.—Vice-Chancellor James yesterday restrained a man from using his own name.

Shapter, Q.C.—Because, having sold his business, which bore his name, he set up with the same name close by.

There were affidavits of the plaintiffs in reply, denying the charges made by the defendant.

G. O. Morgan Q. C. replied on the question of delay, but was stopped by the court.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The plaintiffs have been partners for some years as coal merchants, and in a branch business as "The Guinea Coal Company," a title adopted to designate the nature of their trade, for supplying the public with good coal, as they say, at an uniform price. The defendant from 1860 till January, 1869, was their manager, and as such became acquainted with the secrets of their trade and the names of their customers, and on the 18th of that month, without assigning any reason, gave notice that he should quit their service on the 20th, and he did so. So far there is nothing to complain of. He immediately set up business in Beaufort Buildings, Strand, and for some reason, of which I have vainly asked an explanation, called his business "The Pall-mall Guinea Coal Company." In truth it was, because the plaintiffs being successful he desired to supplant them by using the name designating their branch business, and availed himself of it to take the chance of getting some of their regular customers, a most dishonest purpose. Aware also that he might not be successful in Beaufort Buildings, he removed to Pall-mall, and the plaintiffs being "The Guinea Coal Company," called himself "The Pall-mall Guinea Coal Company," and the plaintiffs being known to their customers as "The Guinea Coal Company," and to carry on business in Pall-mall, they, as the most intelligent portion of the public, who would not look very minutely into these matters, were most likely to be deceived. The defendant thought it a great stroke of business to get into Pall-mall, and the only fair part of his conduct was that he offered the plaintiffs 1000*l.* for their office, which was, however refused, for being well placed, and carrying on a good business, it was an insignificant sum. Finding he could not purchase the business, he adopted the plan of setting up close by, and although in his original circular he added the "N. B." that does not do away with the improper object. I am satisfied that he did not omit to send a circular to all the plaintiffs' customers, and also solicited them personally. The mistake as to the blind shows the consequence of what he did, and there are numerous instances proved of the same kind. Indeed, with two firms so placed, they must occur. Whether it be the case of a shop or hotel with a name so similar, mistakes must arise. With so many other streets where the rents are so much lower, why did he choose Pall Mall, paying between £200 and £300 a year? I cannot hesitate in coming to the conclusion that one object was because his former employers were there already, who, although they did not call themselves "The Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company," the fact of his doing so created great confusion, and a person walking down St. James's-street, and seeing "The Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company," would search no further, not probably knowing the number; and twenty-five instances are given of such deceptions having taken place. Thus the orders were given, and the plaintiffs deprived of their business. When all other streets were open to him, was this a fair and honest mode of carrying on trade? It is contended that there was no property in the name "Pall Mall," and that the plaintiffs had not used it, and therefore it follows that the defendant is at liberty to adopt it, and that I cannot interfere. Is that the true doctrine? Put the case of a well-established shop or inn, or of a publication; directly the name is established so as to constitute a reputation, no person can adopt the same name (which, although not a copyright, is in the nature of a trade mark), because by doing so, he leads the public to believe that they are dealing with the party who has established the name, when, in truth, they are dealing with another person. Has this defendant done so? This doctrine is not a mere technical rule, but founded on this principle—that persons must not conduct business in a manner calculated to deceive, and avail themselves of the property of another person. In Croft v. Day (sup.), in 1843, Lord Langdale very succinctly and distinctly laid down the doctrine of this court. No doubt that was a case of pure trade mark, but it embraces the general principle. He says: "My decision does not depend on any peculiar or exclusive right the plaintiffs have to use the names Day and Martin, but upon the fact of the defendant using those names in connection with certain circumstances, and in a manner calculated to mislead the public, and to enable the defendant to obtain, at the expense of Day's estate, a benefit for himself to which he is not in fair, honest dealing entitled," and he granted the injunction. The same doctrine was recognised by the same judge in Perry v. Truefitt (sup.); I had the same question as to the "property" in a name in Bradbury v. Beeton (ante p. 323) with regard to Punch and Punch and Judy, and it was also considered in Kelly v. Hutton, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 201; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. p. 703, where the present Lord Chancellor held that the proprietor of a newspaper had a right to prevent any other person from adopting its name. It does not depend on any particular act; the court must look at the whole case, and if it sees that the party has done acts leading to an inevitable consequence it will interfere. The case cannot be explained otherwise than on an intention by the defendant to avail himself of the plaintiffs' business, selecting a name which implies that he is selling the coal of the plaintiffs, when he is selling his own, and has gone to Pall-mall in order that their customers may, by the confusion of the two offices so near together, and so alike in title, be deceived. The confusion, and the deception are proved to have arisen. Several defences have been set up; he says he did not intend to deceive; but, Millington v. Fox, 3 M. & Cr. 338, and Clement v. Maddick, 1 Giff. 98, decide that to be immaterial if the effect is deception and injury. I disbelieve that assertion, and also the charges he has brought against the plaintiffs of bad coals and short weight. Such an affidavit ought never to have been allowed to be made, or, if made, put upon the file. It is a statement totally inconsistent with his remaining in the employ of persons he so stigmatizes, as an honest man. As to the delay, no doubt in many cases it is fatal, where the case is otherwise proved; but the circumstances must be considered, and there certainly being no delay chargeable up to the end of August from that time, the plaintiffs not being eager to rush into Chancery, the defendant rather got the benefit of their forbearance, and therefore the injunction must be granted.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Jones and Starling.
Solicitor for the defendant, H. B. Clarke.

Digitized by Google

Tuesday, Dec. 21.

COX v. LAND AND WATER COMPANY (LIMITED).

Newspaper—Copyright — Infringement — Interlocutory injunction—Costs.

Newspapers, although not registered at Stationers' Hall in pursuance of the provisions of the Copyright Acts, have a copyright in their contents.

A newspaper is not "a book" within the 2nd section, nor is it a "periodical work," or a work published in parts, within the 24th section of the Copyright Act.

The defendants had copied from the plaintiff's journal, the Field, a "List of Hounds" obtained by the plaintiff, and compiled at considerable cost. The defendants had copied even the literal errors of the printer:

Held, that inasmuch as the information was procurable by the defendants, who might, if they pleased, compile a similar list, the Court would not grant an interlocutory injunction, but leave the plaintiff to his remedy in damages.

But in such case the bill for an injunction dismissed without costs.

This was a motion on behalf of Mr. Irwin E. B. Cox, proprietor of the Field newspaper, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from printing, publishing, selling, or otherwise disposing of any copies of the Land and Water newspaper containing the list called "The Hunting Field of 1870," or any part of such list, copied or colourably altered from the "List of Hounds" contained in the Field newspaper. The list contained particulars relating to the various packs of hounds in the United Kingdom, the name of each hunt, the nearest town convenient for strangers, the number of couples in the pack, the hunting days, the names of the masters, huntsmen, and whips, the address of the kennel, &c. The plaintiff alleged that this list, which appeared in the Field of Nov. 6, containing some slight errors, abbreviations, annotations, and omissions, was copied almost exactly in respect of these things in the Land and Water journal of Nov. 13.

Glasse, Q. C. and Brooksbank, for the plaintiff; Pearson, Q. C. and Loudon, for the defendants.

Glasse, in moving, said he should show as distinct and deliberate a piracy as was ever brought to the notice of a court.

Pearson.—Allow me to present an objection to this motion. I say, first of all, it never was copied as alleged; and secondly, if it was, that the Field newspaper, not being registered at Stationers' Hall, the plaintiff could not sue.

Glasse would satisfy his Honour that the Field was not a document requiring registration, and for that reason it was not necessary. He should prove that it was not the custom to register a newspaper at Stationers' Hall; and there was no means of registering a newspaper there for the purposes of copyright. The thing complained of was that the "List of Hounds," a table of very great interest, was printed in the Field newspaper of Nov. 6, and on Nov. 13 the defendants published an exact reprint of it in their paper as "The Hunting Field of 1870." They had copied it in the most servile manner, every little error and abbreviation being used, which clearly showed that they had made it a matter of simple copying. The learned counsel then read the affidavits of Mr. Cox and two other gentlemen. He said that there was no necessity for registering a newspaper, the Times, for instance, not being registered. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Would it be lawful for any newspaper to copy the leading articles of the Times?] I should think not.

Pearson.—All the country papers do it, and the London evening papers also.

Glasse.—But they always put at the end where it comes from.

Pearson.—The Times newspaper never made an application of this kind.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—They are supposed to be quoted as a compliment.

Pearson.—We went through the same labour that they did.

Glasse.—It is very remarkable if that be true, for in every instance of error in the Field, precisely the same error has been reprinted in the defendants' journal. The plaintiff charges that the list contained in defendants' newspaper was not the result of original information obtained by the defendants' company, or of independent inquiry; and in almost every instance where errors were the result of mere misprint or omission, and abbreviations were properly used for the convenience of the columns of the Field it was absolutely reprinted and copied into the Land and Water newspaper. For instance, out of seventeen cases where replies to the Field circular contained alterations in the names of hunts, the alterations were made in ten cases, and in the other seven it was not thought necessary to make any change; and in all these instances the exact reprint appeared in Land and Water. Again, the names of towns convenient to hunts were inserted, from information partly supplied at the Field office, and partly by masters of the hunts; and in almost every instance they were printed in Land and Water, and where such convenient town was by oversight omitted in the Field, no such town is mentioned in Land and Water. In the Field of Nov. 6 there were finger points [☞] to indicate that no answers had been received from those masters of hounds; but after the Field had been printed nearly twenty replies were received, rendering alterations necessary; yet in the subsequent week Land and Water published them without any such alterations. In two instances where the wrong symbols of annotation were printed in the Field the same two errors appeared in Land and Water. Where "Marquis" was printed in the Field "Marqs.," on account of the narrower column, the name was printed with the same abbreviation in Land and Water, although, from the greater breadth of column, there was ample space to have printed "Marquis" in full; and no similar abbreviation is printed elsewhere in the Land and Water list. In the same manner, the name of "Macdonld," the master of the Westmeath Foxhounds, was printed without the "a," and Land and Water had printed it also without the "a," though in their case there was ample space to have inserted it. [The VICE-CHAMCELLOR.—These are very curious omissions.] There are others just as curious. Captain Trench Nugent's name appeared in the Field as Capt. "T." Trench Nugent, because the printer had understood a "T" placed above Trench—to prevent its being printed "French"—as indicating that he was to insert another "T" before Trench, which he accordingly did, and Land and Water printed it in exactly the same way. Under the head of Beagles the Cockermouth pack are described as belonging to Col. Green Thompson, M.P., whereas since the last election he has ceased to be a member of Parliament; and that same error is followed by Land and Water. There was but one pack of staghounds omitted from the Field list, viz., the Surrey, and, in consequence of being without information as to several packs of harriers, they were altogether omitted from the Field, and not one of them was inserted in Land and Water. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR. — These are wonderful coincidences.] It is miraculous that the printer's devil, unless he were a devil indeed, could have committed the same mistakes. One does not understand it. And to say that it is the result of information obtained honestly and fairly from the same sources is to say that which I am utterly unable to credit. But I am told that your Honour is not to hear this motion because the Field newspaper is not registered.

Digitized by Google

Pearson.—I say there is no copyright in a newspaper. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Now, for instance, I saw in this morning's Times a review extending over two or three columns of Miss Mitford's "Lytham Letters." Can anybody take that out and re-publish it?] Certainly.

Glasse.—I say, no. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Practically there are a great many difficulties in the way of my disposing of this case, because, supposing I grant the injunction against the defendants publishing the list, and they get a perfectly accurate list, what would occur?] If they get it at their own expense, as in the Directory case, they can do the same thing; but they must not avail themselves of my exertions. Supposing next year they choose to go through the same labour as the Field, they can do it; but if the paper cannot afford the expense of doing it by reason of its circulation, that is no reason why they should take it from me. The learned counsel then quoted the second section of the Copyright Act, which explained that the term "book" meant "every volume, part, or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letterpress, sheet of music, map, chart, or plan separately published." The Field newspaper did not answer any of those descriptions. Looking at the 11th section of the Copyright Act, it said that "a book of registration shall be kept wherein may be registered"—and here he might say that registering did not affect the copyright, but it only gave the right to sue upon it—"any book," and so on. There there was only the word "book." The 24th section, on which his friend relied, enacted "that no proprietor of copyright in any book shall bring an action at law or equity unless he shall, before commencing such action, have caused an entry to be made." [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The word "newspaper" is never mentioned in the Copyright Act.] No. If you can bring "newspaper" into the definition of the word "book," then the Act will apply to prevent me suing until I have registered. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—If Mr. Pearson is right in his objection that there is no copyright in a newspaper unless it is registered, then it follows that there is no copyright in any article that is inserted in such newspaper. If that is so, you may take a copy of the whole of the contents of the Times of to-day and reprint it, calling it by some other name; and there would be nothing to prevent your doing so if there is no copyright.] Certainly it is a startling proposition. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Has it never been determined?]

Pearson.—No; because no newspaper yet has ever filed such a bill as this. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I am not speaking of this. I am speaking of the abstract principle, whether there is an absolute right to reprint any article from a newspaper without the proprietor's consent.]

Glasse.—If this objection holds, it is the undoubted right of any person so to do. I do not like to retort "that no other newspaper has thought it worth its while to do so;" but I do say that it was answered by this, that no other newspaper than Land and Water thought it consistent with its position and character to publish such a deliberate and plain piracy. But we are not to regard the rights and interests of the two papers at present; for the simple and plain question is, whether it is within the Copyright Act or not. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Mr. Pearson's objection raises that. He says there is no copyright in a newspaper, or anything in a newspaper. Then if there is no copyright, it may be pirated.] If your Honour thinks there is not anything in it, it would be idle for me to go into the question generally. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I think I had better hear Mr. Pearson upon that.]

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I am now upon the question whether you can maintain a bill—whether, in fact, you may have copyright in any article published in a newspaper; and therefore you may assume that the piracy is established beyond all doubt.

Brooksbank reviewed the cases where the copyright question had arisen in connection with directories, Lillywhite's Cricketers' List, &c.; but there was no case to be found where the copyright in a newspaper had ever been before the courts of law or equity. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The point is whether the proprietor of a newspaper has sufficient property without registration in an article, or anything written for him at his expense, to prevent another person using it.]

Pearson.—Without registration. We are registered under the Act. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR: If you take the register of the Field newspaper, it gives no information of anything in particular. Suppose the Field had been registered fifteen years ago, what information would that give about this particular article?] Your Honour should know that this is not the first time we have printed a list of this kind. I wish to go into the merits. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR: You are upon the preliminary objection you have taken; and for this purpose you must assume that the merits are against you, and you must take objection that they cannot sue because there is no copyright in the article whatever.] I say, no copyright; and secondly, if there was a copyright, they cannot sue until it is registered. There being no copyright there could be no right to sue in this court, except such right was given by the Copyright Act; the question was whether or not the plaintiff had shown on his bill that he had any right to sue for what he called a piracy of his copyright. After citing the cases, he came to the construction to be put upon the word newspaper; and he argued that it came within the Copyright Act, the words in the interpretation clause, "sheets of letterpress," being in his opinion the best description that could be found for a newspaper. That being so, there could be no right of action by the present plaintiff against the defendants, the plaintiff not having registered in compliance with the Act of Parliament. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR: The article in question here is not "separately published" as "sheets of letter-press" are required to be.] You cannot have a copyright in an article unless you have a copyright in the paper in which it is published. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—A newspaper can never have any copyright. That is your proposition.] I venture to say that is thoroughly good sense and good law. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—If it be so, it is certainly inconsistent with the rights of property.] I think not. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Suppose the Field were to engage Anthony Trollope to write a novel occupying two columns every week, according to your argument neither the Field nor Anthony Trollope would have any remedy. To say that is the law, is utterly inconsistent with the rights of property.] I venture to say that Anthony Trollope, if he thought fit, might register the Field and save his article. We have registered at Stationers' Hall, and we have registered it purposely to claim a copyright; but if newspapers have a copyright at all, then it must be a copyright under the meaning of the word "book" in the 24th section then the proprietor of a newspaper, to obtain copy; right, must register that "book." On the question, whether the Legislature intended a newspaper to have a copyright, he quoted the preamble of the Act, which set out, "Whereas it is expedient to amend the law of copyright, and to encourage the production of literary works of lasting benefit to the world." He contended that, according to this, it was never intended to have copyright in a newspaper; and if it was, it must include the whole of the paper; but when they considered how ephemeral were the contents of a newspaper, it would be clear that there could be no copyright.

Digitized by Google

Glasse, in reply, was stopped.

The Vice-Chancellor—I do not think I need trouble you further. There is a preliminary objection taken in this case, which raises a point of vast importance to the proprietors of newspapers, and I think I may say to the public at large. It is so important, that it seems almost incredible, that the point should never have arisen—viz, whether the proprietor of a newspaper has or has not such a property in articles published in that newspaper and paid for by the proprietor, as entitles him to prohibit the publication by any other newspaper in any other form whatever. The point arises thus: This is a bill filed by Mr. Irwin Cox, who is the proprietor of a well-known weekly newspaper called the Field. He files the bill against the defendants, the Land and Water Journal Company, charging that they have improperly published in their paper an article which was composed for his. The merits of that I do not now enter into, because for the purposes of the argument it has been and must be assumed that the article complained of was a copy of the article of the plaintiff; and upon that ground the defendant, by Mr. Pearson, takes the objection that there can be no copyright in any article published in this newspaper, because it is not registered under the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, commonly called the Copyright Act. Now, upon principle, one would say that if a proprietor of a newspaper employs a correspondent abroad (which we know is done to a great extent in this country by the proprietors of newspapers published here), and that correspondent being employed, sent abroad at great expense—paid very amply for his labours—makes communications to a newspaper which are highly appreciated by the public, and the paper is sought for the purpose of reading those communications as soon as published—Dr. Russell's communications, for instance, during the Crimean war, communications which have been obtained by the Times newspaper at vast expense—if it be the law that the publisher of another newspaper published in the evening of the same day may take the Times newspaper and publish them in extenso, with or without acknowledgment, and if the proprietor of the Times complains, he may say, "But they are common property; true it is, I admit, that you have paid for them; I admit you have given a great deal of money for them, and they are so very valuable that I desire to turn them to account by publishing them in my newspaper; but you have no property in them, although you pay for them; you cannot sue for your newspaper as a book—for then the copyright must be registered—and as you have not registered the book nothing in the newspaper is protected:" if that is the law, it is a monstrous state of law, repugnant to common sense and common honesty, because that there is a property in those articles there can be no shadow of doubt whatever. Still, however clear the right of property may be, if the case falls within the Act of Parliament, I must follow the same course as in the Brighton Directory case (Kelly v. Morris, L. Rep 1 Eq. 697; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 222), where, that being a book, and clearly being admitted within the Copyright Act, it had been registered at Stationers' Hall, but, instead, according to the requisition of the Act, of citing the day of publication, the month only was entered; and I considered, as other judges had done before, that the object of registration was to ascertain at what time the publication did take place, in order that the public might know when the copyright expired, and when they would be at liberty to publish it in a separate form; therefore, though everything else was complied with except the day of the month, I held that omission was fatal, and the bill was dismissed with costs. So in this case, however clearly I am of opinion that this is a property that ought to be protected, if a newspaper is a book within the 2nd section of the Copyright Act, and it is admitted that the Field was not registered, that would be equally fatal to the plaintiff's suit. Now I have put the case of letters from correspondents abroad. With foreign papers, we all know, it is the practice to publish novels; and in some English newspapers it is also done. Supposing a newspaper proprietor were to engage the first novelist of the day to write for him a novel to be published in his newspaper, part every day, and pay him highly: is this proprietor of a newspaper, who had paid highly, to lose all property because the paper was not rgistered? What information would it give if it were registered? Would the registration of a paper called the Field, registered twenty years ago, give information as to where the copyright would commence and end? Not the slightest; and therefore it is not within the policy of the Act; and I am of opinion that it is not within the words of the Act. Now, the question depends first upon the second section, What is a book? because every book within the 24th section must be registered. We find that "book" under the 2nd section "shall be construed to mean and include every volume, part or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letter-press, sheet of music, or dramatic piece," and so forth. Now, certainly "newspaper" does not fall within any one of those descriptions; and if it was intended that this Act should be applied to newspapers, it would have been inserted, as the word "newspaper" is well understood; and the word "newspaper" not being inserted, I must take it as advisedly omitted because it was not the intention of the Legislature that newspapers should be included within the Act; for if it had been intended to include them, what would have been more simple than to introduce the word? Then comes the section which prescribes what is to be done with regard to periodical publications. Sect. 19 provides: "That the proprietor of the copyright in any encyclopædia, review, magazine, periodical work, or other work published in a series of books or parts, shall be entitled to all the benefits of the registration at Stationers' Hall under this Act, on entering in the said book of registry the title of such encyclopædia, review, periodical work, or other work published in a series of books or parts, the time of the first publication of the first volume, number, or part thereof, or of the first number or volume first published after the passing of this Act in any such work which shall have been published heretofore, and the name and place of abode of the proprietor thereof, when such publisher shall not be the proprietor thereof." That, again, does not mention newspapers; and I must come to the same conclusion, a newspaper not being mentioned because it was not intended to be included. Well, then, can a person have any copyright or property in that which is not registered under the Act? This depends, I apprehend, upon the construction of the 18th section, which enacts that when any publisher or other person shall have projected, conducted, and carried on any enclyclopædia, review, magazine, periodical work, or work published in a series of books or parts, or any book whatsoever, or shall have employed any person to compose the same, or any volumes, parts, essays, articles, or portions thereof for publication, in or as part of the same, and such works, &c. shall be composed on the terms that the copyright shall belong to such proprietor, and be paid for by him, then the proprietor of such work shall be entitled to copyright (except that after the term of twenty-eight years the copyright shall revert to the author), and shall be entitled to sue upon registering the same at Stationers' Hall. Now must every right in this be registered under the Act? The present Lord Chancellor decided that in Mayhew v. Maxwell, 1 J. & H. 312; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 847. Mr. Mayhew wrote a certain article or series of articles in a periodical called the Welcome Guest; and the proprietor proceeded to publish them in a separate form. The plaintiff filed his bill to restrain him from publishing them in any other form than in that for which he wrote the work. The same point arose in Strahan v. Graham, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 87; on appeal, 17 Id. 457, where Mr. Graham had sold the right of publishing photographs of the Holy Land in a publication called Good Words, where Dr. M'Leod was publishing a work with regard to the Holy Land, and the proprietors of Good Words had given him permission to use the photographs; but Mr. Graham contended that Mr. Strahan had no right to give it to Dr. M'Leod. I decided in that case, and my decision was confirmed by Lord Chancellor Chelmsford, that there was no right to publish in a separate form that which he had authority to use only in Good Words, and that Mr. Graham had a good right of action. But these cases are distinct authorities to show that there is a property in a publication, although it is not registered. That is the ground upon which Vice-Chancellor Wood commented upon the 24th section. He says, "The plaintiff has not registered under the 24th section." Now Mr. Glasse has referred me to the case of Sweet v. Benning, and the case was between Mr. Sweet, the proprietor of a well-known publication in the law called the Jurist, and Mr. Benning, a well-known bookseller.

Digitized by Google

Glasse.—I think he wanted to publish reports in Sweet's Leading Cases.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Sweet brings an action against Benning for things appearing in a separate publication. This was the subject of the action. I suppose the Jurist had been published before this Act of the 5 & 6 Vict., and therefore it was not registered at all; and therefore the question whether these reports published in the Jurist were subject to the provisions of the Act did not arise. Now, in deciding that case, Jervis, C. J. said: "I think that, under the circumstances stated, there is an implied condition, understanding, or arrangement between the proprietor of the Jurist and the gentlemen who furnished him with reports, that the former should acquire a copyright for the articles so written." Now, therefore, it does seem to me, on solid principles of justice, that a newspaper, not being within the provisions of this Act, does not fall within the provisions of any one of the sections referred to, and I must infer that the term "newspaper" being the best possible and only description of such a publication as that now before me, the Field newspaper—and since, if it had been the intention of the Legislature to apply this Act to newspapers, it was absolutely impossible that the word could have missed insertion in some of the sections, the circumstance of no registration throws no difficulty in the way of the plaintiff maintaining his right in law or equity; and I am further of opinion that upon the most solid principles of justice (though it is seldom worth the while of proprietors of newspapers to assert the copyright in a newspaper), my opinion is most decided, and I desire it to be so understood, and in order that there may be no mistaking my opinion, I say—that, whether it be the letters of a correspondent abroad, or the publication of a tale, or a treatise, or the review of a book, which the proprietor of a newspaper thinks proper to treat, I will not say as copyright, but as property (a property which the proprietor of a newspaper has in every article in the newspaper, and every line for which he pays), under the 18th section, or by the general rules of property—he acquires such a property in that article as entitles him, if he thinks it worth while, to prohibit other persons from publishing the same thing in another newspaper or in any other form. Therefore I am of opinion that the preliminary objection of the defendants must be overruled.

Glasse.—I would allow it to stand over if the defendants would undertake not to print the list in a separate form.

Pearson said his clients desired to state that they intended to publish the "Hunting List for 1870" in a separate form.

Glasse said he was instructed to say that this was not a small matter to the plaintiff, who published the list in the Rural Almanac. He asked the court to restrain the defendants from reprinting the article in question.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I think it is much more a question for damages than an injunction. I think the better plan would be if you, Mr. Glasse, assume that you have established your case, and that you have, at considerable expense and labour obtained this information; and that, from the circumstance of errors being copied in such a manner that they could not have obtained their information independent of you, I must come to the conclusion that they have used a copy; still you must show me that it is a case for the interference of the court by injunction. I am assuming all that to be proved.

Glasse.—Kelly v. Morris, the Post-office Directory case. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is a thing that can be correct only for a short time, because, if the masters don't change, the hunts are given up; and certainly whips are continually changing.] I don't think many changes take place during the hunting season, after November; but there were masters, whips, huntsmen, hounds, and other things in the list not so much subject to change. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I don't know how you are to keep 300 or 400 masters of hounds without change.] There are not 300 or 400; but it is a rare thing for the master of hounds to die. He cited the cases of Kelly v. Morris, L. Rep. 1 Eq. 697; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 222; and Morris v. Ashbee, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550, to show that a person, to entitle himself to information of this kind, must work out the information for himself. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR said there was not the shadow of a doubt about it; but he looked upon this list as a mere ephemeral publication, not calling for the interference of the Court of Chancery.] But it is in the Rural Almanac, which is registered. He should assume, as his Honour had assumed, that, as they had not disproved the piracy, the information had been taken from the Field. Now his Honour would hardly think it fair and legitimate competition in trade that this list should be taken wholly by a rival newspaper, intended to circulate amongst the same classes of readers, and for the purpose of taking credit to themselves for the information which they knew to be so valuable, so highly appreciated, and so useful amongst sportsmen in every county in the kingdom. His Honour would hardly think it fair that they were to be at liberty to take that information, which had been acquired at infinite labour and very great expense, and from which they expected to derive, if not interfered with, a very large profit—far more profit than that usually obtained from what is called a "book." A book, where an edition of 500 is published, his Honour would have no difficulty in restraining, but the circulation of this is from 15,000 to 20,000, and was much more important than any book published; and, therefore, he asked for an injunction. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, supposing he granted the injunction, the defendants could send out their circulars and get all the information they wanted; so that Mr. Glasse's client would be no worse off than without any injunction.] Your Honour must have great faith in the business habits of masters of hounds to suppose that they would at once write to a sporting newspaper. The court is not to consider the difficulties of carrying out its order; it is simply to interfere when sufficient cause is shown, which your Honour has allowed me to assume here. The value of the Rural Almanac is worth half a dozen of the volumes which the court would interfere upon. It is sold at every railway station, and is taken in by every sportsman; and, instead of its circulation being reckoned by hundreds, it is counted by thousands.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is an application for an injunction by the proprietors of the Field newspaper to restrain the proprietors of another paper, called Land and Water, from publishing a certain list which is called "The Hunting Field of 1870." The list in question contains a list of all the staghounds—all the hunts, that is, staghounds, foxhounds, and harriers—in the United Kingdom. It contains the names of hunts, the number of couples of which each hunt consists, the names of masters, the names of huntsmen, the names of whips, places of kennels, the nearest towns, and the hunt days. Now with regard to the hunting days—I believe I am right in saying that in every newspaper (certainly the Times newspaper of every Saturday) there will be found a list of every hunt in the kingdom, with the days and places of their meeting. The names of every hunt in the kingdom are given in the Times newspaper; and it is a matter of public notoriety that many persons can draw up the list of hunts. Then with regard to the master's name, amongst sporting men that also is notorious; and I believe there are plenty of persons—and I know some myself—who would sit down and write the name of every one in the kingdom. The name of the huntsman is pretty nearly as well known; but the whips, being numerous, and obscure persons, they would not be so well known, though even they are pretty well known too. It is admitted on both sides that the mode of obtaining this information is by issuing a circular, as is done by the Court Guide and other publications, and every gentleman who now hears me and occupies a house has lately received a circular containing the name, if they have occupied the house for some time, or if a new occupier, asking him to give the names and it is filled up in a form. And all that is required here is that they issue a circular, requesting the master of the hunt, the name of the hunt, the towns or stations convenient to visitors, the number of couples, the whips, and the hunting days. The case made by the plaintiff is that they have obtained this information. I suppose it may be assumed that, theirs being the old publication—and I believe it is a favourite one in the sporting world—the Field, having that sort of influence which arises from the fact of being a leading favourite, readily obtains this information that a newer publication would have difficulty in obtaining, from the disinclination to answer them rather than the old publication. Therefore, they say they have got the information accurately, while the defendants, without putting themselves to any trouble, make up their list from the plaintiff's, and they have taken the plaintiff's list and copied it completely, even down to the minutest errors; and certainly, as far as I think at present, it seems in the highest degree probable, and I thoroughly believe, that an unfair use has been made of the plaintiff's list to that extent. That they have done so, take for one instance Capt. T. Trench Nugent in the defendants' paper, the "T" having been inserted in the plaintiff's list in the manner described in the affidavit. It is almost impossible that the same error should have occurred in precisely the same way to the defendants; and, therefore, I can only account for the defendants calling Capt. Trench Nugent "Capt. T. Trench Nugent" by the fact of their having copied it from the plaintiff's list. So there are omissions from the plaintiff's list, and there are the same omissions in the defendants' list; so there are other similar omissions, as the word "Marquis" not being printed in full, and various things which lead me to the conclusion that the defendants, having experienced some difficulty in getting the information, actually copied the plaintiff's list; and for the purpose of the present decision I assume that to be so. I also assume the law to be perfectly clear and settled, as laid down by the present Lord Chancellor in Kelly v. Morris; as also by that other case of Morris v. Ashbee. I think in this case of getting the names of masters of hunts, the numbers of couples, the huntsmen and whips, and so forth, it is information open to all those who seek to obtain it; but it is information they must get at their own expense as the result of their own labour, and they are not to be entitled to the labours undergone by others. And this is the case which falls within the principle of Kelly v. Morris. But in this case, as in many others, the question arises—Is it a case for the interference of the Court of Chancery at all? and if it is a case for interference, is it a case for interference on an interlocutory application? Now I do not think it is a case to decide on an interlocutory application, and my reason is this. This list must be corrected from week to week; it would not do to go on publishing the list from the 1st Nov. until April, or the end of the hunting season. Changes must take place; and masters don't all live—though Mr. Glasse says they never die; they are subject to accidents, and family convenience, and other causes which lead to changes in the names; the huntsmen change, and so on, so that this list can hardly last for a week; and therefore the Act cannot be applied. Now suppose I were to grant an injunction, how can I act upon it? The defendants have only to issue a fresh circular, make an urgent appeal for answers, or send a person by rail and get him to go before the master of the hunt; and next week comes out a very correct list, without errors, and how am I to know how they got their information? The plaintiff says it is incorrect. At present I do not see that I can grant an interlocutory injunction, and I am clearly of opinion that I could not interfere by an interlocutory injunction. Whether the plaintiff is entitled to any remedy I do not at present decide; but I do not think it a case for an injunction, though the defendants are not entitled to avail themselves of the plaintiff's labours. It is scarcely worth the while of the proprietors of this respectable paper the Field (and I assume that the defendants are equally respectable) to come into court with such an insignificant matter. But, as they have done so there is a material question which will have to be decided, which after all is the most material question—viz., the costs in the suit. I would suggest to the parties that the wisest thing would be to let the bill be dismissed without costs. But if they don't agree, then I simply refuse the motion, leaving the real cause to be decided at the hearing. It may be a question for damages when the cause is brought to a hearing; but I shall certainly not grant an injunction. Probably I should refer it to chambers to ascertain what damages the plaintiff has sustained. For the present I refuse the motion, and say nothing about the costs.

Solicitor for plaintiff, William Jacquet.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, Nov. 3.

WILSON v. FURNESS RAILWAY COMPANY.

Practice—Demurrer—Specific performance—Ultra vires—Parties.

In a suit for specific performance, a demurrer that the Statute of Limitations would apply to the facts of the case will not be allowed, but the question must be decided at the hearing.

An agreement on the part of a railway company to make a road and wharf is not ultra vires the directors of the company.

Part of the agreement by the company was that it was on behalf of themselves (the railway company) and the inhabitants of A., M., and K., and places adjoining.

Held, that the Attorney-General was not a necessary party to a suit for specific performance of such agreement.

Demurrer.

This was a suit for specific performance of an agreement after mentioned.

The bill was filed by G. E. Wilson and others against the Furness Railway Company.

The facts stated by the bill were as follow: By an Act of Parliament, passed in Aug. 1851, it was enacted, and power was granted to certain parties, to make a railroad from the Furness Railway, at Ulverstone, to the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway, at Camforth (to be called the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway); and it was also enacted that, subject to any alteration which might be approved of by the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom, or the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral, by writing under the hand of the Secretary of the Admiralty, the two several viaducts for carrying the said railway across the estuary of the Severn and the Kent estuary should be so constructed by the company as to afford in each of the said viaducts a clear breadth of water of not less than 1400ft. for the free flux and reflux and scour of the tides, and that the spans or ways of each of the two several viaducts should be openings of not less than 20ft. each, and a headway under the same of not less than 10ft. between its soffit and the high water mark of ordinary spring tides, and in such part of each of the said viaducts, and in such a manner as should be approved and directed by the said Lord High Admiral or commissioners, by writing under the hand of the Secretary of the Admiralty, and subject to any waiver or alteration to be allowed and approved as thereinbefore mentioned, the said company should construct an opening swing or draw-bridge of not less than 36ft. clear width, and the site of such two viaducts, and the mode of constructing the same, and also the said two several opening swing or draw bridges, should be only in accordance with such approval and direction.

The company before mentioned, called the Furness Railway Company, was incorporated in 1835.

By an Act passed in 1858, called the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Act, it was provided inter alia that the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company and the Furness Railway Company might enter into and carry into effect any agreements for the leasing or selling to the Furness Company of all or any part of the property or the powers of the company, upon such conditions as the two companies should mutually agree upon, and if any such lease or sale comprised the railway of the company, it should comprise the whole thereof, and that from and after the transfer the Furness Railway Company should, according to the extent of the transfer, but subject to the provisions of the Act, be subject to all contracts and liabilities with respect to the premises transferred to which the company, if the transfer had not happened, should be subject, and should indemnify the company from the same, and all costs, charges, and expenses with respect to the same.

By an agreement dated the 25th June 1862, between George Edward Wilson (the plaintiff), the Hon. George Frederick Upton, Moses Rodich, John Wakefield, John Jowitt Wilson, John Whitwell, John Wilson, and John Foster, of the first part, and the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company of the second part, after reciting the provisions of the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Act of 1851, bearing upon the subject of the proposed agreement, and that the viaduct had by the partial exercise of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty of their power of waiver been constructed without an opening bridge, but with preparations for making the opening at a future time, and that the parties thereto of that part on their own behalf and as representing the inhabitants of Arnside, Milnthorpe, Kendal and places adjoining or near to the viaduct, had hitherto objected to the waiver of the said opening bridge, and that in order to obviate all further differences the company and the parties thereto of the first part, on behalf of themselves and the said inhabitants had agreed together as follows: "That if the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty shall in such manner as to be effectual for the purpose within twelve months from the date hereof, and for ever thereafter, waive the construction of and the right to require any opening, swing, or draw bridge in the viaduct, and if the said George Edward Wilson shall without any pecuniary consideration convey at the cost of the company to the said John Wakefield and James Ramsden, Esq., the secretary of the company, the land required for so much of the road hereinafter agreed to be made as will pass through his estate, and if Mrs. Green and all other persons through whose estate or estates the said road will pass, will also convey to the said John Wakefield and James Ramsden, at the cost of the said company, the land already purchased of them by Alexander Brogden and John Holme, and which, if required for that part of such road which will pass through their respective estates, the purchase-money for the last-mentioned lands not exceeding £ to be paid by the said company, and also in consideration of the sum of 200*l.* to be contributed and paid to the company through the said John Wakefield and John Jowett Wilson towards the expense of the works hereinafter mentioned, then the company will, at their own cost, and within six months from the date of the waiver aforesaid, and the delivery to them of the land for the purpose, unless prevented by damage done by the tide to the works, and in that case as soon after six months as can be, make upon the land obtained, or to be so obtained for the purpose, a carriage road of the width of 16ft. in the clear from Duke's Inn at Milnthorpe aforesaid to the wharf hereinafter mentioned in the route or direction shown by a red colour in the plan hereunto annexed (and parts whereof are already used as a road), and which shall not be constructed in any part at any lower level than 8in. above a beach mark made by Messrs. Crayston, and Webster, of Kendal, and John Bailton, of Ulverstone, near the house of the said Mrs. Green, to denote the height of a 19ft. 4in. tide on the 19th Aug. 1860, and which road shall be constructed as an embankment according to the cross section A. on the section and specification hereunto annexed, and where it is on the surface, according to the cross section B on the said section and specification hereunto annexed, and to be a public road or highway, and will make good the fences, drains, and watercourses of any enclosed lands, the fences, drains, or watercourses of which will be interfered with by the said road, and will also, whenever any occupation or accommodation road crosses the line to be made, make road approaches as good as they are now, or as near thereto as circumstances will permit, and will also yearly, and at the end of every year after the completion of the said road pay to the Corporation of Kendal (who shall be bound to show the application thereof from time to time) the sum of 5*l.*, to be applied partly in repairing or improving that portion of the said road lying within the division of Hazlestock and Storth, but if, and as often as at the end of any one year, there shall be remaining in the hands of the said corporation a sum of 5*l.* unexpended, the said company shall not be required to pay the sum of 5*l.* or any part thereof in the then next succeeding year, and will also at the cost of the company within the same time as is herein provided for the making of the said road, make, and at all times maintain, upon the sea shore or beach a wharf at or near the place shown on the plan hereunto annexed, with proper mooring ports, to be at all times used as a public wharf for loading and discharging of vessels, and which wharf shall be sixty feet in length, and a suitable and convenient height."

By subsequent clauses it was by the agreement provided that a reference to arbitration should be made in case of any difference between the parties as to the sufficiency of the road or the wharf, or respecting the construction of any clause in the agreement, or any matter agreed to be done by the company.

It was also inter alia provided that "if any award upon a difference as to the sufficiency of the road or wharf should find the road or wharf insufficient, it should state in what respect it was so, and should direct what should be done to make it sufficient."

"Upon completion of the said road and wharf said John Wakefield and J. J. Wilson, or one of them their or his executors, administrators, or assigns, should pay to the company the sum of 200*l.*"

By another clause said G. E. Wilson, &c., on behalf of themselves and the inhabitants aforesaid, were forthwith at the expense of the company to join and concur and use their best endeavours to procure all other necessary parties to join and concur with the company in making the necessary applications to the Lords of the Admiralty for obtaining such entire and perpetual waiver of the opening swing and drawbridge, and were at the like expense to use their best endeavours to procure such waiver.

This waiver by the Lords of the Admiralty was subsequently obtained.

The Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company also subsequently obtained and took possession of the land mentioned in the agreement. Under the terms of their Act of Parliament, that railway company, by deed of transfer of the 4th Aug. 1863, conveyed their works, lands, property and effects, to the Furness Railway Company. This latter company then commenced making the road mentioned in the agreement of the 25th June 1862, but such road, when the bill was filed, was in a very incomplete condition, and the defendants had not commenced the wharf.

These things the railway company had been requested to do, but, although admitting their liability, they had neglected to complete.

The demurrers put in by the defendants, the railway company, were on these grounds: (1) that the liability entered into by the company was ultra vires; (2) that the nature of the agreement was not one which could be made the ground of a bill for specific performance; (3) the lapse of time between the deed of transfer and the filing of the plaintiff's bill; (4) that the Attorney-General, as representing the inhabitants of Arnside, Milnthorpe, Kendal, &c., ought to have been made a party; and (5) that there was a want of mutuality in the agreement.

E. Fry, Q. C. and F. Currey, in support of the demurrer, contended on all the points mentioned therein, that the bill should be dismissed. The cases cited by them were: (1) as to the agreement being ultra vires, and (2) that the bill was to compel the construction of works, and could not, therefore, be sustained,

Flint v. Brandon, 8 Ves. 159;
South Wales Railway Company v. Wythes, 1 Kay & J. 186; on appeal, 5 De G. M. & G. 880;
Blackett v. Bates, L. Rep. 1 Ch. App. 117; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 656;
Gervais v. Edwards, 1 Dru. & W. 80;
Shrewsbury and Birmingham Railway Company v. Stour Valley Company, 2 De G. M. & G. 866;

As to the lapse of time:

Rolfe v. Gregory, 31 L. J. 710, Ch.; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 19; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 750;
Wilson v. West Hartlepool Railway Company, 2 De G. J. & Sm. 475.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and Nalder, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said the demurrer must be overruled. The company have in fact got the benefit of the agreement. They have got the land conveyed to them, and it is vested in them. The case of Storer v. The Great Western Railway Company, 2 Y. & Coll. C. C. 48, concluded the points raised by this demurrer. The company have taken the land for the purposes of the road, and the court will, if possible, prevent such an injustice as would be the case if the company succeeded in their present contention. If I did not compel the company to make the road and wharf, I might say to them, "Then you must allow the plaintiffs to do it." As to the question of ultra vires, it is said that the company is created for the purpose of making a railway, and not for making the road and wharf; but being under an onerous obligation to give a certain easement to the public, the company agree to do something else which is more convenient to both parties. This is not ultra vires. As to length of time; the answer to that is that the company themselves have been in possession of the land. I do not think the Attorney-General a necessary party.

Digitized by Google

Demurrer overruled.

Solicitors: Scott and Jermain; Sharpe and Ullithorne.

Friday, Nov. 19.

THE QUEEN OF SPAIN v. PARR AND OTHERS.

Commission on goods sold—Principal and agent—Countermand of agency—Subordinate Government.

The ordinary commission receivable by an agent on goods sold by him was 2½ per cent. Before actual sale by the agent, the goods were removed out of his hands by order of the principal:

Held, that the agent was entitled to one-half of the ordinary commission, being 1¼ per cent.

The defendants, merchants at Manilla, had received instructions from the Government there to undertake the transport and shipment of a quantity of tobacco to merchants in London, to effect the insuraace, and to pay all the necessary charges and expenses in relation thereto. The merchants at Manilla were to be entitled to charge 2½ per cent. on the amount, valued at about 47,000l.

The Supreme Government of Spain thinking the officer at Manilla had acted incautiously in this respect, refused to allow the amount of the ordinary commission in the account, having directed the tobacco to be sold by their own agents here:

Held, the consignees were entitled to a moiety of the amount of the ordinary commission, being 1¼ per cent. instead of 2½ per cent.

An agent, employed to effect an insurance on goods transmitted from abroad, must account for any discount allowed by the insurance offices on the premiums paid.

This was a bill filed on behalf of the Supreme Government of Spain against the members of a firm of merchants at Manilla, and others, for an account and damages, under the following circumstances.

The Government of Spain possessed the colony of Manilla, and the tobacco grown in large quantities in that country.

On the 18th April 1867 a quantity of Government tobacco was shipped on board a British vessel called Her Majesty. She sailed from Manilla with this cargo on board, and in due time arrived in the port of London. This tobacco was forwarded by Messrs. Tilson, Herman, and Co., the merchants at Manilla. They had been commissioned to do this under instructions from the Intendante of the Spanish Government, being the proper officer in that behalf to undertake the transport and shipment of said tobacco, to effect the insurance upon its value, and the expenses of bonding and warehousing and sale thereof; and to satisfy all the charges and expenses necessary in that respect.

Tilson, Herman, and Co., on the shipment being effected, drew bills in favour of the Spanish Government for three-fourths of the value at Manilla, being to the amount of about 35,000l., which sum at the time of the filing of the plaintiff's bill had been paid into the treasury of the Spanish Government. The remaining one-fourth remained to be settled and liquidated.

The commission upon this transaction which Tilson, Herman, and Co., were entitled to receive, was at the rate of 2½ per cent. on the amount of the value of the tobacco, about 47,000l. sterling. It was consigned by them to their correspondents in London, Parr, Herman, and Co., to whom the bills of lading had been transmitted. Mr. Parr was the only member of the firm of Tilson, and Co., residing in England. It appeared that the Spanish Government considered that the Intendante at Manilla had acted incautiously in the transaction, and in order, as they conceived, to prevent the tobacco being sacrificed, they instructed Don Juan Garvaron, the Consul-General of the Spanish Government in this country, to ascertain the price at which Messrs. Parr, Herman, and Co., proposed to sell this tobacco, to ascertain the market price of similar tobacco, and advise the Spanish Government upon the subject. He was also instructed that should an opportunity occur of selling the tobacco at a higher price than that mentioned by Messrs. Parr, Herman, and Co., he was authorised to pay off the advances made upon it, take possession of the tobacco, and sell it as he should consider most advantageously.

A treaty and correspondence thereupon ensued between Don Juan and Messrs. Parr, Herman, and Co. The result was that Messrs. Parr and Co. refused to recognise Don Juan Garvaron as the representative of the Spanish Government, and declined to give him any information as to the sale of the tobacco. M. Garvaron had heard that the tobacco was about to be disposed of by the firm of Grant, Hodgson, and Co. of London, but could obtain no specific information from that firm.

A formal notification in writing was given by M. Garvaron to Messrs. Parr, Herman, and Co. not to proceed with the sale of the tobacco.

This was admitted by the parties to the cause.

A portion of the tobacco having been offered for sale by Messrs. Grant, Hodgson, and Co., M. Garvaron wrote to Messrs. Parr, Herman, and Co. refusing to authorise or recognise any such sale. In the whole of these transactions Messrs Parr, Herman, and Co. refused to recognise any persons as their principals, except Tilson, Herman, and Co., of Manilla, through whom they had received their original instructions.

Subsequently a portion of the tobacco was sold under an order of this court, and a sum of 2553l. and upwards was transferred into court, to abide the result of the suit.

The defendants claimed 1638l. as commission at 2½ per cent. on the sale of the tobacco. They also claimed to deduct from the amount payable to the Spanish Government a sum of 2999l., which the defendant Parr alleged had been paid by his London firm for the insurance of the tobacco which had been then valued at 57,000l. From the above sum of 2999l., a discount had been allowed by the insurance office.

The whole of the tobacco was actually sold in this country for 65,549l. and upwards, and on this amount a commission after the rate of 1¼ per cent. had been paid by the Spanish Government to the consignees of the tobacco.

The questions raised in this cause were. What was the commission to which the consignees were entitled? and 2nd, as to their right to deduct the discount on the insurance money allowed by the insurance offices.

A good deal of evidence was entered into as to the custom of merchants regulating the payment of commission, and deduction of discount in cases of similar occurrence.

Kay, Q. C., Mathew (Common Law Bar), and A. G. Marten, for the plaintiffs, relied upon Smith's Mercantile Law, edit. 1859, pp. 124 and 127; and Turnbull v. Garden, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 218; and 38 L. J. 331, Ch.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Waller, for the defendants, contended that they were clearly entitled to some commission—and that as to the claim for the discount allowed by the offices, the Spanish Government could not have got the insurance effected upon any other terms.

Digitized by Google

The Vice-Chancellor, after stating the general facts of the case, said:—In this case the Government of Spain contends that the conduct of the defendants rendered this suit necessary. No doubt the defendants were bound to pay attention to the instructions of the Manilla Government through whom they received their instructions. They were their principals. Let us suppose a consignment by the governing powers at Calcutta to France, and some agent of the Treasury says to the consignee, "We are the Supreme Government. We ask you not to obey the instructions you have received from Calcutta. I am the Consul-General." Would not the consignee be justified in rejecting and repudiating any such interference? In my opinion the defendants were right in saying, "We cannot recognise your authority in any way." And I think the consignees were entitled to a fair amount of commission. The advances were made by the firm at Manilla to the Government established there, by bills drawn on their London house, and duly accepted and paid by them. The ordinary commission on similar transactions is 2½ per cent. on the amount of the goods sold, which is reduced to half of that amount where the goods are taken out of the agents' hands before actual sale. The defendants therefore were clearly entitled to 1¼ per cent. in this transaction. As regards the policy of assurance: If a man intends to charge a commission, he must say so, and it must be agreed to by the consignor. The case of Turnbull v. Garden is conclusive on this point. A man cannot be entitled to say, "I charge you as cash paid on the day, and I retain the 10 per cent. discount for paying it on that day." The suit was originally informal, and the defendants are entitled to their costs, except the costs occasioned by the evidence taken in the suit. As to this, no costs on either side.

Decree accordingly.

Solicitors: Walton and Bubb; Stevenson, Williamson, and Co.

Monday, Dec. 20.

Re Young's Trusts.

Practice—Service on infant parties.

Service of a petition for the appointment of a new trustee on infant cestui que trusts dispensed with.

A petition for the appointment of another trustee in the room of one who declined to act further in the trusts of a testator's will, on the ground of the amount of professional duties, had been presented to this branch of the court, and an order made according to the prayer of the petition. It subsequently was discovered that infant parties were interested under testator's will, and the registrar declined to complete the order made on the hearing of the petition as the infants were not properly represented, although counsel had appeared for them on that hearing. No guardian ad litem had been appointed. The common petition for that appointment at the Rolls had been left, but it was stated that although formerly the order would have been a matter of course, a practice had grown up that a special application to the court to dispense with service of the petition on infants was now necessary.

W. Heath Bennet now applied that such service on the infants in this case might be dispensed with. He referred to Morgan's Orders, 3rd edit., p. 178.

The Vice-Chancellor made the order, requiring that the order appointing the substituted trustee should bear date after the order for the appointment of guardian ad litem at the Rolls.

Solicitor: Geo. W. Chinery, Essex-street, Strand.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by T. W. Saunders and J. Shortt, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, Nov. 10.

Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Odell.

Highway—Repair of—Denial by waywarden—Jurisdiction of justices—25 & 26 Vict. c. 61.

The justices have no jurisdiction under sect. 18 of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61 to order a highway board to repair a highway if the waywarden of the parish deny the fact that such road is a highway; and although the denial, if not made bona fide, will not oust their jurisdiction if they are satisfied that the road is really a highway, yet their decision that the denial is not made bona fide is not conclusive, and may be reviewed by this court.

This was a rule to quash an order of justices, whereby the highway board of the district of Bletsoe, in the county of Beds, were ordered to repair a certain road. The said order had been removed into this court by certiorari.

It appeared that at a petty sessions held on the 2nd Feb. 1868 for the division of Bletsoe an information was heard that a certain highway called Yetnow Lane was then out of repair, and that the said highway board were chargeable with its repair. At the hearing a considerable amount of evidence was given to prove both that the lane was a highway, and that the parish were liable to repair it.

It was stated in the affidavits made in opposition to the rule, that upon the waywarden of the parish being called upon to make his defence, he, by his attorney, alleged that the said road, called Yetnow-lane, was not a highway, and cited the case of Reg. v. Farrer, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 115; 1 L. Rep. Q. B., and argued that the justices had no jurisdiction to proceed further by reason of the said waywarden (through him), having denied the road to be a highway, inasmuch as the Highway Acts giving such jurisdiction applied only to highways admitted to be such; that neither the said waywarden nor his attorney denied the liability of the parish of Odell aforesaid to repair the said road; that the justices, therefore, directed the said board to appear at a subsequent petty sessions, and appointed a surveyor to view the said highway, and to report on its state to the justices at such petty sessions; that at such subsequent petty sessions the said surveyor made his report; that the attorney of the said waywarden was in court and stated that he should take proceedings to quash any order the said justices might make in the matter, as the said waywarden denied that Yetnow-lane aforesaid was a highway, and also denied the liability of the parish to repair it; but he did not offer any evidence in support of either of such denials; that neither the said waywarden nor his attorney had previously denied the liability of the parish of Odell to repair the said highway, and that, thereupon, the justices made an order on the said board, limiting a time for the complete and effectual repair of the said highway. The justices, in their affidavit, stated that the evidence offered fully satisfied them that the road was a highway, and that they believed that the denial of the said waywarden that the said road was a highway was not made bona fide, but was colourable only and a bare assertion made without any reasonable ground to support it.

Digitized by Google

In support of the rule the waywarden of the parish made affidavit in which he stated that upon being summoned he convened a parish meeting and was instructed by the parishioners to appear on behalf of the parish and deny the liability of the parish to repair the said road; that he attended with his attorney, and at the hearing his said attorney objected that the said road was not a highway, and that the inhabitants were not bound to repair it, and that he himself stated at the hearing that the said inhabitants always had denied their liability to repair the said road, and that they had been summoned eleven years previously and had been advised by counsel that they were not liable to repair the said road, and the said last-mentioned summons had been abandoned, but that notwithstanding the said objection the parties appointed a surveyor to view the said road and report to them; that at the next petty session the said attorney again objected that the said road was not a highway, and that the inhabitants were not bound to repair it, but that the justices made an order upon the board to repair it. The attorney for the waywarden in his affidavit stated that after evidence had been given that the road was a highway and was out of repair, he stated to the justices that the liability to repair the said road was demised by the said waywarden on behalf of the inhabitants of the said parish, and he also contended on the part of the waywarden that the said road was not a highway and was not admitted to be a highway by the said waywarden on behalf of the inhabitants of the said parish, and therefore the said justices had no jurisdiction to make any order whatever on the said summonses; that the justices made an order appointing a surveyor to inspect the road, and report to them on the 2nd March; that he thereupon objected that the order was unnecessary and improper, as the liability of the parish to repair the road was denied; that he attended the petty sessions on the 2nd March when the surveyor made his report, and the attorney for the complainant asked the justices to make an order upon the highway board for the repair of the road, whereupon he, the said attorney for the waywarden, objected that the said justices had no jurisdiction on the ground that the said road was not a highway, and was not admitted to be a highway by the said waywarden, and that the liability to repair the said road was denied by the said waywarden on behalf of the said inhabitants of the parish, and he thereupon gave the said justices a written notice under the hand of the said waywarden, containing such denial, but that the said justices made an order upon the highway board to repair the said road.

By sect. 18 of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61 (the Highways Act) it is enacted that where complaint is made to any justice of the peace that any highway is out of repair he shall issue two summonses, one addressed to the highway board, and the other to the waywarden of the parish liable to the repair of such highway, requiring such board and waywarden to appear before the justices at some petty sessions in the summons mentioned:

And at such petty sessions, unless the board undertake to repair the road to the satisfaction of the justices, or unless the waywarden deny the liability of the parish to repair, the justices shall direct the board to appear at some subsequent petty sessions to be then named, and shall either appoint some competent person to view the highway, and report to them on its state at such other petty sessions, or fix a day previous to such petty sessions, at which two or more of such justices will themselves attend to view the highway. At such last-mentioned petty sessions, if the justices are satisfied either by the report of the person so appointed, or by such view as aforesaid, that the highway complained of is not in a state of complete repair, it shall be their duty to make an order on the board limiting a time for the repair of the highway complained of, &c.

By sect. 19, it is enacted that:

When on the hearing of any such summons respecting the repair of any highway, the liability to repair is denied by the waywarden on behalf of his parish, or by any party charged therewith, the justices shall direct a bill of indictment to be preferred, and the necessary witnesses in support thereof to be subpœnaed at the next assizes to be holden in and for the said county, or at the next general quarter sessions of the peace for the county, riding, division, or place wherein the highway is situate against the inhabitants of the parish, or the party charged therewith for suffering and permitting the said highway to be out of repair, &c.

Jelf now appeared to show cause against the rule.—The justices had jurisdiction to hear and decide the question, and as they have found that the evidence offered fully satisfied them that the road was a highway, and that they believed that the denial of the waywarden that it was a highway was not made bona fide, but was colourable only, and a bare assertion only without any reasonable ground to support it, this court will not interfere with their decision. [MELLOR, J.—You know that it has been held in Reg. v. Farrer, 35 L. J. 210, M. C.; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 515, the jurisdiction of the justices attaches only where the road is an admitted highway.] The denial must not be colourable, and must consist of something more than a bare denial, otherwise it would be in the power of the parish in the clearest and most notorious cases of a highway to deny its being such, and so prevent the beneficial operation of the statute. In Reg. v. Farrer, the Chief Justice says, "If the denial were not made bona fide, I do not think the jurisdiction would be ousted." In Reg v. Johnson, 34 L. J. 85, M. C., it was held that when, on the hearing of a summons against the surveyors of a parish for the nonrepair of a highway, the surveyors deny the duty of the parish to repair on the ground that the alleged highway is not a highway, the justices cannot proceed to make an order under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 95, that an indictment be preferred without making any inquiry as to whether the road be a highway. [MELLOR, J.—If the waywarden appears and denies, why go into the evidence? The only person who can make the denial is the waywarden.] BLACKBURN, J.—Suppose upon the hearing the justices should come to the conclusion that it is a highway when it is not, how then?] Their finding would be binding. [BLACKBURN, J.—But surely in this case there was ample evidence the other way, that it was not a highway, and that the parish were not bound to repair it. It seems that there had been a dispute upon the very point eleven years ago, and that the parish were advised by counsel that they were not liable to repair.] It does not clearly appear what was the result of that application. But it is certainly for the justices to determine whether or not the objection was made bonâ fide, and this court will not reverse their decision upon that point. [BLACKBURN, J.—I do not see why this court should not reverse the decision of justices on such a point as upon any other.]

Keane, Q. C. and W. Graham, in support of the rule, were not called upon.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that the rule should be made absolute. As to the question, whether if the highway is not admitted the justices can do anything, I think the case of R. v. Farrer is conclusive. The only point left open is whether this court can review the finding of the justices that it was not a bona fide denial on the part of the waywarden of the road being a highway? I think it is established by a series of cases that it is competent to this court to review the finding of the justices upon this point. I do not mean to say that if there is evidence both pro and con, and if the justices as judges of matters of fact decide one way, that this court will not give great weight to their finding, inasmuch as they have the advantage of seeing the witnesses, yet when this court sees plainly that the justices have gone wrong upon their view of the facts, it is not only competent, but it is the duty of this court to review their decision. Applying that rule to the facts here, I think when a representation was made to the justices by the waywarden of the parish, a public officer acting in the course of his duty, that this road was not a highway, and the parish was not liable to repair it, the justices ought to have respected that statement. It is true that if the other evidence showed that the waywarden was acting mala fide, it ought not to bind them. Still as it appeared that eleven years ago an attempt had been made to compel the parish to repair this road, and the opinion of counsel was taken, and was favourable to the parish, that was strong evidence to corrobate the waywarden's statement. All the facts of the case showed that the point was raised bona fide, and in that event the justices could not order an indictment. It never was intended that justices should have jurisdiction to do anything except where it was admitted by the parties that the road was a highway, and the parish admitted or denied its liability to repair it. I think, therefore, the justices were wrong, and that the rule should be made absolute.

BLACKBURN, MELLOR, and LUSH, JJ. concurred.

Rule absolute.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

June 22, and Nov. 15.

WHITEHOUSE AND ANOTHER v. THE WOLVERHAMPTON AND WALSALL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company and mine owner—Severance of lands by railway—Mine owner's claim for compensation—Reference to arbitration—Expenses not yet actually incurred — Future necessary expenses — Amount of ascertainable at once with reasonable certainty— What may be included in award—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), s. 81—"From time to time"—Construction of.

By sect. 81 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 2), "the company shall from time to time, pay to the owner, lessee, or occupier, of any mines extending so as to be on both sides of the railway, all such expenses and losses as shall be incurred by such owner, &c., by reason of the severance of the lands lying over such mines by the railway," . . . and the amount of such losses or expenses shall, in case of dispute, be settled by arbitration.

The plaintiffs, as lessees and occupiers, exclusively for mining purposes, of certain lands, which, during their occupation, had been severed by the defendants' railway, claimed compensation from the defendants for the damage thereby caused; and the parties, being unable to agree upon the amount of compensation to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs, for the damage accruing to the latter, by reason of the before-mentioned severance and the execution of the defendants' works, the matter was referred to an arbitrator appointed under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, who, by his award, assessed the amount of such compensation at 1500*l.*, which he accordingly awarded to the plaintiffs, apportioning it under various heads of damage. By his award the arbitrator stated that the defendants, having objected that the damage, in respect of which the plaintiffs claimed compensation, was of such a description that the plaintiffs were not at present entitled to recover or receive compensation for the same, but must wait until the losses and expenses in respect of which compensation was claimed had been actually sustained and incurred, he had thereupon stated a case for the opinion of the court. The case then set forth the nature of the several items of expense, in respect of which compensation had been awarded, and stated that, although such expenses had not as yet been actually incurred, the time was fast approaching when, by reason of the defendants' works, the same must necessarily be incurred by the plaintiffs in working their mines, and that, in the arbitrator's opinion, as a matter of fact, they were all matters then "apparent, and capable of being ascertained and estimated," and he had "accordingly awarded compensation in respect of all of them."

Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Pigott and Cleasby, BB.), looking at the facts stated in the special case, and without laying down any general rule, that, inasmuch as the "expenses and losses," in respect of which the arbitrator had awarded compensation, were imminent, and capable of being ascertained and assessed at once with reasonable certainty, and the whole of them were incidental and due to the severance of the lands by the railway, they came clearly within sect. 81 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 as "additional expenses and losses," for which the plaintiffs were entitled to present compensation.

This was a special case stated by an arbitrator appointed under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, which raised the question whether, in the amount of compensation awarded by him to the plaintiffs, in respect of damage caused to them as lessees and occupiers, exclusively for mining purposes, of certain lands lying over certain mines, by reason of the severance of such lands by the defendants' railway, he was at liberty to include certain sums of money for "expenses and losses," which at the time of making his award had not actually been incurred or sustained by the plaintiffs, but which, in the arbitrator's judgment upon the facts and evidence before him, were imminent and necessary shortly to be incurred by the plaintiffs in order to enable them to continue the working of their mines, and which expenses and losses were, in his opinion, capable of being at once ascertained and assessed with reasonable certainty. By his award dated 8th Jan. 1869, after reciting that by virtue of the Wolverhampton and Walsall Railway Acts 1855 and 1866 and the public Acts incorporated therewith, the defendants' company was incorporated and authorised to make a railway from Wolverhampton to Walsall, and to purchase and take in lands for the purposes of the said undertaking, and particularly the lands thereinafter mentioned, and that Henry Bickerton Whitehouse and Benjamin Whitehouse, the plaintiffs, were entitled, or claimed to be entitled, to sell and convey the said last-mentioned lands, or some interest therein, to the said company; and that on the 21st April 1867, notice was duly given to the plaintiffs by the company, that the company required to purchase or take the said lands, and that they were willing to treat for the purchase of the lands so required, and as to the compensation to be made for the damage sustained by the plaintiffs, by reason of the execution of the company's works, and the company thereby demanded the particulars of the estate and interest of the plaintiffs in the said lands, and of the claims made by them in respect thereof; and the said lands were delineated in a plan, and specified and described in a schedule to the said notice, as being situate in Wednesfield, in the parish of Wolverhampton, in the county of Stafford, and as being part of field and other lands numbered &c., in the plan and book of reference deposited with the clerk of the peace for the county of Stafford; and reciting that in pursuance of the notice the said plaintiffs afterwards, by statements under their hands, informed the said company of the particulars of their estate and interest in the said lands, and of the claims made by them in respect thereof, and from such statement it appeared, and the fact was, that part of the said fields and lands out of which the company took 2 roods and 32 perches, were lands belonging to one Edward Orme Machell, who had, in the year 1858, granted to the plaintiffs the right to get certain ironstone mines thereunder, and deposit the spoil on the surface; that other portions of the said lands were held by the plaintiffs under one Jonathan Scarth, for an unexpired term of years; that another portion of the said lands was held by the said plaintiffs under Richard Fryer Merson; another portion of the said land was held by the said plaintiffs under the Duke of Cleveland for an unexpired term of years, and that the residue of the said lands were held by them under a lease or agreement for a lease from the said R. F. Merson and others for an unexpired term of years. And reciting that the said plaintiffs and the said company could not agree as to the amount of compensation and damage to be paid as aforesaid, neither did the said company offer any sum of money to the said plaintiffs as and for such compensation. And reciting that the said plaintiffs by a notice bearing date the 12th Feb. 1868, signified to the said company their desire to have the question of compensation settled by arbitration. And that by another notice, dated the 12th Feb. 1868, the plaintiffs nominated John Yardley, mining surveyor, as the arbitrator on their behalf concerning the premises, whereupon the said company nominated in writing, under the hands of their joint secretaries, Joseph Cooksley, mining surveyor, as the other arbitrator in the premises. And that the said arbitrators before entering into the consideration of the matters referred to them duly nominated an umpire in the said question of disputed compensation. And reciting that the said arbitrators differed and failed to make their award in due time, and no extended time was appointed, whereby the matters so referred duly came before the said umpire. And reciting also that the said umpire proceeded in the said umpirage and heard the parties and their advocates, witnesses, and other evidence, and was ready to make his award, when it was discovered that the time, limited by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act for that purpose, had expired before the proceedings in the reference before the said umpire were completed; and thereupon, by agreement under the hands of the plaintiffs and the seal of the said company, dated the 12th Dec. 1868, after reciting the reference to arbitration and the appointment of the said arbitrators and the said umpire, and that the latter was ready to make his award, as before mentioned, but that neither the said arbitrators nor the said umpire had, before proceeding with the arbitration, or since, made the declaration before a justice of the peace required by the 33rd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and that the time limited by the said Act, for the umpire's making his award had expired as before mentioned, but that the plaintiffs and the said company were desirous that he should proceed to make it, and were willing to be bound thereby, notwithstanding the matters aforesaid. It was agreed between the said parties that the umpire should proceed to make his award accordingly, and that they should be bound by such award as if made on a general reference, and that neither of them should or would set up either of the above objections, or any objection on any matter of form not touching the substance of the matters referred, so as the said umpire should make and publish such award on or before the 1st Feb. then next. The said umpire therefore proceeded to make his award concerning the premises, and did thereby find, award, order, and determine that the said company should pay to the said plaintiffs for and in respect of the said lands and their interests therein, and for and in respect of all damage sustained by them by reason of severance and otherwise, and by reason of the execution of the works authorised by the said Acts, and for and in respect of all damage and compensation to which they were entitled under the said reference, the sum of 1500*l*; and reciting that it had been objected before the said umpire, on behalf of the said company, that the damage or injury in respect of which compensation was claimed was of such a description that the said plaintiffs were not at present entitled to recover or receive compensation for the same, or for some part thereof, but must wait until the losses and expenses, in respect of which compensation was claimed, had been actually sustained and incurred, and on the part of the said company, the said umpire was requested to raise the said question on the face of his award, which he did by stating the facts found by him in the following

CASE.

The lands of the claimants, the said H. B. Whitehouse and B. Whitehouse, part of which was taken by the railway company, were held by them under the four different landlords before mentioned, and were in the possession of the claimants; they lay contiguous one to another, and the land taken for the railway was a strip which crossed over them all in a straight line, and was made up of part of each. The lands had been taken by the claimants for the purpose only of mining, and in all of them the mines had been partly got, and the process of mining was going on at the time the company gave their notice to take the land, but a large portion of the mines was still ungotten in places where the workings had not reached. The five holdings (lying contiguous as before mentioned), taken as a whole, were cut into two parts by the railway, one part lying to the north of the railway and another to the south. The railway crosses upon an embankment which had been formed before the case came before me. The workings were progressing from south to north, and those which had taken place were all in the part to the south of the railway, "but were approaching, and in one place were very near to the railway, and, in the ordinary course, if the railway had not interfered, would have soon reached and passed to the north of the land taken by the railway; although the workings had not reached the parts to the north of the railway there is no reason to suppose that, in course of time, and before the expiration of the interest of the claimants they will not do so, and the minerals be worked out to the northern boundary; and, at the time the railway gave their notice, the time was approaching when it would be necessary to sink two pits for the purpose of getting the minerals in the north part, and in fact the spot where one of those pits was to be sunk had been considered, and was determined on and marked on the land by the claimants when the railway company took the land for their railway." The site of the proposed pit, which had been marked, lay in the centre of the line, and was included, and it therefore became necessary that the pit should be sunk elsewhere, and the only proper place for sinking it is in the part to the north of the railway. The claimants have an engine on the land to the south of the railway by which if the railway had not come, and the pit marked out had been made, that pit could have been worked; "but the pit which is to be made instead of it to the north of the railway cannot be worked by that engine on account of the railway intervening, and there must be a new engine and plant erected in the north part to work that pit, and the expense of working that engine must be incurred." The other engine will still be necessary for the workings on the south side of the railway.

Besides the substituted pit on the north side of the railway, the railway company taking the site of the pit which had been marked out, will involve the necessity of sinking another pit on the south side of the railway for the purpose of depositing spoil, which there will be no room to deposit on the north side, the space left for the railway on that side being insufficient, but that pit can be worked by the engine on the south, and no other engine will be necessary to work it. "This pit would not have been necessary but for the railway coming where it does," because the whole of the surface would have been in one piece, so that the necessity for the pit is caused by the railway coming over the claimants' land.

With respect to mines and surface land held under the said Edward Orme Machell, the use of the surface was to deposit the spoil, which, of necessity, must be brought to the surface, when the mine is worked, and unless there is surface land on which that spoil can be deposited, the mine cannot be worked. The claimants had no right to deposit spoil from Machell's on any of their other takings, and had no other land than the surface of Machell's available for the purpose. That surface was already insufficient to contain all the spoil from the mine in Machell's land, and the railway crossing the land, and taking part of that surface, contracted it still more; and if the claimants could get no other land on which to deposit the spoil which the railway prevented from being deposited on Machell's, a quantity of the minerals must be abandoned and lost, which, otherwise would have been gotten; the claimants proved the value of that quantity before me, and claimed that value as part of the compensation; but I find that although the claimants have at present no other land on which they have a right to deposit the spoil in question, they will be able to obtain other surface land for that purpose when they require it, and, therefore, the amount I have included in respect of this claim is in respect of the extra expense the claimants will be put to in acquiring such other surface land, and depositing their spoil upon it, instead of upon their now surface, and I have not included anything for mine, because I find that the claimants will be able to get the mine as effectually as if they had the whole surface land on Machell's.

In consequence of the railway coming where it does, and dividing the surface of the land into two parts, there will necessarily be incurred an extra expense when the proposed pit on the north of the railway comes to be worked, partly from its being necessary to raise the pit frames higher than would otherwise have been necessary, and partly from the necessity of carrying the spoil a greater distance to deposit than would otherwise have been necessary, and the latter head of expense will also apply to another pit at some distance from the former, to the north of the railway.

The sum of 1500*l.*, which I have awarded is made up as follows:—

For the claimants' interest in the land, the sum of 10*l.*

In respect of the engine and plant, 270*l.*

In respect of the expense of working the same for the time during which it will be an extra expense, 840*l.*

In respect of the new pit to the south of the railway, 180*l.*

For the extra expenses in raising pit frames and depositing spoil, 120*l.*

For the expense of acquiring fresh spoil land, and depositing the spoil from Machell's land thereon, 80*l.*

At the time the railway company gave their notice to take the land, no part of the money awarded by me, so far as it is in respect of expense, had been actually expended, nor had the expenses been incurred; but "the necessity for it was foreseen, and the amount, and how far it would diminish the value of the property, was capable of being ascertained with reasonable certainty;" and in ascertaining it, just allowances are to be taken to have been made "in respect of a present receipt of compensation for an expense to be incurred at a future time, and of all other considerations bearing on it."

The railway company had taken possession of the land by virtue of the 85th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and had, under that section, deposited in the bank the sum of 321*l.*, and had also given a bond in respect of that sum pursuant to the same section.

The company contended that the matters in respect of which I have awarded the sums amounting to 1490*l.* were not, nor were either of them, matters in respect of which the claimants were at present entitled to be compensated, and that they must hereafter claim their compensation in respect of these matters under the 81st section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act. "I have held, as matter of fact, if such a finding be admissible and material, that they are all matters now apparent and capable of being ascertained and estimated;" and I have accordingly awarded compensation in respect of all of them, but, if the court is of opinion that I ought not to award compensation in respect of all or any of them, then my award is for such a sum as will remain after deducting what the court decides ought to be deducted.

The above case came on to be argued in Trinity Term last, and by rule of court dated 22nd June 1869, it was referred back to the umpire to be restated, and the award to be amended if he thought fit, and for him to state whether the sum allowed in respect of working the engine was assessed upon the assumption that the claimants would or might work the whole of the mine, or upon the assumption that the railway company would purchase all the land within forty yards of the railway.

In pursuance of that rule, the umpire, on the 4th Nov. last, proceeded to restate the case as follows; and first, the facts already stated in his said award were to be taken as repeated in the restatement of the case, and the said umpire stated the additional facts following:

Upon the hearing before me the claimants, by their evidence, made out a primâ fide case for compensation under each of the heads as to which the special case is stated, to much larger amounts than those I have awarded, and to a much greater amount in the aggregate than the 1500*l.*

After the claimant's case was closed, and the company's case had been so far opened by their advocate as to disclose the question I have raised by my award, and before the time came for the company calling evidence, the parties retired, and on their return informed me that they had agreed that I should make my award for 1500*l.*, but that I should state a case raising the aforesaid question. On my suggesting that there might be other matters on which they ought to agree, and in particular that, as the facts on each of the heads of claim were not identical, they should agree as to what portion of the 1500*l.* should be allotted to each head of claim, they both declined to attempt arriving at any further agreement, and authorised me, if I chose, to distribute it in any way I thought fit, so that the amount of compensation was 1500*l.*, and the aforesaid question was raised by the award; that was what they required, and would be sufficient—the parties did not contemplate that any such division would be necessary, and I have only made such division because the facts as to each head of compensation are not perfectly identical, and not on any supposition that all such facts did not raise substantially the same question. Under these circumstances, I thought it unnecessary for me to enter into the question whether anything from under the railway, or forty yards on each side of it, was or was not to be raised by the engine on the north side of the railway, because, whatever might be the case as to that matter, I was not at liberty to alter the agreed amount of damages, or to give more or less than the 1500*l.*; but in the sum of 840*l.* I did not intend to include the expense of working the engine for the purpose of getting the same under the railway and the adjoining forty yards, which I did not suppose would be got by that engine, but otherwise, as after mentioned.

But, if a specific finding by me on that subject be necessary, I find that the sum of 840*l.* assessed by my said award does not include the expense of working by the engine any part of what was under the railway or within forty yards of it.

The mine was not a flat mine, but one cropping up from the south towards the north, and according to the usual mode of working such a mine no mineral is got out of the seam by means of any pit, if such mineral lies at a lower level than where the pit cuts into the seam, and the pit in question being to the north of the railway, the mineral from under the railway and within the forty yards, if got, would not in the ordinary course of working, nor in the way the plans in evidence before mentioned showed the mines in question to have been worked, be got by means of it, but would be got by means of the old pits to the south of the railway, and consequently not by the engine in question, nor at any additional expense.

The claimants' witnesses stated that so many acres of mine would have to be gotten by the new pit to the north, and consequently by the engine in question, that it would take such a length of time to get that quantity, and working the engine for that length of time would cost so much. I did not understand that the witnesses in stating the quantity of mine to be gotten, were including any part of what lay under the railway, or the adjoining space of forty yards, and that question was not alluded to nor raised by any cross-examination or otherwise, and the evidence of the quantity that would have to be raised by the engine stood uncontradicted.

Except by stating the aforesaid additional facts, I do not think fit to make any amendment in my said award.

The following are the points to be urged in argument on the part of the said claimants:—First, that they were entitled to claim and have assessed by the arbitrator, not only the value of the land usually taken by the railway companies, but also the amount of compensation to which they were entitled for the injuriously affecting their other lands by the taking of the land actually taken; secondly, that all the various heads of damage awarded are properly the subject-matter of compensation within the meaning of the Acts; thirdly, that those heads of damage are necessarily incident to the rating of the lands in question, and naturally arise from it, and are properly the subject of compensation; fourthly, that although the expenses awarded for had not been incurred, the necessity for their being incurred could be foreseen, and they arise from the taking of the lands actually taken, and could be fairly valued; fifthly, the taking of the land actually taken naturally diminished the value of the other lands to the extent of the amount awarded; sixthly, that the claimants are entitled to be paid the full amount awarded.

Points for argument on behalf of the company:—First, that the claimants are at present entitled to compensation only in respect of their interest in the land for which the umpire has awarded the sum of 10*l.*; secondly, that they are not at present entitled to compensation in respect of the additional expense which they may or will thereafter incur in working the mines mentioned in the said award, and for which the umpire has awarded the sum of 1490*l.*; thirdly, that the claimants are not at present entitled to compensation in respect of the said mines or the working thereof being hereafter injuriously affected by the execution of the works of the company; fourthly, that by the 81st section of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (incorporated with the special Acts of the said company) the company are liable to make compensation in respect of the said mines and the works thereof only from time to time as and when the additional expense is incurred, or the injury occasioned by the execution of the works of the company.

The following sect. 81 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act (8 Vict. c. 20), being one of the group of clauses (77 to 85 inclusive) relating exclusively to mines lying under or near the railway, and coming under the heading in the Act, "And with respect to mines lying under or near the railway, be it enacted as follows" is the section on the construction of which this case depends.

Sect. 81:

The company shall, from time to time, pay to the owner, lessee, or occupier of any such mines, extending so as to lie on both sides of the railway, all such additional expenses and losses as shall be incurred by such owner, lessee, or occupiers, by reason of the severance of the lands lying over such mines by the railway, or of the continuous working of such mines being interrupted as aforesaid, or by reason of the same being worked in such manner, and under such restrictions, as not to prejudice or injure the railway; and for any minerals not purchased by the company which cannot be obtained by reason of making and maintaining the railway; and if any dispute or question shall arise between the company and such owner, lessee, or occupier as aforesaid, touching the amount of such losses or expenses, the same shall be settled by arbitration.

H. Matthews, Q. C. (with him was J. O. Griffits), for the plaintiffs, submitted that they were entitled to be paid at once the full amount awarded them by the umpire as compensation. There was, he contended, no distinction in the various sums awarded; all came under the same principle, and all the heads of compensation awarded on came within the wide terms of sect. 81 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act. No doubt the defendants will rely on the words "from time to time" in that section; but the question will be, Is the mine owner bound to wait till the expenses are actually incurred, or are the expenses capable of assessment; and is the arbitrator competent to assess them at the present moment? The current of the decisions has been that, where the expenses are capable of being foreseen and calculated, the mine owner is bound to recover them at once, and not to vex the company with oft-recurring claims and actions, and that any sort of damage which could have been so foreseen and calculated is barred by award. No doubt there are conflicting dicta on the construction and application of sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (8 Vict. c. 18), and as to whether a second claim can be entertained for subsequent damage not foreseen at the time of the first inquiry. In Ware v. The Regent's Canal Company, 9 Ex. 395,

23 L. J. 145, Ex., this court laid it down that compensation could not be awarded for contingent damages in futuro, but that it might be done in a case where it appeared clear that such damage must necessarily accrue. In Croft v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 741; 32 L. J. 113, Q. B.; 3 B. & S. 436, the Court of Queen's Bench held that, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, damage likely to ensue from subsequent subsidence and vibration of surface land, by reason of defendants' tunnel, and which might have been foreseen, was matter which should have been assessed prospectively by the arbitrator, and could not afterwards be recovered by action or otherwise; and Cockburn, C. J. there was of opinion that even damage which could not have been foreseen, could not, subsequently, be the subject of compensation. But, in the present case, the damage could have been both clearly foreseen and easily calculated. This very question arose in Rex v. The Leeds and Selby Railway Company, 8 A. & E. 633. Sect. 32 of the defendants' local Act there contained the words "from time to time," and its words were stronger than those of sect. 81 here, yet it was held that the Act there did not contemplate a future inconvenience of the kind there complained of, and Littledale, J. there said, "it would be very inconvenient if a party could be continually claiming fresh compensation from time to time." Here, in the very language of Willes, J., in delivering judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Bagnall and another v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 419; 31 L. J. 480, Ex.; 1 H. & C. 544, "the damage can be calculated with reasonable certainty," and his Lordship there expressly distinguishes the case of an "unopened mine." Were the facts here that the plaintiff might never open or work the mine it would be a different case. So, to the same effect is the decision of the House of Lords in the Caledonian Railway Company v. Lockhart, 3 Macq. H. of L. Cas. 808; The Great Western Railway Company v. Bennett, in the House of Lords; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 186; 36 L. J. 133, Q. B.; L. Rep. 2 H. of L. E. & I. App. 27, is negatively in the plaintiffs' favour, the point taken by the defendants here not having been raised in that case either below or above. The statute, it is contended, does not prohibit the plaintiffs from getting compensation now, and the inconvenience of laying down a rule that every item of the expenses and losses must have been incurred before compensation can be awarded, would be expensive, and lead in some cases, easily to be suggested, to the bringing a fresh action every day. Even in cases where the past tense is used, it has been held a matter of present assessment; a fortiori that will be so here where the words are, "shall be incurred." There was here an actual present necessity for expenditure in respect of future necessary works, the costs of which were capable of being at once ascertained with reasonable certainty, and therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to present compensation, and consequently to the judgment of the court. He cited also

Reg v. The Navigation Aire and Calder, 30 L. J. Q. B.; and

Lee and others v. Milner and others, 2 M. & W. 824; 6 L. J., N. S., 206, Ex.

Macnamara (with him was Holl), contra, for the defendants.—The expenses and losses in respect of which compensation has been awarded not having yet been incurred, the plaintiffs are not entitled to receive it. No doubt the general rule is that, under sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, compensation for land taken or injuriously affected must be assessed once for all, there being in that section no words from time to time, as there are in sect. 81 of the Act in question in the present case. With respect to mines, however, it seems a different rule prevails for which it may be assumed the Legislature had good reason, as, for instance, what Pigott, B. called the "speculative character" of mines in general—thus, there may be no minerals under the land required by the railway; or, being there, they may never be worked; or, if begun to be worked, may come to a sudden stop by reason of some unseen "fault," and so the additional expense expected to be incurred by a certain working may never be incurred at all. Therefore it is that in the group of clauses 77 to 85 in the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act exclusively relating to mines "lying under or near the railway," the words "from time to time" are found in sect. 81, which provides for payment of compensation by the railway company to the mine owner. The company are here called on to pay a large sum for expenses which may never be incurred. No injury to the mine owner can accrue by his waiting till he has incurred the expense or loss; it is not a question of putting him to costs or depriving him of his rights, for he may claim compensation "from time to time," as the need arises, whereas serious injury and injustice may be done to the company by holding them liable to pay this compensation at once. The arbitrator no doubt found that "although the workings had not reached the parts to the north of the railway, there was no reason to suppose that in time, and before the expiration of the plaintiffs' interest, they would not do so, and that the time was approaching when it would be necessary to sink two pits," &c., yet he nowhere finds that there was any actual existing necessity for doing these things, nor was there a present necessity for the expenditure. It is assumed by the plaintiffs' case that the coal will be worked out to the extreme limit of the northern boundary; but that may never happen. The inconvenience to the mine owner, from his having to make repeated claims is not to be weighed in the balance against the great injury to the company if they are called on to pay a large sum for a possible damage to the mine owner, which, had he waited, it may be, he would never have suffered. The cases cited and relied on by the plaintiffs are distinguishable. In Rex v. Leeds and Selby Railway Company the mine owner was bound by the Act of Parliament not to work so as to injure the railway, and the court decided he was not entitled to compensation for that part of the mine which he could not have worked without being liable to make compensation to them. Croft's case was not the case of a mine, and the words "from time to time" did not occur there, and the judgment of Cockburn, C. J. is in our favour, where he expressly says that if it had been intended that unforeseen damage subsequently accruing should be the subject of future compensation, the words would have been introduced in sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. In the Caledonian Railway Company v. Lockhart, Lord Wensleydale, in 3 Macq. p. 825, draws a distinction between ordinary cases where damages are assessed once for all, and exceptional cases where the words "from time to time" occur. The judgment of Willes, J., in Bagnall's case, in the Exchequer Chamber, is in favour of the present defendants. His Lordship says: "There are practical obstacles of an insuperable character against saying that there arises, upon the making of a railway, an immediate right to compensation in respect of possible future injury to unopened mines. At that time it does not appear that the mine will ever be worked." I submit that the part of the mine here, to the north of the railway, is the same as an unopened mine. Lee v. Milner is distinguishable on the same ground as The Leeds and Selby Railway case; The Great Western Railway v. Bennett also differs from the present case. Should the mines be sold, as suggested just now by Cleasby, B., the amount of compensation would be taken into consideration in the price, and no difficulty would arise in recovering it from the owner or the company. The company are substantially right, it is submitted on all the heads of claim; but certainly on all save the last item, namely, the 80*l.* for acquiring new ground for deposit of spoil.

H. Matthews, Q. C. was not called on to reply.

KELLY, C. B.—This case presents to our view a very complicated state of facts with which, in the absence of inferences to assist us, we must deal in the best way we can. No case has been cited to us at the bar, nor, as far as I am aware, has any been decided, on sect. 81 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), which is the section presented for our consideration in the present instance. Being, therefore, called upon to do so, we must, in the absence of any authority bearing directly upon it, construe and interpret that section for ourselves, and decide this case accordingly. Premising, therefore, that every case of this nature must be taken and considered upon its own merits, and in conjunction with its own facts and circumstances, the only conclusion, I think, to which we can safely arrive in the present case, viewing the whole of the facts together as stated in the special case, is that the total amount of the sum which the arbitrator has here awarded as compensation to the plaintiffs, with the exception of a very small part of it, for their interest in the lands taken by the defendants for their line of railway, was for expenses which either had been, or would in all human probability very shortly be, incurred by the plaintiffs. The question for the court to solve is, whether or not the plaintiffs were entitled to immediate compensation, that is to be paid at once, in respect of those items of expense which, though they might be shortly about to be, had not, in fact, as yet been incurred by them. Now the Act of Parliament (8 Vict. c. 20), s. 81, says that "the company shall from time to time pay to the owner, lessee, or occupier of any such mine extending so as to be on both sides of the railway, all such additional expenses and losses as shall be incurred by such owner, lessee, or occupier, by reason of the severance of the lands lying over such mines by the railway, or of the continuous working of such mines being interrupted as aforesaid. . . . and if any dispute or question shall arise between the company and such owner, &c., touching the amount of such losses or expenses, the sum shall be settled by arbitration." Now, it is said, and has been contended in argument before us, on the part of the defendants, that the compensation is not in this case payable at present, the expenditure not having been actually incurred, and that, wherever such expenditure has not actually been incurred, the party claiming compensation must wait to make his claim until he can call on the railway company for compensation, and on this very plain and obvious ground that some portion, if not the whole, of such expense, may never be incurred at all. Now, I quite agree that, in cases where it is clear that the expenses sought to be compensated can or will never be incurred at all, or where, as in the case of a mine not yet opened or actually at work, it is very uncertain whether such expenses will ever be incurred, or any losses ever be sustained on the part of the mine owner, then compensation cannot be claimed or allowed under sect. 81, or otherwise. But that is not the state of things here. Let us see what are the circumstances here, as stated in the special case. Without doubt, there is no uncertainty as to this mine being worked, for we find it stated in the case that it was being worked at the very time when the notices on the part of the company of their desire to take the land in question were given, and that the time was approaching when, in the ordinary course of working it, that portion of the mine lying to the north of the defendants' line of railway would presently be reached, and the minerals be worked out to the northern boundary before the expiration of the plaintiffs' lease or interest in the lands, and that in consequence of the severance of the lands it would be necessary to sink two pits, one on the north side of the railway, for the purpose of getting the minerals in the north part, and the other on the south side of the railway for the purpose of depositing spoil. It is then stated that, in consequence of the severance of the land caused by the railway, it would be necessary to erect a new engine and plant in the northern part of the land to work one of the said pits, which, by reason of such severance and the intervention of the railway, could not be worked by the plaintiffs' engine at present erected and working on the south side of the line of the railway, and that the expenses in respect of the new engine and plant, and of working the same, and of the new pits, must be incurred. It is obvious then that the working of the mine at this very point was intercepted by the defendants' railway, and that it was necessary, in order that the plaintiffs should be enabled to go on with their working of it, which but for the railway would have proceeded in regular course, that they should presently incur the costs and expenses which are found by the arbitrator as being expenses "about to be incurred." Are we then to hold, under this state of facts, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to receive at once the compensation which has been so assessed and awarded to them by the umpire, or are we to say that they must wait for it until these various items of expense have been actually incurred and expended by them? And then, if we were to hold that this latter alternative was the proper principle on which to construe this section of the Act, this further question would arise, namely, when and how often are the mine owners to bring forward their claims? Must it be every day, or every week, every month, or every quarter; every half year or every year; or must they wait until the end of their term and the expiration of their interest in the premises? In my judgment, looking at all the facts stated in the case, and taking the words of the Act of Parliament (sect. 81) into consideration, I think the court will be justified in holding that these are expenses and losses capable of being ascertained and assessed at once, with reasonable and sufficient certainty; that the whole of them are incidental and due to one and the same cause, the severance of the land by the intervention of the defendants' railway; and that they come, therefore, clearly within the 81st section of the Act as "additional expenses and losses," and that, without desiring to lay down any general rule on the subject, we may say that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion, although at first I entertained some doubt as to the proper construction of the 81st section of this Act of Parliament. That doubt, however, has been removed from my mind in the course of the argument, and I am now clearly of opinion that our judgment should be given in favour of the plaintiffs. The case, as stated with great care by the arbitrator, finds that the plaintiffs are entitled to this amount of compensation (1500*l.*) in respect of certain expenses rendered necessary to be incurred by the defendants' line of railway crossing and cutting in two the plaintiffs' land. The questions then are, were these expenses imminent? were they ascertainable? I think they were. Are they such as are within the statute, and were they capable of being assessed before they were actually incurred or paid by the plaintiffs? It seems to me that they were. The 81st section says this, "the company shall from time to time pay to the owner, lessee, or occupier of any such mine extending so as to be on both sides of the railway all such additional expenses and losses as shall be incurred by such owner, &c., by reason of the severance of the lands lying over such mines by the railway, or of the continuous working of such mines being intercepted as aforesaid," &c. Now it seems to me that, giving a reasonable latitude to the words used in this section of the Act, we ought not to construe them as meaning that the mine owner must of necessity actually expend and lay out the money before he can be compensated. If it were so, the exceeding annoyance and inconvenience pointed out by Mr. Matthews would arise, of the company being vexed by daily claims and actions for compensation. That cannot, I think, have been intended by the Legislature. I think, though the words used are not perhaps the most apt, that our construction of the section is far more reasonable, convenient, and just towards both parties. It is not either quite immaterial to observe that the words of the section are not in the past tense, "which shall have been incurred," but in the present tense, "which shall be incurred."

Digitized by Google

Cleasby, B. concurred with the Lord Chief Baron and Pigott, B. in the foregoing judgments pronounced by them, and referred to the case of The Cromford Canal Company v. Cutts, in Chancery, before Lord Cottenham, L. C., reversing the decision of the Vice Chancellor of England, 5 R. Cas. (O. B. & L.) 442.

Channell, B., who had not been present during the argument, took no part in the judgment.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Attorney for the plaintiffs, J. Needham, 1, New-inn, Strand, W.C., agent for Brown and Fellows, Bilston, Staffordshire.

Attorneys for the defendants, Underhill and Field, 10, New-inn, Strand, W.C., agents for H. and J. E. Underhill, Wolverhampton.

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Reported by John Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Nov. 23.

(Before Kelly, C. B., Martin, B., Byles, Blackburn, and Lush, JJ.)

Reg. v. Hodgkiss.

Perjury—False oath at common law—Affidavit under Bills of Sale Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36.)

A false oath, sworn in an affidavit for the purpose of procuring the registration of a bill of sale, is a misdemeanor at common law, of which a person may be found guilty upon an indictment for setting out the facts, and concluding with the usual averment of "wilful and corrupt perjury," which concluding words may be rejected as surplusage.

Case reserved by Pigott, B. for the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved.

The prisoner was tried before me at the last Summer Assizes for the county of Worcester, upon an indictment which charged that he committed wilful and corrupt perjury in an affidavit sworn by him before a commissioner for taking affidavits in the Court of Queen's Bench.

The affidavit was sworn before the Commissioner at Stourbridge, and was made for the purpose of getting a bill of sale filed.

It was material, in the affidavit, to state the date when the bill of sale was made, which the prisoner swore was on the 18th Dec. 1868, whereas it was, in fact, made on the 4th Jan. 1869.

The counsel for the prisoner objected that such an affidavit could not be the subject of an indictment for perjury, not being, as he contended, sworn in a judicial proceeding.

I overruled the objection, and left the case to the jury, who found the prisoner guilty. But I reserved the case for this court upon the above objection, being pressed by the counsel so to do, and the prisoner was admitted to bail.

The Bills of Sale Acts are the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36; and 29 & 30 Vict. c. 96. G. Pigott.

No counsel appeared on either side.

Kelly, C. B.—The prisoner was convicted on an indictment which charged him with having committed wilful and corrupt perjury in an affidavit required by the Bills of Sale Act, which was sworn by him before a commissioner for taking affidavits in the Court of Queen's Bench, and the question for our decision is, whether he was properly convicted or not. The offence was not wilful and corrupt perjury in the strict sense of that term, and, therefore, the prisoner would not be liable to the more severe punishment which can only be imposed in cases of perjury; but it is quite clear that the taking of a false oath in a matter which is required by an Act of Parliament, in order to obtain the registration of a bill of sale, is a misdemeanor at common law, subjecting the person taking the false oath to punishment. It is true that the indictment in this case, after setting out the facts, proceeds, "and so committed wilful and corrupt perjury," but I think that those words may be treated and rejected as surplusage, and then what remains upon the indictment would show a sufficient case of misdemeanor at common law upon which the prisoner might properly be convicted. I therefore think the conviction should be affirmed.

Martin, B.—I am of the same opinion. That this case may be treated as pointed out by the Lord Chief Baron is shown by Rex v. Foster, R. & R. 459, where the prisoner was indicted for perjury in taking a false oath for the purpose of procuring a marriage licence. In that case the facts stated were not sufficient to show a misdemeanor, but here they are.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

Reported by W. Leycester, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Dec. 7.

(Before Lord Penzance.)

Kelly v. Kelly.

Suit for judicial separation—Moral cruelty considered—Wife's health—Decree.

A husband in the exercise of his marital power harassed his wife by reproaches, debarring her from the society of her friends, opening her correspondence, putting her under the surveillance of servants and the like acts, until her health broke down, and she was on the verge of paralysis. The medical testimony was that a return to such cohabitation would be dangerous to her life. The acts of personal violence were very slight, but the court

Digitized by Google

Held that the moral coercion amounted to legal cruelty, and granted a decree for judicial separation.

This was a wife's suit for judicial separation on the ground of her husband's cruelty. The case, which occupied several days, was tried by the court without a jury, and the facts, which disclosed a case of moral coercion, accompanied by a few acts of very slight personal violence, will be found stated with sufficient fulness in the judgment.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. (Inderwick with him) for the petitioner.

The respondent appeared in person.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord PENZANCE.—The peculiar and distinguishing feature of this case is the adoption by the respondent of a deliberate system of conduct towards his wife, with the view of bending her to his authority. A man who sets about to achieve this end by purposely rendering a woman's daily life unhappy is in danger of overstepping his rights, as he is pretty sure to fall short of his duties. The respondent in this case has, in my judgment, done both. Without disparaging the just and paramount authority of a husband, it may be safely asserted that a wife is not a domestic slave, to be driven at all cost, short of personal violence, into compliance with her husband's demands. And if force, whether physical or moral, is systematically exerted for this purpose in such manner, to such a degree, and during such length of time as to break down her health and render serious malady imminent, the interference of the law cannot be justly withheld by any court which affects to have charge of the wife's personal safety. In cases of this kind everything depends on degree. Many acts, which are venial in themselves, become reprehensible when they take their places as parts of a system. Others, justifiable on occasions, lose their justification when continuously and purposely repeated. In considering a charge of cruelty, therefore, the conduct of the parties inculpated can only be justified, or the reverse, as a whole; and if, upon a general review, the Matrimonial Court is of deliberate opinion that cohabitation could not be resumed with safety to the wife, it is bound by the dictates of common sense, as well as upon principles repeatedly avowed and acted upon in a long series of decisions, to step in and forbid its resumption. No doubt, in cases such as the present, where the personal violence used is of a trifling character, it behoves the court to be sedulous in inquiry and slow in conviction. It should be entirely satisfied that the conclusion of the wife's danger is clearly reached, and on reliable evidence. Moreover, the decisions of my predecessors have imported this further proposition as a condition of the court's interference, that the troubles of the wife are not owing to her own misconduct. "If," said the court, in Dysart v. Dysart, 1 Rob. 108, "a wife can insure her own safety by lawful obedience and by proper self-command, she has no right to come here, for this court affords its aid only when the necessity of its interference is absolutely proved." I do not stop to inquire how far this last proposition would stand the test of cases that might possibly arise in which the safety of a weak, misguided, infirm woman, incapable of self-command, might be gravely imperilled by continued cohabitation. For the decision of this case I fully adopt this condition, and setting out on the above principles, I proceed to inquire, what has Mrs. Kelly suffered, from what cause, and with what result upon her health? There is little variance or dispute about the leading facts. Towards the close of the year 1867, Mr. Kelly informed his wife that a sum of 5000*l.* which had been bequeathed to her by her sister had been in great part lost by the investments he had made of it. Unable to obtain from her husband a clear idea of her rights and those of her son under her sister's will, she wrote to her brother-in-law, Col. Thornbury, to see the will for her and explain it. This he did, and wrote her the result, telling her that the money was in law at the entire command of her husband, and that her son had no rights in the matter. Some further correspondence passed between the petitioner and Col. Thornbury, and between the petitioner and her brother. These letters falling into the hands of the respondent were extremely resented by him, and were directly or indirectly the cause of much, if not most, that followed. About the same time the petitioner's son quarrelled with his father, and was obliged to quit the house. The petitioner, to some extent, took the son's part, which increased the resentment of the respondent. From these circumstances the respondent took up the idea, which he afterwards allowed to fill his whole mind, that his wife was plotting and conspiring against him. He commenced opening her letters, and calling her a vile traitor and apostate. He told her that "no modest woman would associate with her more than a prostitute," "that she had given her confidence to another man," &c. He refused to sit at meals with her, he insisted on occupying a separate bedroom, he told the servants to take orders from him, and not from his wife, he forbade her to visit the poor in the district to which she had been accustomed, and desired her not to attend the ministration of the sacrament. Some months passed in this way. The respondent kept apart from his wife all day except at family prayers, and even then he appears to have had little or no communication with her except in the way of rebuke and reproach. At length, in the month of May 1868 the petitioner became ill, her appetite wholly failed, she lost the senses of taste and smell, and towards the end of the month felt a sensation of numbness in her arm, which gave reason to fear paralysis. She consulted Dr. Drysdale. He advised her to leave home. Her husband refused, and on the 29th June, having become worse, she left her home without his consent. I am satisfied from the medical testimony that at this time the occurrences which had taken place, and the isolation and reproaches to which she had been subjected, had so preyed upon her nervous system and general health that serious consequences were to be feared, if she were not for a time withdrawn from the life she was leading. Mrs. Kelly stayed away nearly four months, which she passed with her relations. The respondent wrote her many letters, in which he enlarged upon her sin. He expressed no care for her health, and none that she should return. In October she returned. Between that time and the January following, when she finally left home, she was purposely submitted to the following treatment. She was entirely deposed from her natural position as mistress of her husband's house. She was debarred the use of money entirely; not only were the household expenses withdrawn from her control, but she was not permitted to disburse anything for her own necessary expenses; every article of dress, every trifle that she required, had to be put down on paper, and her husband provided it if he thought proper. Having refused on one occasion of going into the town to tell her husband everywhere that she had been, an interdict was placed on her going out at all. At one time the doors were locked to keep her in, at another a man servant was deputed to follow her; at another the respondent insisted on accompanying her himself whenever she wished to go abroad. On these occasions he appears to have occupied the short time they were together in what he called putting her sin before her in strong, coarse, and abusive terms, applying to her the same epithets and language as would be applicable to a woman who had been guilty of adultery. He took no meals with her; he occupied a separate bedroom; he passed no portion of the day, however small, in her society. They met, as before, only at family prayers, and if he spoke to her at all it was only to give some directions or to reproach her. Save on one or two occasions she saw no one. Those whom she desired to see were forbidden the house. She was absolutely prohibited from writing any letters unless the husband saw them before they were posted. She was thus, as far as the respondent could achieve it, practically isolated from her friends. Meanwhile, the care of the household was confided to a woman, hired for the purpose, who was directed not to obey Mrs. Kelly's orders without the respondent's directions. In short, she was treated like a child or a lunatic, and in this light she was actually regarded by the woman just mentioned, when she first came to her place; and this, be it remembered, though she had passed the mature age of sixty and had been married to the respondent for twenty-seven years. With no occupation, debarred the society of her husband and her son at home, and that of her friends abroad, withheld from the performance of her household duties, subordinated to servants, penniless, and, so far as her husband could effect it, friendless, the daily life of this lady was little better than an imprisonment, the solitary silence of which was broken only by the language of harsh rebuke, foul words, and epithets of insult, indignity, and shame. What wonder that, under so grievous an oppression, her health again gave way? She could not eat, she hardly slept at all, she was subject to constant trembling and fainting, she woke involuntarily screaming at night, and her nervous system was so shattered that the medical witnesses declared paralysis or even madness to be imminent. Now, upon this testimony, it is important to observe that there was no contradiction. The respondent did not, even upon his own oath, deny or qualify the petitioner's evidence as to her state of health. On this head (the most important in the whole case) the respondent confined himself to the suggestion that her miserable condition was brought about, not by his treatment, but by vexation at the discovery of her own treachery. Her actual condition and danger he did not call in question, and yet it is to a repetition of this treatment, with its almost inevitable results, that the respondent expects this court to order Mrs. Kelly's return. That it should be asked to break in upon his rights as a husband by depriving him of his wife's society, or, I should rather say, of her presence under his roof, is to him a matter of surprise and indignation, for, as he truly says, he has not beaten her. He has, indeed, on two or three occasions, made her feel that his superior physical strength was always ready to be exerted to constrain her movements, but he has inflicted no bruises and done no visible bodily hurt. Such a view of the law, if correct, would be little to its credit, and to coincide with it would be to abrogate the first duty in these matters of the Matrimonial Court—the protection of the wife's health and safety. These, then, are the things which Mr. Kelly did, and these the results upon his wife's health. The remaining question is, why did he do them? His answer, I believe, would be, to bring his wife to penitence and submission. But penitence for what? and submission to what? Although he has never in his numerous letters, so far as I can discover, stated with great clearness what it was that he wished her to do, it is, I think, to be sufficiently gathered from them that he desired her to admit that she had suspected him of fraud, and had traitorously conspired with others to fasten that charge upon him. For this he would have her express remorse and contrition, suing for his pardon and humbly confessing her guilt. Mrs. Kelly refused to do so, because she says she never did in fact suspect him of anything false and dishonourable, and never did take counsel with others to bring the charge of it against him. Writing on the 1st Aug. 1868, she says, "I could not tell a lie in this matter. I did not design any treachery, and will never say I did." And further on, "I am sorry I did not ask your leave to see the will. I had a right to do so, but had I at all thought of its vexing you I would not have acted as I did. Surely, now, as what has taken place cannot be recalled, it would be better to bury the past in oblivion; let bygones be bygones; forgive and forget mutually, and seek to spend the little time that remains of this life on earth together in peace. . . . I promise on my part to do all in my power towards this object, but my position must be such as not to cause a scandal. If you will not do this, will you tell me what you do wish, and what is to be the end of it?" Writing again on the 14th Sept. 1868, she said, "I never thought you had done anything dishonourable, and certainly I never tried to prove it. . . . You are under a complete delusion as to my conduct. My desire is to act towards you with the submission, obedience, and even affection of a wife." It would be difficult for a wife to play her part in so critical and painful a situation in a more becoming manner. Surely such language as this should have satisfied any reasonable man. It did not satisfy Mr. Kelly, because, as it appears to me, he had suffered his mind to become filled and mastered by notions utterly extravagant, both as to the authority of a husband and the legitimate means of enforcing it. He invokes the theory of the law, that the wife should be subject to the husband, but he forgets to add this qualification—"in all things reasonable." He asserts that he is within the law if, refraining from physical violence, he only puts such pressure on his wife as shall force her to obey him. But, again, he should add—"provided the means used to exert moral pressure be reasonable." But what if reasonable means are insufficient, and a wife still holds out against her husband's lawful will? The answer is that the law can neither do nor sanction more. The law, no doubt, recognises the husband as the ruler, protector, and guide of his wife. It makes him master of her pecuniary resources; it gives him, within legal limits, the control of her person; it withdraws civil rights and remedies from her save in his name. Conversely, the law places on the husband the duty of maintaining his wife, relieves her from all civil responsibilities, and excuses her even in the commission of great crimes when acting under her husband's orders. By these incidental means it has fenced about and fostered the reasonable supremacy of the man in the institution of marriage. In so doing it is thought by some that the law is acting in conformity with the dictates of nature and the natural characteristics of the sexes. Be that as it may, the subordination of the wife is doubtless in conformity with the established habits and customs of mankind. With all these advantages, then, in his favour, the law leaves the husband, by his own conduct and bearing, to secure and retain in his wife the only submission which is worth having—that which is willingly and cheerfully rendered. And if he fail, this court cannot recognise his failure as a justification for a system of treatment by which he places his wife's permanent health in jeopardy and sets at naught, not only his own obligations in matrimony, but the very ends of matrimony itself, by rendering impossible the offices of domestic intercourse, and the mutual duties of married life. The cruelty of the respondent is established, and the court decrees a judicial separation with costs.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Solicitors: Copephane; W. H. Gregory.

Irish Election Petitions.

Reported by F. O. CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LIMERICK (CITY) PETITION.

Monday, Jan. 25.

(Before FITZGERALD, B.)

Canvassing by the clergy—Responsibility of candidate—Hiring of mobs—Intimidation—Treating—"Corrupt."

In the city of L. the influence of the Roman Catholic clergy is very great, there being either two or three clergymen in each parish.

Semble, that had they made the cause of a candidate their own, giving him the benefit of what might be equivalent in its effect upon the election to a committee room in every parish conducted by themselves, they being the canvassers; and had the candidate identified his cause with that of the clergy, he would have been responsible for their acts.

In the first part of the 2nd section of the Act of 1854 reference is made to offers and promises antecedently to the vote:

Held, that the Legislature clearly intended the court to draw a primâ facie reasonable inference from the act done as to the purpose for which it was done, leaving it to the other side to rebut that inference if they could. But further that it is for the court to judge of the nature of the suspicious circumstances from which the inference is drawn, and to act upon it or not according to the conclusion at which it arrives.

The law relating to murder and corrupt practices compared.

One side hired and gave large quantities of drink (to the extent of 300l. to 400l. in two nights) to a number of men and boys to operate against anticipated mob intimidation on the other side, but no evidence was given to prove that this organisation was directed against electors or formed for the purpose of being so directed. Nor was it proved that any elector was prevented from recording his vote:

Held, to be neither treating nor intimidation.

A clergyman went direct from the polling booth in company with the personation agent, and was a party to giving a voter an order upon a publican to supply him with drink. The clergyman denied, however, that he had any corrupt intention in causing this order to be so given:

Held that it was not treating.

In order to make treating corrupt it must operate to change the mode in which the voter would have voted.

This was a petition against the return of Messrs. Gavin and Russell, the grounds alleged being bribery, treating, and intimidation.

Coffey, Q. C., supported the petition, and O'Hagan, Q. C., the defence.

The points of argument and the evidence sufficiently appear in the judgment.

FITZGERALD, B.—The petition seeks to avoid the last election for this city upon the grounds of bribery, of treating, and of undue influence upon the part of the sitting members; and those corrupt practices are charged in the proper statutable words in the petition in the case of each of the three corrupt practices. With reference to the cases of direct bribery, I think the counsel upon both sides have, in their able arguments, properly confined themselves to the three cases of Keane, Ahern, and and Skeehan, and I shall confine myself, in the few observations which I shall make, to those three. In Keane's case I have first considered what must be taken to be the admitted facts of the case. It is clear that two days before the election he had himself joined the canvassing party of Tait, who was contesting the election with the sitting members, and he had actually called upon Macdonogh, a person in the employment of Tait, to join with him and them in that canvass; that was two days before the election, and that could not, according to the facts proved before me, have been earlier than the Monday. The day before the polling he had an interview with the Rev. Mr. Malone, who was one of the clergymen of the parish in which he lived; and, in the course of that conversation, a promise was made to him with reference to an old claim, which it also conceded that he had, or alleged that he had, against Mr. Russell and his agents for several years antecedently. In the course of that conversation a promise was made that if the debt were a proper one it should be paid, or it should be "right," or at all events a conversation took place from which the legitimate inference would be, that a promise was made that it should be paid. He, who had two days before canvassed, and who had admittedly this antecedent existing claim, upon the polling day votes for Messrs. Gavin and Russell, and against the party for whom on the two previous days he had been canvassing. Now, those are facts proved wholly independently of his testimony, and by proper legal evidence, excluding the question of agency, which the statutes desire me to exclude. Well, then, it is proved also by the evidence of three men (if they can be credited), that upon two occasions, one almost contemporaneous with the giving of the vote, he had told Macdonogh, Fife, and Barry, that he would not have voted as he did vote unless the promise had been made, that is, unless his claim should be satisfied: or, at least, according to the evidence of Barry, that it would not be safe for him to vote against Russell, having regard to the old claim which existed. And, upon the second occasion, he said, in the presence both of Gardiner and Macdonogh, that he had the promise, and that he had actually been shown the money by which the old claim was to be paid. Those are conceded facts in the case. Now I agree with Mr. O'Hagan in his argument, that the mere statement of an elector or a voter that he had been bribed at an election which is passed ought not, and could not, under the late statute, be relied upon as evidence against the sitting members that a bribe had been given to the man who so alleged it. But I cannot agree that that argument applies to a case like this, in which what the man says is produced, not for the purpose of proving the fact of the promise made to him at all (which is proved independently of his evidence, by the evidence of Mr. Malone himself), but for a purpose for which it is properly receivable as evidence against all the world, although it rests more or less upon what was passing in the man's own mind, which can only be known by inference. Those were the facts: and I cannot but think that that was a case calling upon and requiring an explanation upon the part of the sitting members, supposing the question of agency were established against the Rev. Mr. Malone. It is evidence of a corrupt act, but it is evidence of a corrupt act which may admit of explanation. And, before I enter at all into the question of agency, it is necessary for me to see whether, upon the evidence given before me, it is made out to my satisfaction as an act of bribery. The reasonable inference from those facts, and it appears to me the only reasonable inference, would be, that there was bribery within the meaning of the statute. But what are the facts established besides that, which I am bound to consider before I can come to the conclusion that the promise was made to this man in order to induce him to give his vote? I need not enter into the case of abstaining from voting. The first evidence I must consider is this, that antecedently to the election, antecedent as far as I see, and as far as the recollection of Mr. Cronin goes, to the Monday, an application had been made to him by this man. Mr. Cronin says, that at the time when this application was made to him his own mind was wholly undecided as to the part which he would take in the election. That is Cronin's own evidence; but it does not stop there, because the fact of his mind not being made up, he says, was actually communicated by him to the party who was applying to him. He says that, more than that, it was he who asked Cronin for whom he intended to vote, and that Cronin told him, in answer to that, that his own mind was decided. Now, what does Cronin say (if I can believe it), when he was informed that the man was so undecided as to his vote? It is (if Mr. Cronin is to be believed) that his own mind was made up to vote for the sitting members, Gavin and Russell, though he had a cause of complaint against them. That is the evidence that Cronin gave of the transaction; he says, that his mind being still undecided up to that moment as to how he would vote, he was satisfied that Mr. Tait would not show his colours; he communicaied with Father Malone, and stated the case to him, and that Father Malone seemed to think that it was a fair thing for the man to be paid, but he expressed some doubt as to whether the demand was a genuine demand or not, and that he, upon that, communicated again with the man Keane, and a person of the name of Manahan, who had been clerk of the solicitor for Mr. Russell at the previous election. He was communicated with, and Cronin and Manahan attended together upon Father Malone; and upon that conversation, after satisfying himself as far as he could of the justice of the demand, Father Malone said, that if it was so, it would be fair for him to be paid, or he might rest assured that he would be paid. Well, that being the state of the facts, if I believe Cronin, or pay any attention to the evidence of Father Malone, he thought that the election might be a more favourable time for making a claim than another. I disregard the fact which Father Malone positively deposes to, that in this he had no reference to the vote. He tells me that never throughout the whole course of the proceedings had he entertained a doubt as to the mode in which Keane would himself vote, Keane having actually told Cronin twice antecedently, that though he felt an injury had been done to him in respect to this demand, still his determination was to vote for Gavin and Russell. Now, this is the question which I have to consider upon the whole of the evidence taken with the facts which I have stated shortly; am I, or ought I to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt in a case like this, that that promise was made by Father Malone in order to induce him to give his vote; for unless I am satisfied of that, the inquiry into the question of agency becomes immaterial. With reference to what after all is material as showing that the man's own mind might have been influenced to some extent or acted upon by the promise, that does appear to me important in all these questions, but it never can be conclusive—what I have to consider is, the purpose and intention with which the promise is given, and what was the actual effect produced upon the man's mind. All I can say is that, regarding this as a suspicious transaction, particularly with reference to the time at which it occurred, and to each and all of the circumstances of the case, satisfaction has not been produced on my mind that this was an act of bribery. The next case is the case of Skeehan. That, too, in many respects, is a most remarkable case. This man is a publican residing in this town; it appears that he had been antecedently asked for his vote by a person of the name of O'Brien, and that he informed O'Brien that he had not made up his mind. It appears that one of the clergymen of this parish (I think Mr. Leahy) had, upon one occasion at least, actually communicated with him upon the subject of his vote, and that either he, or some other clergyman of the parish, had called upon him. His answer to Father Leahy was certainly a most remarkable one, and has been properly and ably commented upon by Mr. Murphy, and I indeed never listened to a more able argument than Mr. Murphy's in any case. The question was, "Are you tightened?" and that, coupled with the fact that he had intimated to O'Brien, when he canvassed him before, that his mind was not made up, is no doubt a very material matter in considering this case. Father Leahy subsequently goes into the polling room, and in the polling room, at the time, is the same O'Brien who had antecedently canvassed him for his vote, and Scanlan, the personation agent on the side of Tait and Pigott. He gives his vote, and either at the time of giving his vote, or some very short time after, the Rev. Mr. Scott is also in the booth. I am now speaking again, as in the other case, about facts as to which there is no controversy or dispute. The next thing is, that O'Brien accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Scott, the clergyman of his parish, and the personation agent, Scanlan, go together to the house of this man, almost direct from the polling booth. In the house, and while they are still in the shop, the man asks whether he ought not to get an order as well as other people. Mr. Scott's answer is a singular one with reference to the knowledge which several of the other clergymen seemed to have had of its being the usual practice in elections and matters of this kind to give those orders. He said that he had no authority to give an order. The next thing that happened was, that he is asked by the man Skeehan to go into the office which was off the shop, an office with a door to it; but as I understood the Rev. Mr. Scott's evidence, it was not wholly shut off from the shop, because it communicated from the counter behind. All that the Rev. Mr. Scott could remember of the conversation which then took place was, that he said he had some old brandy. What answer he gave to that or anything further that occurred, Mr. Scott does not remember. It is hard, one would say, to resist the species of inference that this intimation had some connection with a request for an order before. However, nothing, so far as it appears, passed between them in the office; and with that mysterious intimation they come out, and then some other conversation, the nature of which does not appear, took place with reference to the order, and it ends, according to Mr. Scott's evidence, by O'Brien and the person who had accompanied him and Skehan and Scanlan from the booth asking him if he would be safe in giving an order. The answer which Mr. Scott gave was that he thought he would be safe. He says that in giving his answer what he had reference to was, the usual practice at elections of giving those orders, and, I presume, taking the chance of their being honoured. It is singular that this answer should come from Mr. Scott, who himself had refused to give the order because he had no authority; yet he so far encouraged O'Brien, at all events, to give an order, though he told me at the same time, when I asked the question, that he had not the slightest reason to believe that O'Brien had any authority, and he therefore, in his view, must have had precisely and identically the same reasons for refusing to give it. However, what follows after that is that they again retire from the room in which Mr. Scott is, who had declined to give the order because he had not authority, but who had told O'Brien whom he did not know to have any authority, that he would be safe. They leave Father Scott, and go into the office, and the order is drawn up in the office. Now, unquestionably, this differs from the former case; and I must say, that though it is a case which, upon the face of it, does appear to me to require explanation, it differs from the other case in one important respect, that is, upon the law as to bribery. Here there is no evidence of an antecedent promise; in the other case there was evidence of an antecedent promise; that is, a promise given before the vote was given. Here the order is given afterwards, there being no evidence of any antecedent promise, or at least none that I can find in the case; besides which it is positively denied. Now, that is one of the first cases in which the word "corrupt" enters into consideration. I shall have to say more about the word "corrupt" when I come to the cases of treating. As to this I am satisfied, that while in the former part of the 2nd section of the Act reference is made to offers and promises so called, antecedently to the vote, the Legislature clearly intended the court to draw a primâ facie reasonable inference from the act done as to the purpose for which it was done, leaving it to the other side to rebut that inference if they could. I think they intended something further than this, and that though a favour or promise bestowed after the vote was given might raise suspicion, if there were even a reasonable inference, of some such corrupt purpose as has been indicated by the enactment of the 2nd section, yet if the inference was not so strong as to authorise the court to act upon that inference alone, without further evidence, whether direct or circumstantial, from which the purpose for which the thing was done could be drawn it was not to be acted upon. In my view of the matter, every forbidden act done for the purpose mentioned in the Act is to be regarded as done for a corrupt purpose; and once show that a forbidden act is done for the purpose mentioned in the Act, which, without reference to the act being forbidden is a purely innocent act, then it becomes a corrupt act the moment that it is shown to be done for the purpose indicated. But in some cases the act itself affords ground for reasonable inference of the intention with which the act is done, and there the Legislature has not introduced the word "corrupt." If the act be proved to be done, the court is allowed to draw from it the ordinary reasonable inference, primâ facie, that it was done for the purpose which it indicates; and then corruption is made out. But there are other cases which, for some reason or another, as it appears to me, the Legislature thought the inference of intention or purpose was not so strong, and in those cases it introduces the word "corruptly," for the purpose of showing that it did not intend the ordinary inference of intention to be relied upon. This can easily and perfectly be illustrated. At law the malicious purpose is what constitutes murder, but homicide of itself raises the law of inference. Was there any such purpose? The moment homicide alone is proved the jury may infer from the homicide alone the malicious purpose. But if the Legislature had said that there must be express malice to constitude murder, the fact of homicide would be left still, as raising the presumption of malice at law, and would therefore be evidence materially bearing upon the question; but, unless the facts and circumstances made something out in addition, the crime of murder would not be committed. So here, where the Legislature has not introduced the word "corruptly," and the natural and reasonable inference from the act is that it was an act done for the purpose contemplated, the Legislature has treated it as corrupt, without mentioning anything more about it. In those cases in which it seems to have been intended that the court should not infer the purpose simply and solely from the act, it has introduced the word "corruptly." But the whole proof of corruption, as it appears to me, consists in showing that the forbidden act is done for a purpose not innocent according to the Act of Parliament. The Legislature shows there may be the giving of entertainment to voters on account of their voting; and, though that be in itself a forbidden act, it is not forbidden by the section as to corrupt practices; therefore, I think, it was in that case that they introduced the word "corruptly" for the purpose of showing that, beyond proving the fact of entertainment being given to voters, you must give evidence of the purpose. Therefore I am not at liberty to treat it as being sufficient evidence of itself to put the other party upon explanation. Now, that being so, I am bound to construe this Act, in reference to the last line of the second section of the Act of Parliament, where the Legislature has introduced the word "corruptly." It appears to me that I must be satisfied, having reference to the antecedent sections, that this gift given after the election can, from the circumstances of the case, be shown to be the price of the vote. Here, again, the circumstances are strong evidence, and are very suspicious; but I cannot reject the evidence of the parties to it. O'Brien and Scanlan most positively denied it. One of the most suspicious circumstances is going immediately from the man's house to the polling booth. They say it was not for the purpose of accompanying him, but they went (and they are borne out in this by the testimony of Mr. Scott himself) for a wholly different purpose, in that direction; that is, they went to look for the two other voters who lived there. Am I to reject that? Can I treat that as evidence which I can entirely disregard? Now I concur entirely in the observations made by Mr. Murphy, that if a gentleman having influence with the Roman Catholic clergy gave those orders, or authorised or told persons that it was safe to give them, and the orders were given, not one half-hour, not one quarter of an hour, elapses before it is known through the whole town in which it is recognised; and whether for the purpose of profit, or for the purpose of gain, or for any other purpose, the system of orders will most assuredly follow. Therefore, what I have to deal with is this: is it for the corrupt purpose? The Rev. Mr. Scott swears positively that he never did give it for that purpose, that he never thought of such a thing; and Mr. Skehan says that he had voted; that he had not interested himself particularly about his vote at all; and that his asking for the order had merely reference to this acknowledged practice at elections. I confess I am unable to resist positive evidence upon oath of that kind coming from a quarter more particularly bound than any other (if one can be more bound than another) to speak what is the solemn truth. I cannot upon mere inference decide this to be bribery. With reference to Ahern's case, the story, I think, is improbable in itself, and it is not satisfactorily contradicted; although, to a certain extent, it is contradicted. The mere fact that a man going up to poll at that time should in the interval of a few minutes be met, almost in the same place, by three persons, one of whom offered 5*l.*, the other 10*l.*, and the third 15*l.*, would immediately suggest the inference that each of these three persons must have communicated with the others. But I think that is most improbable; and when I add to that the fact that one of these men had been an agent upon the opposite side and was present in the booth on that occasion, and when I couple that with the man's mode of giving his evidence upon the table, I could not satisfactorily to my own mind conclude that there was bribery in this case. Now, coming to the conclusion to which I have come, that these acts of bribery have not been established, of course it renders unnecessary the consideration of the question of agency; but, considering the manner in which it has been discussed in this case, I think it right to guard myself as well as I can (not however attempting to decide anything upon the matter) against its being supposed that circumstances were not proved in this case deserving of the most serious consideration upon this question of agency, as it is called, under the statute. And if, as Mr. Coffey said, this be essentially a Roman Catholic city, and if the influence of the Roman Catholic clergy be enormous; if, more than that, from the position of the great majority of the electors in the city, they naturally look to better educated men than themselves for the management of their temporal as well as spiritual affairs—if that be so, bearing in mind the organised condition of the Roman Catholic clergy, and the fact that in every parish in the town there are, at least, two or three clergymen so connected with the poorer class of voters, a question arises in which, as a body, the clergy are interested. If they make the cause of the candidate their own, and give him the benefit of having what may be equivalent in its effect upon the election to a committee-room conducted by themselves in every parish, they being the canvassers; and if it then turns out at the time of the election that the candidate represents his cause as identical with that of the clergy, and publicly gives out that the question between him and his adversaries is whether the clergy shall be put down or raised up, and is accompanied by them through the streets canvassing; if that be so, though the particular clergyman of the parish be not the party who accompanied the candidate in canvassing, I, for my part, will doubt long before I say that the candidate is not, so far as his sitting in Parliament is concerned, responsible for the acts of those parties in their several districts and parishes. I can determine nothing, but I say that is a matter upon which my mind is by no means satisfied; and if I were called upon to decide it at this moment, my impression would be decidedly different from that which is alleged by Mr. Coffey. I now come to the cases of treating, and, for the purpose for which I view them they seem to me to be divisible into three distinct classes, each requiring a somewhat different consideration. No doubt Mr. Murphy (of whose argument I really can hardly say more than I have already said) has, for the interest of his client argued that they could be mixed together, but it appears to me that, considering the case, I am bound to separate them. I come first to what I should consider as the class which is relied upon, namely, cases of mixed bribery and treating; and those are, I believe, the greater number of orders given by Lynch, and the two orders given by Punch. I leave out of consideration the order for Skehan; that belongs more properly to the order of bribery; for it was an order by which the man might be satisfied by taking the goods to himself and giving money. The second class is what I should call the class of pure treating; those are the cases of Moloney and Manahan. It is impossible for me to regard either of those as cases of mixed bribery and treating in the way in which it has been propounded to me here; because, unless I entirely reject the evidence of Father Moloney and Mr. Manahan, it is utterly impossible to consider the orders as given for the benefit of the public, and it is that way, as far as I understand it, that these cases were urged as cases of bribery; I mean bribery as distinct from treating. I therefore treat them by themselves. Then comes the last, and, in my mind, the most serious class of cases, that is the cases of mixed bribery and intimidation (as they are called, and properly called I think) the hiring of mobs upon the part of persons in the interest of Mr. Russell, for the alleged purpose of putting down mobs upon the other side. Well now, with regard to the orders, the argument used is this; that except the two orders of Punch, all the orders which have been given are the orders of Lynch. I think there were twenty-one orders altogether spoken to in the course of the evidence. Taking out of those the three which again, if any reliance at all is to be placed on the evidence of Mr. Leahy, must be taken out of this class and put into those of mixed treating and intimidation, there would remain about eighteen, including those of Punch's, involving a sum of about 30*l.* in the whole. If these seventeen or eighteen orders were really given for the corrupt practices mentioned in the Act, namely, that of influencing votes and inducing men to vote, and for compensation for votes given, I find the greatest difficulty in understanding how they could be treated as satisfactory evidence of the purpose of bribing the public. I dwell more upon the number of them, because the sums, with the exception of those two of Punch's, were positively small, and were not given till after the poll had closed altogether, and all of them were given by Lynch. They were distributed, two of them to persons who had no wives and families; and one of them at all events, to an unmarried female. There were seven publicans to whom they were given altogether; and one, at least, was given to a man who had no vote at all. I find the greatest difficulty in coming to the conclusion that these orders were given to bribe the public. I cannot act upon mere suspicion or tricks of the election. I must consider these cases with reference to the evidence. It did strike me unquestionably, from the first, from matters which Mr. Murphy has urged, that the beginning of the giving of these orders was the act of Mr. Leahy, who gave them, for the purpose of drinking, to this mob, hired by him, and under his directions. But he did give them. He could not, as it appears to me, have given them to such a man as Lynch or to such a man as Crow, knowing that orders of this kind are ordinarily given at an election, without the certain anticipation of that fact being known to the clergymen. The publicans have given credit for every order afterwards given; but if I am to believe Father Leahy's evidence, that this is an account still due, he would unquestionably be responsible for the purposes as to which the orders had been applied by the men in whose hands he put them. They were acting in a matter in which he had given them an authority to do something, though a limited authority. Yet, if I come to the conclusion that Father Leahy, in giving these orders, was not actuated by any corrupt practice, either with reference to bribing or treating, unless they can go further, and make out that the parties who acted under him gave them for that purpose, there is no evidence before me that they were given for that purpose. It occurs to me that if these men were set upon encouraging this practice of bribing for the benefit of the wide world, the last thing they would attend to would be the interest of the parties for whom Mr. Leahy or any other party was interested. I am therefore without a rational ground for coming to the conclusion that the purpose for which these orders were given was the benefit to the publicans or any of the purposes indicated by the counsel for Mr. Russell. Now, with respect to Moloney, I shall speak shortly upon those cases. How am I to come to the conclusion that the orders given by Mr. Moloney, improper as I conceive them to be; leading, as I think, to improper and wholly mischievous results; leading to enormous expense and enormous drinking, at least, upon this occasion, were given for the purpose of affecting the return of the member, supposing Mr. Moloney to be the agent of the sitting member; or that they were given to people for the purpose of corruptly influencing their votes? If the evidence is to be believed, the persons for whose benefit they were given were the persons whose votes (there could not be the slightest doubt) needed no stimulus whatever of this kind. Lamentable as the results of such practices are, I must act by the law; I must go by the strict construction of the Act, and I am unable to come to the conclusion that corrupt purposes of treating have been proved. Consequently, the conclusion which I draw from the evidence is, that with respect to those particular cases, there was no doubt with regard to their votes or how they would have voted. Nothing has been proved in these cases, and I must act upon the evidence before me. If it can be shown to me that some man who had promised his vote had changed, it would be different; but nothing of that kind is proved. The evidence stands uncontradicted, that this was intended for the purpose of persons who had voted. I now come to the last part of the case, and it is one that I approach with the greatest pain; and the whole case is a very painful one, considering the persons implicated in it. There was a sum of between 300*l.* and 400*l.* expended in a couple nights, or nearly so, in giving drink to various persons, to the number of several hundreds, throughout the city of Limerick, for the purpose of securing their services to repel, if necessary, the force used by the opposite side. I will put it no further. I am told that reasonable ground existed for terror on behalf of the party who was about to canvass for Messrs. Russell and Gavin upon the Monday, the day before the day of "nomination;" that these terrors were entertained by a grave assembly of magistrates and clergymen —for that is the way it has been put to me by the counsel for the sitting members; that they were terrified by the demonstration, some of which they saw, more of which they heard; by articles in the newspapers, written against some of them personally, which caused them to be seriously apprehensive of going out upon their canvass. It does appear that some of them actually refused to go out canvassing, and left; and as far as I can gather, the whole thing seems to have been in confusion upon that day. After those persons had left (and Mr. Leahy was among those who left) the canvassing party did go out. Mr. Murphy has truly put it that there was some actual demonstration, and even a threat of violence used by a person of the name of Larry Kelly to one clergyman; and it does appear that the whole feeling of the crowd collected was changed by that circumstance, and by the address of the clergymen. What is the conclusion to which the assembly of magistrates and clergymen really came, attending, as they had a right to do, by the side of the sitting members, Major Gavin and Mr. Russell? The first thing they did was to send for the bookkeeper of the candidate in whose cause they were interested, and to instruct him to provide persons who were to resist, if necessary, the violence threatened upon the other side, and to put it down. The assembly of magistrates interested upon that particular side determine to call upon the bookkeeper of the party in whose return they are interested to set about providing a mob for the purpose of protecting them and counteracting the mob upon the other side. That is the conclusion come to by the magistrates and clergymen. And, accordingly, this man, the bookkeeper, does proceed upon this duty, and, so far as I can gather, the whole of the next two nights he spent in going through the public houses of the city, treating the various men in the employment of Messrs. Russell and otherwise, for the purpose of getting them to act for them upon the nomination day; but that is not all; one of those magistrates communicates with two at least of those clergymen; to one of them he gives 100*l.* for the purpose of raising men, without even the responsibility that might attach to the agent of the other side if put into such a position as that. It is to that man Crow, who was upon the table, that the instructions were given. He is to provide himself with persons like himself for this peaceable mode of putting an end to what had stricken such terror into the hearts of the clergymen and magistrates. In another case the sum of 150*l.* was used similarly, being supplied by a magistrate to a clergyman. For what purpose? It was, as Mr. Conway, another clergyman, said, to get the boys of the town, a specimen of whom we had upon the table in the three witnesses, Skehan, Hayes, and Crow, and accordingly that is done. Whatever view I may personally take of this transaction, it is another question whether it comes either within treating or intimidation. As to intimidation, I cannot see how the evidence applies in the absence of proof that it was directed against electors, or was organised for that purpose. I have not the evidence of a single elector who was prevented in any way whatever from voting; not a particle of evidence. Then how can I bring it within intimidation under the Act of Parliament? To bring it within the definition of treating is still more difficult, because, whatever I may think of this misguided league, if the purpose really were simply and solely the putting down a mob, how can I treat it as one of the corrupt purposes mentioned in the Act? Supposing I were satisfied that a hot and intemperate partisanship had induced men to be so unscrupulous with regard to the lives and persons of their fellow citizens as to trust the safety of the city to a contact between the mob raised by themselves and the mob which they say was raised by the other parties, even then the case would not be brought within the statute. I wish I could say that this wicked folly would not be properly described as acts of hot intemperate partisanship leading to an unscrupulous disregard of the lives and persons of their fellow citizens. It is true that no direct or distinct evidence has been given before me of evil results as regards injury to property or injury to life resulting from this which, I repeat again, was a wicked folly. I have heard of one house being wrecked; but there was not a single instance in which direct evidence was given either as to hearsay or as to anything else, that injury was done to person or property by what is called the mob of Tait. But while I admit that there is no direct evidence upon the other side of injury done after this wicked folly was perpetrated, it is impossible that I can shut my eyes to the mode in which gentlemen in the position of magistrates answered questions, hinting at excesses of that kind by drawing a distinction which they have drawn in this case between knowledge and rumour. However, it has failed in satisfying me that this last head has been sustained on behalf of the petitioners. It will therefore be my duty to certify to the Speaker that the sitting members are duly elected.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Coffey applied for costs.

FITZGERALD, B. stated that, according to Parliamentary practice, he could not give costs unless he were prepared to pronounce the petition frivolous and vexatious, which he was not prepared to do.

Digitized by Google

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, Nov. 19.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re THE BLAKELY ORDNANCE COMPANY (LIMITED); CREYKE'S CASE.

Company—Winding-up—Contributory—Past member—The Companies Act 1862—Sect. 28.

By the articles of association of the above-named company, it was provided that, after one month's non-payment of any calls, the board might declare the shares forfeited for the benefit of the company, and that such forfeiture should involve the extinction, at the time of the forfeiture, of all interest in, and all claims and demands against the company in respect of, the shares, and all other rights incident to the shares; but that any member whose shares had been forfeited should, notwithstanding, be liable to pay all calls then owing on such shares. Under these articles the board duly declared forfeiture of forty shares held by C. He subsequently paid the call due at the time of forfeiture. But as the forfeiture had taken place within one year before the commencement of the winding-up, it was Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that C.'s name must be settled on the list of contributories as a past member of the company; for, although as between C. and the company the shares were, by the constitution of the company, absolutely extinguished, the Companies Act 1862 rendered the member liable to contribute for a period of twelve months after the cessation of his interest, whether such cessation be occasioned by a transfer or a forfeiture.

Bridger's and Neill's case, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 624, considered and followed.

This was an appeal by Mr. Creyke against an order of the Master of the Rolls (reported in 21 L.T.Rep.N.S. 165), by which his Lordship, considering that the appellant was liable to contribute as a past member to the assets of the company, which is now in course of winding-up, ordered that his name should be settled on list B. of contributories accordingly.

The report referred to fully states all necessary circumstances.

Jessel, Q. C. and Speed, for Mr. Creyke, contended that forfeiture of the shares altogether extinguished the relationship between company and shareholder having regard to the articles of association, which were different in Re the Accidental and Marine Insurance Corporation, Bridger's Case and Neill's Case, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 266; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 624, which was the case mainly relied on by the official liquidator. They also referred to

Re the Blakely Ordnance Company, Stocken's Case, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 412; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 161;

Re the Blakely Ordnance Company, Needham's Case, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 472; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 135.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Higgins, for the official liquidator, were not called upon.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—I quite agree that the facts of this case and of Bridger's and Neill's case are not identical; but though there is a distinction in the facts, in principle there is no distinction whatever between the two cases. The difference between Bridger's and Neill's case and this case is this—that although the shares had been forfeited in the former, the parties whose names were sought to be put on the list were persons who had transferred their shares, and their transferees could not be made liable in respect of calls made on those shares; while in this case the gentleman whose name is sought to be put on the list has simply had his shares forfeited; and there is, I agree, a somewhat different clause as to forfeiture in these articles from that which was in Bridger's and Neill's case. The clause in this case is this: "The forfeiture of any share shall involve the extinction at the time of the forfeiture of all interest in, and all claims and demands against, the company in respect of the share, and all other rights incident to the share; but any member whose shares have been forfeited shall notwithstanding be liable to pay to the company all calls owing on such shares at the time of such forfeiture." No doubt the shares were extinguished by the forfeiture, and the company had a right to re-issue them if they could get anyone to take them, and, as between the company and the member, apart from the Winding-up Act, the only liability was that the member was bound to pay the calls made on him antecedently to the forfeiture. Well, but apart from the Winding-up Act, the position of the company with respect to a transferor would be just the same as it would be with respect to a person whose shares had been forfeited by any act. Could the company in any one of these cases, according to the ordinary articles of association, proceed against the transferor? The result is, that this liability of a past member is a liability entirely created by the statute, and by nothing else.

That being so, first of all let us see whether this 50th clause was meant to put an end to what the statute provides. I certainly should hesitate, before I decided that a clause which went in the direct teeth of the statute, was good for anything at all, but this clause does not go in the direct teeth of the statute; it is quite consistent with the statute, and it is quite possible to read the clause and the statute together. You must take the articles as they stand; you must take the statute as it stands; and you must take them both together, and then see what is the liability. If you make this a proviso, the upshot would be this, that by the 50th clause of the articles the shares would be extinguished by forfeiture, but if there is a winding-up within a year the liability continues to pay all debts due at the time of the forfeiture. Neill's and Bridger's case is a decision that there need not be existing shares in order that a past member may be made liable in respect of shares; that is clearly decided. This case also decides that the amount unpaid on the shares in respect of which the member is liable, is the amount, if any, which has not been paid, and they decide this, as plainly as a case can decide anything, that what you have to look to is the original contract by the shareholder in respect of the shares.

Then you have to consider whether the shareholder has ceased to be a member for more than twelve months; then, whether any other person is liable in respect of those particular shares, and if so you must exhaust him before you can come upon the past member; but if it be the case either that those shares are transferred, and the person who is a member in respect of those shares cannot be made liable, or if those shares do not exist at all, then beyond all question, after all the existing members have been exhausted, the past member is liable. I confess that I should have no difficulty on account of the arguments which Mr. Jessel and Mr. Speed have placed before me—the first of these being with reference to the contribution by contributories inter se, and the second of them being with reference to the third division of the 38th section of the Act. With reference to contributions by contributories inter se, if you have twenty past members all of whom have been made contributories, and whose contributions would have to be settled inter se, we all know that you may make calls upon past members before you have made your list complete, and you may make calls in such a way that a man may be obliged to pay a given sum, and afterwards recover that given sum from others in the same category as himself. Therefore that creates no difficulty.

Then as to the third subdivision of the 38th section, that has been held to create no difficulty in Bridger's and Neill's case, and it certainly creates no difficulty here. It is, "No past member shall be liable to contribute to the assets of the company, unless it appears to the court that the existing members are unable to satisfy the contributions required to be made by them in pursuance of this Act." That clause means simply this, and nothing else, that the liability of past members shall be secondary to the liability of existing members, that you must exhaust all the existing members before you go on the past members; but when these are exhausted you may go on the past members; it matters not whether there are existing shares or not. Forfeiture and transfer have for this purpose the same effect. Therefore this appeal must be refused with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Taylor, Hoare, and Taylor.

Solicitors for the official liquidator, Lewis, Munns, Nunn, and Longden.

Saturday, Nov. 20.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Ex parte LUBLIN; Re LUBLIN.

Bankruptcy—Practice—Time for entering an appeal—The Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, ss. 12, 14, and 16—General Orders of 12*th Oct.* 1861, rule 32.

The limit of twenty-one days for the entering of an appeal fixed by sect. 12 of the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act 1849, applies to appeals by way of motion.

Re Redfearn, 11 Jur. N. S. 611; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 292, not followed.

Therefore in a case where notice of motion of appeal had been served within twenty-one days from the date of the pronouncing of an order, but the appeal had not been taken to the chief registrar for entry till after the expiration of the twenty-one days, it was held that the appeal was too late.

This was an appeal from a decision of one of the registrars of the Liverpool district Court of Bankruptcy acting as deputy for the commissioner.

A trader-debtor summons was issued by the Bankhall Oil and Chemical Works (Limited) against one Edward Lublin. When the summons came on for hearing before the deputy commissioner, on the 12th Oct. 1869, various objections were taken by Lublin's solicitor to the form of the affidavit of debt upon which the summons was issued. The deputy commissioner held that the affidavit might be rectified and resworn, and ordered this to be done. Lublin's solicitor then contended that the affidavit would thereby become a new one, of the date in which it was resworn, and that, consequently the summons would not be founded, as it ought to be, on an affidavit duly sworn and filed. The deputy-commissioner overruled this objection, and called upon Lublin to admit or deny the debt. This he declined to do, until an appeal from the decision of the deputy-commissioner could be heard and disposed of. The deputy-commissioner thereupon directed it to be recorded upon the summons that there was no appearance to the summons in the terms of the statute.

From this decision a notice of motion of appeal dated the 1st Nov. 1869, was given on behalf of Lublin, and duly served on the other side within twenty-one days of the pronouncing of the order, but was not taken to the chief registrar for entering until the 4th Nov. The chief registrar declined to enter the appeal on the ground that it was more than twenty-one days from the making of the order. Upon an ex parte application of counsel for the appellant, Giffard, L. J. on the 6th Nov. directed the registrar to receive and enter the appeal de bene esse. This having been done, the appeal now came on to be heard.

Yate-Lee, on behalf of the appellant, opened the appeal.

De Gex, Q. C. contra, took the preliminary objection that the appeal was too late. The twenty-one days were to be counted from the date of the pronouncing of the order appealed from. He referred

Re Hopkins, 3 De G. J. & S. 456;
Re The Risca Coal Company, 31 L. J. N. S. 429, Ch.;
Ex parte Clarke, 2 De G. & J. 245.

Yate-Lee contended that now by virtue of the orders of 12th Oct. 1861, rule 32, appeals were brought by way of motion. Sect. 12 of the Act of 1849, which provided that if no appeal was entered from an order within twenty-one days from the date thereof, such order should be final, could not apply except to the date of the service of the notice of motion. And in Re Redfearn, 11 Jur. N. S. 611, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 292, Lord Westbury held that if notice of motion of appeal was given within twenty-one days from the pronouncing of the order of appeal that was enough.

De Gex, Q. C. said that from the report of that case in 13 W. R. 665, it appeared that all parties consented to the appeal being received.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that the registrar informed him that in that case the deposit upon the appeal was made within the twenty-one days. His Lordship was afraid that he could not follow the decision in Re Redfearn. In one of the reports it was stated that all parties consented to the appeal being received, and he thought there must be some mistake in the other report. To hold that sect. 12 of the Act of 1849 had no application to appeals brought by way of motion would be in effect to repeal that section. The appeal must be dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Etty, of Liverpool.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PRAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dec. 2 and 6.

THE LAND CREDIT COMPANY OF IRELAND v. LORD FERMOY; Ex parte MUNSTER.

Practice—Service of decree—Writ of fi. fa.—Motion to discharge on ground of non-service of decree.

By the decree in a suit the defendants were declared to be jointly and severally liable to pay a certain sum on a fixed day. The plaintiff issued a writ of fi. fa. for the whole amount against one of the defendants, without serving him with the decree:

Held, that service of the decree was not necessary when a day certain was fixed for payment, and that the plaintiff was entitled to issue the writ against any one of the defendants for the whole amount, when they were jointly and severally liable.

Digitized by Google

This was a motion on behalf of Mr. Henry Munster, one of the former directors of the company which is now being wound-up, and also one of the defendants in the suit, to set aside a writ of fi fa, on the ground of irregularity.

On the 24th March 1869, the Master of the Rolls made a decree in the suit (reported 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 293; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 7), whereby several former directors of the company, including Mr. Munster, were declared to be jointly and severally liable to repay a sum of 3739*l*, which, in his Lordship's opinion, had been improperly applied in the purchase of shares in the company; and it was ordered that they should, on or before the 30th June then next, pay this sum, with interest from the date of the decree, and the costs of the suit when taxed.

The decree was duly passed and entered on the 10th May 1869, but it it was not served on Mr. Munster.

On the 24th Nov. 1869, the official liquidator of the company issued a writ of fi. fa., directing the sheriff of Sussex to levy on the goods and chattels of the defendant Munster for the sum of 3739*l.*, with interest from the date of the decree, and also for the sum of 580*l.*, the amount of the taxed costs of the suit.

Execution had been levied under the writ, but the sheriff had been stayed, by the direction of the court, from proceeding till the present motion should have been disposed of.

Jessel, Q. C. (Hemming with him), for Munster, moved to discharge the writ on the ground that service of the decree was a necessary preliminary to the issue of the writ, and had not been effected; and also on the ground that the writ ought to have followed the decree, and been issued against all the defendants in the suit, instead of being issued against Munster only. He cited

Adkins v. Bliss, 2 De G. & J. 286;
23rd Order, Rule 10;
29th Order, Rules 1 and 6;
30th Order, Rule 4.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Shebbeare, for the official liquidator, contended that service of the decree was not necessary when the date of paym nt was named in the decree, and that the plaintiff was at liberty to issue the writ against one defendant, where a number of defendants were decreed to be jointly and severally liable to pay. They cited

Stresten v. Whitmore, 5 Beav. 228;
1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 18 & 20;
Seton on Decrees, 3rd edit. vol. 2, p. 1240;
Daniel's Chancery Practice, 4th edit. p. 958.

Jessel, Q. C. in reply, referred to Seton on Decrees, 2nd edit. p. 648.

Dec. 6.—Lord ROMILLY.—I cannot say that the order is quite free from ambiguity; but orders are the creatures of the court, and the court is not bound to construe them strictly according to the meaning of the words. Service of the decree is not required where a day certain is fixed for payment, but it is required where payment is to be made so many days after service. Personal service is in some cases impossible, and substituted service causes great delay. Attachment cannot be resisted on the ground of non-service of the decree. As to the other point, I am quite clear that the sheriff may be directed to levy against any one of the defendants, where they are jointly and severally liable, but without prejudice to the right of such one defendant to require contribution from the others. I am of opinion, therefore, that I cannot discharge this attachment, and that the motion must be dismissed, but without costs, as the question was doubtful.

Solicitors for the applicant, Ward, Mills, and Witham.

Solicitor for the official liquidator, Henry Gover.

Friday, Dec. 10.

Re CONSTANTINOPLE AND ALEXANDRIA HOTELS COMPANY;

EBBETTS' CASE.

Company—Winding-up—Contributory—Infant.

An infant applied for shares in a company, which were duly allotted. A few months later he came of age. Two years after the allotment of the shares, the company having meanwhile been ordered to be wound-up, he transferred the shares for a nominal consideration, but the transfer was never registered:

Held, that the execution of the transfer was a confirmation of the transaction, and that he must be retained on the list of contributories:

Semble, that an infant will not be relieved from shares for which he has applied personally.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by a Mr. Ebbetts to have his name removed from the list of contributories to the above company on the ground that he was an infant at the time when the shares were allotted to him.

In Nov. 1863 he applied for 150 shares, which were duly allotted to him. He attained the age of twenty-one on the 8th April 1864. On the 3rd June 1865, the company was ordered to be wound-up, and on the 28th July following Ebbetts executed a transfer of the shares to a Mr. F. H. Wood for a nominal consideration. The transfer was never registered, and Ebbetts alleged that he had executed it merely under the notion that he would thereby relieve himself from liability. The official liquidator placed his name on the list of contributories, and he took out the present summons to have his name removed from the list. The summons was now adjourned into court.

Bagshawe, in support of the application, submitted that the execution of the transfer, being quite futile, did not affect his right to get rid of a liability incurred during infancy.

Bevir, for the official liquidator, was not called upon.

Lord ROMILLY.—I have no doubt that he is a shareholder, and that his name must be retained on the list. I am not aware of any case where an infant applied personally for shares, and was held not to be liable. An infant can bind himself by fraud; and if the court were of opinion that an infant had applied for shares intending to retain them if the company should succeed, and to get rid of them if the company should fail, the court would in all probability hold him liable, and retain him on the list. But however that may be, in the present case the execution of the transfer was clearly a confirmation of the transaction, and the summons must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

Solicitor for the applicant, Pearce.

Solicitors for the official liquidator, Routh and Stacey.

Digitized by Google

Dec. 10 and 13.

Re COMMERCIAL BANK CORPORATION OF INDIA AND THE EAST;

FERNANDEZ'S CASE.

Company—Winding-up—Foreign executor—Probate duty.

An Indian company was ordered to be wound-up by the Court of Chancery. An Indian creditor of the company had received a dividend on his claim. He then died, and his will was proved in India by his executor, whose domicil was in that country. A further dividend became payable after the creditor's death.

Held, that the dividend might be transmitted to the executor, without requiring him to take out probate in England.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by the executors of a Mr. Fernandez, one of the creditors of the above company, for the payment of a dividend which had become due. Fernandez had his domicil in India; he had before his death received one dividend on the amount of his claim. His will was proved by his executors in Bombay, and not in England, and the question to be decided on this summons was whether the court could direct payment of the further dividend to the executors without requiring them to take out probate in England.

The Commercial Bank Corporation of India and the East was incorporated by royal charter in 1864, for the purpose of carrying on the business of banking in all parts of the world. Its head office was at Bombay, but it had a branch office in London under an agent or manager. In May 1866 it was ordered to be wound-up by the Court of Chancery.

Bagshawe, for the executors of Fernandez, contended that the company was clearly a foreign company, and that the court could therefore direct the payment to be made to the executors without requiring them to take out probate in England.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Kekewich, for the official liquidator, did not take any part in the argument.

W. W. Karslake, for the Crown, contended that a foreign executor could not take proceedings here for the recovery of a sum due to his testator's estate without taking out probate here. He cited Lasseur v. Tyrconnel, 10 Beav. 28.

Dec. 13.—Lord ROMILLY.—The question is, whether I can properly pay a dividend to a foreign executor, without requiring him to take out probate here. The bank is an Indian bank, with only a branch in this country, and the debt, in respect of which this dividend has become payable, was incurred in India, and, moreover, the funds out of which the dividend is to be paid are not in court; for all these reasons, I am of opinion that I must send it to the executor in India. The recipient must, of course, pay all the costs of transmission, but will escape the cost of taking out probate here. If the question did not arise on an Indian bank, I do not say what I should do; if such a case should arise, I should wish it to be mentioned to me again. The official liquidator and the applicants must have their costs out of the estate, but I cannot give the Crown any costs, as Mr. Karslake will not consent to treat this as a representative case.

Solicitors for the applicants, Tucker, New, and Langdale.

Solicitors for other parties, Freshfields; The Solicitor of the Inland Revenue.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

July 14, 17, 19, and 20.

GIFFARD v. WILLIAMS.

Partition suit—Disputed legal title—Jurisdiction—Evidence—Decree—Costs.

Where the plaintiffs, on a bill for a partition, sought to establish their title (which was purely a legal one) to the undivided part of the property in dispute, and the defendants denied the plaintiffs' title:

Held, that, inasmuch as the primary object of the bill was a partition, and the establishment of the plaintiffs' title only incidental to that relief, the court had jurisdiction to make the decree asked.

The plaintiffs tendered as evidence in support of their title the rent-rolls, containing entries of the receipt of rent, in the handwriting of the deceased stewards of their predecessors in title:

Held, that such evidence was admissible.

Slade v. Barlow, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 296; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 10, and Bolton v. Bolton, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 298, commented upon.

This was a partition suit. The facts, as stated by the bill, were as follows:

Thomas Giffard, by his will dated 18th July 1855, devised all his freehold estates of inheritance to the plaintiffs James Wyley and George Holycak for the term of 1000 years, upon certain trusts therein declared concerning the same, and subject thereto to the use of his first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainder to the use of his brother, the plaintiff Walter Peter Giffard, for his life, with remainder to the use of the plaintiff Walter Thomas Giffard (then the only son of the plaintiff Walter Peter Giffard) for his life, with divers remainders over (which failed), with remainder to the plaintiff Charlotte Josephine Herbert, the eldest daughter of the testator, and the wife of the plaintiff William Reginald Herbert, as tenant in tail.

The testator died in Jan. 1861, leaving no son, and thereupon Walter Peter Giffard became tenant for life, and the plaintiff Charlotte Josephine Herbert became entitled to the first vested estate of inheritance in the property devised by the will.

Part of the property so devised consisted of an estate known as Plas Ucha, situate in Nequis in the county of Flint. This estate was at about the beginning of the last century owned by a Mr. Roberts, whose daughter Helena married Peter Giffard, the ancestor in title of the plaintiffs. In consequence of that marriage the estate passed to Peter Giffard, and from him to Elizabeth Giffard, and after her decease to the testator. Included in the estate was a field called Gwegloed Vadock or Wereglodd Fudog, the right to the moiety of which formed the subject of the present dispute.

The plaintiffs, in support of their claim, stated that the tenant of the field had always (at least since 1738) paid rent for one moiety of it to the owner for the time being of the Plas Ucha estate, and that the tenants, or some persons representing them, had always attended the rent days of those owners; that in 1771 the Plas Ucha estate was parcelled out into farms; and that upon that parcelling out, one moiety of Wereglodd Fudog was assigned as a separate holding to Edward Williams, at the rent of 1*l.* 10*s.* a year; that the owners of the Plas Ucha estate had from time to time repaired the fences of the field, and done other acts of ownership in relation thereto; and that a commutation and apportionment of the tithes took place in 1838, in which apportionment and the plan thereto one moiety of Wereglodd Fudog was stated to be the property of the said Elizabeth Giffard, and that Miss Elizabeth Henrietta Jones, who was then the owner of the neighbouring estate of Tyntwyll, and entitled as the owner of the other moiety of the field, raised no objection to that description.

They further stated that the other undivided moiety of the field had for many years past constituted part of the Tyntwyll estate, of which the defendant Catherine Margaret Williams, the wife of the defendant Richard Williams, was the owner in fee-simple. The ancestors in title of the plaintiffs generally let their moiety of the field to the owners for the time being of the Tyntwyll estate, who, in their turn, let the entirety of the field as part of the farm of Tyntwyll and Tydryn, which letting was alleged by the plaintiffs to be, as to one moiety of the field, a subletting.

It had recently been discovered that valuable veins and mines of coal and iron existed under the surface of the Wereglodd Fudog Field, and the defendants Richard Williams and his wife had in consequence, and for the first time, insisted that the defendant Catherine Margaret Williams was the absolute owner of the field, subject only to a rentcharge of 2*l.* a year, payable out of the whole of the Tyntwyll estate, and vested in the plaintiffs as the owners of the Plas Ucha estate.

The defendant Richard Williams and his wife had assumed to demise the entirety of the field to the defendant Robert Davies, as tenant thereof from year to year.

Since the 25th March 1861 the defendant Richard Williams had excluded the plaintiffs from the receipt of any part of the rent of the field, and had received the rents for the entirety of it.

The defendants alleged that the plaintiffs were entitled to a divided moiety of the field, and not to an undivided moiety. The plaintiffs, however, showed that the ancestors in title of the defendant, Catherine Williams, the wife of the defendant, Richard Williams, were from time to time tenants under the ancestors in title of the plaintiffs, of their moiety of the field; and thus, if such moiety were a divided one, such tenants confused the boundaries of the estates, and the boundaries thereof could not now be ascertained without the aid of this court.

There were no visible boundaries dividing the field; and no boundaries were known to the persons who had been longest acquainted with the field.

The bill prayed a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to an undivided moiety of the field called Wereglodd Fudog, that a partition might be made of the field; but that if the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were entitled to a divided moiety of the field, the boundaries of such moiety might be ascertained and defined; for an account and payment of all rents received by the defendant Richard Williams and his wife, or either of them, in respect of the field, which relief however was ultimately waived; that the right of the several parties in the field might be ascertained and declared, and that the defendants or one of them might pay the costs of the suit.

The defendants, by their answer, denied that the field in question ever formed part of the Plas Ucha Estate. They stated that it was included in the Tyntwyll Estate, to which estate the defendants, Richard Williams and his wife, claimed to be entitled since the year 1846, from which time, as they alleged, the rent had been regularly paid to them for the whole estate. That in 1832 the predecessor in title of the defendants, Richard Williams and his wife, to the Tyntwyll Estate, brought an action of ejectment against the then occupier and tenant of the estate, and recovered possession of it, including the entirety of the field in question, and ever since the owners of the estate had been in undisturbed possession of the rents and profits of the whole of the field. They denied that either the tenant of the field or any other person had ever paid rent for the field to the owner of the Plas Ucha Estate; but they stated (in the ninth paragraph of their answer) that some of the former tenants had for fifty years and upwards made certain payments to the plaintiffs, or their ancestors in title, of an annual sum of 40*s.*, which (as they believed) was payable out of or charged upon the whole of their property at Nequis (and not out of or upon the said field in particular), to or in favour of the plaintiffs or their ancestors by way of equality or exchange, on the occasion of "certain exchanges of land effected many years ago, between their predecessors in title, and the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs;" but they said that such payments were not made in respect of rent or otherwise in respect of the field in question, but simply by way of rentcharge, or quit rent on the whole of the Nequis estates, as by the receipts given for the same was so expressed to be made.

The remaining facts of the case will be found in the judgment below.

Fry, Q.C. and Cozens Hardy, for the plaintiffs, submitted that they had clearly, by the pleadings, established their claim to an undivided moiety of the field. Their title commenced with the deed executed in Dec. 1672, and had continued uninterrupted down to present time. The rent rolls of the Nequis estate, which were proved to be in the handwriting of the former stewards of the property, showed that rent for the field had been continuously paid to the agents of the plaintiff's predecessors in title. In one of the books relating to the estate, there was an entry proved to be in the handwriting of the solicitor and agent (since deceased), of a predecessor in title of the plaintiffs, to the effect that Robert Roberts (one of the predecessors in title), had one-half of "Wereglodd Fudog." In fact, the whole of the evidence as to the plaintiff's title was indisputable. (They were stopped by the court.)

Osborne Morgan, Q.C., and Williams (of the Common Law Bar), for the defendants, objected to the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs. Mere entries in the rent rolls by third parties since dead, without showing whether such entries were made contemporaneously with the events of which they spoke, or in the due course of business, or against the interest of the persons making them, were inadmissible.

Price v Lord Torrington, 1 Sm. L. C. 290;
Outram v. Morewood, 5 T. R. 121;
Poole v. Dicas, 1 Bing. N. S. 649;
Chambers v. Bernasconi, 1 Tyrw 342; in error, 4 Ibid. 531.

The plaintiffs had also tendered as evidence in support of their case the tithe commutation maps, but these were no evidence unless it could be proved that all the requirements of the Tithe Commutation Acts (6 & 7 Will. 4 c. 71, ss. 60, 61, 63, 64; and 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 69, s. 2), had been strictly observed. They further contended that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. It was asked under the colour of a bill filed ostensibly for a partition to decide upon a disputed legal title. The court had no power to do so.

Baring v. Nash, 1 Ves. & B. 551;
Slade v. Barlow, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 296; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 10;
The Bishop of Ely v. Kenrick, Bunb. 322.

The bill came within Sir John Rolt's Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 42), s. 4, as an ejectment bill, and ought, in accordance with the authorities, to be retained on the file for a year, with liberty to the plaintiffs, if so advised, to bring an action at law.

Potter v. Walter, 2 De G. & Sm. 418; Bolton v. Bolton, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 298.

R. C. Palmer appeared for other parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I will not trouble you Mr. Fry to reply. The principal question in this case is that of jurisdiction. It was said that the court ought not to entertain this suit, because there is a dispute as to the title, and two recent decisions have been referred to, which are, no doubt, cases of importance. They are authorities, however, which it is plain from the argument in the present case, may be very easily misunderstood. In the case of Bolton v. Bolton (ubi sup.), the main purpose was not a partition, but the establishment of the plaintiff's title upon the construction of a will. It was the case of a bill filed by a person out of the possession of the property; and the object of the suit was to recover the possession. That being so, it appears that a bill in equity for a partition, ought not to be made a means of trying a title, which should properly be tried at law. In the same way, in the case of Slade v. Barlow (ubi sup.), which came before James, V.C., he took exactly that view. He treated that case as I did that of Bolton v. Bolton, and as the Lords Justices treated it—as a case in which, under colour of a bill for a partition, what was sought was to establish a title to the property, of which the plaintiff was out of the possession. In the present case the circumstances of the property are peculiar. In this, as in all other cases, the plaintiffs on a bill for a partition must prove their title to the undivided part of that property which they seek to have divided. There is no such rule, so far as I am aware, as that a bill for a partition cannot be maintained, if a defendant denies the plaintiff's title, and the title is purely a legal one. I never heard such a rule laid down anywhere. No doubt the title must be proved; but even where a plaintiff has come for a partition, and has not at once succeeded in proving his title, this court has given him an opportunity of producing further evidence of it, without sending him to a court of law. In the case of Baring v. Nash (ubi sup.) Sir Thomas Plumer, at the end of a judgment of great research, and with which he took extreme pains, says, "Where the legal title is under suspicious circumstances, a court of equity may well pause in directing partition, but if the title is clear a partition is a matter of right; and it is expressly stated in Parker v. Gerard, Ambler 236, that there is no instance of not succeeding in such a bill, but where there is not proof of title in the plaintiff; and in the case of Cartwright v. Lord Bath, the court gave leave and time for the plaintiff to make out his title." Of course, if a title cannot be made out, the right to the partition must fail entirely. The question, therefore, in the present case is this: The bill in this suit is one, primarily, for a partition. The great object of the suit is the partition; and the reason for wishing to effect that object, is the increased value of the property, in consequence of the discovery of some minerals below the land. That being so—the prime object of the suit being the partition of the property, and the establishment of the title to it being only incidental to the partition—the question which this court has to consider is, whether these plaintiffs have established their title to an undivided moiety of this small close of land? The circumstances of the case are, as I have said, very peculiar. The plaintiffs have gone very far back in proving this title. Upon a review of the whole of their evidence, as contrasted with that of the defendants, who deny the title of the plaintiffs, it seems to me, certainly, that the plaintiffs have proved their title very clearly indeed. To begin with their deeds. The first is a deed dated so long ago as 1672. The close of land in question, is, by its proper name, included in their conveyance, and was conveyed to that family through whom the plaintiffs derive their title. The next deed is a deed of 1730. In that deed the close of land is given very clearly mentioned. But it is mentioned with this peculiarity: being mere land, it is nevertheless spoken of as, and called, "all that other messuage or tenement commonly called or known by the name of Gwengloed Vadock, now or late in the tenure, possession or occupation of Robert Williams, at or under the yearly rent of 1*l.* 10*s.*" It has been fairly enough argued that there is no messuage upon this close of land, and the words "messuage or tenement" are not a proper description of a close of land containing four acres. But looking at all the other circumstances of the case, I have not the slightest doubt that the parcel there described is the identical close of land now in question. It is to be observed that although the description contains the word "messuage," there is also the word "tenement." That word clearly is, I think, enough to signify the land, without any messuage at all upon it. Moreover this estate passed in the beginning of the 18th century, about one hundred and thirty years ago, by marriage to the family of the Giffards. A member of that family, Peter Giffard, through whom the plaintiffs claim, married an heiress of the name of Roberts, who was entitled to this land. The title is, therefore, traced down. The property remained in the family; and they, not being obliged to mortgage the land, no other title deed occurs, until a comparatively recent period. But the clear and important evidence in this case in favour of the plaintiffs, is the proof of the payment of rent for this land to the family of the Giffards, and the fact that those claiming under them, as to one undivided moiety of this close of land, held it as tenants in common with the owner of the neighbouring estate. As to the whole of that evidence, however, the plaintiffs' case is met by a denial on the part of the defendant that the rent rolls or rentals are no evidence at all. Some cases were then cited which really have nothing to do with the present question, beyond this, that in Outram v. Morewood (ubi sup.), a case before the Court of Queen's Bench, in which entries by a third party—entries made, not in the discharge of any duty, but simply by a third party—were not admitted to be legitimate evidence. In that case a distinction was taken between entries by a third person deceased, and entries by a steward. In Starkie on Evidence (vol. 1, p. 32), which is, perhaps, the best text-book on the subject of the Law of Evidence, I find in looking at his statement and summary of the case of Outram v. Morewood that he says this: "In Outram v. Morewood Lord Kenyon said that, although a general right might be proved by traditionary evidence, a particular fact could not. There the question was whether Cow Close had been part of the estate of Sir I. Zouch, out of which certain rents and coals had been reserved; and the court held that the fact could not be proved by entries made by a third person, deceased, in his books of receipts of rents from his tenant, such entries being considered as no more than a declaration of the fact by such third person, which was different from entries by a steward, who thereby charged himself with the receipt of money." It has been said, although I think, with no very great force, that such entries not being against the interest of the person making them are inadmissible. The fact of the entries being against the interest of the person who makes them is said to be the circumstance that gives them credibility, and establishes them as evidence. But I think that is not entirely an accurate view of the matter. I quite assent, however, as other judges have assented, to the statement of Mr. Starkie, at p. 347 of the same volume. He there says this:—"It may, however, be observed that the consideration that the entry was made in the course of discharging a professional or official duty, or even in the ordinary course of business in which the party was engaged, seems both in reason, and upon the authorities, to afford a much safer warrant for giving credit to such evidence, than is supplied by the consideration that the entry or declaration might possibly have been used to the prejudice of the party," &c. Lord Hardwick, in Manning v. Lechmere, 1 Atk. 453, speaking of what is evidence, says:—"Where there are old rentals, and bailiffs have admitted money received by them, those rentals are evidence of the payment, because no other can be had." Therefore, in my opinion, all the objections to the reception of these rentals as evidence in this case are entirely unfounded. I should not have noticed the authorities upon that part of the case if it had not been that so much stress was laid, and the case so strongly pressed upon them, by Mr. Morgan. I think, however, that he has, to say the least, been obliged, for the purpose of his argument, to employ them in a way in which they cannot legitimately be used. Then, looking at these recitals themselves, they extend over the greater part of a century and a half; and leave to my mind not the slightest doubt that the rent, the payment of which they purport to show, was paid to the owners of the Plas-Ucha estate, in respect of this particular close of land. That alone would be enough to establish clearly, to my satisfaction, the claim of the plaintiffs. But when I look at the case set up by the defendants, that of the plaintiffs is, I think, greatly strengthened. The defendants cannot deny that rent has been paid; and they cannot deny that rent has been paid by tenants. In their answer they affect to say that the rent, which, according to the entries, has been paid for more than a century and a half, and was probably paid before that, was paid in respect of rent due for equality upon the occasion of certain exchanges. That is deliberately and distinctly stated in their answer. Now the defendant's case upon that completely broke down; indeed, I think that statement was not even mentioned by Mr. Morgan in his argument. But it is impossible to get over it. Three receipts were produced from the custody of the defendants, but they totally contradict their case. Those receipts are ordinary receipts for rent, such as are given to a tenant upon a proper payment by the proper hand to receive the rent. It seems to me unnecessary to go minutely through the other parts of the case, but they also strengthen that of the plaintiffs. It must be observed, however, that in the year 1838, which is now thirty-one years ago, and more than thirty years before the bill in this suit was filed, the Tithe Commissioners, in discharge of their duties, apportioned the tithe rentcharge on this estate. The statute makes the entries by the commissioners in their proceedings, when properly verified, evidence of the matters therein stated. In the document produced, and authenticated by the Tithe Commissioners, one undivided moiety of this very close of land is stated as part of the property in respect of which they discharged their duty. That was, however, attempted to be got rid of in this way: it was said in effect that the predecessors of the defendants, the persons who oppose the title of the plaintiffs, lived a great way off the property in question, that the defendants themselves now live twenty miles from it, and that they or their predecessors did not hear of the commutation, and probably had no notice of it. But the Act of Parliament requires these things to be done not in a corner, but upon notice, in all the most public places, so that it is impossible to treat this document otherwise than as a public one, and as further evidence that at that time the owner of the undivided moiety of the field was aware of the facts. That being so, it appears to me that the plaintiffs have established their title; and, having established a title against a case deliberately set up by the defendants' answer, and which has failed, this case does not come within the ordinary rule as to the costs of a partition suit. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs must have the declaration which they pray for by their bill—viz., that they are entitled to an undivided moiety of the field called Wereglodd Fudog, and there must be a decree that the partition shall be made of the field, with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, John Flower, for R. N. Heane, Newport, Salop.

Solicitors for the defendants, J. Whitehouse, Kimber, and Ellis, for Dewes and Co., Nuneaton.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ERRATUM.—In the report of Cox v. Land and Water Company (Limited), ante, p. 550, the case alluded to by the Vice-Chancellor as the Brighton Directory case was Mathieson v. Harrod, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 629; L. Rep. 7 Eq. 270; and not Kelly v. Morris, L. Rep. 1 Eq. 697, as stated in the report.

June 9, 14, and 23, and Dec. 10.

ALLEN v. BONNETT.

Bankruptcy—Mortgage eighteen months previous—Notice subsequently—Bill of sale not registered—13 Eliz. c. 5.

A builder having become bankrupt and absconded, his uncle, a publican, gave notice to the assignees of a deed whereby all the bankrupt's property, real and personal, was conveyed and assigned to him to secure 750l., 450l. previously paid, and 300l. expressed to be paid at the date of the deed, bearing date eighteen months before the bankruptcy, and there was also a bill of sale. The bill of sale was not registered, and no notice was given to anyone (there being several other incumbrancers) until after the bankruptcy. There were no accounts to show the advances either in the bankrupt's books or in any documents of the mortgagee, who was not a literate man, but who swore to lending the money, although no one saw it pass, and he admitted that the 300l. was not advanced as expressed by the deed. On the questions whether the money was really advanced; whether the absolute conveyance and assignment was an act of bankruptcy, and even if valid, whether it was not void under the 13 Eliz. c. 5:

Held, on the evidence, that there was no proof that it was not advanced; that the case was governed by Alton v. Harrison, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 623; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 100; and that the deed was a good deed under the statute.

This bill was filed by Charles Allen, Richard Wyles, and Charles Hodgkin, creditors' assignees of Elias Bonnett, against Charles Bonnett, uncle of Elias Bonnett, for the delivery up and cancellation as void, of an indenture of mortgage dated the 22nd Feb. 1865, and to restrain the defendant from dealing with or acting on the mortgage; the question being, whether such indenture was not, by reason of its comprising the whole property of the said Elias Bonnett, an act of bankruptcy; and, as being concealed until subsequently to such bankruptcy, void as against creditors as a fraudulent preference under the statute. In July 1866, Elias Bonnett carried on business as a brickmaker at Sittingbourne, Kent, and on the 20th of that month was adjudicated a bankrupt, and on the 17th Aug. the plaintiffs were chosen creditors' assignees.

Digitized by Google

The bill alleged that at the date of his bankruptcy, Elias Bonnett was possessed of considerable freehold and leasehold property near Sittingbourne, subject to mortgages, executed prior to July 1866, to various persons, such property being that described in the alleged mortgage of the 22nd Feb. 1865. That Elias Bonnett never surrendered on his bankruptcy, and had absconded; and, on the 4th Aug. 1866, the following notice was served on the respective solicitors of the mortgagees:

To all whom it may concern. I do hereby give you notice that, by an indenture bearing date the 22nd Feb. 1865, Elias Bonnett, of Milton and Sittingbourne, in the county of Kent, builder and bricklayer, conveyed to me all the freehold and leasehold hereditaments of him, the said Elias Bonnett, and described and referred to in the same indenture, for securing to me, my executors, administrators, and assigns, the sum of 750*l.* and interest, as therein mentioned. Dated this 4th Aug., 1866. CHARLES BONNETT.

That this notice was the first intimation to the mortgagees of the mortgage, and not received till fifteen days after the bankruptcy; and that subsequently to the plaintiffs' appointment as assignees a like notice was served on their solicitors, Messrs. Prall and Son, who, on the 30th Aug., applied to the defendant for a copy of the deed, which they received from his solicitors, Messrs. Duffield and Bruty. This deed was made between Elias Bonnett, of the one part, and the defendant of the other part, and was dated the 22nd Feb. 1865. After reciting that Elias Bonnett was indebted to the defendant in 450*l.*, and had occasion for a further advance of 300*l.*, it was witnessed that in consideration of those sums, 450*l.* due, and 300*l.* to the said Elias Bonnett by the defendant paid on the execution thereof, the receipt whereof was thereby acknowledged, the said Elias Bonnett directed, limited, and appointed, and granted and conveyed unto the defendant and his heirs, certain freehold property, particularly described, to hold to the defendant and his heirs, to the only proper use and behoof of him, his heirs and assigns for ever, subject, nevertheless, to the several mortgages then existing thereon, and the proviso for redemption. And it was further witnessed that for the consideration aforesaid, the said Elias Bonnett bargained, sold, demised, and transferred to the defendant, his executors, administrators, and assigns, certain leaseholds and all other (if any) leaseholds, messuages, and tenements and hereditaments of him the said Elias Bonnett, situate in Sittingbourne or Milton aforesaid, or elsewhere, to hold the same to the defendant, his executors, administrators, and assigns, subject nevertheless to any mortgage or mortgages then affecting the same, and the proviso for redemption. There was then a further witnessing part assigning to the defendant all the bankrupt's stock-in-trade, household goods, chattels, and effects, and personal estate in Sittingbourne, Milton, or elsewhere, then belonging to him, or which might thereafter be acquired, and all debts then and thereafter to become due to him, in the usual form. At the foot of the deed was this receipt:

I do hereby acknowledge that on the day and year first above written I was justly and truly indebted to the above-named Charles Bonnett in the sum of 450*l.*, and that I have this day received of him the further sum of 300*l.*, the consideration money above expressed, to be paid to me on the execution hereof.

ELIAS BONNETT. } £450
300
£750

Witness, W. J. Bruty.

The bill then alleged that, in consequence of this deed not having been heard of, and no notice to prior mortgagees given until after the bankruptcy, nor any reference made to it by the bankrupt when he effected loans upon deeds of subsequent date, and the said Elias Bonnett having left his home several days before his adjudication, the plaintiff's solicitors made inquiries respecting the defendant, and ascertained that he kept a public-house at Margaretting, in Essex, farmed a small piece of land, and dealt in hay and straw; that he was the uncle of the bankrupt, and not a man of means or position to lend such a sum as 750*l.*; that, upon this, the defendant was summoned before the Bankruptcy Court, and examined on the 5th Dec. 1866 on oath, when he stated that for fourteen or fifteen years past he had been in the habit of lending people money, and had had a great deal of business with the bankrupt, who owed him 460*l.* before Feb. 1865, lent on different occasions, never more than 100*l.* at a time, but he could refer to no accounts, nor give any other details.

The defendant alleged that in Feb. 1865, the bankrupt gave him a bill of sale, but nothing was done under it, nor was it registered, and he admitted that no indifferent party ever saw him lend money to the bankrupt, and that not more than three weeks elapsed between the bill of sale and the mortgage. That he could not tell how much he paid the bankrupt when the bill of sale was delivered, but admitted that he did not pay 300*l.* on the execution of the mortgage, although the receipt was to that effect. He professed himself unable to say whether he advanced any money to the bankrupt since Feb. 1865, but he alleged that Elias Bonnett had paid him for interest on the mortgage, 14*l.* at Christmas 1865, and 8*l.* in May 1866, but kept no account and gave no receipt to the bankrupt, and admitted that he never received any money for interest on the old debts. The bill then charged that the deed was entered into with a view to defraud creditors, that the defendant was a person of small means and never possessed the money which he alleged he had advanced, and that at the time of the making the indenture no valuable consideration passed between the parties, and that either the alleged debt never existed, or, if it did, it was a fraudulent preference, and in either case void, and as comprising all the bankrupt's property also void as an act of bankruptcy, as putting it into the defendant's power at any time to stop the trading of the said Elias Bonnett, and never registered under the Bills of Sale Act, and therefore void as against the plaintiffs.

The defendant by his answer admitting the bankruptcy and the main facts, stated that he always believed Elias Bonnett to be a man of credit, and was told by him and believed that at the date of the defendant's mortgage the deeds relating to his property were deposited with his bankers, as the defendant believed, to secure current accounts, or temporary advances, but he was unable to set forth the facts and dates of any mortgages, or to whom, except that after the bankruptcy he was told by Mr. Hills that clients of his held mortgages on the property, and had refused further applications for advances, and that he, the defendant, had no notice of any mortgages previous to the bankruptcy, and he submitted that his mortgage was prior to all equitable incumbrances of subsequent date. That believing him to be a man of substance, he assisted him from time to time, and did not register the bill of sale, fearing that Elias Bonnett's credit might suffer. That he first knew of the bankruptcy on the 31st July 1866, which surprised him; but, being ignorant what persons claimed charges on the property, he left it to his solicitors to realise his security. That the deed correctly stated the consideration for the mortgage and that the defendant was the owner of freehold and copyhold property besides that which he farmed; that he was much embarrassed by the examination in bankruptcy, having no books or papers to refresh his memory, and no copy of such examination had been furnished to him. The answer then denied the intention to defraud creditors, and alleged his relationship to the bankrupt as the reason for his advances, and that valuable consideration passed to the amount of 750*l.* in 1864, in three sums of 50*l.* each, and stated various items advanced, making up the full sum. The defendant was a man of very little education, not in the habit of keeping accounts, and had no banker; that the deed being executed eighteen months before the bankruptcy was not void, and that the mortgage was not registered, but was not therefore void. The evidence of the plaintiffs was that they could not discover by the bankrupt's papers (he having taken some with him) anything respecting the defendant's advances, that the value of the bankrupt's property was 11,000*l.* and his debts 12,000*l.* Mr. Hills denied giving the defendant information as to the mortgages, and there was evidence of the defendant's want of means, and affidavits of the bankrupt's clerks, swearing that they knew nothing of advances by the defendant. On the other hand, the bankrupt's solicitor verified the execution of the deed, but admitted that he saw no money pass, but believed the transaction to be bona fide, the full effect of not giving notice being explained to the defendant, and giving the same reason for not registering. This affidavit spoke in favour of the defendant, and there were others to the same effect; and in his own affidavit the defendant stated his unincumbered property as worth 1663*l.*, the gross returns of his business being 100*l.* per month, and he in other respects verified his answer.

Digitized by Google

Glasse, Q. C., Higgins, and Chute, for the plaintiffs, contended that the whole case was fraught with suspicion, and there was no evidence whatever to prove the advances, except the defendant's unsupported statement; whereas the negative testimony was very strong, and there was admission of the non-advance of the 300*l.* at the date of the deed. The deed itself was an act of bankruptcy; but, not depending upon that, it was void as against the plaintiffs as contrary to the statute of Elizabeth:

Ex parte Bailey, 3 De G. M. & G. 542;
Mercer v. Peterson, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 309; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 30;
Keely v. Martin, 16 W. R. 432;
Ex parte Sparrow, 2 De G. M. & G. 907;
Ex parte Taylor, 5 De G. M. & G. 392;

Next there was fraud in law, being an assignment of his solvency:

Hooper v. Smith, 1 W. Bl. 441;
Woodhouse v. Murray, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 639; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 570;
Graham v. Chapman, 12 C. B. 85;
Ex parte Foxley, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 519, 520.

On the evidence it was clear that the whole transaction was collusive, and had no foundation in fact.

Cotton, Q. C., and Everitt, for the defendant, insisted that the transaction was bona fide, and the defendant was as ignorant of the real state of the bankrupt's affairs as the other parties. There was no trace of collusion, the defendant being so nearly connected with the bankrupt, and being imperfectly educated, and having no banker, the lending of his money was somewhat irregularly managed, and in the case of the bankrupt he was less particular, as he perfectly trusted him. The money advances were necessarily confidential matters, but the security was regularly effected, and the solicitor swore to his belief of its bona fides. Under these circumstances, there was no authority to show that the mortgage was void; there was no notice, it was effected more than a year before the bankruptcy, and the mortgage was in the form that might be expected to secure the defendant, and was prepared by his legal advisers.

6 Geo. 4, c. 16, s. 86.
Mercer v. Peterson (sup.);
Ex parte Foxley (sup.);
Ex parte Taylor (sup.);
Ex parte Sparrow (sup.);
Lindon v. Sharp, 7 Scott, N. S. 730;
Goodricke v. Taylor, 2 De. G. J. & S. 140; 2 H. & M. 383; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 604;
Pennell v. Reynolds, 11 C. B. N. S. 709;
Bell v. Simpson, 2 H. & N. 410.

Glasse, Q. C., in reply.
Holmes v. Turner, 3 K. & J. 99.

Dec. 10.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is a bill filed by the assignees in bankruptcy of Elias Bonnett, who became bankrupt on the 20th Sept. 1866, for the purpose of setting aside a deed executed by the bankrupt on the 22nd Feb. 1865, therefore more than twelve months before the bankruptcy, in favour of the defendant. The bankrupt had for some years previously to his bankruptcy, carried on the business of a builder and brickmaker, at Milton, near Sittingbourne, in Kent. The deed sought to be impeached was in effect a conveyance and assignment of all the freehold, leasehold, and personal estate of the bankrupt to the defendant, who is his uncle, in consideration of the sum of 450*l.*, stated to have been owing to the defendant for previous advances, and of the further sum of 300*l.* stated to have been advanced before the execution of the deed. [The Vice-Chancellor referred to the deed.] The plaintiffs seek to set aside the deed on two grounds: First, on the ground that no consideration whatever was paid for it, but that the alleged debt of 450*l.* was a mere pretence, and the alleged payment of the 300*l.* on the execution of the deed a mere fraudulent pretence, and that the deed was, in fact, executed for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of the bankrupt; and secondly, on the ground that the deed even if a consideration was given for it, being a conveyance and assignment of all the bankrupt's property to one creditor to the exclusion of the rest, necessarily had the effect of depriving him of the means of carrying on his trade, and was, therefore, not only an act of bankruptcy, but was absolutely void against the creditors under the statute, 13 Eliz. c. 5. [The Vice-Chancellor then referred to the allegations in the bill, the defendant's answer, and the affidavits.] Upon this evidence it is impossible that I can come to the conclusion that the money was never advanced by the defendant to the bankrupt. There is nothing to support the plaintiff's case on this point beyond the suggestion that the defendant was at the time of the transaction a person of no means, and not in a situation to make advances to the bankrupt. It is well known that persons in the class of life of the defendant frequently carry money to a large amount about them, and deal with it in a very irregular manner. I have no doubt whatever of the substantial truth of the defendant's statements as to the advances. It is not necessary to come to the conclusion that the precise sums stated in the deed were advanced. The amount due upon the deed may be the subject of inquiry on some other occasion, or in some other proceedings. The plaintiffs have undertaken to prove that no money whatever was advanced by the defendant, and that I am of opinion they have entirely failed to do. Upon the second objection to the deed, that, even assuming a consideration to have been proved, it is void against the creditors under the statute of Queen Elizabeth, many authorities were cited and commented on upon both sides, and it would have been necessary for me to go into a minute consideration of them if it had not been for a recent decision of Giffard, L. J., which, I think, completely covers this case, and renders it unnecessary for me to do more than state it and follow it. The case I refer to is Alton v. Harrison, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 623; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 100. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR referred to the case and read the judgment.] Whether this decision is in accordance with many earlier cases, and whether it is consistent with such cases as Re Sparrow, 2 De G. M. & G. 907; and Re Taylor, 5 Ibid 392; and Goodricke v. Taylor, 2 De. G. & J. & S. 140, it is not necessary for me to consider; it is enough for me that it is the last decision of the Court of Appeal on the subject. I am of opinion, in the words of the Lord Justice, that the deed is bona fide, and not a cloak for retaining a benefit to the grantor, and is therefore a good deed under the statute. I may add that I think the case of Mercer v. Peterson (sup.), has considerably altered and qualified the strict rules as to deeds of this description which were laid down in Graham v. Chapman, 12 C. B. 85, and the numerous older authorities which were cited in the argument. The plaintiffs' case, therefore, wholly fails, and the bill must be dismissed with costs.

Digitized by Google

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Nickinson and Prall.

Solicitors for the defendant, Duffield and Bruty.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, Dec. 7.

DEEKS v. BAILEY.

Practice—Nominal defendant.

A nominal defendant (clerk to a board of health) must answer the plaintiff's bill in his official capacity.

An application to remove his name from the record on the ground of want of interest refused.

This was a demurrer to the plaintiff's bill.

As the point reported has only reference to the question of practice, it is unnecessary to give a detail of the statements of the bill. It may be sufficient to say that it was filed against the defendant Wm. Bailey, clerk to the Aldershot Local Board of Health. The Public Health Act of 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), provided that the district local board might be sued in the name of the clerk. By the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90, s. 46, however, "the local boards of the kingdom are incorporated, and may now be sued in their own names."

The demurrer was on the ground of want of equity.

H. M. Jackson in support of the demurrer.

G. Whitbread, for the plaintiff's bill.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that it was quite clear the demurrer must be allowed, but that under the circumstances there must of course be given leave to amend.

Jackson then asked that the name of Mr. Bailey might be removed from the record.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that it did not appear to him that the name of the clerk ought to be removed from the record. He must answer the bill in his official capacity. The discovery he could give might be of importance to the defendant's case. The demurrer, however, must be allowed. Usual costs to be paid by plaintiff, with liberty to amend.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Bicknell and Jortin; J. Lott.

Wednesday, Dec. 8.

CHICHESTER v. LORD DONEGAL AND OTHERS.

Practice—Discovery—Disclosure of contents of deeds.

Mortgagees (defendants) with whom the plaintiffs have a common interest in the presumed title to the lands mortgaged are bound to answer and set forth the date, particulars, and material contents of the deed of settlement under which the power of mortgaging was created.

This was a summons adjourned from chambers, and the question raised was by way of exceptions to the defendants' answer.

They were mortgagees under a power of mortgaging reserved to the defendant, the Marquis of Donegal, and the late Earl of Belfast, by a deed of settlement of certain estates made and executed in July 1851.

The bill prayed an account and discovery of the matters therein alleged so far as related to the deed of settlement under which both plaintiffs and defendants claimed a common title.

The mortgage-deed was dated in 1852.

Interrogatories had been filed as to the execution and purport of the deed of settlement of July 1851. To the interrogatory as to the date, parties' names, and material contents of this deed, they answered that they believed such deed as in the bill mentioned was executed, but for the reasons thereinbefore mentioned they declined to state what were the lands and hereditaments comprised in such deed, or what was the effect of it, or who were the parties thereto.

These materials, they contended, they were not bound to disclose unless an offer was made to pay off the mortgage debt, principal, interest, and costs.

Freeling, in support of the exceptions to the answer, contended as before stated.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Montague Cookson, in support of the answers of the defendants.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the defendants, the mortgagees, were bound to answer these interrogatories so far as they went to the disclosure of the contents of the deed which formed the title of both parties to the suit. In the deed of settlement each party had a common interest. The mortgage deed stood upon a different footing, with which the plaintiffs could not be allowed to interfere. So far as the exceptions filed went to that part of the answer of the defendants as to the contents of the settlement before mentioned they must be allowed.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors, C. Appleyard; Cookson and Wainwright.

Thursday, Dec. 2.

PRICE v. RICKARDS.

Practice—Motion to dismiss bill for want of prosecution—Bankruptcy Act 1861.

A deed of assignment under the Bankruptcy Act 1861 operates as a transfer of the property, and divests all interest in a party to the suit.

Therefore the plaintiff (the bankrupt), having no further interest in the suit, a motion to dismiss his bill refused, and leave given to amend or to serve the order on the trustees of the deed.

This was a motion to dismiss the plaintiff's bill for want of prosecution.

It appeared that the bill was filed in Sept. 1868, and a notice of motion for a decree in the suit had been given in June 1869, but the plaintiff had not set down the cause for hearing on the usual motion.

On the 18th July 1869 the plaintiff had executed

Digitized by Google

a deed of assignment to trustees, according to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, being a deed for the benefit of his general creditors. Shortly afterwards this deed was duly registered.

A defendant, having an interest in the subject-matter of the suit, now moved to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, the plaintiff not having replied to certain affidavits in proper time, in answer to some filed by this defendant.

Amphlett, Q.C., and Deere Salmon in support of the motion.

D. Sturges, on the part of the trustees of the deed, opposed it, on the ground that the plaintiff had no further interest in the suit. He relied upon the 197th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, which relates to the jurisdiction of the court, and declares the rights and liabilities of the parties after the registration of the deed.

Amphlett in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the deed of assignment made and duly executed under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and duly registered, was in full operation, not having been set aside, and it operated as a transfer of all the plaintiff's interest in the subject-matter of the suit; consequently the motion must be refused. He should not, however, allow the costs of the application, as the defendant had been possibly misled by the case of Perkins v. The Cape Town Railway Company, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 225; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 634, and he should give leave to amend, and to serve the order on the trustees of the deed of July 1869.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors, Young, Jones, and Co.; G. R. Dodd.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, Nov. 20.

WORTLEY (app.) v. THE NOTTINGHAM LOCAL BOARD (resps.)

Market—Removal of part of same to another locality—Bye-law.

Where there is a grant of a market to be holden within certain limits, the grantees may hold such market in any convenient place within the said limits, and may from time to time remove such market, or any part thereof, to any other convenient place within the same limits.

A bye-law for regulating a market must not be so restrictive as to prevent, without leave, a frequenter of it from resorting to it.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 45, upon a conviction of the appellant. It was as follows:

At a petty sessions of the peace holden at the Guildhall in and for the town of Nottingham, on the 15th July 1868, before us the undersigned, two justices acting in and for the said town, the said defendant was charged in and by a certain information, and the said parties respectively being then present, the said charge was duly heard by us, and upon such hearing we adjudged the said defendant to pay a penalty and costs, and in default of distress imprisonment.

The information was that on the 4th July 1868, in the town of Nottingham, Thomas Wortley, of Lenten, did unlawfully place a number of skins of sheep and lambs upon part of the ground occupied for the market, in the Great Market-place, without the authority of the superintendent of the said market, contrary to the said bye-laws duly made and passed, and against the form of the statute. The following is a copy of the bye-law in question:—"No person shall throw or place the skin of any beast, sheep, or other animal, or any part of such skin, or the offal or refuse of any beast, sheep, or other animal, upon any part of the ground occupied for the market, or upon any part of the immediate approach thereto, or in or upon any cart, barrow, or other carriage or vessel standing in any part of the market ground, or of the immediate approaches thereto, without being authorised so to do by the superintendent of the market." The bye-law was made under the provisions of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), which came into operation in the borough of Nottingham in 1859, and of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 14), which is incorporated in the Local Government Act 1858 by sect. 50, which enacts that there shall be incorporated with that Act the provisions of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847, with respect to the holding of markets and fairs and the protection thereof, and with respect to bye-laws. By the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847, sect. 42, it is enacted that the undertakers may, from time to time, make such bye-laws as they may think fit, for all or any of the following purposes, that is to say (amongst other things), for regulating the use of the market place and fair, and the buildings, stalls, pens, and standings thereon, and for preventing nuisances or obstructions therein, or in the immediate approaches thereto; but this power of making bye-laws is subject to the provision that such bye-law shall not be repugnant to the laws of that part of the United Kingdom where the same are to have effect, or to the provisions of this or the special Act, or of any Act incorporated therein; and by sect. 43 of the same Act a penalty not exceeding 5*l.* may be imposed for each breach of such bye-law, and by sects. 44, 45, 46, and 47 of the same Act certain formalities are required to be observed before and after the bye-laws have come into operation, the whole of which have been complied with.

The Corporation of Nottingham are lords of the manor and grantees of the market by virtue of ancient charters. The Great Market-place belongs to the corporation, and occupies an area of between five and six acres. It is situate in the centre of the town, within the district of the said local board, and has from very ancient times been used as a market for the sale of fruit, vegetables, fish, furniture, clothes, hides and skins, and other effects. It is also used for the standing of carriers' carts, which are brought into the Great Market-place from the surrounding country, and the horses being taken out the carts remain standing in the market until the business of the day is over. The principal cattle market is likewise held in the Great Market-place upon a Wednesday (being one of the market days) in each week. A small market for cattle is held upon a Saturday in each week in a new cattle market in Burton-street, also the property of the corporation, at a distance of about 350 yards from the Great Market-place. The butchers' shambles are situate in the Great Market-place, and belong to the Corporation of Nottingham. In the month of May 1855 the following resolution was duly proposed and carried at a meeting of the town council of the borough of Nottingham: "It is also resolved and ordered that the market for the sale of hides and skins be henceforth removed from Smith-row (that being part of the Great Market-place, in which hides and skins had theretofore been sold) and held in the new cattle market in Burton-street, free of charge by the corporation, as recommended in the report of the chamber committee, and be there held in such part of that market ground as the superintendent shall from time to time direct."

Digitized by Google

Shortly before the passing of the resolution above referred to, the corporation erected in Burton-street on part of their ground used for the new cattle market, a building for the public sale and purchase of hides and skins, which building they let to a company of butchers as yearly tenants, and who have the exclusive control of the same building during their tenancy, and all hides and skins taken to such building have, by a regulation of these tenants, to be sold by auction through their broker. A great majority of the butchers, both of the town and country, send their hides and skins to this building to be sold. A piece of land, part of the new cattle market, and adjoining to such building, has been paved by the corporation and set apart as a market for the sale and purchase of hides and skins, and this is the place which the market superintendent points out as the grounds upon which hides and skins may be thrown and sold. It is not used by any person for this purpose. Hides and skins are brought in small lots by carriers in and upon their carts into the Great Market-place, and then and there sold and delivered by them to fellmongers who have their carts with them, wherein they take away the hides and skins so purchased. The butchers who come out of the country to their shops in the shambles on a market day also (but in contravention of an order of their landlords the corporation) bring hides and skins in small quantities into the Great Market-place and there sell and deliver them in like manner as the carriers. No hides or skins are sold in the new cattle market in Burton-street but such as are consigned to the company occupying the building before referred to. The fellmongers, who are very few in number, have never paid any toll to the local board or others for or in respect of their use of the Great Market-place, and Mr. Bayley and one other fellmonger have never ceased to use the same. The local board have only one superintendent of the market to exercise the power contemplated by the bye-law, and he had, at the time when the offence charged in the information was committed, no discretion to grant such authority for the placing of skins in any part of the Great Market.

The defendant Thomas Wortley was in the employ of Mr. Thomas Bayley, of Lenton, near Nottingham, fellmonger, and from the evidence that was given before the magistrates it appears that on Saturday morning, July 4th 1868, that being a market day, the defendant, about twelve o'clock at noon, was at the top of a carrier's van standing upon a part of the Great Market-place, opposite to Angel-row, used as a highway, and means of access to other parts of the Great Market-place, which are for the present used as a market and place of standing for carriers' carts, and for the sale of furniture as above stated, and threw many sheep and lambs' skins from the top of the van on to that part of the market place used as such highway and means of access as aforesaid. At about one o'clock in the afternoon of the same day the defendant was again seen standing on the top of another carrier's van which was standing on another part of the Great Market-place, which is for the present used as a market and place of standing for carriers' carts, and for the sale of furniture as above stated, and he threw from the top of the van a great many sheep and lambs' skins on to the said last-mentioned part of the market place, and they were allowed to remain on the ground five-and-twenty minutes. All the skins thrown upon the ground by the defendant were so thrown for the purpose of examining them previously to their purchase by him. The market superintendent was not present during the time, and the defendant had not applied to him for permission to place these skins on the ground, and if he had so applied it was shown that the market superintendent would have refused him such permission on the ground that the new cattle market, and not the Great Market-place was the place appropriated to the sale of hides. No actual obstruction of the highway was caused by the defendant, who only made use of the Great Market-place in a reasonable and proper manner consistently with the usage of his trade, provided that he had any right to use the same after the Order of Council of the 7th May 1855, or without an express authority from the superintendent of the market. On the part of the defendant it was contended that he had a right by common law or custom to trade in the manner complained of in the Great Market-place, and that such right had not been taken away by what had been done. That the bye-law was bad as being unreasonable and in restraint of trade. That if it was a good bye-law, the offence charged in the information had not been proved, because, as he contended, it was incumbent upon the local board to have a superintendent for the purpose of and authorised to carry out the same in the Great Market-place. The magistrates held that the offence charged was proved, and that the bye-law was good, and they convicted the defendant in a penalty of 20s. and costs. The questions for the opinion of the court are, whether the right to trade in hides and skins in the Great Market-place is now legally determined? If such right be yet existing, then, whether the bye-law is good in law, and if good then whether under the facts and circumstances stated in this case the defendant was rightly convicted? And the conviction is to stand or be quashed according as the court shall decide. Given under our hands and seals at Nottingham this 7th May 1869.

THOMAS ADAMS.
THOMAS BALL.

Wills appeared for the appellant.—The corporation, as owners of the market, had no right to remove a part of it; they might, by their common law right, have removed the entire market to a more convenient place, but not a part only of it, and there is no authority for saying that they can. Indeed, one class of trades may be so connected with another that they cannot be separated in locality without ruinous consequences following. [COCKBURN, C. J.—On the other side it may be said that it may be highly convenient to remove a particular business to another part.]

Islington Market Bill, 3 Cl. & Fin. 512, 518;
Ellis v. Mayor of Bridgenorth, 15 Com. B., N. S., 52.

The bye-law also is bad as being in restraint of trade; it is too wide, and prohibits all dealing with skins in the market or its neighbourhood without the consent of the superintendent. He referred to the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 50;

10 & 11 Vict. c. 14, ss. 12-16, and 42.

Cave for the respondent.—At common law the owners of a market have power to remove it to any other part within the jurisdiction:

Turner v. Southhill, 3 East, 538;
Moseley v. Walker, 7 B. & C. 40;
Rex v. Cotterill, 1 B. & Ald. 67, Lord Ellenborough's judgment;
De Rutzen v. Lloyd, 5 A. & E. 456.

In the present case there was ample reason for removing the skin market from its old locality to a new place, it being in the interest of the public that it should be removed. The bye-law may be too general, as applying equally to the new and to the old market, but this can be easily amended, the question involved in the present dispute being really whether or not they have power to remove the skin market.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think it is quite clear that the corporation must be taken to have a right of market anywhere within the manor, and therefore that they could transfer the market from one place to another within such manor, and on the authority of the cases cited this right to transfer a part of the market to another place, so as to suit public convenience, seems to be implied. I am therefore of opinion that the corporation were justified in so transferring the sale of skins to a separate place within the market, and I am against Mr. Wills upon the first question; but as regards the bye-law I agree with him that it is too wide and should be amended. And, therefore, as our judgment is partly in favour of the appellant, the conviction will be quashed, but without costs.

Judgment for the appellant.

June 1 and Dec. 13.

DAWKINS v. PAULET.

Libel—Privileged communication—Military discipline—Malice.

A military person cannot maintain an action against his superior officer in respect of anything done by such superior officer in the discharge of his military duty, but must follow the special mode of redress pointed out in the Articles of War.

To an action brought by a captain in a regiment of the foot guards against the major-general commanding the Brigade of Foot Guards for an alleged libel, contained in certain reports written by the defendant and sent by him to the Adjutant-General of the Army, the defendant pleaded that it was his duty as the plaintiff's superior military officer to write and forward, for the information of the Commander-in-Chief, such reports relating to the military conduct, duties and qualifications of the officers under him, and that the reports in which the alleged libels were contained were made by him in the ordinary course of his military duty as such superior military officer, and not otherwise, or for any other reason.

To this plea the plaintiff replied that the words in the declaration mentioned were published by the defendant of actual malice, and without any reasonable, probable, or justifiable cause, and not bonâ fide, or in the bona fide discharge of the defendant's duty as the plaintiff's superior military officer. On demurrer to the replication.

Held (per Mellor, Lush, and Hayes, JJ., dissentiente Cockburn, C. J.), that the replication was bad, and furnished no answer to the plea.

Per Cockburn, C. J.—The replication was good, and an answer to the plea. Though acts done in the honest exercise of military authority are entirely privileged, yet if the opportunity it affords is intentionally abused for the purpose of injury and wrong, the person wronged, though a soldier, is not debarred from obtaining redress in a court of law.

Per Mellor, J.—The motives under which a man acts in doing a duty which it is incumbent upon him to do, cannot make the doing of that duty actionable, however malicious they may be.

This was a demurrer to a replication.

The declaration alleged that before and at the times of committing of the grievances hereinafter in the several counts of this declaration alleged, the plaintiff was an officer and lieutenant-colonel in the Army, and held Her Majesty's commission as captain in Her Majesty's regiment of Coldstream Guards, and was entitled to certain emoluments in respect thereof. And the defendant falsely and maliciously wrote and published of and concerning the plaintiff and of and concerning him as such officer and captain, as aforesaid, in the form of a letter in the words following, that is to say: "Sir,—I (meaning the defendant) have the honour to forward a letter from Lieut.-Col. Dawkins, Coldstream Guards (meaning the plaintiff), complaining of an order which I considered it necessary to give in consequence of his (meaning the plaintiff's) incompetence in the field, and of his unfitness to conduct the business of a battalion in barracks, and to request that his conduct may be referred for investigation by a court of inquiry. I am fully prepared to support my judgment with regard to Lieut.-Col. Dawkins by the evidence of the general officers and others under whom he has served, and with whom he has been brought in contact, since he has risen to the rank of a superior officer. I have taken the present course advisedly, in order to bring this case to a decision, as in justice to the battalion to which he belongs I submit that an officer who has shown such want of judgment, tact, and temper, is not fit to be entrusted with the responsibility and charge of a command." Whereby the plaintiff lost the value of his said commission and was compelled to leave his said regiment, and was deprived of the emoluments he might and otherwise would have acquired from the holding of his said commission and continuing in his said regiment, and has been and is injured in his reputation as an officer and a soldier, and was and is otherwise greatly injured and damnified. And the plaintiff also sues the defendant for that the defendant falsely and maliciously wrote and published of and concerning the plaintiff, and of and concerning him in his profession as such officer as aforesaid, in the form of a letter amongst other things, in the words and figures following, that is to say: "If he (meaning the plaintiff) feels himself aggrieved, he has only himself to thank for the position in which he has placed himself, as I (meaning the defendant) could not in justice to myself retract an order I had given him previously, and which he should have the good sense to understand was not to be cancelled by his (meaning the plaintiff) surreptitiously assuming a command I considered him unfitted for." Whereby the plaintiff has been and is injured in his reputation as an officer and a soldier, and was and is otherwise greatly injured and damnified.

Plea 2.—That before, and at the time of the writing and publishing of the words complained of in the declaration, the defendant was an officer in Her Majesty's army on full-pay, holding the public office or appointment of Major-General Commanding the Brigade of Foot Guards, of which brigade the said regiment of Coldstream Guards formed part, and as such officer and major-general aforesaid, the defendant was the superior military officer of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff was under his command; and it was the defendant's duty as such superior military officer and major-general commanding as aforesaid, to forward to the Adjutant-General of Her Majesty's Army at head-quarters certain letters from time to time, written and sent to the defendant, as such superior officer and major-general commanding as aforesaid, in relation to their military conduct, duties, and qualifications by the officers under his command, and to make thereupon, and in relation thereto, for the information of the Commander-in-Chief of the said army, reports in writing to the said adjutant-general of the said army on the subjects of such letters; and as to the orders (if any) therein referred to, and the military conduct, the qualifications, competence, and fitness for their military duties of the officers writing the same; and also generally from time to time to make reports in writing to the said adjutant-general for the information of the Commander-in-Chief of the said army of, and concerning the battalions and regiments comprising the said brigade; and of and concerning the officers thereof under the defendant's command; and of and concerning their conduct, qualifications, competence, and fitness for their duties as such officers. And the defendant, as such superior military officer and major-general commanding as aforesaid, had received from the plaintiff certain letters in relation to the military duties of the plaintiff, and to certain orders received by the plaintiff as such officer, and to his conduct, and his competence and fitness for his said duties as such officer, in which letters, respectively, the plaintiff requested that the same might, to wit, in the performance of his said military duties as such superior officer and major-general commanding as aforesaid, be forwarded by the defendant to the Adjutant-General of the Army, for the information of the Commander-in-Chief of the said army; and thereupon the defendant, in his said capacity of major-general commanding as aforesaid, and in the ordinary course of his said military duty as such superior military officer and major-general commanding as aforesaid, and because it became, and was, necessary and incumbent upon him, by his duty to Her Majesty as such superior military officer and major-general commanding as aforesaid, so to do, and as an act of military duty and not otherwise, or for any other reason, forwarded the said letters to the said Adjutant-General of the Army, and for the information of the said Commander-in-Chief of the Army, when forwarding such letters, made certain reports in writing in relation to the said letters of the plaintiff, and the contents and subject-matter thereof respectively, and to certain military orders received by the plaintiff therein respectively referred to, and with respect to the plaintiff's conduct as such officer as aforesaid, in relation to the said orders and other matters in the said letters of the defendant mentioned, and as to the plaintiff's incompetence in the field; and his unfitness, as such officer as aforesaid, to conduct the business of a battalion in barracks, to wit, in the form of letters addressed by the defendant to the Adjutant-General of Her Majesty's Forces at headquarters (being the proper officer in that behalf to receive the said letters, and the said reports so forwarded and addressed respectively); and such occasion being the proper occasion, according to the discipline and regulations in force in Her Majesty's army, for the defendant, as such superior military officer and major-general commanding as aforesaid, to make to the said adjutant-general such reports in writing as aforesaid, which are the said letters of the defendant, and the said writing and publishing, complained of in the first and second counts of the declaration respectively.

Replication 2.—The plaintiff, as to the defendant's second plea, says that the said words in the declaration mentioned were written and published by the defendant of actual malice on his, the defendant's, part, and without any reasonable, probable, or justifiable cause, and not bonâ fide or in the bonâ fide discharge of the defendant's duty as such superior officer as in the said second plea alleged.

Demurrer to the replication, and joinder in demurrer.

Plaintiff's points:—First, that the second replication showing that the defendant published the letters of actual malice without any reasonable, probable, or justifiable cause, and not bona fide in the discharge of his duty, as in the second plea alleged, is an answer to that plea; secondly, that notwithstanding the circumstances mentioned in the second plea, the action is maintainable for the publication of the letters complained of, the same being admitted to have been published of actual malice, without any reasonable, probable, or justifiable cause, and not bona fide, or in the bona fide discharge of the defendant's duty, as in the second plea alleged; thirdly, the plaintiff will also contend that it being admitted by the second plea that the publications complained of in the declaration were false and malicious, the circumstances in that plea set forth constitute no answer to the action, and that the said plea is therefore bad in substance

Defendant's points:—First, the defendant will contend that under the circumstances appearing on the record, this action is not maintainable; secondly, that the motives of an act done in the strict course of military duty, and under the obligation of military discipline, are not examinable in a court of law; thirdly, that the letters complained of related solely to the military capacity and qualifications of the defendant, and were written in the course of military duty, and that no action can be maintained by one officer in the army against another in respect of any loss of military status or position resulting from an act of military duty; fourthly, that the only remedy (if any) in such a case is to proceed under the Articles of War.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. P. Collier, Q. C.) (with him the Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Colcridge, Q. C.) Dowdeswell, Q C., and Archibald), in support of the demurrer to the replication. The plea of the defendant, all the statements of which are admitted by the record to be true, is a complete bar to the action; and the replication furnishes no answer to the plea. It is to be taken on the demurrer that the alleged libels were written by the defendant in the ordinary course of his military duty as the superior officer of the plaintiff, and no action will lie against the defendant for anything written by him under such circumstances. Neither will the averment of actual malice contained in the replication ground such an action. The leading authority on the subject is Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 T. R. 493, where it was held that the commander of a squadron who maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause brings before a court martial the captain of a vessel under his orders for an alleged breach of duty, is not, for so doing, liable to an action at suit of his subordinate. Lord Mansfield, C. J., and Lord Loughborough, C. J., in the reasons given by them, as reported to the Lord Chancellor, for reversing the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, say, "The great and important question now brought into judgment for the first time is, whether such an action can lie? The occasion has often arisen, at different periods of time, when men of the fleets, put upon their trials before a court martial, have thought the charge without a probable cause, and have warmly felt the injury of such an act of malice or oppression; yet, till this experiment it never entered into any man's head that such an action as this could be brought; consequently there is no usage, precedent, or authority in support of it. The case stands upon its own special ground. The wisdom of ages hath formed a sea military code, which in the last reign was collected and digested into an Act of Parliament. The great object of this code is that the duty of every man in the fleet shall be prescribed and regulated by rules and ordinances adapted to sea military discipline; and that every man in the fleet for any offence against his duty in that capacity or relation, shall be tried by a court-martial. If a man be charged with an offence against the articles, or, where the articles are silent, against the usage of the navy, his guilt or innocence can only be tried by a court-martial. A commander-in-chief has a discretionary power by this military code, to arrest, suspend, and put any man of the fleet upon his trial. A court-martial alone can judge of the charge. But this military law hath foreseen that though it is necessary to give superiors great discretionary power, it may be abused to oppression; and therefore has provided against such abuse by the 33rd article. A commander who arrests, suspends, and puts a man on his trial without a probable cause is guilty within that article; but the same jurisdiction which tries the original charge must try the probable cause, which in effect is a new trial. And every reason which requires the original charge to be tried by a military jurisdiction, equally holds to try the probable cause by that jurisdiction." This reasoning is strictly applicable to the present case. If this action were maintainable the plaintiff would be trying before a jury the reasonable and probable cause. [LUSH, J.—The jury would, in fact, have to determine whether he was a competent commander in the field?] If such actions were maintainable, the discipline of the whole army would be destroyed. The learned judge before referred to, after alluding to the difficulties under which military commanders have frequently to act, says, "A military tribunal is capable of feeling all these circumstances, and understanding that the first, second, and third part of a soldier is obedience. But what condition will a commander be in if, upon the exercising of his authority, he is liable to be tried by a common law jurisdiction? If this action is admitted, every acquittal before a court-martial will produce one. Not knowing the law or the rule of evidence, no commander or superior officer will dare to act; their inferiors will insult and threaten them." "The person unjustly accused," say their Lordships, "is not without his remedy. He has the properest among military men. Reparation is done to him by an acquittal; and he who accused him unjustly is blasted for ever and dismissed the service." The judgment of the Exchequer Chamber was affirmed in the House of Lords (see 1 T. R. 784). In Home v. Lord F. C. Bentinck, 2 Brod. & Bing. 130, where an officer brought an action against the president of a court of inquiry appointed to inquire into his conduct for a libel stated to be contained in the report made thereon, it was held that this report was a privileged communication, and that it was properly rejected as evidence at the trial. It was endeavoured to distinguish this case from that of a court-martial on the ground that the court of inquiry was not a judicial tribunal; but the judgment of the court proceeded upon "The broad rule of public policy and convenience," independently of the character of the court. "The proceeding," said Dallas, C. J., "was in its very nature an official proceeding directed by the commander-in-chief for the purpose of obtaining that information which he was bound to obtain as to the conduct of every officer holding a commission in His Majesty's army, and in furtherance of the exercise of his public duty upon the result of such inquiry, whether the inquiry was to cease in the first instance, or whether the result of that inquiry was to lead to any ulterior measure. The consequence of this was that a court of inquiry was held, of which the defendant in this case was the presiding officer; that court of inquiry was held in consequence of a duty created by the order of the Commander-in-Chief, which was imperative upon him; and a report made by the defendant in conjunction and connection with the officers, was an act of duty imposed upon him as a military man by his superior commander, the Commander-in-Chief, whose order he was bound to obey." [COCKBURN, C. J.—The letter written by the defendant in the present case is not one written proprio motu in the course of his military duties, but is a comment upon a letter which it was his duty to forward.] The plea avers that this was done as an act of military duty, and not otherwise, and on demurrer this must be taken to be so. As on the pleadings, this letter must be taken to have been written maliciously, the only question is whether this would entitle the plaintiff to maintain the action. The effect of Home v. Lord Bentinck (ubi. sup.) is thus stated in 1 Wms. Saund. 131 c.: "No action can be maintained for matter injurious to the plaintiff's character contained in a report made to the Commander-in-Chief by the president of a number of military officers acting as a court of inquiry under his directions." [COCKBURN, C. J.—There was no question in that case as to how far the occasion being privileged, the privilege was taken away by the malice of the defendant.] If the reasons of public policy were considered so strong that the court would not even look at the report by receiving it in evidence, the same reasons apply in a case like the present to prevent the action being maintained. Such is the view of the effect of the decision taken in Wms. Saund. If the action will not lie at all, an averment of want of reasonable or probable cause will not alter the matter. An officer is not left without remedy against the wrongful acts of his commanding officer. The 12th Article of War gives a mode of obtaining redress in providing that, "if any officer shall think himself wronged by his commanding officer, and shall, upon due application made to him, not receive the redress to which he may consider himself entitled, he may complain to the general commanding-in-chief of our forces, in order to obtain justice, who is hereby required to examine into such complaint; and, either by himself or by our Secretary at War, to make his report to us thereupon, in order to receive our further directions." [COCKBURN, C. J.—But he would in that way get no compensation in damages for any injury which may have been done him.] If nothing but the military status of a party is affected by the judgment of a military tribunal, this court will not interfere, even where the military tribunal has acted without jurisdiction or has exceeded its jurisdiction. Re Mansergh, 1 B. & S. 400. Cockburn, C. J. in that case asks (p. 405), "Does not every person who enters the military service of the Crown, give the Crown a right to determine his military status at pleasure?" and in the judgment, his Lordship says, "I quite agree that where the civil rights of a person in military services are affected by the judgment of a military tribunal, in pronouncing which, the tribunal acted without jurisdiction, or has exceeded its jurisdiction, this court ought to interfere to protect those civil rights; e.g., where the rights of life, liberty, or property are involved, although I do not know whether the latter case could occur. Here, however, there was nothing of the sort, and the only matter involved was the military status of the appellant—a thing which depends entirely on the Crown, seeing that every person who enters into military service engages to be entirely at the will and pleasure of the sovereign." So in Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby, 4 F. & F. 831, Willes, J. says: "It is only by reason of the 88th section, to which reference has been made, that a soldier acting bonâ fide, and in discharge of what he supposes to be his duty, could ever set up, as against a citizen not a soldier, the justification of superior command. But, with respect to persons who enter into military state, who take Her Majesty's pay and who are content to act under her commission, although they do not cease to be citizens in respect of responsibility, yet they do, by a compact which is intelligible, and which requires only the statement of it to recommend it to the consideration of everyone of common sense, become subject to military rule and military discipline." "I will lay it down," says his Lordship (p. 832), "perhaps, rather more broadly than even the defendant's counsel would desire, that even if it had been made out that Lord Rokeby had maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause, given the evidence he did before the courts of inquiry in 1864 and 1865, and if it had been proved that he was the prime mover in the dismissal of Col. Dawkins from the army, that that gentleman could not have obtained redress in these courts." These authorities are decisive against the maintenance of the present action. There is no precedent for it. It would be against the public interest to permit actions to be brought in the civil courts against commanding officers who make reports in the discharge of their military duty.

Digitized by Google

S. Hill, Q.C. (with him Holl), in support of the replication. It is not contended on the part of the plaintiff that an action similar to the present would lie against a judge, counsel, witness, or juryman; it is necessary for the due administration of justice that such actions should not be maintainable in their case; but a similar reason does not apply to the present case. No decided case has gone to the extreme contended for on behalf of the defendant. In Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 T. R. 493, the judgment of the Court of Exchequer was strongly in favour of the plaintiff on the ground that there was no evidence of reasonable and probable cause. The judgment of the Court of Exchequer was no doubt reversed by Lords Mansfield and Loughborough, but on the ground that in their opinion there was evidence of the existence of reasonable and probable cause. As to the question whether the action would lie, their Lordships say that "the question is doubtful; and when a judgment shall depend upon a decision of this question it is fit to be settled by the highest authority. According to our opinion it is not necessary to the judgment in this cause; because, supposing the action to lie, we think judgment ought to be given for the defendant." In Warden v. Bailey, 4 Taunt. 67, it was held that an action of trespass lies for an inferior military officer against his superior officer (both being under martial law), who imprisons him for disobedience to an order made under colour, but not within the scope of military authority; although the imprisonment be followed by a trial by a court martial In this case it was argued (p. 69) that "there were two points made in the case of Sutton v. Johnstone: first, that there was a probable cause for the admiral's proceeding; secondly, that both parties being under martial law, the action could not be maintained; but the better opinion was that the judgment proceeded upon the ground that there was a probable cause;" and Heath, J. is reported to have agreed to that. And Lawrence, J. said, "Lord Mansfield held that the action could not be supported, because the declaration showed probable cause, and though the inclination of his opinion was that no such action could be maintained, yet he said it was not necessary to decide on that point, for the facts did not raise the argument;" so that the point involved in the present case must not be taken to have been decided in Sutton v. Johnstone. Further, Lawrence, J. says (p. 75), "I have heard from good private information that the reasons assigned by Lord Mansfield for reversing the judgment of the Court of Exchequer were not adopted by the House of Lords, though the judgment of the chief justices was affirmed;" and Mansfield, C.J., in delivering judgment, thus speaks of the decision in that case:—"The learned judge was desired to nonsuit the plaintiff upon the ground of a doctrine supposed to be established by the case of Sutton v. Johnstone, that an officer cannot maintain an action against his superior officer for imprisonment inflicted in consequence of disobedience to any command whatsoever issued by the superior to the inferior officer. To be sure, that is a very wide inference to draw from Sutton v Johnstone, that being only a case of imprisonment for disobedience to the orders issued in the heat of a battle, where obedience and instant obedience is necessary. Lord Mansfield and Lord Loughborough do not decide this point; they expressly avoid determining it, though they intimate a very strong opinion, and observe that it is a very important case, and send it to the dernier resort. The only point therefore decided in Sutton v. Johnstone is that there was probable cause for the imprisonment in that case." [LUSH, J. referred to the words of Mansfield, C.J., "with respect to the order itself, it might indeed be very convenient that a military officer might be enabled to make the men under his command learn to read and write, it might be very useful, but is not a part of military discipline;" whilst the record in the present case admits that the act of the defendant complained of was part of his military duty.] In Sutton v. Johnstone, in the court below, Eyre, B. distinguishes (p. 503) the case of a military officer from that of a judge or juror. "The presumption of law," he says, "that judge and jurors do nothing causelessly and maliciously does not derogate from the universality of the principle 'that where it can be shown that one man has causelessly and maliciously accused another of a crime, or has otherwise vexed him by causelessly and maliciously exercising upon him, to his damage, powers incident to his situation of superior, the injured party is entitled to redress by this species of action.' The commander-in-chief of a squadron of ships of war is in the condition of every other subject of this country, who, being put in authority, has responsibility annexed to his situation. The propositions which attempt to establish a distinction for him are dangerously loose and indefinite." After referring to the difficulties of an officer's situation the same learned judge says, "Considerations of this nature cannot exclude the established jurisdictions of the country; on the contrary, those jurisdictions must be presumed to be equal to their functions; it must be presumed that they will do their duty honestly; if they do no man can have much to fear. To situations which require indulgence they will show it; but, be the risk more or less, all men hold their situations in this country upon the terms of submitting to have their conduct examined and measured by that standard which the law established. Men of honour will do their duty and will abide the consequences." In Barwis v. Keppel, 2 Wils. 314, an action against an officer for reducing a serjeant of the guards to a common soldier in Germany, was held not maintainable solely on the ground that the cause of action had arisen out of the king's dominions; and it was there never suggested in argument that the action would not lie at all; the defence resting on the ground of the absence of malice. "By the Act of Parliament to punish mutiny and desertion" said the court, "the king's power to make Articles of War is confined to his own dominions; when his army is out of his dominions, he acts by virtue of his prerogative, and without the statute or Articles of War; and, therefore, you cannot argue upon either of them, for they are both to be laid out of this case, and flagrante bello, the common law has never interfered with the army: inter arma silent leges." [COCKBURN, C.J.—The court say also, "We think, as at present advised, we have no jurisdiction at all in this case."] That was because the army was then acting abroad, and in time of war. The words "flagrante bello, the common law has never interfered with the army," imply that in the opinion of the court cessante bello the common law would apply. Home v. Lord F. C. Bentinck (ubi. sup.) differs from the present case in this, that the defendant who wrote the libel was the president of a court of inquiry specially appointed to inquire into the plaintiff's conduct; whereas the defendant in the present case had no express orders to pursue the course which he had adopted. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Can that make a difference? On the argument of this demurrer, we must take it that the alleged libel was written by the defendant in the course of his military duty.] No doubt that is so; but the case last referred to approaches much more closely that of judges and juries than the present case. "The proceeding," said Dallas, C. J., "was, in its very nature, an official proceeding directed by the Commander-in-Chief for the purpose of obtaining that information, &c." [MELLOR, J.—I cannot see any difference between an act done in the discharge of a general duty, and an act, such as the making of this report, done in pursuance of a special order of the Commander-in-Chief.] The defendant in the present case adds comments of his own. [MELLOR, J.—He alleges in his plea that it was his duty to do that also; and on demurrer it must be taken to be so.] In Dickson v. The Earl of Wilton, 1 F. & F. 419, it was held by Lord Campbell, C. J., that though letters from the commanding officer of a regiment to his immediate superior containing charges against the colonel in command, and a conversation with a Member of Parliament as to a question to be put in the House of Commons relative to the dismissal of the colonel on those charges, were privileged communications, yet circumstances showing that the letters were written, not from a sense of duty, but from personal resentment on account of other matters, and that the object of the conversation was to prejudice the plaintiff by reason of such personal resentment, were evidence of actual malice, taking away the privilege. "Whether or not," said Lord Campbell to the jury, "the occasion gives that privilege is a question of law for the judge; but whether the party has fairly and properly conducted himself in the exercise of it is a question for the jury. I, therefore, as the judge, tell you that, in point of law, all the communications to Lord Combermere, to the War Office, and to Mr. Duncombe, were privileged; but whether that privilege has been abused is for the jury. If it has been abused the privilege is gone." According to this ruling it would be a question for the jury to determine in the present case, with what motive the letter of the defendant was written. The opinion of Willes, J., as expressed in Keighly v. Bell, 4 F. & F. 763, which was an action by an officer against his commander for imprisonment, malicious prosecution, and libel, is in favour of the same view. At p. 799, he says, "There are two elements necessary to maintain this action; one is dishonesty or malice, that is, bad motive for the proceeding; the other is, the absence of any probable cause for the proceedings; and as to the one or the other, I confess the inclination of my mind is that there is no evidence. Officers, we know, vary in their degrees of severity or austerity, and one may be a little more rigid, and another a little more lax, in the maintenance of discipline; but such differences as these cannot be allowed to be the ground of an action founded on malice, and so long as the officers discharge their duty honestly, they are not liable merely for discharging it in a way which others may think more or less severe. It is necessary to prove dishonesty or indirect motive, and of that, where is the evidence?" And the plaintiff was nonsuited on that ground. Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (ubi sup.), was decided solely on the authority of Sutton v. Johnstone, and the remark formerly made as to that case applies also to this. In Dixon v. Lord Combermere, 3 F. & F. 527, which was an action against a late Secretary of State for War, a lord lieutenant (commandant of the militia of the district), and the colonel of a regiment of militia, for causing, by means of false charges, the removal of the plaintiff from the office of lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, Cockburn, C. J. says (p. 584): "It is my duty to tell the jury that we are not sitting as a court of appeal to determine whether he has discharged his duty wisely, as to which he is responsible to his sovereign and his country, but not at the suit of a private individual. It is not a question whether he has exercised his discretion well or wisely. But the jury, in order to find a verdict against him, must come to the conclusion that he has dishonestly and corruptly abused the power entrusted to him." Lastly, as to the argument that the plaintiff has a remedy open to him, the only mode of redress is that given by the 12th Article of War, and that is not sufficient to meet such a case as the present. The plaintiff may ask for a court of inquiry; but if that is refused to be granted, is he to be left without any other remedy? Is there to be no redress for one who has spent the best years of his life in a profession, and invested his money in the purchase of a commission? If such a doctrine as is contended for on behalf of the defendant is to be laid down as to the army, why should it not also be applied to the Civil Service wherever an officer in that service is reported by his superior? [HAYES, J.—In the Civil Service there is no court like a court martial; there is nothing open to members of that service but the civil courts of the kingdom.]

Digitized by Google

The Attorney-General in reply.—Barwis v. Keppel is in favour of the defendant so far as it goes; and the same is true of Warden v. Bailey. The opinion of Willes, J., in Keighly v. Bell, is to a similar effect: "I hope," said his Lordship, "I may never have to determine that difficult question, how far the orders of a superior officer are a justification. Were I compelled to determine that question, I should probably hold that the orders are an absolute justification in time of actual war—at all events, as regards enemies or foreigners, and I should think even with regard to English-born subjects of the Crown, unless the orders were such as could not legally be given. I believe that the better opinion is that an officer or soldier, acting under the orders of his superior, not being necessarily or manifestly illegal, would be justified by his orders. The question happily does not arise in that general or abstract form, as here it is a question between military persons, amenable to military authority."

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 13.—The judgments of the members of the court were now delivered as follows:—

COCKBURN, C. J.—This is an action for a libel written by the defendant concerning the plaintiff as an officer holding Her Majesty's commission as a captain in the Coldstream Guards, in a letter addressed by the defendant to the Adjutant-General of the army, reflecting on the character and capacity of the plaintiff as an officer, and in which the plaintiff was represented as incompetent in the field and unfit to conduct the business of a batallion in barracks, and it was requested that his conduct might be referred for investigation by a court of inquiry; and in which it was finally submitted that an officer who had shown such want of judgment, tact, and temper was not fit to be entrusted with the responsibility and charge of a command; by reason of which it is alleged that the plaintiff has lost his commission, and has been compelled to leave his regiment, and has suffered in his reputation as an officer. The declaration contained also a second count, but to this it is not material further to refer. To this there is a plea of a somewhat prolix and confused character; but the sum and substance of which is that the defendant, being the commanding officer of the regiment in which the plaintiff was a captain, and the plaintiff having written a letter to the Adjutant-General complaining of an order given by defendant as such commanding officer, and having conformably to military regulation sent such letter to the defendant to be by him forwarded to the Adjutant-General, it became the duty of the defendant, in transmitting the letter, to accompany it with a report on the order complained of, and the subject matter of the complaint, with such observations as the circumstances of the case appeared to require; that it thus became necessary as a part of the duty of the defendant to report on the incompetency and unfitness of the plaintiff; that the matter complained of was contained in a report thus made in the course of defendant's duty as such commanding officer, and on fulfilment of such duty, and not otherwise or for any other reason. To this plea there is a replication that the words complained of were written and published by the defendant of actual malice and without any reasonable, probable, or justifiable cause, and not bona fide or in the bona fide discharge of the defendant's duty as alleged. To this replication there is a demurrer, and we have to determine whether the replication affords a sufficient answer to the plea. Independently of the great question of absolute privilege in military matters, which presents itself in this case, there can, in my opinion, be no question that the replication is sufficient. If the effect of the plea is to be taken to be that the matter complained of was written for the purpose of causing an inquiry to be held as to the conduct and competency of the plaintiff with a view to his removal from the army, it is a sufficient answer in point of law to say that such a proceeding was malicious and without reasonable and justifiable cause. If, which I think is the right view, the effect of the plea is that the matter complained of was published in the discharge of a duty, and as such was privileged, it would, under ordinary circumstances, be sufficient to reply that the words were published maliciously and without bona fides. For, to entitle matter otherwise libellous to the protection which attaches to communications made in the fulfilment of a duty, bona fides, or, to use our own equivalent, honesty is essential. And to this, again, two things are necessary—first, that the communication be made not merely in the course of duty, that is, on an occasion which would justify the making it, but also from a sense of duty; secondly, that it be made with a belief of its truth. By the demurrer the the defendant, for the present purpose at least, in order to raise this question of law, admits, as he must do, that the averments in the replication are true; in other words, that his representations as to the plaintiff, though made on an occasion of military duty, were made dishonestly, maliciously, and without a belief in their truth. To support this demurrer, it is therefore necessary to maintain that in all matters relating to military authority and discipline a subordinate officer, so far as civil redress is concerned, is entirely at the mercy of his superior; that the latter may institute proceedings against him without right or reason on charges which he knows to be unfounded—may, under the disguise of duty, write concerning him that which he knows to be false, and may thus bring upon him consequences the most disastrous, without the party injured being entitled to redress in a court of law. While I fully agree that acts done in the honest exercise of military authority are entirely privileged, I confess that I am not prepared to arrive at a conclusion so startling and apparently unjust as that, if the opportunity it affords is intentionally abused for the purpose of injury and wrong, no redress is to be had by an officer in a court of law. The question may be considered with reference first to legal authority, secondly, to general principle, and, thirdly, to the peculiar position of persons in the army and navy as distinguished from the rest of the Queen's subjects. The question first came before the courts in 1785 in the great case of Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 T. R. 493, which was an action against the defendant for having, as commanding officer of a fleet, maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause brought the plaintiff to a court martial for breach of duty and disobedience of orders. Two principal questions arose, first, whether the action, as brought by an inferior against a superior officer, would lie, and, secondly, whether the facts upon which the defendant had acted in instituting proceedings against the plaintiff amounted to reasonable and probable cause. A second verdict with large damages having been given for the plaintiff, and a motion in arrest of judgment having been made in the Court of Exchequer, in which the action had been brought, Eyre, B. delivered the judgment of the court. In the difference of opinion which exists on this very important question, I think it desirable to recall to recollection this remarkable and to my mind satisfactory judgment. Dealing with the first branch of the case, he says, "The court never had a difficulty upon this part of the case. The principle of the action, which is pretty clearly ascertained in the decided cases, is general and universal. In the cases alluded to of judges and jurors it cannot apply, because the law gives faith and credence to what they do; and therefore there must always in what they do be cause for it; and there never can be any malice in what they do. The presumption of law that judges and jurors do nothing causelessly and maliciously does not derogate from the universality of the principle that, where it can be shown that one man has causelessly and maliciously accused another of a crime, or has otherwise vexed him by causelessly and maliciously exercising upon him to his damage powers incident to his situation of superior, the injured party is entitled to redress by this species of action. The commander-in-chief of a squadron of ships of war is in the condition of every other subject of this country who being put in authority has responsibility annexed to his situation. The propositions which attempt to establish a distinction for him are dangerously loose and indefinite. It is said subordinate officers may be brought to a court-martial for improper conduct, and that no action lies for anything done in a course of discipline, or under powers incident to situation. If by improper conduct be meant a breach of the articles for the government of the navy; if by a course of discipline be meant exacting that which the discipline of the navy requires; if by what is done under powers be meant that which is warranted to be done under those powers, it will be agreed simply that for doing any of those acts no action will lie; for those are lawful acts in themselves, and there is nothing added to make them unlawful in the particular case. But in respect of the first branch of this proposition, if it be meant that a commander-in-chief has a privilege to bring a subordinate officer to a court-martial for an offence which he knows him to be innocent of, under colour of his power or of the duty of his situation, to bring forward inquiries into the conduct of his officers, the proposition is too monstrous to be debated. Under the second branch of it it may not be fit in point of discipline that a subordinate officer should dispute the commands of his superior, if he were ordered to go to the masthead; but if the superior were to order him thither, knowing that, from some bodily infirmity, it was impossible he should execute the order, and that he must infallibly break his neck in the attempt, and it were so to happen, the discipline of the navy would not protect that superior from being guilty of the crime of murder. And one may observe in general, in respect of what is done under powers incident to situations, that there is a wide difference between indulging to situation a latitude touching the extent of power, and touching the abuse of it. Cases may be put of situations so critical that the power ought to be unbounded; but it is impossible to state a case where it is necessary that it should be abused; and it is the felicity of those who live under a free constitution of government that it is equally impossible to state a case where it can be abused with impunity. . . . We enter into all the difficulties in the situation of an officer whose honour and fortune may come to be so staked. In this particular case they have had their weight with us; the decision has not been a hasty one; but considerations of this nature cannot exclude the established jurisdiction of the country. On the contrary, those jurisdictions must be presumed to be equal to their functions—it must be presumed that they will do their duty honestly; if they do, no man can have much to fear. To situations which require indulgence they will show it; but, be the risk more or less, all men hold their situations in this country upon the terms of submitting to have their conduct examined and measured by that standard which the law has established. Men of honour will do their duty and will abide the consequences." Error having been brought on this judgment, the case was twice argued before Lord Mansfield and Lord Loughborough, the latter being then Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, and the judgment of the Court of Exchequer was reversed, not, however, on the ground that the action would not lie; but solely on the ground that the facts sufficiently showed the existence of reasonable and probable cause. Lord Mansfield, in a masterly argument to which I shall again have occasion to refer, gives his reasons for thinking that such an action ought not to be allowed, but he stops short of deciding the point. At the conclusion of his reasoning he says, "These considerations incline us to lean against introducing this action. But there is no authority of any kind either way, and no principle to be drawn from the analogy of other cases which is applicable to trials by a sea court-martial under the marine law, confirmed, directed, and authorised by statute. And, therefore, it must be owned that the question is doubtful; and when a judgment shall depend upon a decision of this question, it is fit to be settled by the highest authority. According to our opinion it is not necessary to the judgment in this cause; because, supposing the action to lie, we think judgment ought to be given for the defendant." The judgment of the two chief justices was subsequently affirmed in the House of Lords, but, as it appears, upon the same ground, namely, the existence of reasonable and probable cause. In the later case of Warden v. Bailey, 4 Taunt. Rep., Lawrence, J., in the course of the argument, stated that he "had heard from good private information that the reasons assigned by Lord Mansfield were not adopted by the House of Lords, though the judgment of the chief justices was affirmed." The same question presented itself in the case just referred to of Warden v. Bailey. There the plaintiff, a sergeant in a regiment of militia, having been arrested by the defendant, the adjutant of the regiment, by order of the lieutenant-colonel, for disobedience of an order of the latter with reference to an attendance at an evening school and contribution to its support, and for inciting one of the regiment to disobey the order; and having brought an action for such arrest and imprison- [illegible] ·rned judge who presided at the trial, on the authority of the case of Sutton v. Johnstone, nonsuited the plaintiff. On a motion to set the nonsuit aside it was again strenuously urged, as before in Sutton v. Johnstone, that the action would not lie. The court, however, holding Sutton v. Johnstone as falling altogether short of deciding so large a proposition, set the nonsuit aside on the ground that while there was no evidence of the mutinous language attributed to the plaintiff, the order of the colonel to attend the school and contribute to the expense of it was beyond the scope of his military authority, and that consequently the disobedience of the order did not justify the arrest. On a second trial before Sir James Mansfield, C. J., the learned judge having ruled according to the foregoing decision, a bill of exceptions was tendered and the case came on before the Court of King's Bench sitting as a court of error. The same points appear to have been made as had been urged in the court below; and in the end the court gave judgment for the defendant in the action, not however on the ground that the action would not lie, but that there was sufficient evidence of mutinous language having been used by the plaintiff to justify the arrest. It can hardly be supposed that had the court been prepared to adopt the reasoning of Lord Mansfield in Sutton v. Johnstone, they would not have disposed of the case on the question of law, instead of going into an elaborate examination of the evidence. The question again presented itself in an action brought by the present plaintiff, Col. Dawkins, against Lord Rokeby (4 F. & F. 806), an action arising out of these same transactions and regimental disputes. The action was for false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, and conspiracy to cause the plaintiff's removal from the army. The case come on for trial before Willes, J. at Nisi Prius, when the learned judge is reported to have ruled—partly on similar grounds to those set forth by Lord Mansfield in Sutton v. Johnstone, and partly because it had been so decided in that case—that even were it proved that the proceedings ascribed to the defendant had been malicious and without reasonable and probable cause, and that he had been the prime mover in the dismissal of Col. Dawkins from the army, the latter could not obtain redress from a court of law, and he accordingly nonsuited the plaintiff. These are all the authorities directly bearing upon the question, and the result of them appears to me to be that so much of the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Sutton v. Johnstone, as is immediately in point to the present case, stands unreversed either by the judgment in error in that case, or by any subsequent decision of a court in banc, while it is supported by the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in Warden v. Bailey, and incidentally and indirectly so by the decision of the Court of King's Bench when that case was before them on error. The case of Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby is no doubt to the contrary. But, however great my respect for the opinion of the learned judge who presided, I cannot hold myself bound by a single ruling at Nisi Prius, however positively expressed, in a matter in which the Court of Exchequer in Sutton v. Johnstone expressly, and the Court of Common Pleas in Warden v. Bailey, as incidentally appears, entertained a different opinion, and which Lord Mansfield himself declared to be open to grave doubt and fit to be decided by the highest authority. But it is argued that, independently of authority, as a matter of public policy, an action of this nature ought not to be allowed, and that, as in the case of judges, jurors, and witnesses acting in the administration of justice, an absolute immunity is afforded however unrighteous may have been their acts, however malicious and sinister their motives; so, by analogy, on like grounds of public policy, superior officers in military or naval command ought to enjoy entire immunity in respect of acts, however unjust and malicious, done by them, if in the exercise of their authority. The argument cannot be put more forcibly than it is presented in the reasoning of Lord Mansfield in Sutton v. Johnstone. In substance it comes to this—it is essential to the efficiency of an army that discipline should be upheld, that obedience to orders, however despotic and peremptory, should be enforced; that the energy of commanding officers in giving such orders in cases of trying emergency, and enforcing obedience of orders and observance of discipline, by bringing those guilty of disobedience of orders or of breach of discipline to punishment according to military law, should not be crippled by the apprehension of vexatious actions, more especially as juries, by whom such actions would have to be decided, are incompetent to form a judgment on matters of a military or naval character, and might adopt conclusions different from those at which a professional tribunal alone fitted to decide on such a matter, might arrive. And that, if any of those who have voluntarily submitted themselves to military law should suffer injustice or oppression at the hands of a superior, they must be content with such redress as the military law affords. Yielding to no one in respect for an opinion of Lord Mansfield, I must say that this reasoning fails to bring conviction to my mind. I cannot bring myself to believe that officers in command would hesitate to give orders which a sense of duty required, or to enforce obedience and discipline in the due exercise of authority, from any idle apprehension of being harassed by vexatious actions. Men worthy to command would do their duty, as Eyre, C. B. expresses it, fearless of consequences, and would trust to the firmness of judges and the honesty and good sense of jurors to protect them in respect of acts honestly, though possibly erroneously, done under a sense of duty. While no man would more strenuously uphold military authority when legitimately exercised, or would more earnestly urge upon juries the propriety of presuming everything in favour of its legitimate exercise, and of requiring the most cogent and conclusive evidence of its abuse, to entitle an inferior officer to recover in an action against his superior, I cannot bring myself to think that it is essential to the well-being of our military or naval forces that where authority is intentionally abused for the purpose of injustice or oppression—where charges are preferred which to the knowledge of the party preferring them are unfounded and unjust—where representations are made, which the party making them knows to be slanderous and false—the party injured, whose professional prospects may have been ruined, and whose professional reputation may have been blasted, is to be told that the Queen's courts, in a country whose boast it is that there is no wrong without redress, are shut to his just complaint. On the contrary, I cannot but believe that to a force depending upon voluntary augmentation it will be far more beneficial that its subordinate members shall know that, against intentional oppression and manifest wrong, leading to consequences disastrous to professional interests or character, redress may be found at the civil tribunals of the country. Neither can I believe that a jury, under the guidance of a judge, may not be safely entrusted with the decision of such questions. No doubt in matters of military discipline a military tribunal and government is better qualified to form a correct judgment; and where the question turned on nice points of military or naval tactics, a jury would be advised—and doubtless would act on such advice—to presume in favour of military or naval authority. But in cases of manifest wrong and proved maliciou motive, no tribunal can be better qualified to form a just and correct judgment. Nor can I admit the incompetency of juries, when assisted by professional evidence, to form correct judgments even on professional matters. Every day special juries are called upon to decide questions turning on matters of science and professional knowledge, foreign to their ordinary avocations—among others, questions of navigation and nautical skill—and their decisions are on the whole satisfactory. At all events, trial by jury in matters of wrong between man and man is an essential part of our judicial system, and, as it appears to me, the question of competency or incompetency of the tribunal cannot be admitted as an element in our decision of the present question; neither, I must say, do I feel the force of the argument that an individual on becoming a soldier consents, in case of being driven from the army or suffering other wrong by the dishonest exercise of superior authority, to be subject to and abide by the military law alone, or that, as a superior making malicious and unfounded charges against another is amenable to punishment by the military law, redress in such a case is to be sought under the military law and at the hands of a military tribunal alone. It is undoubtedly true that a man on entering the army or navy subjects himself to the military law, and wherever that law conflicts with the civil law applicable to the ordinary subject, he must be content to forego the rights which the ordinary law affords. And if by any provision of the military code a party subjected to its authority were prohibited from resorting to the civil tribunals for the redress of a wrong inflicted under colour of military authority, there would be an end of the question. But no such prohibition exists; and though the punishment of the wrongdoer may be in some sort a satisfaction to the party injured, it affords no compensation for the fatal consequences in a professional or pecuniary point of view, which may have resulted from the wrong. But whatever may be the right view of this matter with reference to considerations of policy, a grave question appears to me to present itself as to how far a court of law is warranted, in the absence of positive law or previous decision in refusing redress in a case of admitted wrong, and in which the right of action would otherwise be undoubted, simply because, on grounds of public convenience, the action as between the particular parties ought not to be allowed. The cases of judges and jurymen seem to me, I must say, very remote. It does not seem to have appeared to Lord Mansfield to be analogous, as he expressly says that no principle can be gathered from other cases analogous to the present. It may be that the immunity afforded to judges and others concerned in the administration of justice may be essential to that great end. It does not follow that a soldier persecuted or slandered by another shall be left without civil remedy. For my own part, I should prefer to treat the immunity of judges as a matter positivi juris, as settled by decisions and authority, rather than as resting on sound or satisfactory principle, on which, were the matter res integra, it would be desirable to act. I cannot believe that judges or juries would fail to discharge their duty faithfully and fearlessly according to their oaths and conscience, or witnesses give evidence less truthfully, from any fear of exposing themselves to actions at law. I am persuaded that the number of such actions would be infinitely small, and would be easily disposed of, while, on the other hand, I can easily conceive cases in which judicial opportunity might be so perverted and abused for the purpose of injustice, and that, on sound principles, the authors of such wrong ought to be responsible to the parties injured. At all events, it seems to me by no means to follow that, because such a principle may be required in the interest of the administration of justice, it is to be applied, without positive enactment, to wrongs inflicted by one member of the land or naval forces of the Crown upon another. Thinking the question of policy more than doubtful, for the reasons I have given—though after the reasoning of Lord Mansfield, the ruling of Willes, J., and the opinion of my learned brothers from whom I have the misfortune to differ, I of course feel the utmost diffidence in my own views—thinking also that it is exceedingly doubtful whether, assuming that as a matter of public policy an action by an inferior against a superior officer ought not to be maintained, a court of law, in the absence of positive enactment, can act upon such assumption, I cannot but think that if the law is to be thus settled, it should be done by legislative enactment, or, at all events, by a court of error, and that, acting as a court of first instance in dealing with this demurrer, we should give judgment for the plaintiff. But my learned brothers, for reasons they will themselves give, have arrived at a different conclusion, and therefore judgment must be given for the defendant.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

MELLOR, J.—This case was argued before my Lord Chief Justice, my brother Lush, the late Mr. Justice Hayes, and myself, in Trinity Term last, and the judgment I am about to deliver was entirely approved of by my lamented friend, Mr. Justice Hayes. I approach the subject with great diffidence, seeing that my Lord Chief Justice has arrived at an essentially different conclusion. This is an action of libel brought by the plaintiff, who was a lieutenant-colonel in the army, holding a commission as captain in Her Majesty's regiment of Coldstream Guards, against the defendant, who held the office of major-general commanding the brigade of Foot Guards, of which the regiment of Coldstream Guards formed part. The alleged libels were contained in certain letters written and sent by the defendant to the Adjutant-General for the information of the Commander-in-Chief, inclosing and commenting upon letters sent by the plaintiff to him, and which the plaintiff required the defendant, as his superior officer, to forward to the Adjutant-General. The question to be determined by the court arises upon a demurrer to the second replication to the second plea. The second plea alleges that the defendant, when he wrote and published the letters, was an officer in Her Majesty's army, holding the public office or appointment of major-general commanding the brigade of Foot Guards, of which the regiment of Coldstream Guards formed part, and was the superior military officer of the plaintiff, who was under his command; and that it was the defendant's duty, as such superior military officer, to forward to the Adjutant-General of Her Majesty's army, at head quarters, certain letters written and sent to the defendant, as such superior officer and major-general as aforesaid, in relation to their military conduct, duties, and qualifications, by the officers under his command, and to make, in relation thereto, for the information of the Commander-in-Chief of the army, reports in writing to the said Adjutant-General on the subjects of such letters. The plea then states the receipt by the defendant from the plaintiff of certain letters in relation to the plaintiff's military duty, and to certain orders received by him as such officer, and to his conduct, and competence, and fitness for such duties as such officer, in which letters the plaintiff requested that the same might, in performance of the defendant's duty as such superior officer, be forwarded by the defendant to the Adjutant-General for the information of the Commander-in-Chief; and that thereupon the defendant, in the ordinary course of his military duty as such superior military officer, and because it became and was necessary and incumbent upon him, by his duty to Her Majesty as such superior military officer so to do, and as an act of military duty, and not otherwise or for any other reason, forwarded the said letters to the Adjutant-General; and, for the information of the Commander-in-Chief when forwarding such letters made certain reports in writing in relation to the said letters and the contents thereof, and to certain military orders therein referred to, and with respect to the plaintiff's conduct as such officer as aforesaid, in relation to the said orders, and to the plaintiff's incompetence in the field, and his unfitness to conduct the business of the battalion in barracks and that such reports were in the forms of letters addressed to the Adjutant-General, being the proper officer to receive such letters and reports, which were forwarded on an occasion being the proper occasion according to the discipline and regulations in force in Her Majesty's army for the defendant to make such reports in writing, and which are the letters whereof the writing and publication is the matter complained of by the plaintiff. To this plea the plaintiff replied that the words in the declaration mentioned were written and published of actual malice on the defendant's part, and without any reasonable, probable or justifiable cause, and not bona fide, or in the bona fide discharge of the defendant's duty as such superior officer as aforesaid. To this replication the defendant demurred, and in one ground of demurrer alleged that no action is maintainable in respect of words written and published under the circumstances stated in the plea, even if written and published maliciously, and without reasonable or justifiable cause. It is to be observed that the replication admits the facts stated in the plea—viz., that the letters in question were written and published by the defendant in the ordinary course of his duty as commanding officer to the Adjutant-General, for the information of the Commander-in-Chief, and as an act of military duty, and not otherwise, or for any other reason; but yet it seeks to avoid the effect of that admission by the allegation that they were written and published maliciously and without reasonable or justifiable cause, and not bona fide, or in the bona fide discharge of the defendant's duty as such superior officer. I am of opinion that such replication is bad, and is no answer to the matters alleged in the plea. If it was the defendant's duty to write such letters and to make such reports touching the plaintiff's conduct, qualifications, and fitness as an officer (which is admitted by the replication), I do not see how it makes the defendant's conduct actionable because he did what it was his duty to do maliciously, and not bona fide in the discharge of his duty. The defendant in substance says, "I did my duty, and nothing more than my duty." To which the plaintiff replies, "I admit that you wrote the letters and reports as an act of military duty, and not otherwise; but you did so maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause, and not bona fide." It is difficult to comprehend how it could be without reasonable or probable cause if done as an act of duty which it was incumbent upon him to do. It is to be observed that the replication contains no allegation that the statements contained in the reports were false to the defendant's knowledge, and I am clearly of opinion that without such an allegation the words "without reasonable or probable or justifiable cause, and not bona fide," are, in connection with the admissions in the replication, simply insensible and repugnant. I must not be taken to admit that had such an allegation appeared on the record it would have entitled the plaintiff to judgment on the demurrer, but it would have given rise to different considerations. I apprehend that the motives under which a man acts in doing a duty which it is incumbent upon him to do cannot make the doing of that duty actionable, however malicious they may be. I think that the law regards the doing of the duty, and not the motives from or under which it is done. In short, it appears to me that the proposition resulting from the admitted statements on this record amounts to this: does an action lie against a man for maliciously doing his duty? I am of opinion that it does not; and, therefore, that upon the pleadings as they stand we might give judgment for the defendant. The Attorney-General, however, did not rest the defendant's case on the effect of the admissions in the pleadings, but contended broadly that no action would lie at law against an officer of the army charged with duties such as those stated on the record in the discharge of them. He likened the case of the defendant to that of judges of courts of law, to grand jurymen, petit jurymen, and to witnesses, against whom no action lies for what they do in the course of their duty, however maliciously they may do it. He claimed the immunity for the defendant for acts done in the course of duty on the highest grounds of policy and convenience. No judge, nor juryman, nor witness, he said, could discharge his duty freely if not protected by a positive rule of law from being harassed with actions in respect of the mode in which he did the duty imposed upon him; and he contended that the position of the defendant manifestly required the like protection to be extended to him and to all officers in the same position. And there is, I think, little doubt that the reasons which justify the immunity in the one case do in great measure extend to the other. How can a commander freely communicate his real opinions to the Adjutant-General as to the conduct, qualifications, or fitness for particular duty of any officer under his command (if his opinion be prejudicial to such officer), under the dread of an action for libel, or other action which, if he were not protected, might be brought against him by any dissatisfied subordinate officer who might consider himself aggrieved? To this it may be answered that no action would lie, as his communication would be privileged if made bona fide and without malice. On the other hand, it must be observed that, although his communication might be privileged under such circumstances, still cases might frequently occur in which the judge on a trial at law would have to submit to a jury the most difficult question of military discipline—such as whether orders disobeyed would be proper orders for a commander to give, or were given maliciously and not bona fide, or whether the opinion expressed as to the competence of a subordinate officer for particular duties was justified or not. The promotion of an incompetent man may cause the greatest disaster; and yet if the person who has to make his report as to the fitness or unfitness of such officer is to do it under the idea that the opinion he expresses may be overruled by a jury ignorant of such matters, how can he be expected to do it freely? The Attorney-General, however, relied not only upon the analogy he drew from the case of a judge, juryman, or witness, but he cited in support of his argument the opinion of Lords Mansfield and Loughborough in the case of Sutton v. Johnstone, in error; and there is no doubt that those eminent judges did in the court of error express an opinion in the analogous case of an action for a malicious prosecution of a naval officer by the commander-in-chief of a naval squadron before a naval court-martial, that no such action could lie, and in the course of their observations they said: "If this action be admitted, every acquittal before a court-martial will produce one. Not knowing the law or the rules of evidence, no commander or superior officer will dare to act; their inferiors will insult and threaten them." And again, "If every trial," that is by court-martial, "is to be followed by an action, it is easy to see how endless the confusion, how infinite the mischief will be." These considerations appear to me to apply à fortiori to a case like the present, in which the letters and reports complained of were written by the defendant in the performance of a positive duty, and for the purpose of obtaining an investigation of the matters therein alleged by a competent military tribunal. It is to be observed that the opinions expressed by Lords Mansfield and Loughborough, although of the greatest weight, and given after the fullest consideration, were not necessary to the judgment in that case, which actually proceeded on other grounds, and therefore does not amount to a decision binding us to declare that no such action will lie, and does not conclude us with reference to the present case; but the exposition of the law expressed in those opinions has been generally accepted and referred to in other cases as a very weighty authority. It was evidently given after great consideration, and derives additional weight from the fact that it was delivered in a court of error, and after an argument displaying the greatest ability and research. It proceeds upon the principle that the law will rather suffer a private mischief than a public inconvenience. It was observed by Baron Eyre, in delivering the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, that the ground upon which the immunity from actions enjoyed by judges and jurymen proceeds is that "the law gives faith and credence to what they do, and therefore there must always in what they do be cause for it, and there never can be any malice in what they do." Crompton, J., in Judy v. Blackburn, 3 B & S. 570, stated that the immunity of judges of the Superior Courts was established to secure their independence, and to prevent them being harassed by vexatious actions. It is manifest that the administration of justice would be paralysed if those who are engaged in it were to be liable to actions upon the imputation that they had acted maliciously, and not bona fide; but it is to be observed that this absolute privilege is not confined to the administration of justice in the Superior Courts, but it has been also applied in its fullest extent to judges of the County Courts (Scott v. Stansfield, 37 L. J. 155, Ex). Nor is it, indeed, confined to the administration of justice, for it is well established that members of Parliament cannot be called in question out of Parliament for anything they may say in Parliament, in the course of any proceedings in Parliament; and in like manner Ministers of the Crown cannot, from reasons of the highest policy and convenience, be called to account in an action for any advice which they think right to tender to the Sovereign, however prejudicial such advice may be to individuals (Irwin v. Sir G. Grey, 4 F. & F. Rep. and C. B. Rep. N. S.) Do not these reasons of public policy and convenience strongly apply to the present case? Can the administrative duties discharged by officers of the army in the position of the defendant be liable to be reviewed by a jury in an action at law without producing the greatest mischief and public inconvenience? I shall presently show that a special mode of redress for all officers in the army who consider themselves aggrieved by their superior officers in relation to the discipline and government of the army is provided by the Articles of War and in that view how inconsistent it would be that the judgment of a military tribunal familiar with the question should be liable to be reviewed and a different result attained by the verdict of a jury in an action of law upon the very same facts. It is true that a standing army was unknown to the common law, and was always looked upon with great jealousy by our ancestors; but it is now and has been for many years regulated by Acts of Parliament, and by Articles of War framed under them; and the machinery for administering it has long been recognised and settled, and there is now a Secretary of State for War expressly appointed by the Crown, with a series of officers charged with particular duties, all tending to the regulation and government of Her Majesty's forces, and I cannot but think that the analogies referred to do in principle apply to a case like the present. Upon these considerations, and supported by the opinion of Lords Loughborough and Mansfield, and that of other eminent judges, I come to the conclusion that the present action will not lie. There was another ground of great importance upon which the Attorney-General insisted, and which strongly supports the opinion above expressed. He argued that, the plaintiff being at the time of the printing and publishing of the letters and reports an officer in the army, and the defendant being his commanding officer, and the letters and reports in question being matters simply relating to military duties and discipline, and to the administration of the army, the plaintiff, if he had ground of complaint in respect of them, was bound to make it to the tribunal specially provided by the Mutiny Act and Articles of War relating thereto, and that it was the only tribunal to which a military officer could appeal in respect of such matters. There is no doubt that the 12th section of the Articles of War does provide "that if any officer shall think himself wronged by his commanding officer, and shall, upon due application made to him, not receive the redress to which he may consider himself to be entitled, he may complain to the General Commanding-in-Chief of our Forces in order to obtain justice, who is hereby required to examine into such complaint, and either by himself, or by our Secretary at War, to make his report to us thereupon, in order to receive our further directions." And it is also provided that all the provisions of the Articles of War "shall apply to every person who is or shall be commissioned or in pay as an officer." It would seem to follow from the provisions thus made by the Articles of War for a special mode of redress for every officer who may think himself wronged by his commanding officer, that it was intended that every officer aggrieved by any order or report made in the course of the administration of the army must follow the special mode of redress pointed out in the Articles of War, and that, in respect of any grievances or complaint arising out of such administration merely, he can have no redress in any other way. Certainly this view of the law is supported by the opinion of Lords Mansfield and Loughborough, expressed in the case of Johnstone v. Sutton, above referred to, in which it is said: "Commanders in the day of battle must act upon delicate suspicion, upon the evidence of their own eyes; they must give desperate commands, they must require instantaneous obedience. In case of a general misbehaviour, they may be forced to suspend several officers, and put others in their places. A military tribunal is capable of feeling all these circumstances, and understanding that the first, second, and third part of a soldier is obedience. But what condition will a commander be in, if upon the exercising of his authority he is liable to be tried by a common law judicature?" I think that these considerations tend strongly to show that the Legislature, in providing special means of redress for officers feeling themselves aggrieved by any exercise of ordinary military authority or duty, by establishing special tribunals for the purpose by the Articles of War, did intend to preclude such officers from appealing to the ordinary tribunals in respect of such matters. This view is confirmed by the opinion of Willes, J., in Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby, 4 F. & F. 841, upon which he nonsuited the plaintiff in an analogous action, and which, so far as I am aware, was not afterwards questioned. He is reported to have said as follows: "With respect to military men, I beg to say that I cannot conceive anything more fatal to themselves—anything more fatal to the discipline or subordination of the army—if every officer who considers himself to have been slighted by his inferiors, or every officer aggrieved by his superiors, whom, having become a soldier, he has consented to submit to, should seek to undo their judgment before a tribunal which must necessarily have but slight acquaintance with those matters upon which it is called to pronounce an opinion. I have no doubt that this is the law, and that it is that which is most beneficial to the community." The case of Grant v. Gould, 2 Henry Blackstone, 69 (see Barwis v. Keppel, 2 Wils. 314), strongly supports the same view. In that case Lord Loughborough said: "The object of the Mutiny Act, therefore, is to create a court invested with authority to try those who are a part of the army in all their different descriptions of officers and soldiers, and the object of the trial is limited to breaches of military duty. Even by that extensive power granted by the Legislature to His Majesty to make Articles of War, those Articles are to be for the better government of his forces, and can extend no further than they are thought necessary to the regularity and due discipline of the army." And in that case, prohibition being refused, Lord Loughborough further said, speaking of a military court-martial sitting under the Articles of War: "This court being established in this country by positive law, the proceedings of it, and the relation in which it will stand to the courts in Westminster Hall, must depend upon the same rules with all other courts which are instituted and have particular powers given to them." It appears to me that, upon the ground that the defendant and the plaintiff were both officers in the army, the defendant being the superior officer, and both being bound by the Articles of War, it was the duty of the plaintiff to adopt the remedy thereby provided with reference to the matters whereof he complains, and that he has no remedy at law in respect thereof. I am therefore of opinion that upon these grounds our judgment must be for the defendant.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

LUSH, J.—It is admitted on the record that the letters complained of were reports made to the Adjutant-General of the army for the information of the Commander-in-Chief by the defendant, as the superior military officer of the plaintiff, in the discharge and under the obligation of military duty touching the competence of the plaintiff as an officer, and his fitness for command in the field and in barracks. And the question turns on the validity of the replication which alleges that these reports were made of actual malice, and without any reasonable, probable, or justifiable cause, and not bona fide or in the bona fide discharge of the defendant's duty as such superior officer. In the view which I take of this case it is unnecessary to determine what is the precise meaning intended to be conveyed by the latter allegation; whether it is merely a repetition in another form of the malicious motive, or whether, by saying that the letters were not written bona fide or in the bona fide discharge of duty, is meant to imply that the defendant knew the statements in them to be false. For, however they may be construed, I am of opinion that the question raised is one purely of military cognisance, and not within the province of a court of law. It is to be observed that the letters complained of reflect on the plaintiff in his capacity of military officer, and in that capacity only. They affect his character, not as a citizen, but as a soldier, and they were written, not for circulation among the public, nor to a private individual, but to the proper military authority, and for the purpose of originating an inquiry into the competence of the plaintiff, and the propriety of an order which the defendant, as his superior officer, had made. A standing army is an institution unknown to the common law. Without the Mutiny Act, the relation between the plaintiff and defendant, out of, and in respect of which this complaint arises, could not have existed in time of peace; and an army raised in time of war would have been entirely under the dominion and control of the Crown, and all questions of military discipline and abuse of power would be decided by its own absolute authority. On this ground it was held in Barwis v. Keppel, 2 Wil. 314, that an action would not lie by a private soldier against his commanding officer for reducing him on the field of battle from a sergeant to the ranks, though the act was alleged to have been done maliciously and without any reasonable or probable cause. If, therefore, the jurisdiction claimed for this court by the plaintiff exists, it must be derived from the Act by which the army is created and governed. No such jurisdiction is given in terms, and, so far from its being conferred by implication, I think it clear that the intention of the Legislature was to exclude the interference of the courts of law, and to confine all matters of complaint of a purely military character to the military authorities; for the Mutiny Act supplemented by the Articles of War constitutes what purports to be a complete military code. It professes to deal with the whole military conduct of every soldier, and in every department of the service. It provides rules for the protection of the subordinate against his superior officer, as well as for due subordination; for the redress of grievances as well as for the punishment of offences; and appropriate tribunals are constituted for administering and enforcing these provisions. Amongst the Articles of War are two sections headed "Redress of Wrongs," the one applying to commissioned, the other to non-commissioned officers and privates. The first, which I presume is the one under which the plaintiff acted as stated in the plea, is to this effect: "If any officer shall think himself wronged by his commanding officer, and shall upon the application made to him not receive the redress to which he may consider himself entitled, he may complain to the General Commanding-in-Chief of our Forces in order to obtain justice, who is hereby required to examine into such complaint, and, either by himself or by our Secretary of State for War, to make his report to us thereupon in order to receive our further directions." Can it be reasonably inferred that any other mode or measure of redress was intended by the Act than that which is specified in this article? It is no argument to say that the remedy is imperfect because no pecuniary compensation is given to the injured party. The defect, if it be one, is a defect in the code itself, which we cannot remedy. The plaintiff has no reason to complain, for he has all which the law military, to which he engaged to submit when he entered the service, entitles him to have. The same code creates both the right and the remedy, and this court cannot add to the one or to the other. The elaborate judgment of Lord Mansfield and Lord Loughborough in Johnstone v. Sutton, an analogous, though not similar case, upholds the view which I have taken upon grounds which I think equally applicable to this case; and though the ultimate decision in the case was based upon an independent ground, I cannot but regard it as a judgment of high authority. As every year since that date Acts have passed for the government both of the army and of Her Majesty's marine forces, without any intimation of a contrary view on the part of the Legislature, and so many occasions for questioning it must have occurred, and yet the judgment stands unassailed, I look upon it as one which has received the tacit assent of both the Legislature and the judicature. It is true that Lord Campbell in Dickson v. Lord Wilton, 1 F. & F. 419, and again in a case between the same parties (3 F. & F. 1), left the question of malice to the jury, but in neither case was the point now in controversy raised. On the other hand in Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby, 4 F. & F. 806, Willes, J. ruled that the action was not maintainable. His observations in that case, which have been quoted by my brother Mellor, I entirely adopt. For these reasons I concur with my brother Mellor in pronouncing judgment for the defendant.

Digitized by Google

Judgment for the defendant.

Attorneys for the plaintiff, Smith and Co.

Attorney for the defendant, The Solicitor to the Treasury.

NISI PRIUS.

SUSSEX SPRING ASSIZES, 1869.—LEWES.

(Before BRAMWELL, B.)

LORD ST. LEONARDS v. ASHBURNER. (a)

Trespass — Title—Evidence — Production of deeds — Length of possession—Effect of is evidence of title apart from the Statute of Limitations.

In an action which raises a question of title to land, the question being one of boundary, long possession and acts of ownership afford pregnant evidence of title in the party possessed, notwithstanding the non-produc- of his title-deeds, and even against some evidence of title in the other party (if such evidence leaves the question in doubt); upon the ground of the acquiescence of the other party in the possession, and acts of ownership. And this evidence is quite independent of the Statute of Limitations, the effect of which is to vest the property in the person in possession, even although until the period of limitation had elapsed it was not his, whereas the effect of possession and acts of ownership is evidence to show that the title was originally in that party.

Action of trespass, by Lord St. Leonards, for cutting trees, alleged to have been growing on his land.

Plea: not possessed.

C. Pollock, for the plaintiff.

Sir G. Honyman, for the defendant.

The parties possessed adjoining estates, originally portions of one estate held in the hands of the same owner, but having a natural boundary between them, and they had been occupied by different tenants. More than twenty years before the act complained of, the plaintiff had purchased the portion he held, and had planted trees upon the locus in quo, some of which had been cut down to try the title. The defendant, within the twenty years, had come into the possession of the other portion, and had recently claimed the locus in quo, as belongings to it. The question was one of boundary. The plaintiff relied upon his possession, and acts of ownership, as proving that the boundary was one which corresponded with the old boundary between the two portions of the original estate, and which included the locus in quo in his portion, and he declined to produce his title-deeds, "upon principle." The defendant relied chiefly on a plan indorsed on his title-deeds, and which appeared to be rather in his favour; but it was so small (being merely on

(a) Reported by W. F. FINLASON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Digitized by Google

the margin of the deed) that it was necessarily doubtful and indistinct; and although he also gave some evidence as to boundary and acts of ownership, it was slight and inconclusive; and the preponderance of evidence of acts of ownership was vastly in favour of the plaintiff, who indeed had planted the trees in the locus in quo more than twenty years before, and had been in possession ever since. The plaintiff was pressed in cross-examination to admit that he was relying on the Statute of Limitations to claim land not really his, but this he strenuously refused to admit, and urged his long possession as the best proof of title.

BRAMWELL, B., to the jury.—The action is to try the title to the land, and it is for the plaintiff to make out his title. The question is one of boundary, and the great point is, which of the parties has actually enjoyed the land in dispute. Title-deeds come to little without evidence of actual enjoyment, for otherwise anyone might pretend to give away the lands of anybody else. Parchment, of itself, comes to little; the real question is as to actual enjoyment; and in this case the great question is, who has enjoyed the land in dispute since the estate was divided. Now, we have the positive and undoubted evidence of Lord St. Leonards that he actually planted the trees upon the piece of land, and that is certainly one of the most cogent pieces of evidence that could possibly be given in a case of this kind; building a wall upon the land could hardly have been more so. It may fairly be presumed that Lord St. Leonards, when he planted the trees, believed or supposed the land to be his, and, as he had bought the estate, he would, of course, take care to know what he bought. And it is difficult to suppose that the owner of the other portion of the estate would not have equally known the boundary, and would not have resisted the plaintiff's acts of possession if the land in question was not within his boundary. Besides, the plaintiff has been in continued possession ever since, cutting the trees and sporting on the ground, exercising every possible act of ownership. It would be difficult to imagine a stronger case. It was said on the part of the defendant, "Produce your title-deeds." But the plaintiff declined to produce them, and this refusal was in accordance with law, with sound reason, and good sense. For it would be extremely hard if a man might commit a trespass upon land in the possession of another, and then say "Produce your title-deeds." Surely the other might fairly answer, "I am not called upon to produce my title-deeds, for I am in possession, and you are a trespasser; produce your own title-deeds, and prove your title to the land you claim." The defendant, indeed, produced his title-deeds, and relied upon a plan indorsed on the margin of one of the deeds. But the scale was so minute that the weight of that evidence was slight. Where, indeed, a deed refers to a plan, it is conclusive between the parties or their privies. So far as it goes, the plan is in the defendant's favour; but it is for the jury to say what such a piece of evidence is worth. And so as to the acts of ownership on the one side or the other. There is further, on the part of the plaintiff, the case under the Statute of Limitations, and if he has been in exclusive possession for more than twenty years, that gives him a conclusive title by virtue of the statute.

Verdict for the plaintiff.

COURT OF PROBATE.

Reported by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Nov. 23.

(Before LORD PENZANCE.)

In the Goods of COOPER.

Will—Bankruptcy and emigration of executor—Administration granted to one of the legatees.

An executor became bankrupt and emigrated to Australia before proving the will. The estate was of small value, and the court, under the circumstances, granted letters of administration, with the will annexed, to a sister of the deceased as one of the legatees, but directed the written consents of all persons interested under the will to be filed in the registry.

Elvira Louisa Cooper, late of No. 44, Bernard-street, Russell-square, in the county of Middlesex, died Aug. 3, 1869, a spinster, leaving a will duly executed, and dated July 22, 1865, of which she appointed John Johnson sole executor. The value of the property was under 300*l.* By the will the testatrix bequeathed the sum of 100*l.* to her mother, and the remainder of all other moneys, after payment of the funeral expenses, to her sisters, Rosina Mary Cooper, Henrietta Sophia Raikes, Eliza Humes Cooper, and Alice Grace Cooper, and to the said Alice Grace Cooper she bequeathed all her wearing apparel, books, plate, jewellery, pictures, and household furniture. Her executor, John Johnson, on Dec. 28, executed an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. On Dec. 21 he filed his petition for adjudication of bankruptcy in the district court of Leeds, in the county of York. In Jan. 1867 he went to Australia, and was now said to be at Ballarat, with no intention of returning to England.

Searle now moved for a grant of administration, with the will annexed, to Alice G. Cooper, as one of the residuary legatees, relying on the words of the will, which he contended constituted a residuary bequest to the deceased sister.

Lord PENZANCE.—Under the circumstances of the case—the poverty of the estate, the bankruptcy of the executor, and his absence from the country—you may take the grant under the 73rd section; but you must bring into the registry the written consent of the mother and all the other persons interested under the will.

Solicitors, Benham and Tindall.

Tuesday, Nov. 30.

In the Goods of CROFTS.

Will of married woman — Separation-deed — Scotch divorce — Will not republished after death of husband —Limited grant.

A testatrix for many years before her death had been separated from her husband, and enjoyed under a post-nuptial settlement a separate income of 150l. a year. She had also obtained a decree of divorce in Scotland, but both she and her husband resided in England. Her husband predeceased her, and she did not re-execute the will which she had made before his death. Her property consisted partly of savings and partly of a legacy which had been left to her after the decree of divorce. The Probate Court granted probate limited to so much of her property as on the oath of the party appliant appeared to be the produce of her separate estate.

Harriet Crofts died March 1869, leaving a will duly executed, bearing date June 22, 1868. In 1837 Mrs. Crofts separated from her husband, and never afterwards cohabited with him. On the 21st and 22nd Sept., in contemplation of their separation, Robert Crofts, her husband, executed a post-nuptial settlement, by which he secured to her, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, an annuity of 150*l.* In 1840 Mrs. Crofts, then being resident in England, obtained a divorce in Edinburgh, on the ground of adultery committed by her husband when in Scotland—but before the decree was pronounced, her husband returned to England, and never afterwards resided in Scotland. The value of the testatrix's property was under 800*l.*, consisting of money in the Funds and furniture, arising partly out of her savings, and partly from a legacy left her after the date of the Scotch decree of divorce. The will commenced by saying that she had certain separate property over which she had a right of disposal, and that in the exercise of that power, she disposed of the same in the manner therein following. The testatrix's husband died in July 1868, after the date of the execution of the will, and she survived him and died without re-executing the will.

Digitized by Google

Dr. Spinks now moved for probate of the will on behalf of the executor. He submitted that as the property was made up of the deceased's savings and of the legacy which came to her after her divorce, it was her separate estate, of which she had power to dispose by will, and therefore that the executors were entitled to a general grant. [Lord PENZANCE.—The difficulty in your way is that the court, in deciding whether she had power to dispose of her property, will be exercising the powers of a court of construction as to the effect of that separation-deed. I will consider in what form the grant ought to go.]

On a subsequent day, Lord PENZANCE said:—The grant may go, limited to such property as appears, on the oath of the party applying, to the best of his belief to be the produce of her separate property.

Proctors, Heales and Co.

OLVER v. JOHNS.

Will—Attestation—Signature not seen—Presumption.

The sole surviving attesting witness to a will, which had been prepared by a person well accustomed to the making of wills, deposed that when she signed the will she did not see the testatrix's signature, nor could she remember seeing the other attesting witness sign, though she handed the pen to him. She had been requested by the testatrix to witness her will, and the court Held the will to have been duly executed.

The plaintiff propounded the will of Jenefer Johns Cole, of St. Austell, in the county of Cornwall, who died March 7, 1868. The defendant pleaded undue execution and undue influence. The will was prepared by one Glanville, who was one of the attesting witnesses, but who had since died. The attestation clause was in this form: "Published as for the last will and testament of the said Jenefer Johns, who signed the same in our presence, and we, in each other's presence, have signed the same as witnesses the day and year as above."

The sole surviving witness, Jane Jenkins, made an affidavit describing the circumstances of the execution. The deceased asked her to witness the will, but the did not see the testatrix sign, nor did she see any signature. After signing she handed the pen to the other attesting witness, Glanville, and left the room without seeing him sign.

Pritchard, on behalf of the intervener, who had been allowed to come in and prove the will, moved for probate of the will. The question is one of presumption. The memory of the attesting witness is a blank, and as the will was made by a man accustomed to make wills in the neighbourhood, the presumption omnia ritè esse acta applies.

Dr. Swabey contra.—There is nothing to show that the testatrix's signature was there, and the circumstances do not justify such a presumption.

The COURT held that the case came within Gwillim v. Gwillim, as regarded the presumption of the testator's signature being on the will at the time of attestation. As to the witnesses signing in each other's presence, it held that the facts allowed the Court to assume that they had so signed, and granted probate.

Attorneys for intervener, Emmet, Watson, and Emmet.

Attorneys for defendant, Westall and Roberts.

COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

Reported by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Dec. 7.

(Before LORD PENZANCE, J. O.)

PARKINSON v. PARKINSON.

Dissolution suit—Desertion not proved, and charge of cruelty subsequently added—Practice.

A wife brought a suit for dissolution on the ground of adultery and cruelty. She proved the adultery, but failed to prove the cruelty. The hearing was adjourned, and she subsequently discovered that the communication of syphilis amounted to legal cruelty.

The court on motion allowed her to add a charge of cruelty to that effect to the petition.

This was originally a wife's petition for dissolution on the ground of her husband's adultery and desertion. The adultery was clearly established, but the court held the desertion not proved, and the further hearing was adjourned for the petitioner to decide whether she would ask for a decree of judicial separation.

Dr. Swabey, on her behalf, now moved for leave to add a charge of cruelty. In support of the motion he read affidavits from Dr. Conolly, deposing that a complaint from which the petitioner now suffers, and has for a long time been suffering, communicated to her by her husband, is syphilis; and another from Mrs. Parkinson, in which she stated that she had only become aware that the communication of such a disease amounted to legal cruelty by hearing a case tried in this court while she was waiting the hearing of her own case.

Lord PENZANCE, J. O.—You may have leave to amend your petition by adding the charge as prayed.

Solicitors: Chippenden, Clarke, and Turner.

Wednesday, Nov. 10.

FINNEY v. FINNEY.

Dissolution suit—Costs of witnesses not called—Maintenance money.

In a suit for dissolution the respondent's counsel withdrew their opposition after a few witnesses had been called. The registrar in taxing the costs disallowed the costs of several witnesses who were in attendance, but not called, and also disallowed maintenance money for the witness on whom the proof of the wife's case chiefly depended.

The court on motion confirmed the registrar's report on the latter point, but on the ground that the case was one which, from the circumstances, required to be well proved, allowed the expenses of the witnesses who were not called.

Digitized by Google

The petitioner, who had a small independent property, married the respondent, Major Finney, in Oct. 1863, and afterwards lived with him in different parts of London, and at Southsea. In Jan. 1867, she separated from him, and soon afterwards she filed a petition praying for a judicial separation on the ground of cruelty. The case was heard in Nov. 1867, when the court held that the cruelty was not proved, and dismissed the petition. Subsequently the petitioner received information from one Louisa Aldridge, that the respondent had committed adultery with her. She alleged that she had been the Major's mistress before his marriage, and that he had kept up an adulterous connection with her afterwards. Mrs. Finney then presented a petition for judicial separation on the ground of adultery. The respondent filed an answer denying the charge.

The case was heard before Lord Penzance, J. O. and a special jury on July 14 and 15, and after the evidence of Louisa Aldridge had been corroborated by several witnesses, the counsel for the respondent abandoned further opposition to the decree, and the jury having found all the issues for the petitioner, the court pronounced a decree for judicial separation. The costs were taxed in the registry, and the registrar disallowed the expenses of several witnesses who were in attendance, but not called on to corroborate the evidence of the witness Louisa Aldridge. He also disallowed a sum charged for subsistence money of Louisa Aldridge during the period between her communication with the petitioner's solicitors and the trial.

Dr. Spinks, for the petitioner, now moved that the report be referred back to the registrar for a reviewal of it. The petitioner's solicitor, in summoning these witnesses, had acted under the advice of counsel, who were of opinion that Aldridge's evidence, under the circumstances, ought to be strengthened in every possible way by independent testimony. That they were not called was the result of the respondent's counsel withdrawing their opposition. [Lord Penzance, J. O.—The case was certainly one which required to be well proved.] On the point of maintenance money he cited

Anonymous, 2 Dow & Ry. 424;
Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 7 Wms. 725;
Mount v. Larkin, 8 Bing. 195;
Evans v. Watson, 15 L. J. 256, C. P.;
Howes v. Barber, 21 L. J. 254, Q. B.;
Ansell v. Marsh, 22 L. J. 118, Q. B.

Searle, for the respondent, submitted that the court before granting the motion should have before it the report of the registrar, with his reasons for disallowing the costs.

Lord Penzance, J. O.—The best plan will be to have a meeting in chambers, and settle the matter there.

Subsequently in chambers the Judge Ordinary allowed the expenses of the witnesses, but confirmed the registrar's report in disallowing the maintenance money.

Solicitors, Bischoff and Co.

Saturday, Nov. 13.

Richards v. Richards and Cook.

Suit for dissolution—Suspected connivance of husband—Decree suspended—Queen's Proctor put in motion.

In a suit for dissolution, the court, having reason to suspect the husband of connivance or conduct conducing to adultery, suspended the decree, and directed the Queen's Proctor to make inquiries into the bona fides of the petitioner's case.

This was a husband's suit for dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery. The parties were married in the United States, and at the time of the alleged adultery they were residing near Bristol. Soon after their return to this country, they made the acquaintance of the co-respondent, and the respondent being in bad health, he took her, as was alleged, to visit some relations of his near Newport. It was proved, however, that they never went to Newport, but lived at Cardiff for ten days or a fortnight as man and wife. On their return the co-respondent went to lodge with the petitioner, and one night he and the respondent were surprised by the petitioner in the act of adultery. Upon this a petition was filed, and the case was tried before the court without a jury. Neither the respondent nor co-respondent had filed an answer.

Inderwick for the petitioner.

At the trial various letters written to the husband during the absence of the wife with the co-respondent were read, which induced the court to suspect connivance or conduct conducing to adultery. The petitioner was called, and his cross-examination did not tend to remove the suspicion.

Lord Penzance, J. O.—This is a peculiar case. The adultery of the wife has been clearly proved, and the question is whether the petitioner has disentitled himself to a decree by his own conduct. When the letters from the co-respondent were read, a suspicion was raised that the petitioner knew what was going on, and when the petitioner came into the box that suspicion was not removed. Among other things, he was not able to say how long his wife remained in the house after he had caught her in the act of adultery. However the petitioner may be merely a stupid man, and his case may be a good one. Under the circumstances the court will suspend the decree for the present, and direct the Queen's Proctor to make inquiries.

Solicitor, E. W. Le Riche.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Reported by Douglas Kingsford, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 22 and July 17.

(Present: The Right Hon. Sir William Erle, the Lord Chief Baron (Sir Fitzroy Kelly), Sir Robert Phillimore, and Sir Joseph Napier.)

The Attorney-General for New South Wales (app.) v. Michael Murphy (resp.)

New South Wales—Conviction for felony—Venire de novo—New trial—Access of jury to newspapers—Jurisdiction of Supreme Court of New South Wales—Irregularity not avoiding verdict—Remedy.

The respondent was tried for murder, at a session of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery in New South Wales, was convicted and sentenced to death.

Afterwards an application on behalf of the prisoner was made to the Supreme Court of the colony, sitting in banco, for a rule to show cause why a venire facias de novo should not issue for the trial of the prisoner. On further affidavits the rule was made absolute, and it was also ordered that a suggestion should be made on the record to the effect that after the jury had been empanelled, and before verdict, the jurors were allowed, during certain adjournments of the court for the night, by the officers of the sheriff having charge of them, to have access to and free perusal of certain newspapers containing reports of the evidence from day to day; and that the last-mentioned trial, by reason of the matters so suggested, was not according to law, but was irregular and void. This suggestion was followed by an entry, purporting to be an order that, for the cause aforesaid, the judgment on the said verdict be vacated, and that the sheriff cause a jury anew to come.

Held (reversing the judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales), that the above order vacating the judgment upon the verdict, and for a venire facias de novo was invalid:

First. Because this was substantially an attempt to grant a new trial on the ground that the conviction was unsatisfactory by reason of irregularity in the conduct of the trial, and the discretion to grant new trials does not extend to cases of felony: (R. v. Bertrand, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 752, followed.)

Secondly. Because the Supreme Court sitting in banco had not jurisdiction to take cognizance as a court of appeal of the judgment pronounced at the session of oyer and terminer, which had come to an end before the session in banco began.

Thirdly. Because the evidence was insufficient, in that, on mere hearsay information, it showed only possible access by the jury to newspapers, without showing that the newspapers contained matter tending to influence the jury improperly, or that they were ever read by the jury.

The cases in which a verdict upon a charge of felony has been held to be a nullity, and a venire facias de novo awarded, have been cases of defect of jurisdiction in respect of time, place, or person, or cases of verdicts so insufficiently expressed or so ambiguous that a judgment could not be founded thereon; but there is no authority for holding a verdict of conviction or acquittal in a case of felony, delivered before a competent tribunal in due form, to be a nullity by reason of some conduct on the part of the jury, considered unsatisfactory by the court.

If irregularity occurs in the conduct of a trial not constituting a ground for treating the verdict as a nullity, the remedy to prevent a failure of justice is by application to the authority, with whom rests the discretion either of executing the law or commuting the sentence.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales delivered on Sept. 24, 1867. The appellant, the Hon. James Martin, Her Majesty's Attorney-General for the colony of New South Wales, sought to obtain the reversal, alteration or variation of that judgment.

The main facts of the case were as follows:—

On the 12th Aug. 1867 an information was filed in the Supreme Court of the said colony, at Sydney, by the appellant, as attorney-general, that the respondent did, on the 22nd Nov. 1865, at South Creek, in the said colony, feloniously, wilfully, and of malice aforethought, kill and murder one Samuel Hassan.

To this information the respondent pleaded not guilty, and issue was joined thereon.

The respondent was, on the 19th, 20th, and 21st days of Aug. 1867, at the session of the said court of oyer and terminer and general gaol delivery then holden, tried, upon the said information, before the Hon. Alfred Cheeke, one of the judges of the said court, and a jury of twelve jurors duly empanelled and sworn.

After having heard the evidence for the Crown and the prisoner, and having been addressed by the counsel for the Crown and the prisoner respectively, and charged by the said judge, the jury, on the said 21st Aug., retired from the bar of the court to consider their verdict. On the following day they returned into court, and by their foreman stated that they had not agreed, and were not at any time likely to agree concerning their verdict; and having been then kept, without separating, for the space of upwards of three days and three nights—during more than twenty-seven hours of which they had been deliberating on the matters before them—they were discharged by the judge from giving any verdict.

The respondent was again tried on the said information at the next session of the said supreme court as a court of oyer and terminer, and general gaol delivery, on the 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th Sept. 1867, before the Honourable Peter Fawcett, one of the judges of the said court, and another jury, duly empanelled and sworn. And on the said 14th Sept. the jury found that the respondent was guilty of the felony and murder charged, and thereupon the respondent was by the court sentenced to death.

After the adjournment of the court on the evenings of the said 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th Sept respectively, the said jurors were lodged at "Butt's" Metropolitan Hotel in Sydney, under the charge of the sheriff's officer. During the times when they were at such hotel, and before giving their verdict, the said jurors were allowed the use of the newspapers of the day, containing alleged reports of the trial so far as it had gone. The heading of the report in one of such papers was "The South Creek murder case," and in one report the following passage was contained: "The witness was cross-examined, but was not shaken in his evidence."

The said jurors were also allowed during the time of their sojourn at the said hotel to hold communication, without the permission of the presiding judge, with persons other than the officers in charge of them; but such communications had no reference to the matters in issue.

On the 19th Sept. 1867, a rule was granted by the said Supreme Court, calling upon the appellant to show cause why a venire de novo should not issue for the trial of the respondent on grounds appearing in an affidavit of James Hart, referred to in the said rule, and which grounds were in substance that the said jurors, after they had been empanelled to try the said case, and during their sojourn at the said hotel and before they delivered their verdict, were allowed the free use of the said newspapers containing the said reports, and that without the permission of the presiding judge, but with no reference to the matters in issue, intercourse was permitted between the said jurors and other persons not being in charge of them during the time they were at the said hotel.

On the 24th Sept. 1867, the said rule was, after reading certain further affidavits, and after hearing counsel for the Crown and for the respondent, made absolute, and by such rule absolute it was ordered that an entry should be made on the record of the respondent's conviction of the said charge to the effect that, after the jury had been empanelled to try the case, and before they delivered their verdict, they were improperly allowed the free use of the newspapers of the day which contained reports of the trial as far as it had gone, in one of which newspapers the heading given was "The South Creek Murder Case," and lastly that a venire facias de novo should issue for the trial of the respondent upon the said charge. The judgment below was not written, but the reasons for that judgment were afterwards stated for the purpose of the appeal, and were as follows:—

Stephen, C. J.—I am of opinion that there must be a venire de novo. It is laid down in Tidd's Practice, 2 vol. 953 (8th edit.), citing a note to Davies v. Pierce, 2 T. R. 126, that a venire de novo is grantable when the jury have misconducted themselves. The authority quoted for this position is a case mentioned in 2 Strange, 887. In Viner's Abridgment, title "Trial," K., g. 4, it is said that "capias was awarded against the under-sheriff charged to keep a jury, and he permitted them to go and to have meat and drink, for he, upon his examination, confessed the matter, which is of record now, and he is an officer, &c., and therefore capias, &c., and against the jury, because the matter is only surmise, venire facias was awarded, and another venire facias between the parties at issue to return a new jury." In the margin it is added, that Brooke says, "it seems that this matter was confessed or notably proved," Br. Jurors, pl. 12. In Hale's Pleas of the Crown, p. 306, it is said that "if, after the jury sworn, either party deliver a piece of evidence to the jury, and the verdict is given for him that delivered it, it shall avoid the verdict, but then this must appear by examination, and be endorsed upon the postea or verdict so as it appears of record." The distinction between an award of a venire de novo, and a rule for a new trial, appears to be, says Manning, Serjt., in a note to Gould v. Oliver, 2 M. & G. 238, "that the former is always founded upon some irregularity or miscarriage apparent upon the face of the record, whilst the latter is an interference by the court, in the discretionary exercise of a species of equitable jurisdiction, for the purpose of relieving a party against a latent grievance. After a rule for a new trial, and a new trial had thereon, the record is in the same state as if no trial, except the last, had taken place, whereas upon a venire de novo the fact of the first trial, and the circumstances under which that trial became nugatory or abortive, and which rendered a second trial a matter not of discretion, but of right, necessarily appear on the record." And, again, in the following page, Hale, P. C. 308, Hale, C. J. says: "If depositions are read in court to the jury, and after the jury sworn and going from the bar, the solicitor or prosecutor for the king or party, without consent of parties or order of the court, deliver the copies of the deposition to the jury, if they find against him on whose part the copies were delivered the verdict is good, but if they find for him on whose part they were delivered, and this appear by examination, and be (as it ought to be) endorsed upon the postea or record, the verdict shall be quashed, and a new venire facias or award for a new jury shall be returned." If the court is satisfied by evidence before it that there has been a miscarriage of justice, the authorities show that the court has authority to direct the matter to be entered on the record, and it thus appears on what ground the venire de novo is awarded. I think, therefore, that it is our duty to direct the matter to be stated on the record, as was done in R. v. Fowler, 4 B. & A. 273. An entry was there made like the one I propose to have made in this case. I am satisfied that what occurred here was by the permission of the officers in charge of the jury, they being in fact officers of the Crown. The jurors were allowed to read, and some of them did in fact read, reports (or papers purporting to be reports) of the evidence daily given at the trial, or said to have been given, so far as it had proceeded. There is nothing to show whether the evidence was rightly or wrongly reported. These reports may, as far as appears, have been written by the Crown, or the authority of the Crown. It is sufficient to say that the officers of the Crown permitted the jurors to read reports, or what purported to be reports, of the trial. Such a proceeding, in my opinion, was wrong and dangerous in the last degree. The newspapers might have contained a comment on the trial. In fact, the following passage was contained in the report, "The witness was cross-examined, but was not shaken in his evidence." What was done must be considered to have been done by one of the parties to the proceeding, and therefore it vitiates the verdict. I have come to this conclusion, although keenly alive to the absurdity of adhering to form rather than substance in the conduct of criminal proceedings. It is quite possible to pervert rules of practice so as to secure impunity to guilt. But I think that there has been in this case a substantial miscarriage of justice, or, at all events, an extreme risk of such miscarriage. The mischief is obvious, and the proceedings so dangerous that no court could sanction it. It is better to allow the case to go down to another trial than to allow the verdict to stand. As to the effect of communicating with a juryman in respect to indifferent matters, it would be monstrous, I think, to say that a juryman should not receive a communication from his wife as to the illness of a child, or as to circumstances which might irretrievably injure his fortunes. I never understood that jurymen might not receive communications of this kind. In order to set aside a verdict on such ground, it would be necessary to show that some mischief had been caused by what had occurred.

Hargrave, J.—First, I concurred generally in the Chief Justice's elaborate statement in court, and review of the old authorities as to writs of venire de novo from very early date to the present time, but, not having read the written reasons of the Chief Justice as now filed, I assume that these authorities justify the technical issue of this writ on this present occasion, on the ground that the trial was conducted with such a substantial and gross miscarriage of justice as required the whole trial to be treated as a nullity, and this independently of all consent from any party. Secondly, I think that the giving of printed newspapers to the jurors during the trial containing (as was admitted) alleged reports of the case composed by mere newspaper employés, or any other unofficial bystanders, being the usual popular summaries of the evidence interspersed with remarks upon the relative importance and effect of particular testimony, the demeanors of the witnesses, the reporter's opinions as to the effect and bearing of cross-examination, and the usual condensed popular narrative of the speeches of counsel, and other court proceedings of this trial, were circumstances which constituted a substantial miscarriage of justice, and which seemed to me to come strictly (however unintentionally) within the common law offence of "embracery," defined (by Hawkins, P.C. vol. 1, c. 86, ss. 1, 5, and other authorities, cited at Russell's Crim. Law, chap. 21) to be "any practice which tends to affect the administration of justice by improperly working on the minds of jurors." The jurors ought not even to be "instructed by letters, persuasions, &c.," but only by the strength of the evidence, and the arguments of counsel in open court. If such a practice as that under consideration should be now authoritatively sanctioned by this court, or even for an instant tolerated, it is impossible to foresee the perversions of justice which may easily follow; and the common law and statutes referred to by Hawkins and Russell were intended to prevent all such irregularities by making all such offences indictable. Thirdly, I think that the delivery of these newspapers to the jury, whether by way of substitution for the perusal of the judge's notes, or in addition thereto, was, in fact, a gross contempt of court, and within the decisions of Lord Langdale in Littler v. Thompson, 2 Beav. 129, and of Lord Cottenham in Lechmere Charlton's case, 2 My. & Cr. 217, as an "attempt by private communication to influence the conduct of anyone invested with the duty of judicially disposing of matters pending in court," or "to obstruct the ordinary course of justice." I need scarcely point out that the delivery of these alleged reports, even though being open, and in court, or even by consent of the judge and of the parties, are circumstances not in the slightest degree altering the illegality of such conduct, as contrary to all judicial regularity and criminal procedure. Fourthly, I considered the decisions of the House of Lords in O'Connell's case, and of the Privy Council in Bertrand's case, as strongly directed against all such exceptional novelties in criminal procedure, being necessarily calculated to render trial by jury "a delusion, a mockery, and a snare," and "to interrupt the due and orderly administration of the law." Many other mischiefs, theoretical and practical, arising from the course adopted in this case, were pointed out by Mr. Pilcher as counsel for the prisoner, but the above were the chief grounds of my own judgment. I think it right to add, that the report in 6 S. C. R. 24 to 35, is very erroneous in many particulars.

Digitized by Google

Faucett, J.—The following is in substance what I said when giving judgment in this case: Having expressed my general concurrence in the observations made by the Chief Justice and Hargrave, J., I then said, I am of opinion that an irregularity has been committed, and the only question is how it ought to be remedied. The court cannot say that the matters improperly brought before the jury did not influence their minds. The irregularity complained of was allowed by the officer of the Crown who had charge of the jury, and the case is in this respect somewhat analogous to those cases in which evidence had been, without leave of the court, handed in to the jury by one of the parties or by the attorney of one of the parties; but, as I consider the act was an oversight on the part of the officer, I prefer to rest my decision on the general ground that what purported to be a report of the evidence had got improperly into the hands of the jury, by which their minds might have been prejudicially affected, and that this was an irregularity. And, on the whole, I consider that this irregularity having taken place out of court, and without the knowledge of the presiding judge, was, in effect, such a misconduct on the part of the jury as ought to render the verdict void; and that, in accordance with and in analogy to the authorities cited in 21 Viner's Abr., title "Trial" (G. g., 6 to 19), a venire de novo ought to be granted. I also think that the matter complained of ought to be set out on the record.

A suggestion in pursuance of the said rule absolute was thereupon entered upon the record, and an entry was also made on the said record that it had been ordered by the said court that the judgment on the said verdict should be vacated, and that the sheriff should cause a new jury to come for the trial of the issue joined upon the information aforesaid, and that the prisoner was remanded to the custody of such sheriff in order to take his trial on that information accordingly.

The appellant, Her Majesty's Attorney-General for the colony of New South Wales, afterwards presented a petition for special leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council against the said judgment of the 24th Sept. 1867, vacating the judgment on the said verdict, and awarding a venire de novo; and on the 29th Feb. 1868 Her Majesty in Council gave the appellant special leave to appeal (5 Moo. P. C. N. S 47), on the same conditions as were imposed in Attorney-General of New South Wales v. Bertrand, 4 Moo. P. C. N. S. 460.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., and Cohen, for the appellant.—The ordering—a venire facias de novo, under the above circumstances, was, in effect, granting a new trial. In R. v. Bertrand, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 752; 1 L. Rep. Priv. Co. 520, it was held that, according to the English law prevailing in New South Wales, the Supreme Court there has no power to grant a new trial in a case of felony. The previous case of R. v. Scaife, 17 Q. B. 238, in which a new trial, after conviction for felony at the assizes, was granted by the Court of Queen's Bench, was there examined and overruled. And in the present case a venire facias de novo could not be granted. The rule as to such writs is correctly laid down in Witham v. Lewis, 1 Wils. 55, where it is said, "a venire facias de novo can only be granted in one or other of these two cases; first, if it appear upon the face of the verdict that the verdict is so imperfect that no judgment can be given upon it; secondly, where it appears that the jury ought to have found other facts differently; and it cannot be granted in any any other case." See too

Davis v. Lucas, 2 T. R. 126, and note;
R. v. Huggins, 2 Str. 887; 2 Raym. 1585;
R. v. Keite, 1 Raym. 138; Viner's Ab., title "Trial," K. g. 3; K. g. 4 (1), (25); Hale's P. C. c. 42, p. 306;
R. v. Fowler, 4 B. & Ald. 273.

In the present case the matters relied upon for the issue of a venire facias de novo were not such as to warrant the court in awarding such a writ. The cases that will be probably relied on by the other side were before the courts in error or on appeal. But the Supreme Court in New South Wales had no jurisdiction in error or on appeal. The verdict was given by a jury duly empannelled, and there was nothing that amounted to a mis-trial.

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q.C.) and Archibald, for the respondent.—There was such a substantial miscarriage of justice in the course of the second trial, in allowing the jury the use of the newspapers, as to amount to a mis-trial. The jury ought only to be instructed by the strength of the evidence and the arguments of counsel in open court, and allowing them to read newspaper reports of the trial as it proceeds had a tendency to interfere with the due and orderly administration of justice. The case of R. v. Bertrand (ubi sup.) is no doubt a decision that there could be no new trial, but there is a clear distinction between a venire facias de novo and a new trial. The latter will be granted where any irregularity sufficient to avoid the trial appears on the record, and that whether the suggestion on the record was made before or after judgment. See Archbold's Crim. Pl. 16th edit. 165–8;

1 Chitty Cr. Law, 654;
Deacon Cr. Law, 1341.

Reference was also made to

R. v. Campbell, 1 Cox C. C. 269:
R. v. Yeadon, 1 Leigh & Cave, C. C. R. 81; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 329;
R. v. Mansell, 27 L. J. 4, Mag. Cas.;
R. v. Mellor, 1 D. & B. 408;
R. v. Winsor, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 289, 390; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195;
Leverson v. The Queen, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 394.

Sir R. Palmer replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 17.—Judgment was delivered by Sir W ERLE:—Upon this appeal it appears by the proceedings returned to this court that the prisoner Murphy was tried for murder at a session of oyer and terminer and gaol delivery for the month of September, before Mr. Justice Faucett, and was convicted and sentenced; and all the proceedings, as far as appeared, were regular in due form of law. Afterwards, an application on behalf of the prisoner upon an affidavit was made to the supreme court sitting in banco, in term, for a rule to show cause why a venire de novo should not issue for the trial of the said prisoner, and, upon further affidavits, the said rule was made absolute; and therein it was also ordered that a suggestion should be made on the record to the effect that after the jury had been empannelled, and before verdict, the jurors were allowed, during certain adjournments of the court for the night, by the officers of the sheriff having charge of them, to have access to and free perusal of certain newspapers containing reports of the evidence from day to day; and that the last-mentioned trial, by reason of the matters so suggested, was not according to law, but was irregular and void. This suggestion was followed by an entry, purporting to be an order, that, for the cause aforesaid, the judgment on the said verdict be vacated, and that the sheriff cause a jury anew to come. It farther appears by the same proceedings above referred to that the only affidavit giving judicial knowledge to the supreme court of the alleged irregularity in keeping the jurors was that of the attorney for the prisoner, who deposed "that he was informed by one of the jurors who acted on the said trial, and he verily believed, that after they had been empanelled to try the said case, and during their confinement at the hotel (where they were kept during adjournments), and before verdict, the jurors were allowed the free use of the newspapers of the day which contained reports of the aforesaid trial as far as it had gone, in one of which newspapers the heading given was the 'South Creek Murder Case.'" These are the proceedings in the courts below to which we think it necessary to advert as relevant to this appeal. Upon the argument in this court the question has been whether the above-mentioned order for vacating the judgment upon the verdict and for a venire de novo in order for another trial was valid, and their lordships have come to the conclusion that the answer should be in the negative, both on the ground which their lordships relied upon in the case of Reg. v. Bertrand (16 L. T. Rep., N.S., 752; L. Rep. 1, P. C., 520), and also on the further grounds stated below—1st. Their lordships consider that the present case is in substance an attempt, by the exercise of a discretion, to grant a new trial on the ground that the conviction was considered to be unsatisfactory by reason of some irregularity in the conduct of the trial. In Bertrand's case the irregularity was, that the evidence of the witnesses was read to the jury from the notes of the evidence on a former trial. Here the irregularity was in so keeping the jury during the course of the trial, as that the jurymen may have had access to some newspapers during that time; but the law is clear that the discretional power vested in certain courts and cases to grant new trials does not extend to cases of felony. The law on this subject was declared by their lordships in that case, and we consider that the law so declared governs the present case. Each of these cases falls within the rule that no person ought to be put in peril twice on the same charge. The application of the rule is shown in detail by Blackburn, J., in R. v. Winsor, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 313; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195, who there states, "When the jury have been brought together, and the prisoner has been given in charge, and the trial has commenced, the right course, if practicable, is that the jury should give their verdict convicting or acquitting the prisoner. When the jury have once found a verdict of conviction or acquittal, the matter has become res judicata, and after that there can be no further trial." He further shows that a venire de novo on the same indictment would be erroneous, and a new indictment on the same charge would be defeated by a plea of autrefois acquit or convict. These remarks relate to a verdict returned upon a good indictment for felony before a competent tribunal. Their Lordships cite this statement of the law to show the finality of a verdict upon a charge of felony when the indictment is good, and the prisoner has been given in charge to a jury, in due form of law empanelled, chosen, and sworn, and a verdict of conviction or acquittal has been returned. In the present case, if the prisoner should have been tried and convicted upon the venire de novo ordered to issue by the rule here appealed against, according to the passage just cited, a judgment thereon would be erroneous. The cases in which a verdict upon a charge of felony has been held to be a nullity and a venire de novo awarded have not been classified in the Digests; there are cases of defect of jurisdiction in respect of time, place, or person—cases of verdicts so insufficiently expressed or so ambiguous, that a judgment could not be founded thereon; but we have not discovered any valid authority for holding a verdict of conviction or acquittal in a case of felony delivered by a competent jury before a competent tribunal in due form of law to be a nullity by reason of some conduct on the part of the jury which the court considers unsatisfactory. As to the two supposed exceptions to this rule against new trial in cases of felony, R. v. Scaife, 17 Q. B. 238, was noticed in R. v. Bertrand, and the other case of R. v. Fowler and Johnson, 4 Barn. & Ald., was explained to be no decision in the course of the argument on this appeal. Secondly, the farther grounds for sustaining the present appeal beyond those expressed in the judgment in Bertrand's case relate both to the form of the proceeding in the Supreme Court when exercising appellate jurisdiction under which the rule appealed against was granted, and also to the sufficiency of the evidence on which that court acted in granting that rule. Their Lordships are not aware of any principle either of the law of England or of this colony by virtue whereof the Supreme Court, sitting in banco in term, could take cognisance as a court of appeal of the judgment pronounced by Faucett, J. at the session of oyer and terminer, which had come to an end before the session in banco began; and although the relation of the courts to each other in respect of appellate jurisdiction has not been ascertained by us with precision, still, whatever be that relation, we find no form of proceeding analogous to that which is required by the common law in proceedings when the aid of a court of error or appeal is invoked, but the form is the form adapted to an application to the discretion of the court for a new trial. Then as to the sufficiency of the evidence of the facts on which the court acted in granting the rule appealed against, their Lordships do not find any strictly legal evidence of any fact; they find nothing beyond an affidavit of mere hearsay information, obtained from a person who had been on the jury, but was then discharged; and this information, if admitted to judicial notice at all, showed possible access to newspapers, without showing that they contained matter which tended to influence the jury improperly, or that the jury ever did, as a matter of fact, read the newspapers. There is also the further objection that the supposed informant had been one of the jurymen, and the courts here have at times expressed a reluctance which we consider salutary against receiving the separate statements of any of the individuals who had in combination formed a jury, in order to impeach the verdict. The whole of the proceedings in the Supreme Court are referred to the Judicial Committee, and as their Lordships consider that the rule nisi for a new trial, and the rule absolute founded thereon, were each granted on insufficient grounds, both rules fail to produce any effect, and the conviction stands unimpeached thereby. We do not examine the authorities cited for the respondent, because none of them appear to us to sanction the notion that a verdict, even in a civil case, could be set aside upon an imagination of some wrong without any proof of reality. The suggestions upon which verdicts have been so set aside in civil cases have alleged traversable facts, material and relevant, to show that the verdict had actually resulted from improper influence, and we refer to the special verdict reported in 11 H. 4, f. 17, as affording an example of such facts as would, if stated in a suggestion on the record, have had the effect of setting aside the verdict. The case in the Year Book, 11 H, 4, 17, we translate as follows:—"The plaintiff in an assize had delivered an escrowment [writing to be used in case of need?] to a juryman on the panell, for evidence of his matter; and after the same juror, with others, had been sworn, and put into a house to agree on their verdict, he showed the writing to his companions, and the officer who kept the enquest showed this matter to the court, through which the justices took the writing from the jurors, and took their verdict; and by the examining ("per l'apposaile") of the jurors the time of the delivery of the writing was inquired into, and it was found (i.e., by the jurors) to be as above stated; and as the verdict was for the plaintiff, now he prayed judgment. Gascoigne and Hull said that the jury, after that they were sworn, ought not to see or carry with them any evidence, except that which was delivered to them by the court, and by the party put in court as the evidence shown; and inasmuch as they did the contrary, the plaintiff ought not to have judgment." This case, with the words of Gascoigne and Hull, has been frequently referred to in abridgments and treatises by Brooke, Rolle, Hale, Viner, and others; but the general words of those judges, as well as of judges in general, are to be limited in some degree by reference to the facts of the case in respect of which they were spoken, and the issue of this case is not altered by transcription. We take one reference to this case, as an example, from Bro. Ab. "Gen. Issue," p. 85, thus:—"After stating that an enquest must not take evidence privily, he adds, 'Et par Gascoigne et Hull s'ils preignent escrowe extra curiam et passent pur le plaintiff, si ceo appiert sur examination par le court, ceo est cause d'arrester le jugment:'" (11 H. 4, 17.) So that the result of the examination, viz., that the verdict was not "according to the evidence," but upon evidence taken out of court, from one party without the assent of the other, appeared by the finding of the jury, and was upon the record, as Brooke understands the case, or the judgment could not have been arrested. The special verdict here reported may be contrasted with the suggestion in the present case. In the case 11 H. 4, 17, the court which had jurisdiction both to try the suit and to arrest the judgment ascertained the fact of the misconduct of the plaintiff by examining the jurors, while acting as jurors, and by their verdict. Judicial knowledge from this source is in contrast with the affidavit above described. Also the interest of a plaintiff as a party may be contrasted with the supposed interest of the Queen (referred to in the judgment of the Chief Justice in the court below) in an indictment in which, although it runs in her name, she has no interest beyond that of truth and right. Neither is the sheriff her agent, as also there suggested; he emanates from the people, and is neither appointed by, nor can be dismissed by, nor is he paid by, the Queen; furthermore, the mere omission of his bailiffs to clear a room in an inn where jurors are confined, of the newspapers coming there by the course of the inn, is in contrast with the culpable craft of the plaintiff who prepared a statement of his case, and sought out a juryman into whom he probably infused a prejudice in his favour, and so influenced the verdict. In conclusion, their Lordships desire to add that they are sensible of the importance of guarding the channels for information through which the minds of the jury are led to their verdict, and concur with the learned judges of the court below in their zeal for the prevention of any such misconduct in future; but they think that the court was wrong in granting a new trial as a remedy for this misconduct, and that the mischief would be greater if uncertainty was introduced respecting the course to be pursued in administering the law relating to charges of felony. If irregularity occurs in the conduct of a trial not constituting a ground for treating the verdict as a nullity, the remedy to prevent a failure of justice is by application to the authority with whom rests the discretion either of executing the law or commuting the sentence. As there was, in the opinion of the court below, irregularity in the trial of the respondent sufficient to vacate the judgment, their Lordships have no doubt that, upon proper application on behalf of the respondent, which they recommend to be made, such weight will be give to these remarks as they may appear to deserve. But, as between the appellant and respondent, their Lordships will advise her Majesty that the appeal should be sustained without costs, and that the order for a new trial should be reversed.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Judgment reversed.

Agents for the appellant, Oliverson, Peachey, Denby, and Peachey.

Agents for the respondent, Solicitor to the Treasury.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by M. W. McKellar, and H. H. Hocking, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, Nov. 20.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

DURANT (app.) v. KENNETT (resp.)

Parliament—Borough vote—Corporation, occupation by member of—Occupation as owner or tenant—2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27.

In 1724 T. left certain real and personal property to trustees and their heirs in trust to make an annual allowance out of the proceeds thereof to each one of seven persons. These persons were to be disabled or superannuated lieutenants of the Royal Navy; they were to be appointed in a certain prescribed manner to receive this allowance, and as a vacancy occurred in their number it was to be filled up in the same manner. T. expressed it as his wish that these seven persons should be incorporated, and that power to hold lands should be given to such corporation; also that they should dwell together in one house to be provided for that purpose, live in a collegiate manner, dine at one table, conform to certain rules, and be in subordination to certain visitors.

In 1793 these seven persons were incorporated by a royal charter, and the charter was framed with a view to give effect to the above-mentioned wishes of T. Certain lands that had been devised by T. as aforesaid were then vested in fee simple in this corporation.

Among others there was a piece of ground in the borough of W., on which was erected a range of buildings which went by the name of T. college, and which formed seven separate dwelling-houses and a mess-house with offices attached; there was a colonnade in front of the houses, and a small lawn walled in with a gate opening on to a public highway. This building had been erected with a view to carrying out the above mentioned wishes of T.

In 1867 K. was duly appointed to fill a vacancy in this corporation, and by virtue of that appointment he went into occupation of one of the above-mentioned seven dwelling-houses, which he chose with the consent of the governor. He held this house for his life subject to his being expelled for certain causes. He was separately rated to the relief of the poor in respect of this house, while the corporation was rated in respect of the mess-house and the garden. He had fulfilled all conditions as to length of residence and payment of rates:

Held, that he did not occupy this house as owner or tenant within the meaning of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27.

Appeal from the revising barrister for New Windsor.

At a court held on Saturday, 23rd Oct., 1869, before the barrister appointed to revise the lists of voters for the borough of New Windsor, Benjamin Chandler Durant duly objected to the name of Edward Kennett, hereinafter called the respondent, being retained on the householders' list of voters for the parish of New Windsor, in the said borough.

The description of the respondent on the list was as follows:—

Name.	Place of abode.	Nature of qualification.	Street where property is situate.
Kennett, Edward.	Travers College.	House.	Travers College.

The respondent occupied during the qualifying period one of seven houses known as Travers' College, each of which was numbered and separately rated to the poor-rate, and he had paid all poor-rates that had become payable by him in respect of the said premises.

The respondent was one of the seven naval knights of Windsor, who were incorporated by Royal Charter, bearing date 23rd June, in the 38th year of the reign of King George the Third, by the name of "The Poor Knights of Windsor," of the foundation of Samuel Travers, Esq.

By stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 116, s. 4, it was enacted that "the said poor knights shall henceforth be styled Naval Knights." By the said charter (which may be referred to as if it were part of this case), after reciting that Samuel Travers, Esq., deceased, by his last will and testament, in writing, dated 16th July, 1724, gave, devised, and bequeathed all his real and personal estate unto his executors and their heirs, upon trust, out of the rents and profits, to settle an annuity or yearly sum of 60*l.*, to be paid to each and every one of seven gentlemen to be added to the then eighteen Poor Knights of Windsor, the said annuities to be charged upon an estate of 500*l.* per annum, to be purchased and set apart for that purpose, in the county of Essex, and that the said testator humbly prayed that the said seven gentlemen might be incorporated by charter, with a clause enabling them to purchase and hold lands in mortmain, and that a building, the charges thereof to be defrayed out of his personal estate, might be erected or purchased in or near the Castle of Windsor for a habitation for the said seven gentlemen, who were to be superannuated or disabled lieutenants of English men-of-war; but the repairs were to be in the first place paid out of the said estate of 500*l.* per annum, and then 12*l.* per annum to be applied to the governor or senior of the seven, and the remainder to be equally divided between him and the other six; and that the said testator desired that the seven gentlemen so to be incorporated might be single men without children, inclined to lead a virtuous, studious, and devout life, to be removed if they should give occasion for scandal; and that the said testator declared his mind to be that they should live in a collegiate manner, in order whereunto he would have 26*l.* a year deducted out of their several allowances to keep a constant table; and that the said testator appointed the chief Governor of Windsor Castle, the Dean of Windsor, and the Provost of Eton College to be visitors, with power for them, or any two of them, to act, and that as often as any vacancy should happen, the said testator desired they might be thus supplied: the Commissioners of the Royal Navy to choose three lieutenants for each vacancy, out of which the Lord High Admiral, or the Commissioners of the Admiralty for the time being, to choose two, and the King's Majesty to nominate one of them. And that by an order of the Court of Chancery, bearing date the 26th July 1793, in a certain cause pending in the said court, proposals for setting apart a part of the said testator's estates in the county of Essex for the purpose of making a provision for the support and maintenance of the said seven gentlemen to be added to the eighteen poor knights of Windsor, instead of purchasing an estate for that purpose; and also the purchasing a piece of ground at Windsor wherein to erect a habitation for the said seven gentlemen, and the erecting such new buildings thereon would be a proper execution of the trusts and directions in the testator's will respecting the same; the seven persons therein named and their successors, to be elected and nominated in the manner prescribed in and by the last will and testament the said Samuel Travers, were constituted one body corporate and politic by the name of "the poor knights of Windsor of the foundation of Samuel Travers, Esq., "and by that name were to have a perpetual succession and a common seal with capacity to receive and hold for the ends and purposes of their institution the land or ground to be purchased for the purpose of erecting a house or building for their habitation, and that the house or building to be erected thereon, as well as the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, in the county of Essex, to be appropriated and set apart under the direction of the Court of Chancery for their support and maintenance in such manner and under and subject to such conditions, restrictions, and regulations as the Court of Chancery should direct. The charter further ordained that there should be a governor of the said corporation, viz., the senior of the lieutenants, members of the corporation, according to their rank in the Royal Navy, and that the Chief Governor of Windsor Castle, the Dean of Windsor, and the provost of Eton College for the time being, or any two of them, should be visitors of the said corporation, and that the said seven knights and their successors should observe and obey the rules, orders, and regulations thereinafter contained, and such further rules, orders, and regulations as the king, his heirs or successors, should at any future time make for the better government of the said knights, or the better carrying the intentions of the founder into execution, and as the Court of Chancery should also make or declare in further ance of the will of the said Samuel Travers.

The charter further ordained that the said seven knights and their successors should lead virtuous, studious, and devout lives, and should daily attend divine service in the chapel in Windsor Castle, and should live together in a collegiate manner in the house or building to be erected for their residence, and keep their table together in their common hall, and that such table should be provided out of their common stock or purse; and that they should not go away from and leave their said house, and absent themselves therefrom for more than ten days in any one year without a licence first obtained for that purpose from the said visitors upon reasonable cause, and that during their residence at their said house they should not lie out of their respective apartments, nor haunt the town, the alehouses, or taverns; and that the governor of the said seven knights for the time being should have the care and custody of their common seal, and that the other six should be obedient to the governor, and all the seven should be obedient to the said visitors in the observance of the rules, orders, and regulations therein contained, and of all others which the king, his heirs, and successors, should thereafter make for their orderly behaviour and government.

The charter further ordained that the said visitors should once in every year appoint a day and hour at which the said seven knights and their successors should be warned to be present, and should cause the rules, orders, and regulations to be read to them, and that if any of them should neglect to attend, not having leave of absence from the said visitors, or should offend against the said rules, orders, and regulations, it should be lawful for the said visitors to impose a reasonable fine or penalty; and in case the offence should seem to require such punishment, it should be lawful for them to give a solemn warning to the offender not to offend again in the like manner; and he that should have been twice so warned should, upon the third offence, be expelled or removed by the said visitors; and that if any knight should refuse or neglect to pay any fine or penalty, he should be liable to be expelled or removed by the said visitors. And that the said visitors should also have full power to expel or remove any of the said seven knights and their successors, who should marry or give occasion for scandal, or who might be convicted of felony or any notable crime; and that the said seven knights and their successors should, before they were let into possession of the apartments to be erected for them, take their oaths that, during the time of their continuing such knights, they would observe, conform to, and keep all the rules, orders, and regulations contained in those presents, and such other rules, orders, and regulations as should thereafter be made as aforesaid.

By indenture of bargain and sale bearing date the 26th June 1799 (approved by the master and enrolled in the Court of Chancery), Henry Emlyn conveyed a messuage or tenement with the garden and ground thereunto belonging situate in Datchet-lane, near Windsor Castle, in the parish of New Windsor, to the said poor knights and their successors for the ends and purposes of their institution, and subject to such orders and regulations as the said Court of Chancery should from time to time make concerning the same.

The college, which was erected on the ground so conveyed, consists of a range of buildings forming seven dwelling-houses, containing three apartments each, viz., kitchen, sitting, and bedroom, and a mess-house with kitchens and other offices at the back. There is a colonnade in front of the houses, and a small lawn walled in with a gate opening into Datchet-lane, now called Datchet-road.

The mess-house is separately rated to the poor-rate, and the rates payable in respect of it are paid out of the common fund of the college. Each knight keeps the house which he occupies in repair.

In the year 1867 the respondent was appointed by royal warrant to supply a vacancy, and by virtue of that appointment, he went into occupation of a vacant house in the said college, which he chose, with the consent of the governor. This is the house which he now occupies, and he holds it for his life subject to his being expelled or removed for any of the causes above stated.

The respondent claimed to have his name retained upon the said list on the ground that he was the inhabitant occupier as owner of the said house, and relied on Fryer (app.) v. Bodenham (resp.), 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 645; 38 L. J. 185, C. P.; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 156. It was objected that the ownership of the said house was in the corporation aggregate, and not in each member of it separately, and Heath (app.), v. Haynes (resp.), 5 C. B., N. S., 389; 27 L. J. 50, C. P. was cited.

The revising barrister held that the respondent was the inhabitant occupier of the said house as owner, and retained his name on the said list.

If the court should be of opinion that the respondent was the inhabitant occupier of the said house as owner, his name was to be retained, otherwise, his name was to be expunged.

H. James, Q. C. for the appellant.—The respondent is not the owner of these premises at all, and does not occupy personally. His occupation is merely the occupation of the corporation aggregate. He occupies solely by virtue of his being a member of such a corporation. The claim was that he occupied as either owner or tenant. It is clear that he could not be said to occupy as tenant; the only question then is whether he occupies as owner. The case of Fryer v. Bodenham, L. Rep. 4, C. P. 529; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 645, on the authority of which this question was decided by the revising barrister, has nothing at all to do with this case. This case falls within Heath v. Haynes, 27 L. J. 50, C. P. [BRETT, J.—But why need he be actually either owner or tenant? Is it not sufficient that he occupies as if owner or tenant?] Even if he has an estate in this house other than that which he has as a member of a corporation, he has no right to a vote. Here there is no contract between him and the corporation, and he pays no rent. The respondent holds so long only as he obeys the rules which the king or his successors may lay down. He cited

Heartley v. Banks, 28 L. J. 144, C.P.; K. & G. 219;
Bridgewater v. Durant 31 L. J. 46, C. P.; K. & G. 377;
Fryer v. Bodenham., 38 L. J. 185, C. P.; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 645; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 529;
Davies v. Waddington, 7 M. & G. 37; 14 L. J. N. S. 45, C. P.
Simpson v. Wilkinson, 7 M. & G. 50; 14 L. J., N. S., 49, C. P.; 1 Lutw. 168;
Roberts v. Percival, 34 L. J. 84, C. P.

H. Matthews, Q. C. for the respondent.—It is a fallacy to assume that a man must be actually owner or tenant in order to claim the franchise; the words "as owner or tenant" are merely descriptive of the nature of the occupation. If a man occupied a house in the character of owner, without any title at all, that would be sufficient to give him a right to a borough vote. The naval knights have not the legal estate, it is true; but they have an equitable estate for life in their houses. [BOVILL, C. J.—All the cases in which members of a corporation have been held to have no title to a vote are those in which no trust is imposed on the corporation for their benefit. But when a trust is imposed on a corporation to demise its property to its members, the members then have a right to a vote. Still, in order to succeed, you must either distinguish the present case from Heath v. Haynes (ubi sup.), or else say that that case has been overruled.] The distinction between that case and the present is that there the occupation was precarious, while here it is not. The occupation is different in point of fact. [BOVILL, C. J.—I see that by the rules the knights are to be obedient to the visitors. What, then, is there to prevent the visitors from making a rule making all the knights change rooms?] The occupation here is not precarious, but permanent, though according to rules: (Beeson v. Burton, 12 C. B., N. S. 247; 2 Lutw. 225; 22 L. J. 83, C. P.) We must get rid of the notion that it is impossible for a corporator, qua corporator, to have a vote. It is true I have not found any case in which a member of a corporation has been allowed a vote qua member, but Davies v. Waddington (ubi sup.) is very near. It is not necessary for a borough vote that a man should have even an equitable estate; mere occupation is sufficient: (Rogers on Elect., 10th edit., p. 50, note.) [BOVILL, C. J.—I thought that in Roberts v. Percival (ubi sup.) it was admitted on all hands that a member of a corporation as such had no right to a vote.] The question there was whether the eleemosynary character of the occupation did not disentitle. [BRETT, J.—How do you distinguish this case from Heartley v. Banks (ubi sup.)?] There there was no finding of a permanent tenure. The obedience exacted from the knights was general and unqualified, whereas here it is limited to the rules. He cited also

Baxter v. Brown, 7 M. & G. 198;
Bligh v. Brent, 2 Y. & C. 268;
Bennett v. Blain, 15 C. B., N. S., 518; 33 L. J. 63, C. P.;
Roberts v. Percival (ubi sup.),
Simpson v. Wilkinson (ubi sup.);
Heath v. Haynes (ubi sup.).

H. James, Q.C. in reply.—All the authorities show that a member of a corporation, as such, cannot claim a vote in respect of the corporate property:

Vin. Ab., tit. "Corporation;"
Heywood's County Election, 2nd edit., p. 115;
A Resolution of the House of Commons, A.D. 1624, p. 798 of the first Journal of the House;
May on Elections, 268;
Acland v. Lewis, 30 L. J. 31, C. P.;
Roberts v. Percival (ubi sup.)

Next it is contended that, even if that proposition cannot be maintained, still here a second estate has been created, in respect of which Mr. Kennett can claim a vote. But is it pretended that he could go to a court of equity and compel the governor to allow him to remain in a particular house. He has a right to occupy one of the seven houses, but no right to any particular house. [WILLES, J.—The question here is whether the corporation has created a distinct estate in the corporator.]

BOVILL, C. J.—The question for us to decide is, whether the claimant, Mr. Kennett, is entitled, as the occupier of a house which he occupies either as owner or tenant, to a vote for the borough of New Windsor. It was contended on his behalf before the revising barrister, that the case fell within the principle of the case of Fryer v. Bodenham (ubi sup.), while on the other hand it was objected that the case of Heath v. Haynes, 27 L. J. 50, C. P., was decisive against the claim. With regard to the cases cited on behalf of the respondent before the revising barrister, I may remark that in neither of them was the claimant a member of a corporate body. In each case, there was an independent body of trustees who held for the bedesmen in the one case and the brethren in the other. In those cases, the facts which raised that state of things were expressly found. The present case, however, is one in which there is a corporation aggregate, of which the claimant is a member. The corporation is one in the nature of a collegiate establishment of an eleemosynary character, where certain property is held by the corporation for the purposes of the corporation and for the benefit of its members. The original constitution of the charity contemplated the occupation of one house for the general benefit of the members. Subsequently, however, the institution was incorporated, and the corporation purchased a range of buildings forming several houses, which houses were assigned to the different members, one to each. The houses were thus assigned merely for the more convenient enjoyment of the property by the members of the corporate body. There is no instance where the individual members of a corporation have been held entitled to a vote in respect of the property of the corporation that may be held by them. From the earliest times we find decisions of the House of Commons against such a claim. It is perfectly true, as Mr. Matthews has contended, that the precise point before the court did not then arise, as in those cases the claim was to a vote for the county, and not to a borough vote. Still the general principle is distinct enough. In earlier times a higher qualification was required for a county vote than is now necessary; still those cases must be regarded, because the question was, equally then as now, whether the claimant was in occupation of the land as either owner or tenant. And in all cases where he was held to be the owner, the only test was the value of the lands so held. Thus in earlier cases relating to a dean and chapter, it was held that the dean was not entitled to a vote for his house, because it was a part of the estate of the corporation, and this notion has prevailed in the later cases. There are other cases of a similar character where the members of a corporation holding corporate property were held not entitled to a vote. The latest case decided on this point was the case of Heath v. Haynes (ubi sup.) In that case the brethren were incorporated; they had separate residences and exclusive occupation of the property assigned to them. Still they were held to be not entitled to a vote, in accordance with the previous decisions. The ownership of the property was held to be in the corporation, and not in the members. This and that individual member was not considered to occupy either as owner or tenant, but his occupation was the occupation of the corporation in the person of its members. The law was clearly laid down in that case, and the present case has not been distinguished from it. That this case is still law is shown by the more recent decision in the case of Roberts v. Percival, 34 L. J. 84, C. P., the case of the bedesmen of Lord Burleigh's Hospital. In 1844, it had been decided that they were entitled to a vote. Between that time, however, and 1864 certain transactions took place, on which it was contended that, assuming the legal origin of the foundation, if the claimants had any estate it was only as members of a corporation aggregate, and that these very transactions led to this conclusion. These fresh facts were laid before the revising barrister, and it was contended that it must be assumed that the bedesmen occupied solely as members of the corporation. As to this point, Erle, C. J. said: "In Simpson v. Wilkinson (ubi sup.), this court was then of opinion that the inmates of Burleigh Hospital had a freehold interest in the rooms assigned to them, and I am of opinion now that the inmates of that hospital have a freehold interest in the rooms assigned to them, and that they are entitled to vote. The origin of the hospital is unknown; but in Simpson v. Wilkinson, 7 M. & G. 50, the court were of opinion that the revising barrister might presume that the hospital was established before the 39 Eliz. c. 5, and that it had been created and endowed by Lord Burleigh, by granting the land to feoffees in trust for the members of that hospital. Now it seems to me that the parties taking under such an endowment would have all the rights of property given by the terms of the feoffment, and they might have all the property in the shape of an equitable freehold, just as a corporation for charitable purposes under the 39 Eliz. c. 5 might have, only that in the case of such corporation the whole of the property would be vested in the corporation, and the members would not, by reason of their membership, be qualified. The majority of the hospitals are now incorporated, and that is why there is an end of any question about the members of such hospitals having a right to vote. But if the lands be conveyed to feoffees in trust for the inmates of the hospital, then the legal interest would be in the feoffees and the equitable interest in the members of the hospital, and that equitable interest would be according to the terms of the deed; and where the deed is lost, the terms of it would be presumed from the way in which the property has been enjoyed." In that case as here, each member was put into a room for life. That being so, instead of saying that in this case each member has an estate for life in the house assigned to him, the charter of the corporation is set out. The case further states that in 1867 the respondent was appointed one of the naval knights, "and by virtue of that appointment he went into occupation of a vacant house in the said college, which he chose with the consent of the governor." If the case merely stated that and no more, we might come to a different conclusion. But we must judge from the whole of the facts; and these facts clearly show that the naval knights lived in their houses only as members of the corporation. That is a matter of fact found by the revising barrister. Under these circumstances, it seems to me impossible to distinguish this case from those of Heartley v. Banks, and Heath v. Haynes (ubi sup.), the doctrine laid down in which was fully confirmed by the judgment of Erle, C. J., in Roberts v. Percival (ubi sup.) There is no authority for saying that the members of such a corporation occupying under such circumstances, have a right to vote. But then it is contended, that in this case the corporation holds its property in trust for its members, and that they have each a right to their houses independently of the corporation. But in a case where the property is vested in an independent body of trustees, in trust to allow certain persons to occupy, subject to certain known rules, that is not such an occupation as to entitle these persons to a vote; though where the rules, subject to which the tenements are occupied, are not known, the case may be different. Without dealing any further with the authorities, what is the character of the occupation in these eleemosynary cases? The eleemosynary character does not necessarily deprive the occupier of a vote, still it is an important feature in the character of the occupation. In the case of Freeman v. Gainsford, 11 C. B., N. S., 68; 31 L. J. 33, C. P., the property was vested in trustees; the claimant was a member of the charity and occupied rooms subject to the rules of the hospital. It was, however, held that the claimant had no estate in his chambers, but that he was simply an object of charity. At p. 92 of 11 C. B., N. S., Williams, J. says: "The occupier of a residence as part of the benefits of a charitable institution is not entitled to an estate of freehold therein, unless the founder has expressly assigned it to him directly or indirectly during his life. . . . I assume that there is sufficient to show that the claimant would have a freehold interest in the rooms allotted to him if he had any property in them. But the question is whether he has any property. I am of opinion that he has none. The language of the constitutions simply is, that the accommodation provided for the recipients of the charity shall be regulated in a certain way. They are to take for their lives, subject to removal for any of the offences specified. But it does not therefore follow that the particular rooms are to be assigned to each of them as owner for his life. It seems to me clear that he has not the right of an equitable owner at all. If he had, although the purposes of the charity might require him to be removed to another set of rooms, he might set the governor at defiance. It is quite manifest that no such state of things as that could have been intended. It is simply the case of a number of persons placed on a charitable foundation, who by the regulations of the charity are entitled to be properly and reasonably accommodated with chambers to live in, and other allowances." Although these words apply to a county vote, yet the principle as to the character of the occupation is the same, and they show that the respondent here cannot claim as either owner or tenant of his rooms. Then again Bridgewater v. Durant, K. & G. 377; 31 L. J. 46, C. P. was decided on the ground that the claimant had not shown that he had a sufficient occupation, either as owner or tenant; and in Hall v. Lewis, 11 C. B., N.S., 114; K. & G. 499, it was held that the claimant was not entitled to a vote. In Heartley v. Banks, 28 L. J. 144, C. P.; K. & G. 219, it was held that the military knights had no title to a vote. The military knights were not a corporation; the legal estate was in the dean and canons of Windsor. A separate house was assigned to each knight, and exclusive possession given; but it was held that these knights occupied by royal charity, and nothing more. They were subject to any regulations that might be made by the dean and canons. It was held that they did not occupy as either owners or tenants, but were mere recipients of charity. The same reasons apply here in determining the character of the occupation. In all these cases the members occupy in severalty only by private arrangement among themselves and for their general convenience. As to the case of Beeson v. Burton, 12 C. B. 647; 22 L. J. 33, C. P.; 2 Lutw. 223, it was decided on the same grounds as Roberts v. Percival (ubi sup.). The claimant here is a member of a corporation aggregate. The corporation is owner of the fee simple, and there is no estate in the members. The corporation occupies its houses by its members. These members are bound to live in a collegiate manner and are removable for misconduct. They have no estate in their houses. They do not occupy them either as owners or tenants, but simply as members of the corporation. The case falls within that of Heath v. Haynes (ubi sup.). As to the character of their occupation, it is the same as that of the military knights. In this case there is, in a certain sense, an occupation by the members, but it is the occupation by the corporation as owners of the property, and there is no occupation by the members individually. The undergraduates at the universities have exclusive possession of the rooms assigned to them, but they have no vote in respect of them. The same remark applies to persons resident in almshouses. In this case then the respondent has no equitable estate for life and no occupation as owner; he does not occupy in either character. On these grounds I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister was wrong, and that it must be reversed.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. When the principle on which these cases are decided is borne in mind, the conclusion is inevitable, that Mr Kennett is not entitled to a vote. That principle is, that a corporation aggregate has no vote. That is the plain rule; and, though it is true that a member of a corporate body may have a distinct estate, or that a tenure may exist between the corporate body and the individual, or there may be a distinct right in the member, we must be satisfied, before we come to any such conclusion, that such a state of things has been created by some means known to the law. If, however, we strain facts for the purpose of making ing them fit into the similitude of a tenure, we shall find that we enable a corporation to do indirectly what the law does not enable it to do directly. It is not our duty to do that. We must look at the facts of the case and remember, that prima facie the property of a corporation is occupied by the members in their corporate capacity, and the ownership is not distributed among the individual members who at a given time happen to enjoy particular parts of the corporate property. As to the question of ownership and tenure, so long as the member of a corporation enjoys corporate property for the purposes for which the corporation exists, the prima facie presumption is that his enjoyment is that of the corporation itself. Let us then apply these principles to the present case. The fact mainly relied on by the respondent for the purpose of showing that he has a distinct ownership or tenure in his house is, that he was "appointed by royal warrant to supply a vacancy, and by virtue of that appointment he went into occupation of a vacant house in the said college, which he chose with the consent of the governor. This is the house which he now occupies, and he holds it for his life, subject to his being expelled or removed for any of the causes above mentioned." On this finding he rests his claim to be considered to have an equitable estate for life in his house. He does not pretend that he occupies as tenant; and it is plain that he could not do so. I quite agree that, if this statement stood alone, that a man holds lands for life subject to good behaviour, that would amount to an equitable estate for life. There may be something in the charter which may render it impossible for us to consider it an estate for life. But let us assume that there is nothing, and that Mr. Kennett actually has an equitable estate for life in his house; but then can we say that he holds an equitable estate in the technical sense in which this word "hold" is used by lawyers? What do we mean when we say that a man holds an estate; do we mean that he possesses it by benevolence, or as of right? It is clearly to be taken in the latter sense, so that the question becomes whether Mr. Kennett holds an equitable estate for life in his house as of his own right. To determine this question it becomes necessary to look to the history of this foundation. It appears that in the year 1728 a person left certain property for the purpose of making provision for seven superannuated or disabled lieutenants of the royal navy. I am far from thinking that the eleemosynary character of the foundation is unimportant; still, for the purposes of my decision, I omit this circumstance. The naval knights have a right to share in the property left by the founder of this charity. The founder made provision for the common habitation of the knights. They were to live together in a collegiate manner. For a long time the institution had no house of its own; but in the year 1793 the charity was brought before the Court of Chancery, when an order was made by which new buildings were directed to be built for the habitation of the recipients of the founder's charity. It had been the wish of the testator that the knights should be incorporated. Accordingly, at the time I am speaking of, they were constituted a corporation by royal charter. This charter is even more express than the founder's will as to their living together in one house, as their common residence, and in a collegiate manner. Thus the intention plainly was that the corporaton should be of a collegiate character. It was not contemplated that each house should become the exclusive property of its occupier; nor on the other hand can it be pretended that in this case the singuli enjoy the universitas. The charter goes on to provide that the knights shall not lie out of their apartments, and that they shall be subject to certain rules. It provides for the appointment of visitors. The knights were liable to be expelled on certain occasions, so that in this respect the property was enjoyed by them in the same manner as property is enjoyed by a woman, to whom it is left for her to possess it so long as she remains chaste. What is the result when a person holds property under such circumstances? My answer to this question I have, in order to be precise, put into writing. It is (the learned judge here read what he had written) that the naval knights have no such exclusive or permanent right in or to their houses as to constitute a several property or occupation, any more than if, besides using a common hall, they used also a common dormitory. The system of appropriation is not a strict right, only for convenience, founded on usage not amounting to prescription or habitual mode of enjoying the corporate property without a transfer of ownership or the creation of a term. As to ownership, that remains in the corporation; as to tenure, each of the knights, by allotment or by the consent of the trustee—which is not a mode of creating a tenancy, and does not make the knight a tenant in any sense either legal or popular—occupies a certain place which it is usual and decent to allow him to occupy during good behaviour. There is no occupation either as owner or tenant. On these grounds I think the claim must be disallowed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, and concur entirely with the reasons given by my brother Willes. I think that Mr Kennett occupies simply and solely as a member of the corporation, in pursuance of the purposes set forth in the charter. Mr Matthews has not been able to find any case in which it has been held that the members of a corporation occupying houses under circumstances like the present, have been entitled to a vote. The principle which would prevent their being so entitled applies to a county vote: but it has been extended by resolution to the case of burgesses. In addition to that, there is an express decision of this court in the case of Heath v. Haynes (ubi sup.). Mr Matthews cannot show any substantial distinction between that case and the present. The two cases may differ in some minute details; but there is no substantial distinction between thm. It seems to me impossible to say that the claimant here is entitled to a vote without overruling the case of Heath v. Haynes (ubi sup.). On these grounds, and on the grounds set forth by my brother Willes, and my Lord, in which I entirely agree, I am of opinion that Mr Kennett is not entitled to a vote for the borough of New Windsor, and that the decision of the revising barrister must be reversed.

BRETT, J.—I think that the claimant in this case is not entitled to a vote, because he occupies solely as a member of a corporation aggregate, and therefore the nature of his occupation is not that of either an owner or a tenant. When that is said, there is to my mind an end of the case; but it further appears that certain trustees have powers of management in this institution, so that this case is precisely similar to the cases of Heath v. Haynes (ubi sup.), and Heartley v. Banks (ubi sup.). The authority of these cases has never been impeached, much less overruled. In the case of Davies v. Waddington, 7 M. & G. 37; and 14 L. J. 45, C. P., the claim was to a county vote; but there it was held that the members of a corporation had not an equitable freehold in the estates of the corporation, because they were removable from their houses at the discretion of the prinicpal and the governors. In the case of Heath v. Haynes (ubi sup.) the claim was to a borough vote; there it was held that the claimants did not occupy either as owners or tenants, but that the corporation occupied in the persons of its members. In Heartley v. Banks (ubi sup.) the claimant was a member of a charitable foundation of which certain trustees had a discretionary power of management. There Cockburn, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the court said: "We are of opinion that the characteristics of ownership are wanting; that the occupation is only as subordinate to the purposes of a charity and subject to the immediate control of the principal of the institution." In Freeman v. Gainsford (ubi sup.) the claim was to a county vote. The institution of which the claimant was a member was not a corporation, but the property was vested in trustees, who had also powers of management. The present case falls within the decision in Heartley v. Banks (ubi sup). I do not think that the claimant can be said to have an equitable freehold in his house. He occupies it solely for the purposes of the charity, so that the case of Simpson v. Wilkinson, 7 M. & G. 50, and 14 L. J., N. S., 49, C. P., does not apply. In the latter case the claim was to a county vote; but the bedesmen were not members of a corporation, and the revising barrister was upheld in his decision that they were entitled to an equitable freehold. In Roberts v. Percival, 34 L. J. 84, C. P., the facts were very similar to those in Simpson v. Wilkinson (ubi sup.). Neither of these cases, however, overrules Heath v. Haynes (ubi sup.). In the case of Fryer v. Bodenham, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 529; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 645, all the judges agree in saying that they do not pretend to overrule the case of Heath v. Haynes. They said that there was evidence of the claimants having a freehold for life, and therefore that the case fell within that of Simpson v. Wilkinson and Roberts v. Percival (ubi sup.). The judges distinguished these cases from that of Heartley v. Banks (ubi sup.), but expressly said that they were not to be understood as overruling it. I am of opinion that the present case falls within that of Heath v. Haynes (ubi sup.), and if not, that it must be governed by Heartley v. Banks (ubi sup.). On these grounds I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister must be reversed.

Decision reversed.

Attorney for appellant, Thos. Durrant.

Attorney for respondent, Jno. Taylor, jun., for C. T. Phillips, Windsor.

Saturday, Nov. 20

FORD (app.) v. HARINGTON (resp.).

Borough vote—Corporation—Dean and chapter—Canon —2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27.

H. as a canon of E. was a member of the dean and chapter of E. On his appointment to the canonry he was put into possession of a house the property of the dean and chapter of E. This house he held for his life in right of his canonry.

Held, that H. occupied this house as owner within the meaning of 2 Will. 4, c. 45 s. 27.

Upon an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for the city of Exeter, the following case was stated for the opinion of the court:—

At a court held on the 21st Oct., 1869, before me, the revising barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the city of Exeter, Brutton John Ford duly objected to the name of the Rev. Edward Charles Harington being retained upon the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of members for the said city, as well in respect of his ownership of a freehold house situate in the precinct of the close within the said city as of his occupation of the same house.

The name of the said Edward Charles Harington appeared upon the freeholders' and occupiers' list respectively as follows:

Harington, Rev. Edward Charles	The Close Exeter	Freehold House	The Close.

Harington, Rev. Edward Charles	The Close Exeter	House	The Close.

The facts proved were these: The Rev. Edward Charles Harington is one of the canons residentiary of the cathedral church of St. Peter, in Exeter, and his qualifying property is the residentiary house belonging to him in respect of his canonry.

The dean and chapter of the said cathedral are a corporation aggregate, consisting of the dean and five residentiary canons, and sixteen non-residentiary prebendaries.

There are five canons who are appointed for life, and five houses which the canons are entitled to occupy, and with their enjoyment of which the chapter as a body cannot interfere.

On the election of a canon he produces the key of the house occupied by his predecessor, and prays to be admitted. As one of the canons he is elected and decreed to be installed, and thereupon takes possession of his house. No evidence was produced to show how he got the key. The senior canon has the right of occupying the vacant house if he chooses, and that might have been exercised. Each canon must reside three months, and each canon repair his house outside and in at his own expense.

At one time there were more canons and houses than there are now. For some years two of the canons, Canon Martin and Canon Butt, occupied the same house during their respective residences. The canonical residences on the suppression of the canonries were let and the rents paid into the common fund of the chapter. The present canons have occupied the houses in which they are now living ever since their appointments.

The questions for my decision were:

1. Whether the said Edward Charles Harington was entitled to such an estate or interest of freehold in his said residentiary house as entitled him to vote. 2. Whether he occupied the same house as owner or tenant.

I decided both questions in the affirmative, and retained the name of the said Edward Charles Harington both on the freeholders' and occupiers' list.

If the court should be of opinion that the first question was wrongly decided, the name of the said Edward Charles Harington will be expunged from the freeholders' list, and if of opinion that the second question was wrongly decided, his name shall be expunged from the occupiers' list.

Kingdon, Q.C., for the appellant.—The recent case of Durant v. Kennett (vide preceding case) and the case of Heath v. Haynes, 27 L. J. 50, C. P., show conclusively that Mr. Harington's claim cannot be maintained.

Philpotts for the respondent.—A canon is no doubt, as such, a member of the dean and chapter, and has a share in the property belonging to that corporation aggregate; at the same time he is also a corporation sole, and is capable of holding property as such. The finding of the revising barrister is decisive in favour of this claim, for Mr Harington is found to occupy this house, "which belongs to him in right of his canonry." The recent case of Durant v. Kennett (ubi sup.) does not go beyond the case of Heath v. Haynes (ubi sup.) Both those cases are plainly distinguishable from the present, as in them the occupation of the claimants was adjudged to be the occupation of the corporation aggregate to which they respectively belonged, whereas here, although

Digitized by Google

Mr Harington as a canon is a member of a corporation aggregate, he holds this house in right of his canonry, that is to say, in his own right as a corporation sole. A canon, as canon, has duties wholly distinct from his position in the dean and chapter. The corporation aggregate of the dean and chapter has no spiritual duties, it is only a council for the bishop, to consent to and confirm his acts, whereas a canon has to preach. A canon holds his house for life, and the dean and chapter have no right to interfere with his enjoyment of it. If he leaves it in a dilapidated condition his successor has a right of action against his personal representatives. [WILLES, J.—That doctrine was extended to the case of a vicar choral in Greaves v. Parfitt, 7 C. B., N. S.] He cited

Randolph v. Milman, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 60; L. Rep. 4 Ex. Ch. C. P. 111;
Com. Dig., tit. "Eccles Persons;"
Churton v. Frewin, 16 L. T. Rep. N.S. 171; L. Rep. 2 Eq. 634;
Dr. Sand's Case, Skinner, 121;
The Case of the Dean and Chapter of Norwich, 3 Co. 72 b;
The Case of Sutton's Hospital, 10 Co., 23 a;
3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, s. 59.

Kingdon, Q.C., (in reply).—True that Mr Harington is found to hold this house in respect of his canonry, but as canon he is a member of the corporation aggregate, and accordingly, that finding of the revising barrister is not conclusive of this question. It is consistent with that finding that Mr Harington holds his house in respect of his membership in the dean and chapter. There are many authorities to show that this is the true view to take of his position: (Rogers on Elections, p. 30, citing Middlesex cases, 2 Peck. 113.) The 50th sect. of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, certainly recognises the possibility of a dean or canon holding property as such dean or canon, and in addition to his share in the corporate resources of the dean and chapter; but it expressly provides that all such separate property shall vest in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The formalities which a canon at Exeter has to go through before he gets possession of his house show that the ownership of the corporation is distinctly recognised. Moreover, on a vacancy, the senior canon may take the vacant house if he chooses; thus the whole property is floating about, and is the general property of the dean and chapter [Brett, J.: Would the personal representatives of a canon be liable to his successor if the house were left in a dilapidated state?] I think not. In Greaves v. Parfitt, 29 L. J. 216 C. P.; and 7 C. B., N.S. 838, the vicar choral had been expressly collated by the bishop, and had a house of residence attached to his office. He cited also:

Com. Dig. tit. "Eccles. Persons;" cc. 3 and 4.
Cripps on Church and Clergy, 5th edit., p. 118.

BOVILL, C. J.—The respondent, as one of the dean and chapter of Exeter, is a member, no doubt, of a corporation aggregate, and if he occupied his house in that character alone it is clear that he would not be entitled to a vote. The case would, under these circumstances, be within the case of Heath v. Haynes, 27 L. J., 50 C. P., and our recent decision in the case of the Naval Knights of Windsor, Durant v. Kennett, vide prec. case. In those cases, on the facts presented to the court, the court came to the conclusion that the brethren in the one case and the knights in the other occupied under the circumstances only as members of a corporation aggregate. But here Mr. Harington bears two characters. He is, first of all, a member of a corporation aggregate, and next he is, as a canon, a corporation sole. There can be no doubt that as a canon he is a corporation sole. Of the property belonging to the dean and chapter, some belongs to the dean and chapter jointly in their corporate capacity; but other portions of the property are enjoyed in severalty, a portion being enjoyed by the dean himself and other portions by the canons. The dean may be said to enjoy a portion in respect of his office, and the same remark applies to the canons. Thus in Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, 9th edit., p. 90, it is said that "the possessions of the dean and chapter are for the most part divided, the dean having one part alone in respect of his deanery, and each particular prebendary a certain part in right of his prebend; the residue the dean and chapter have alike, and each of them is for this purpose incorporate by himself. For a prebendary who hath a distinct estate, and hath also a vote in the chapter, is a corporation sole in respect of the one, and at the same time is a member of a corporation aggregate in respect of the other." Here, on the statements in the case, Mr. Harington has separate possession of, and separate rights over, this house. He has also separate liabilities in respect of it. If, on his death, the house which he has occupied as canon were dilapidated, his executors would be liable to his successor to make the dilapidations good. That point was decided in Dr. Sand's case, Skinner, 121, and also in Radcliffe v. D'Oyly, 2 T. R. 630, and the doctrine was confirmed and extended to the case of a vicar choral in the case of Greaves v. Parfitt, 7 C. B., N. S., 838; 29 L. J. 216, C.P. Where a prebendary has an advowson in right of his prebend, and the incumbent of the living having died, the prebendary dies before a presentation is made, his executors present: (Rennell v. The Bishop of Lincoln, 7 B. & C. 113.) This case was afterwards confirmed in the House of Lords: (8 Bing. 490.) That a prebendary, as a corporation sole has separate and distinct rights over his house, altogether independently of his membership in the dean and chapter is further shown by the following passage from 2 Burn's Eccles. Law, 9th edit., p. 92: "But by the stat. 28 Hen. 8, c. 11, the profits of a prebend during the vacation shall go to the successor towards payment of the first fruits. In order to reconcile which, perhaps the distinction may be this: that the issues of those possessions which he hath in common with the rest of the chapter shall, after his death, be divided among the surviving members of the chapter; but the profits of those possessions which he hath in his separate capacity, as a sole corporation of himself, shall be and enure to his successor." The form of the writ, as given in Fitzherbert, strongly confirms the view, that a prebendary takes in right of his office, of course subject to Mr. Kingdon's observations that he is, as prebendary, a member of the corporation aggregate. From the cases referred to, it appears that a canon is regarded by the law for many purposes in several different aspects. The question for us here is, whether, so far as the occupation of his house is concerned, he is to be regarded as holding in severalty or as a member of a corporation aggregate. The case says that the house belongs to the respondent in right of his canonry. From these findings in the cases, I come to the conclusion that, as in other cases, a canon may hold property in his own right as a canon. Mr Harington occupies this house in his character of canon, and not as a member of the dean and chapter of Exeter. In some old authorities (2 Peck. 113, Middlesex cases), it was held that a prebendary was not entitled to a vote in respect of his prebend. But in Eliot, p. 24, there is a passage quoted from Heyw. Co. 2nd edit. 125, which explains this: "With respect to chapters, where the dean and each prebendary has a separate portion in right of his office, each is a corporation sole and may vote; but where the whole annual income is divided among them as a corporation aggregate, they cannot vote." In the Westminster case, 2 Peck. 113, the dean and chapter, as a corporation aggregate, were considered to occupy their houses separately only by agreement among themselves, and the corporation aggregate kept the houses in repair. The report of the case is short, but if the facts were sufficient to support the contention that the members of the dean and chapter in that case occupied in severalty only by agreement among themselves, then one can understand how the court came to the conclusion that they were not entitled to vote in respect of their houses. The passage I have just cited from Heywood shows that a prebendary may be entitled to vote, and I think that the distinction there made is conclusive in favour of Mr. Harington's claim. In the present case the corporation aggregate of the dean and chapter cannot be said to occupy Mr. Harington's house. It cannot interfere with his occupation as canon, nor can it transfer the house to another. On the other hand, we find that Mr. Harington is a corporation sole with a freehold office for life. He occupies his house solely in respect of his canonry. He cannot be disturbed in his occupation. He does not occupy, in my judgment, as a member of a corporation aggregate. I am of opinion that he occupies as a corporation sole in his own right and in respect of his canonry. Or, if we consider that the dean and chapter held this house in trust for him, we must still regard him as having an equitable freehold for life. But I think that he has a freehold in his house, with all the rights that by law flow from such an estate, and amongst others the right to a vote. On these grounds I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister must be affirmed.

Digitized by Google

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I quite adhere to the judgment of this court in the recent case of the Naval Knights of Windsor (Durant v. Kennett, vide prec. case), and to the proposition I then laid down that when a member of a corporation enjoys and occupies a part of the property of such corporation in pursuance of the purposes for which the corporation exists, it must be primâ facie presumed that his occupation is the occupation of the corporation, and the estate is in the corporation. I think, too, that it would be straining the law to say that, because a corporator is allowed to occupy part of the corporate property for life unless he does something to induce the corporation to turn him out, this would confer any estate on him, or that he acquires any interest in the property which he has entered on as his allowed share, by force of an usage which is not of such a character as to confer a prescriptive right. I think, too, that it is a refinement for Mr. Philpotts to say that a corporation aggregate is incapable of occupying. I should have thought the contrary. More than one case has occurred in which a corporation, having occupied without any instrument under seal, has been held liable for use and occupation. The principle, then, is that a corporation aggregate has no vote. The presumption is, that where a member of a corporation occupies part of the corporate property, his occupation must be regarded as the occupation of the corporation; and further, that it would be absurd to regard him as holding as tenant under the corporation. That, however, is the whole extent of our decision in the case of the naval knights. In conferring among ourselves, however, in that case, it was agreed by every member of the court to be open to any member of a corporation to rebut this presumption by showing that he has a distinct occupation. The whole discussion in this case, then, is whether Mr Harington has shown sufficient to rebut this presumption. It is quite open to him to rebut it, and show that he has a separate ownership. The finding of the revising barrister is precise, and on that finding it appears that the house was taken by Mr Harington on succeeding to his predecessor, and that he occupies the house in right of his prebend, he being at the same time, as a prebendary, a member of the dean and chapter of Exeter. In other cases relating to corporations, with the nature of which we are not acquainted, it might appear right to send the case back to the revising barrister to be restated. That, however, is unnecessary in this case. My reason for saying this is, that it is necessary for the purpose of our decision to determine whether Mr. Harington has the character of a corporation sole. That character is only borne by certain persons. In any other case if a person were presumed by the revising barrister capable of holding property as a corporation sole, it might be necessary that the revising barrister should set forth the facts on which his conclusion was founded. This, however, is not so in the case of a member of a dean and chapter. When a member of a dean and chapter holds separate property to the exclusion of the other members, we recognise a case in which the presumption is that he holds such property as a corporation sole, and not merely as a member of a corporation aggregate. In the present case we find that the other members of the dean and chapter cannot interfere with the respondent in his enjoyment of his house. We find that this house has been assigned to him, not by private arrangement among the members of the corporation aggregate for the more convenient enjoyment of the common property, but as something which belongs to him in right of his prebend. That this is the general character of the occupation of property by the members of a dean and chapter appears from Com. Dig.tit. "Dean and Chapter," where reference is made to this very distinction: "And though the dean and chapter make a corporation, yet the dean and every prebendary of the chapter may be a corporation by himself. So the dean may have belonging to his deanery a church, prebend, or other possessions." In speaking of a prebendary Comyns says: "A prebend is jus spirituale percipiendi proventus in ecclesia, competentes percipienti ex divino officio cui constitit. A canon is he, qui est electus in fratrem, and has a stall in choro, et locum in capitulo. . . . If a prebendary aliens his whole possession he continues prebendary, for he has his stall in the choir and his place in the chapter." Nothing could more clearly show the separation of the property. In the case of the Dean and Chapter of Norwich, 3 Coke's Reports, 72 b, the authority of Comyns is fully borne out, that "if a prebendary demises his prebend, the prebendary shall do the things proper to his function, and not the lessee." A prebendary, then, is capable of taking as a corporation sole, and he does not take in succession, except in that character. I should have thought that that was sufficient for our conclusion. It might perhaps have been better for the revising barrister to have ascertained and explained the way in which the property of the dean and chapter is held; but it was perhaps thought inconvenient to set out their title. There is no question, that if a living is attached to a prebend, the prebendary holds that as a corporation sole. In ordinary cases, where a living is so attached, the prebendary is admitted by the bishop, though the living belongs to him in right of his prebend. Stress has been laid on the fact that the prebendary, on being appointed, appears before the house, and begs the dean and chapter to admit him. That, however, does not weigh in my mind. But all doubt is removed by the form of the precedent for a writ to obtain possession, in the case where the preceding prebendary has demised his house, and the tenant holds it over without licence. The form of the writ is evidence of the law, especially as Fitzherbert, without even a note expressing doubt upon the subject, shows that the right to the house is not in the dean and chapter, but in the prebendary. With regard to the Westminster case in 2 Peck. 113, the chapter was but lately formed. No prescription was relied on, and whether the decision was right or wrong is explained by the case, that where the members of the dean and chapter occupy the property in severalty only, by agreement and arrangement among themselves, they gain no right to a vote. In this case, however, Mr Harington does not occupy this house as his share of the common property, allotted to him by agreement among the members of the corporation aggregate, but he holds it as his separate property. The result of the case to my mind, even without these authorities, is that a prebendary occupies his house in right of his prebend. In case of dilapidations, the incoming prebendary would have to sue the executors of the late one; but it would be difficult to see the reason of this, if the deceased prebendary had no successor. Under these circumstances, I think we should do wrong if we were to act on what I have said is primâ facie presumption in these cases. I am clearly of opinion that the revising barrister was right, and that his decision must be affirmed.

Digitized by Google

KEATING, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. At the same time, I do not in the least wish to interfere with the decision in the case of the naval knights (Durant v. Kennett, vide prec. case). There is, no doubt, a presumption that a member of a corporation occupying part of the corporate property occupies in respect of his membership alone; and it is for him to show that he has a distinct occupation, and holds in his own right. The question then here is, whether this presumption is rebutted by the facts. It seems to me that the statement of the revising barrister, that Mr Harington occupies this house in right of his canonry, rebuts it, and consequently that the decision of the revising barrister must be affirmed.

BRETT, J.—At first I had some doubts whether the case had been sufficiently stated, but with the knowledge that we have, as matter of law, of the way in which property is held by a dean and chapter, we are enabled to decide that the claimant in this case occupies his house, not merely as a member of a corporation aggregate, but in his own right as a corporation sole. It is contended that a canon is entitled as a member of the corporation aggregate to be installed in his house, and that he holds it simply and solely as such member. If that were so, the case would fall within Heath v. Haynes (ubi sup.), and our decision in the case of the naval knights (Durant v. Kennett, prec. case), which cases I am happy to find are entirely justified by the old authorities. I am clearly of opinion that in those cases the claimants were not entitled to a vote, as they were shown to occupy only because they were members of a corporation aggregate. Here, however, that is not so. Mr Harington occupies his house, not only as a member of a corporation aggregate, but as a corporation sole, to whom the house has been assigned by law. On these grounds I am also of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister must be affirmed.

Decision affirmed, with costs against the appellant.

Attorney for the appellant, J. E. Fox.

Attorney for the respondent, G. E. Philbrick.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Nov. 8 and 10.

WILLIAMS v. TAYLOR AND OTHERS.

Bankrupt—Liability of assignees—Lease—Election to take benefit of—Acts evidencing intention to elect—Possession for limited period—Action for rent under lease—Use and occupation—B. A. 1849, s. 145—B. A. 1861, ss. 110, 131.

By lease, dated 8th March 1866, the plaintiff demised a house and premises to R. for seven years, at 600*l. a year, payable quarterly on 8th June, 8th Sept., 8th Dec., and 8th March. On 25th March* 1869 R. filed a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy, which was subsequently annulled on the 15th April, on which day R. was adjudicated a bankrupt on a creditors' petition, under which, on the 7th May, the defendants were appointed assignees, and at a meeting of creditors on the same morning it was resolved, pursuant to sect. 110 of the B. A. 1861, that no further proceedings should be taken under the bankruptcy, which resolution was confirmed at an adjourned meeting on the 21st May, and it was then resolved that the bankrupt's estate should be wound-up and administered by the assignees in like manner as if the same had remained in bankruptcy. On 27th March 1869 plaintiff distrained for the quarter's rent due on the 8th March, and at the request of the solicitors to the petitioning creditors and the official assignee, the plaintiff remained in possession, without selling, till 12th May, when the defendants' solicitors paid the rent and the costs of the distress to the plaintiff. The defendants, as assignees of the bankrupt's estate, remained in possession "for the purpose of realising the stock, fixtures, and furniture, and not otherwise," and on 8th June another quarter's rent became due, and was paid to the plaintiff on the same day by the same solicitors on behalf of the defendants. On the 12th June the plaintiff's attorney wrote to the defendants' attorneys as follows: "I take it that as the assignees have not declined the lease of the premises, but are still in possession, they have elected to take the lease See sect. 131 B. A. 1860." No answer was sent to this letter. The defendants remained in possession for the purposes before mentioned, and no other, and on the 23rd June they sold by auction on the premises the tenant's fixtures belonging to the estate. The removal of the fixtures was completed by 30th June, and attempts were made to deliver the keys of the premises to the bankrupt, but the defendants were unable to ascertain his address. On 21st July they tendered the keys to his solicitors, who declined to accept them; and on the 30th July, having learnt where the bankrupt was, they forwarded the keys to him at Belfast by registered post letter, and informed him that they declined to accept the lease. On the 1st Aug. the defendants' attorneys wrote to the plaintiff's attorneys that the defendants had disclaimed any interest in the premises, and had delivered the keys to the bankrupt. On 8th Sept. plaintiff took possession upon the understanding that his doing so should not affect his right (if any) against the defendants to the quarter's rent due that day. The lease had been deposited by the bankrupt, prior to the bankruptcy, with a creditor, as security for a debt, and remained in the creditor's possession till after 8th Sept., when it was delivered by him to the plaintiff.

In an action by the plaintiff to recover from the defendants the quarter's rent to 8th Sept., on a special case stated without pleading for the opinion of the court, it was Held, by Channell, Pigott, and Cleasby, BB. (dissentiente, Kelly, C. B.) that the question of election being one of intention, the acts of the defendants, as stated in the case, were acts evidencing such an unequivocal intention on their part, to elect to take to the lease of the premises for at any rate the six months to 8th Sept., as to fix them with liability, in the present action, for the quarter's rent to that day; and (per Channell, B.) to render it unnecessary to decide whether, having regard to the decision in Goodwin v. Noble, an action for use and occupation could be maintained against them.

Digitized by Google

Goodwin v. Noble, 8 E. & B. 587; 27 L. J. 204, Q. B., discussed and distinguished.

Sed contra, per Kelly, C. B.—The acts of the defendants did not amount to such an unequivocal act of election to take to the lease, as precluded them from disclaiming it on the 1st Aug., or rendered them liable in the present action for the quarter's rent: (Goodwin v. Noble.) And the plaintiff, as was said by Lord Campbell in that case, should have forced the defendants to their election under sect. 145 of the Bankruptcy Act 1849:

Also, per Kelly, C. B., that, notwithstanding the decision in Goodwin v. Noble, the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover for use and occupation; it being contrary to every principle of the law that a lessor should be entitled to recover the same rent, for the same premises and for the same period, under the covenant against his lessee, and at the same time for use and occupation against the assignees.

This is an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants for the recovery of 150*l.* for one quarter's rent of premises, No. 60 and 62, Church-street, Liverpool, from the 8th June 1868, to the 8th Sept. 1868, and by consent of the parties, and by the order of Master John C. Templer, dated 9th May 1869, according to the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, the following case has been stated for the opinion of the court, without any pleadings.

1. The plaintiff is the owner of a dwelling-house and shop, Nos. 60 and 62, Church-street, Liverpool, and by an indenture dated the 8th March 1866, he demised those premises to James Robertson for seven years, from that date, at the rent of 600*l.* per annum, payable quarterly on the 8th June, the 8th Sept., the 8th Dec., and the 8th March.

2. On the 25th March last, James Robertson filed a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy in the Liverpool District Court of Bankruptcy. On the 30th of the same month, Messrs. Potter and Taylor, of Manchester, who are creditors of the said James Robertson, filed a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against the said James Robertson in the same court, and on the 15th April the bankrupt's petition was annulled, and the said James Robertson was adjudicated bankrupt on the petition of Messrs. Potter and Taylor, and on the 7th May, under the last mentioned petition, the defendants, Francis Taylor, John Howell, and Joseph Barnicot, were appointed assignees of the estate and effects of the bankrupt. At a meeting of creditors of the said James Robertson, held on the same day, it was resolved, pursuant to sect. 110 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, by the requisite majority of the said creditors that no further proceedings be taken in the said bankruptcy. And on the 21st May an adjourned meeting was held, at which this was duly confirmed, and the requisite majority, required by the said section, directed that the said estate and effects of the said James Robertson should be wound-up and administered by the said assignees, in like manner as if the same remained in bankruptcy.

3. On the 27th March, two days after the bankruptcy petition was filed, the plaintiff distrained for the quarter's rent, due to him for the premises, on the 8th of that month, and, at the request of the solicitors to the petitioning creditors and the official assignees, plaintiff remained in possession without selling up to the 12th May following, when Messrs. Haigh, Son, and Co., the solicitors or agents acting for the defendants in the bankruptcy, paid plaintiff the rent due on the 8th March last with the costs of the distress.

4. The defendants, as assignees of the estate of the said bankrupt, remained in possession of the premises for the purpose of realising the stock, fixtures, and furniture, and not otherwise; and on the 8th June another quarter's rent became due, and was paid on the same day by Messrs. Haigh, Son, and Co., on behalf of the defendants, to the plaintiff. On the 12th June 1868 the plaintiff's attorney wrote the following letter to the defendants' attorneys, which remained unanswered:—

Re Robertson.

I take it that as the assignees have not declined the lease of the premises in Church-street, but are still in possession, they have elected to take the lease. See sect. 131 Bankruptcy Act 1861.

5. The defendants still remained in possession of the premises for the purposes mentioned in the last paragraph, and for no other purpose; and on the 23rd June they sold by auction, upon the premises, the tenant's fixtures belonging to the said bankrupt's estate.

6. The removal of the said fixtures was completed by the 30th June, and attempts were at once made to deliver the keys of the premises to the bankrupt. The said assignees were unable to ascertain his address, and on the 21st July they tendered the said keys to the bankrupt's solicitors, who declined to accept them. On the 30th July the assignees ascertained that the bankrupt was in Belfast, and on that day the keys were forwarded to him by registered letter, and he was informed that the assignees declined to accept the lease or the benefit thereof.

7. On the 1st August the defendants' attorneys wrote to the plaintiffs' attorneys that the defendants had disclaimed any interest in the premises, and had delivered the keys thereof to the bankrupt.

8. On the 8th Sept last the plaintiff took possession of the said premises, it having been agreed with the defendants' solicitors that his so taking possession should not affect his right, (if any) against the defendants, to the rent from the 8th June to the 8th Sept. last, or any part thereof.

9. The said lease had been deposited by the said bankrupt, prior to the bankruptcy, with a creditor as security for the payment of a debt, and the same remained in his possession until after the 8th Sept., when it was delivered by the said creditor to the plaintiff.

10. The court is to be at liberty to draw such inferences from the facts as a jury could properly have drawn.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the said plaintiff is entitled to recover from the said defendants the sum of 150*l.* for one quarter's rent of the said premises; or any, and (if any) what part thereof.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiff for the amount to which the plaintiff shall be found to be entitled, with costs of suit, if the said amount shall exceed 20*l.*; otherwise for the said amount, with costs. If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment of nolle prosequi, with costs of defence, shall be entered up for the defendants.

The plaintiff's points for argument:—1. That there is evidence on the facts stated of an election by the defendants to take the premises in question for the residue of the term created by the lease of 8th March 1866. 2. That there is evidence of an election by the defendants to take the said premises for the quarter in respect of which the rent sued for is claimed. 3. That the defendants are liable in use and occupation for the last mentioned period, and that the rent in the lease is evidence of the value of the said premises. 4. That the plaintiff is entitled to the judgment of the court for 150*l.*

Digitized by Google

The defendants' points:—1. That under the circumstances set forth in the special case the plaintiff is not entitled to recover any rent from the defendants. 2. That the facts show that the defendants did not elect to take the benefit of the lease of the premises.

The following sections of the Bankruptcy Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106) and the Bankruptcy Act 1861 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 134) respectively are material, and were referred to in the argument and judgments.

The Bankruptcy Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106) enacts, by sect. 145, that if the assignees of the estates and effects of any bankrupt having or being entitled to any land, either under a conveyance to him in fee, or under an agreement for any such conveyance, subject to any perpetual yearly rent reserved by such conveyance or agreement, or having or being entitled to any lease or agreement for a lease, shall elect to take such land, or the benefit of such conveyance or agreement, or such lease, or agreement for a lease, as the case may be, the bankrupt shall not be liable to pay any rent accruing after the issuing of the flat or filing of the petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against him, or to be sued in respect of any subsequent non-observance or non-performance of the conditions, covenants, or agreements, in any such conveyance or agreement, or lease or agreement for a lease; and if the assignees shall decline to take such land, or the benefit of such conveyance or agreement, or lease or agreement for lease, the bankrupt shall not be liable, if within fourteen days after he shall have had notice that the assignees have declined, he shall deliver up such conveyance or agreement, or lease or agreement for lease, to the person then entitled to the rent, or having so agreed to convey or lease, as the case may be; and if the assignees shall not (upon being thereto required) elect whether they will accept or decline such land or conveyance, or agreement for conveyance, or such lease or agreement for lease, any person entitled to such rent, or having so conveyed or agreed to convey, or lease or agreed to lease, or any person claiming under him, shall be entitled to apply to the court, and the court may order them to elect and deliver up such conveyance or agreement for conveyance, or lease or agreement for lease, in case they shall decline the same, and the possession of the premises, or may make such other order therein as it shall think fit.

The Bankruptcy Act 1861 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 134) enacts as follows:—

Sect. 109 provides for a meeting of creditors after adjudication.

Sect. 110 enacts, that in case at such meeting, or any other meeting of creditors, any proposal shall be made by or on behalf of the bankrupt, which it shall appear to the major part in value of the creditors then present, ought to be accepted, or if it shall appear to the majority in value of creditors present at any meeting, to be desirable on any ground to resolve, and such majority shall resolve, that no further proceedings be taken in bankruptcy, the meeting shall be adjourned for fourteen days, in order that notice of such resolution may be given to every creditor by the official or creditors' assignee, which shall be done accordingly; and if at such adjourned meeting a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors present shall so resolve, proceedings in bankruptcy shall be suspended, and the estates and effects of the bankrupt shall be wound-up and administered in such manner as such majority shall direct, and the bankrupt having made a full discovery of his estate, shall be entitled to apply for an order of discharge.

By sect. 117, on appointment of the creditors' assignee, all the estate, real and personal, of the bankrupt shall be devested out of the official assignee, and vested in the creditors' assignee.

Sect. 131, in every case of a lease, or an agreement for a lease, it shall be lawful for the assignee to elect to take the same and the benefit thereof, and to keep possession of the premises up to some quarter or half-yearly day, on which rent is made payable by the same lease or agreement, such day not being more than six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, and upon such day to decline such lease or agreement for a lease.

Powell, Q. C. (with him was C. Russell) for the plaintiff.—It is difficult to see what answer there can possibly be to the defendants' liability for the rent of the quarter during nine weeks of which they held possession. It is enough that they were in possession, and it is not for the plaintiff to argue the question of election to take to the lease. Before the statute of 1849, assignees under the old law were held liable where they had taken possession and occupied for the benefit of the estate (see Ansell v. Robson and another, 2 Cr. & J. 610; 1 L. J., N. S., 216, Eq, and the judgment of Lord Lyndhurst, C. B.), that being on the premises, and actually taking possession is sufficient to bind them. No doubt the defendants will rely on Goodwin v. Noble and others, in the Queen's Bench, 8 E. & B. 587; 27 L. J. 204, Q. B.; but that case is, at all events, an authority for the plaintiff to this extent, that it shows them to be liable, at any rate, for a quarter's rent, for use and occupation. Subsequently to this was passed the Bankruptcy Act 1861, which relieved assignees from a dangerous position. Previously to that if assignees interfered or did anything with the lease they were held to have elected to take possession; but under sect. 131 of the Act of 1861, they may hold for a limited period, and then at its expiration may decline further interest in the premises. Here the plaintiff may say the defendants have elected to take the lease entirely, but at least, having paid the quarter's rent on the 8th June and continued to occupy for several weeks of the second quarter, they are liable for that. He cited also McDonald v. Thompson, a very recent case in the Common Pleas, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 666; L. Rep. 4, C. P. 747 (and was stopped by the court, who called on)

J. Brown, Q. C. (with him C. Jeffery), for the defendants.—There has, it is submitted, been no election here by the assignees, nor is there any evidence of any, and without election there can be no liability on their part as lessees, and there can be no action against them for use and occupation, inasmuch as the premises are let under a lease. Sect. 131 of the Act of 1861 makes no difference in the case, but leaves the matter exactly where it was before. It only confers on the lessees a power which they had not before got. Prior to 1861 if they elected at all the election was taken to be for the whole term, unless they got rid of it by assignment. There is nothing in the section defining what is election, or altering the doctrine. It is a mixed question of law and fact. [KELLY, C. B.—What effect then do you give to the words "and upon such day to decline such lease or agreement for a lease," in sect. 131 of the Act of 1861?] The section gives the assignees power to hold the premises for six months after the adjudication, and then to decline the lease, but they have not done it here, and the section has no application. In Copeland v. Stephens, 1 B. & Ald. 593, after much discussion it was held by Lord Ellenborough, C. J. delivering the considered judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, that the general assignment of a bankrupt's estate

Digitized by Google

under the commission did not vest a term of years in the assignees unless they did some act manifesting their assent to such assignment as regarded the term, and then accepted of the estate and rents. That judgment has been acted on ever since as laying down the law correctly. It was so held also in a more recent case, Lindsey v. Limbert, 12 B. Moo. C. P. 209; 5 L. J. 52, C. P.; 2 Car. & P. 525. The question, then, here is, have these defendants done any unequivocal act evidencing an election to take to the lease? The payment of rent under the first distress proves nothing. Until the resolution of the 7th May was confirmed on the 21st May the assignees could do nothing. The payment of rent on the 8th June was obligatory upon them in the course of their duty, to prevent the loss which would have accrued to the estate by a forced sale. They remained in possession no longer than was absolutely necessary to enable them to dispose of the bankrupt's estate. They had not elected on the 12th June, nor were they then bound to do so. The cases show that six and even twelve months have been allowed to assignees under such circumstances without rendering them liable for the whole term. At most "the circumstances are equivocal," as was said by Lord Campbell, C. J. in Goodwin v. Noble (ubi sup.). That case, the facts of which are parallel with the present, overrules the old cases and the dicta cited on the other side. He cited also

Ex parte Tilston, in re Tilston, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 493, Chan; L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 199;
Ex parte Webster, in re Wickham, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 556;
Ex parte McKerrow, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 753;
Mallett v. Levin, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 531, Ex.;
Tuck v. Fyson, 6 Bing. 321;
Wheeler v. Bramah, 3 Campb. 340.

The case of Macdonald v. Thompson, cited on the other side, was a case of ordinary goods and chattels, and involved no question of election at all. It was impossible, without overruling all the cases cited, to hold that there had been any election here. Nor is there anything amounting to an estoppel. The most that can be said is that they did not answer the attorney's letter—that they in fact did nothing. It was competent to the landlord (and he was bound to have done so) if the assignees were slow to elect, to apply to the Court of Bankruptcy and put pressure upon them (sect. 145 of the Bankruptcy Act 1849.) The lease still continuing there could be no claim for use and occupation. A count for it would not lie. [CLEASBY, B. refers to Hanson v. Stevenson, 1 B. & Ald. 390; and to sect. 110 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861.]

Powell, Q. C. in reply.—The cases cited contra have little or no application. The question turns entirely on sect. 131 of the statute of 1861. Before that statute, if the assignees interfered in the least degree, they were fixed with the liability for the whole term. Speaking broadly, the meaning of sect. 131 was this: "Three courses are open to you, the assignees, and you may either not enter at all, or you may enter for a limited period, or if you enter, and fail to exercise the power given you by the statute of expressing your intention of taking it only for a limited period, then you shall be held to have taken it for the whole term." The same acts, which before the statute might not have been, may now well be, held to amount to an election. Why did not the defendants write and disclaim taking possession? They knew the landlord's address. Goodwin v. Noble is not disputed, but it was decided under a totally different state of the law, and has no analogy here. This is not an action against the defendants as assignees, but against them as persons entering upon and occupying the plaintiff's premises. Unless the defendants are liable, how is the landlord to get his rent? He cannot get it from tl bankrupt. He cited also the case of Ex parte Syk re Steel, before Commissioner Holroyd, 32 L. T. Re 19, and referred to Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, 220 et seq. 9 edit., by Cole.

Cur. adv. vult.

Their Lordships retired for some time, and c their return into court, there being a difference opinion upon the bench, they proceeded to deliver tl following judgments.

CLEASBY, B.—The plaintiff, is, I think, entitl to judgment in this case. The action is brought b him as landlord, to recover from the defendants quarter's rent, under a lease. It seems that tl tenant or lessee, a Mr. Robertson, became a bank rupt on his own petition on the 25th March 186 which bankruptcy was subsequently annulled, an he was eventually, on the 15th April 1868, adjud cated bankrupt on a creditor's petition, and on tl 7th May following such adjudication, the defer dants were appointed creditors' assignees, and o the same day came a meeting of creditors, which, pursuant to sect. 110 of the Bankrupt Act 1861, a resolution was passed that no furth proceedings should be taken under the bank ruptcy, which resolution was confirmed in th regular way at an adjourned meeting on tl 21st of the same month of May, it bein then resolved that no further proceedings i the bankruptcy should be taken; and that tl bankrupt's estate and effects should be wound-u and administered by the assignees in like manner if the same had remained in bankruptcy. This dat the 21st May 1868, therefore, so far as the petitio of the defendants as assignees is concerned, is a ver important one. Now no particular reliance has bee placed on this transaction as regards the liability c the defendants. I shall, therefore, consider th case as if they had remained assignees of the bank rupt in the usual course, guarding myself onl against its being supposed that the creditor after resolving that no further proceedings i bankruptcy should be taken, and so withdrawin the matter so far from the complete jurisdictio of the court, though it could not be take out of the court altogether, could, by this re solution, still confer on the defendants all th rights and privileges of assignees in bankruptcy We must, however, deal with the case upon th concession of the parties as involving the respon sibility of the defendants as assignees. The bank rupt is the lessee under a lease at the rent of 600 a year, and I take it to be clear that the propert in the lease, and the character of assignees of th lease, do not belong to the defendants unless the have done some act to make them belong to them Mr. Powell, in arguing for the plaintiff, stated mor than once that the effect of the later Act of Par liament of 1861 was to make it pass to them a once, more than it did before. I differ from tha construction of the 117th section of the statute which leaves the case, I think, pretty much as i was before, because the only effect of sect. 117 i that, upon the appointment of the creditor assignee, the property passes out of the officia assignee to the creditors' assignee; nor is ther anything, I think, to show that this section make it vest in the assignees, or that it can in an way be said to vest in them, until they have don some act to make it do so. The simple questio then in this case is, have the defendants, or hav they not, done some act to make it vest in them They may make it vest in them by positive election or by notice to creditors, or by doing some ac equivalent to election. Any act which clothe them with a right in the property as assignees any right of possession would, in my opinion, be an election from which they could not escape. The merely being in possession by the messenger, for the purpose of disposing of the property, as goods, chattels, pictures, or the like, would of itself leave it an open question whether or not there had been an election, and to determine whether or not that act amounted to an election, we must, I think, see whether there is anything showing them to have been there in the character of tenants. The moment it is established that they have a claim of title as tenants or, in any way, to the lease by election, the moment they have done any act availing themselves of any right to the occupation of the premises as lessees, they have made a conclusive election, and they cannot get out of the 131st section of the Act of Parliament. Have they, then, made themselves tenants under the lease or not? Now the first distress, in respect of the rent due on the 8th March, is nothing, for that became due long before they had anything to do with it, as their real characters only commenced on the 21st May. Therefore we may, I think, throw altogether out of our consideration the payment of money for the first distress for the purpose of redeeming the property which belonged to them, as they had no alternative but to make the payment. We must look, then, to what took place afterwards. We find them in possession—the rent day (the 8th June) coming round—the day arrives—no particular demand or pressure is made or put upon them for payment of the rent, but we find that they pay it. How far they had a right to occupy these premises for the purpose of selling the fixtures which may or not have been very valuable to them, we need not say; but we know they are in possession, and that as the rent day came round they paid the rent, and according to the statement in the case they paid it on behalf of the estate. From that time, therefore, the plaintiff, the landlord, was estopped from regarding them in any other light than as his tenants. He could not have turned them out, having received rent from them. I do not feel myself at liberty to infer that the rent was not received from them as tenants, and that being so, they paid it as tenants and became tenants, and could not subsequently make an election. But it does not stop there. The plaintiff's attorney, having regard to sect. 131 of the late Act of 1861, and knowing that the defendants might or might not elect, according to the Act, with reference to the quarter that remained, wrote them the letter set out in the case, not, I think, for the purpose of inveigling them into a position of unlimited liability as to this lease of 600*l.* a year, but merely of ascertaining the position of the parties and how matters stood between them respecting the next quarter, which had then just commenced. This letter is dated 12th June, and is as follows: "I take it, as the assignees have not declined the lease, but are still in possession, they have elected to take the lease. See sect. 131 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861." Undoubtedly, when the assignees paid the rent on the 8th June they might, as has been said, at the same time have given up the key and possession of the premises, and have rid themselves of all further liability. But they did not do so. All goes to show, in my opinion, that they elected to remain in for another quarter, and sufficient, I think, has taken place, on the statement of facts in the case, to make the defendants responsible. There remains the question, how does the case stand with regard to the authorities? It seems to me that the important case of Goodwin v. Noble, on which so much reliance has been placed, does not, when the judgment is carefully looked at, profess to overrule the previous authorities, or to lay down any new rule. Its effect is that every question arising on these matters must be judged of by a close attention to the circumstances of the particular case, in order to enable it to be seen whether or not there has been an unequivocal election. Taking the facts in this case—namely, the fact of the defendants remaining in possession for a particular purpose, the fact of their payment of rent when it became due, without anything to show it to have been paid otherwise than in the character of tenants, the fact that it was received by the landlord from the defendants as tenants, and the letter of 12th June,—and coupling all three circumstances together, with what took place after that letter,—namely, that the assignees took no steps until a much later period, when their attorneys wrote to the plaintiff's attorneys to say that they had at that time disclaimed any interest in the premises, and had sent the key to the bankrupt—it appears to me that the effect of the whole matter is, at all events, to bind them to an election to come under the liabilities of this lease as tenants to the extent of six months, or rather to the extent of the rent to the 8th Sept. So far as that goes, therefore, my judgment is that the defendants have so far bound themselves to pay that they cannot relieve themselves to that extent, and that our judgment ought to be for the plaintiff.

Digitized by Google

PIGOTT, B.—I cannot say that I have not hesitated a good deal as to the proper conclusion at which the court ought to arrive in this case; but, in the result, I come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. I think the case depends mainly on the question whether we can say that these assignees have elected to take the benefit of this lease. That must depend upon the evidence in the case—the question of election being a question of intention. A man may have in his mind an intention in one direction, and all his acts may point in another. We cannot enter into another man's mind, except so far as his acts enable us to do so. Judging by the acts of the defendants, I feel bound to infer that they had an intention to elect, and did elect, to take the benefit of this lease. I do not feel at all pressed by the argument adduced on behalf of the defendants as to the difficulties thrown in the landlord's way by the bankruptcy. On the contrary, I think the Bankruptcy Act shows the mode in which all the parties may be relieved. It seems to me that the Act has taken pains to put them all—the landlord and the tenant, the bankrupt and the assignees—in such a position that they may easily ascertain how they stand, and extricate themselves from any difficulty by taking the proper course there pointed out, and has vested in the court power to do full justice between them all, by making "such order as the court shall think fit." My judgment is rested on the question whether or not the defendants have elected to take the benefit of this lease; and I have come to the conclusion that they have. What are the facts leading me to that conclusion? First, there was the rent which came due on the 8th March, and was paid under the distress, and which, I agree with my brother Cleasby, may be put out of our consideration. Then the next rent became due on the 8th June. In the meanwhile the defendants were in possession, but I do not lay much stress on that, for it may be equivocal; that is to say, they may have been there for the purpose of taking the goods, or for the purpose of asserting a right to the possession. But nevertheless there they were. Then, on the very day the rent became due, they pay it, or it is paid for them, without any demand or any threat of distress, or sale of goods. But even so far, I would agree that that might be equivocal, if they paid it to avoid a distress, or because they knew that if they did not, then they might be compelled to pay it by way of distress. But the next thing is that the plaintiff's attorney takes the course which seems to be the most straightforward and business-like course for him to take; he gives notice to the defendants, or to their attorneys rather, of the view he himself takes of this act of payment of rent. The letter says, "I take it that as the assignees have not declined the lease of the premises, but are still in possession" (and he might have added "and have paid the rent") "that they have elected to take the lease," and he gives as a reason for so concluding "See 131st section of the Bankruptcy Act." What more could a landlord do than that? It is said that he might have applied to the court. So of course he might, at some cost and trouble; but surely the more reasonable course was to tell the other side the view he took of the acts of the defendants. I must say that if the defendants have done an act such as paying their rent, which may be equivocal as to the intention taken to be involved in it, and they have notice that the other party, who is interested in the matter, and is a party to the business, takes the view that their continued possession, coupled with the payment of rent, amounts to an election, and that it is taken by him to be so, I think there is but one course open to them if they do not mean to be judged otherwise by their silence, and that is to say, "You are mistaken; we do not by paying the rent mean to be taken to have elected to continue in possession. We know we must pay rent one way or the other if our goods are on the premises, and we have paid it as the most beneficial course for us to take." On the contrary, however, they treat the matter with silence, and thus, in my opinion, tacitly assent to the view which the plaintiff's attorney had taken. But if I am stretching that too much against the defendants, yet the evidence of election does not stop there. The possession still continues, and it continues in spite of the notice that continuance of it would be taken to be an intention to elect. It does not even stop there, for on the 1st Aug. the defendant's attorneys wrote to the plaintiffs' attorney to say that they had disclaimed any interest in the premises, and that they had delivered the key to the plaintiff. Why, if they meant from the first to treat the landlord and his attorney as persons with whom they had nothing to do, do they send that notice? They might have said, "You may go to the court, or do anything else, or write us letters, but we will not answer them; our business is not with you, it lies with the court and the bankrupt and the estate, and we have nothing to do with you." It would have been consistent, therefore, that they should have sent the keys to the bankrupt, and taken no notice of the plaintiff and his attorney, and their conduct then might have been consistent, although perchance it might have been equivocal. But on the 1st Aug. they do not continue this consistent, though unbusinesslike, conduct, but write and say they have disclaimed any interest, as though, up to that time, they had been acting as if they had not disclaimed, or as if they had elected to take to the lease. It was time under sect. 131 for them to disclaim, as it required them so to do. Their acts seem to me to be no longer equivocal. Whatever their intention may have been, they cannot complain if a judge, who has to determine whether by their acts they had elected or not, comes to the conclusion that those acts evidence an election in point of fact. I have come to that conclusion, as I have already said, not without some hesitation. I think the case differs from that of Goodwin v. Noble. In that case no doubt there were the payment of rent and other circumstances, but there were not the circumstances of the notice imparting the view taken by the other side, which was treated with silence, and the subsequent continuing in possession after such a letter, with the notice of the 1st Aug., that I have already referred to in paragraph 7 in this case. That seems to me to cause the present case to differ from the facts in Goodwin v. Noble. In the conclusion I have arrived at I am not embarrassed by that case, or by the other cases. I agree with that case to this extent, that each case must depend on its own circumstances, when it is a question of intention or election, to be evidenced by facts. In the present case it seems to me that these are facts which do evidence an election, and that the plaintiff is therefore entitled to our judgment.

Digitized by Google

CHANNELL, B.—Like my brother Pigott, I have not been free from doubt in the course of this case, nor am I now altogether free from doubt, knowing that there is a difference of opinion upon the bench; but, upon the best consideration I can give to the case, I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the judgment of the court. This is a case stated for the opinion of the court without pleadings, and it provides that the court may draw such inferences as a jury might properly draw. Substantially, the question submitted to us is, whether 150*l.*, or any part thereof, can be recovered in any way or in any shape upon the facts as stated? Mr. Powell has contended that there was abundant evidence of an election on the part of the defendants, the assignees, to take, and that if it were so, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. But he submitted another point, not secondarily, but primarily, that notwithstanding there had been no election, the plaintiff was still entitled to recover as for use and occupation. The contest he made on that point was founded mainly, as I understand, on the case of Goodwin v. Noble. Upon this latter point, however, I feel it unnecessary to give any opinion, because I am of opinion, with my brothers Pigott and Cleasby, that there is here evidence of an election to take. Neither do I enter into the point that has been made at the bar, namely, that if there is an intention to take, or circumstance that may warrant us in thinking that there was an intention to take, for a limited period, namely, for a period not exceeding six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, and that if there were no notice at the time that it was for a limited period that the assignees intended to take; or no notice, at the expiration of that limited period, that it was for a limited period only, and not in futuro, that they intended to take, that then they must be taken to have elected to take the whole term. I think it is unnecessary to decide that, being, as I have already stated, of opinion that there is evidence here of such an unequivocal intention to elect to take, as will fix the defendants in the present action. I agree in thinking that the payment of the rent due on the 8th March may be substantially left out of consideration. I do not say that it is to be forgotten altogether, but if that had been the only element in the case, it might have been explained away, because there was a distress put in for the rent, and the payment of that rent under that distress would not amount to an election to take. But I agree that if rent is paid afterwards, without any explanation as to the circumstances under which it is paid, and without anything to prevent its being taken as a payment of rent in the ordinary course, by which the assignees would show that they considered themselves entitled to possession, not possession merely for the purpose of disposing of the property, but as having a rightful possession of the property, that is strong evidence of an election to take, and would preclude the landlord, without explanation being given, and estop him from treating the assignees as trespassers—that is to say, as not entitled to the benefit of the remainder of the term. Here the defendants remained in possession, and the rent next became due in the ordinary course on the 8th June, and it was paid, as I understand, without any explanation, such as might arise from circumstances existing when the payment on the 8th March was made, or anything in fact to prevent its being taken to be paid as rent in the ordinary way; and when that payment is made the defendants are and continue still in possession of the premises. That payment, then, having been made, then comes the letter of the 12th June to which I attach great importance. It was a step which the plaintiff's attorney was not only justified in taking, but which it was proper in justice and fairness he should take. He says (his Lordship here read the letter of 12th June, and then proceeded as follows). The defendants give no answer to that; they remain in possession, the goods are afterwards sold; and they do, as speedily as may be considered reasonable, proper, or possible, endeavour to discharge themselves of the assets after the goods are sold. Having taken the time which they require for the disposal of the goods, on the 1st August they write the letter, in which they intimate that they have disclaimed, leaving, however, the inference that, down to that time, they had done no act which would disentitle them to retain possession of the premises, because on that day they gave notice of their intention to disclaim, although the preceding acts show that they had made an election. It would appear from the case that the lease had been pledged by the bankrupt. It does not appear that that fact was known to the defendants. The case, therefore, in that respect, so far as anything turns on it, differs from Goodwin v. Noble, in which case it was clear that the assignees were aware that the lease had been deposited, and that they were entitled to a beneficial interest in the property, and that if they elected to take, although they might have been entitled to any surplus, after satisfying the debt which might arise when the goods were disposed of, yet in that case it would have been for the benefit of others, and not for the benefit of the general estate of the bankrupt. In that respect this case differs from Goodwin v. Noble. I am, I think, warranted, having the power to draw inferences as a jury, in holding that there was in the present case an election to take. I say not whether for a limited period or for the whole term; upon that point the inference to be drawn is that they elected to take, and that therefore the bankrupt is entitled to recover. That renders it unnecessary to dispose of the point as to whether, having regard to the case of Goodwin v. Noble, an action for use and occupation can be maintained.

KELLY, C. B.—I regret to say that I am unable to come to any other conclusion in this case than that the defendants are entitled to the judgment of the court. The first question which arises is, whether upon the facts, which have been so accurately stated by my learned brothers, we are called upon to say that the defendants elected to take to this lease, and became the assignees of it as between them and the lessor. Now the first fact relied on by the plaintiff is, that the assignees took possession and remained in possession of the premises for the purpose of disposing of the goods. I gather that from the terms of the special case. The truth is, they found the messenger under the bankruptcy in possession, when they were appointed assignees on the 7th May, the bankruptcy having taken place some time before, and they accordingly proceeded to take possession of the bankrupt's effects which were within this house and upon these premises, and they may be taken to have either gone into or remained in possession, and that remaining in possession is held as, in the first place, some evidence of an election to take the premises. I think in a case like this, it is clearly no evidence at all; because it was an act necessary and indispensable to the discharge of their duties as assignees. There was property belonging to the bankrupt's estate on the premises, and it was their duty to take possession of it, which they could not do without entering on the premises on which it was. There they remained. Now, is the remaining on the premises under the circumstances of this case, any evidence of an election to take the premises as lessees? They remained until they sold and disposed of the bankrupt's property and effects, which were upon the premises, and no longer. It is not suggested that there was any want of due diligence or expedition in such disposal, between the 7th May, when they became assignees, and, I think, about the 20th June, when they had disposed of the whole of the property; and as soon as they had disposed of the whole of it they delivered up the key to the bankrupt. His residence was not known then for some time, but they endeavoured to find him out, and at last they heard of his being at Belfast, and they transmitted the key to him in a registered letter on the 21st July. Then on the 1st Aug. they gave notice to the lessor that they disclaimed any interest in the premises, and accordingly abandoned the election. I do not think, therefore, that the entering on the possession in order to take possession of the bankrupt's effects, which they were bound to do, nor the remaining in possession until they had disposed of them, which also they were obliged to do in the discharge of their duty, is any evidence justifying us in coming to the conclusion that they had elected to take the premises as lessees. The remaining fact is a very important one, and one which for a long time held my mind suspended on the question, and led me for a time to think that the plaintiff might be entitled to the judgment of the court; and that is, that on the 12th June, four days after the second quarter's rent had become due and had been paid, the attorney for the plaintiff wrote to the attorneys for the defendants the letter which has been so often referred to. [His Lordship here read the letter.] Now I do not at all deny that this letter really did call upon the attorneys for the defendants, in common courtesy, as well as a matter of business, to send a reply to say, as the truth was, "the assignees have not elected to take the premises; they have entered upon them in order to dispose of the bankrupt's effects; they are disposing of them as fast as they reasonably can, and, therefore, you must not take it that they have elected to become the assignees of the lease." This, however, they did not do. But the question is, looking to the principle of the law, and the authorities which bear on this case, does the omission of the attorneys to answer that letter, and to disclaim the suggested election, amount in itself to an election binding the defendants to be treated as the assignees of this lease? I think it does not. In the first place, though I do not rely much upon that consideration, it does not appear that the attorneys communicated this letter to the defendants, or that the latter ever heard of it, and it would be with reluctance that I should hold assignees to be bound to take a lease of this nature unless they themselves had really the opportunity of considering whether it would, on the whole, be for the benefit of the estate that they should do so. But, further, when the language of the letter is closely looked at, it is really very peculiar. It is not, as it has been assumed to be, a letter saying, "I take it for granted," or "I assume," or "I shall assume that you, the assignees, have taken to this lease, unless you intimate to me the contrary," but it is this,

Digitized by Google

"I take it that, as the assignees have not disclaimed the lease of the premises, and are still in possession, they have elected to take the lease—See sect. 131 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861." In truth it is no more than an expression of opinion (the writer's), in point of law, of the effect of sect. 131. "I take it that, as the assignees have not disclaimed, &c., they have elected to take under sect. 131 of the statute." It may well be that the attorneys for the assignees did not feel themselves called upon to argue the matter in point of law with their correspondent. They may have thought, "it may be so, but we take it to be otherwise—in our opinion there has been no election, and therefore we shall take no notice of the matter." But it seems to me impossible, in reason and good sense, to hold that the omission by the attorneys to answer this letter, or even by the assignees themselves, is such an unequivocal act as binds them to a supposed election. That depends upon authority. It is true that although it was held in one of the early cases, Turner v. Richardson and another, 7 East, 334, that the taking, or being in possession of the premises, and, in one sense, treating them as the property of the assignees, and the putting them up for sale by auction, did not amount to an election to take the premises as assignees, yet there is no doubt that subsequently in the very important case of Hanson v. Stevenson and another, 1 B. & Ald. 303, which has been also referred to, Lord Ellenborough and the other judges of the Court of King's Bench in general terms stated, as a general proposition that the taking possession of the premises is of itself an irrevocable act, and an election, and conclusive evidence of an election, on the part of the assignees. I cannot myself assent to that doctrine, but I should have been bound by it if it had not been impeached by the case subsequently decided, and so much referred to in the present case, I mean the case of Goodwin v. Noble, in 8 E. & B. In that case there is a long string of facts on which the judgment of the court is founded. There was there not only a taking of possession, but an actual remaining in possession for a period of eighteen months, yet that was not deemed to be an unequivocal act amounting to election. Moreover rent had been paid during the whole of that time, or the greater part of it, some four or five quarters, and even that, coupled with the remaining in possession all that time, was not held to amount to an election. I do not hesitate to adopt what was said by Lord Campbell there as a direct declaration of the law on this subject. He says (at p. 692 of 8 E. & B.), "The result of the various cases upon this subject seems to be that the assignees of the bankrupt are not liable as assignees of the term unless they have done some act which unequivocally indicates to the lessor that they have elected to take the benefit of the lease." It is clear, therefore, on that authority, that the taking possession and remaining in possession, even for a period of time four times as long as that during which the assignees here remained in possession, does not of itself amount to an election. Neither does the payment of rent during that period amount to an election. Let us, then, see if there is anything in the payment of rent in the present case which distinguishes it from the case of Goodwin v. Noble. Here two quarters have been paid. The first was paid before the defendants became assignees, and in consequence of the landlord's putting in the distress. Under an arrangement the plaintiff himself, the landlord, remained in possession until the assignees were appointed, and then the assignees, in order to redeem the bankrupt's effects from the distress, under which they would have been sold, paid the rent. Mr. Powell, as I understand, does not rely much, or at all, upon that. Then there was a further payment of rent, when the next quarter became due, on the 8th June. It seems to be assumed that this was a mere voluntary payment, and in the capacity of tenants to the landlord, and therefore evidence of tenancy, and also of their having taken to the lease. But it appears to me, regard being had to the time of payment, that it was, like the first payment, in order to relieve the property of the bankrupt from distress, to which it was liable I think the reason of payment having been made on the 8th June was, because the assignees well knew that on the following morning, the 9th, if payment were not made, it would be competent for the landlord, as he had done on the previous quarter, to send in a distress and sweep away, perhaps, the whole of the effects. They therefore wisely and properly, in my judgment, paid the rent on the day it became due. It seems to me that there is no evidence of an election to which any weight ought to be given in this case. We next come to a third fact, which is of a different character, namely, that the plaintiff's attorney, having written to the attorneys of the defendants, no answer was sent to the letter; and it is contended, therefore, that the plaintiff, the lessor, had a right to assume that what had been suggested in that letter was the case, namely, that the defendants had elected, under sect. 131, to take to the lease, and had not disclaimed it at the expiration of the quarter. But, as it does not appear that the assignees themselves, whose duty it was to exercise their own judgment, with or without legal assistance, in the matter of taking to or disclaiming the lease, ever knew or heard of this letter, the argument founded on their silence is not entitled to the weight which otherwise, perhaps, might have attached to it. But even if they had been told of the letter, it is nothing more, as it seems to me, than a dissent from the spirit of the law which is stated, in that letter, to be the opinion of the attorney by whom it was expressed. I do not think that it amounts to an unequivocal act of election. The unequivocal act by which an election ought to be tested is that which must come within the principle and real meaning of the judgment of Lord Campbell in Goodwin v. Noble. But there is another ground, and one on which I feel less hesitation in coming to my present conclusion, and one which is adverted to by Lord Campbell in the before-mentioned case, and which, I think, should put that case beyond doubt in favour of the defendants, and it is this. Suppose, for a moment, the lessor and his attorney to have been under the impression that the defendants had elected to become assignees of the lease, it was competent to the lessor to have applied immediately to the Court of Bankruptcy to compel the assignees to at once elect whether they would take the lease or not; and we should not be justified, I think, in holding that there was an unequivocal election in this case, when it was open to the party who seeks to treat it as such to have put the matter beyond all doubt by resorting to that course of action which the law has pointed out and enabled him to take, and which, might enable the court at once and without delay to do justice between all parties. Sect. 145 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106) enables a lessor circumstanced as the plaintiff is here, at any time after appointment of assignees, to apply to the court to compel the assignees to elect; and the court, having power to do justice between the parties, would doubtless in this very case have forthwith determined whether the assignees should accept or reject the lease, or whether they should be allowed some short and reasonable time for disposing of the effects which had not been sold, allowing them to retain possession of the premises for that necessary and reasonable time, on the terms that they should compensate the lessor, who was entitled to the rent, for the use and occupation of the premises during that period. Now, that course was not adopted; and I think that that is a very important consideration in this case. Lord Campbell, in Goodwin v. Noble, at p. 604 of 8 E. & B., says, "At most the circumstances relied upon by the plaintiffs are equivocal; and under such circumstances we think it highly desirable that the lessor should avail himself of the power given by the statutory enactment in the 145th section of the Bankruptcy Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106) to apply to the Court of Bankruptcy that the assignees may be put to their election. The plaintiff might thus at once have got into possession of the demised premises, and this expensive litigation might have been entirely avoided." Now, I apply the whole of that sentence to the present case, and I am at a loss to understand why it was that the plaintiff here did not, when he found that his letter remained unanswered after a day or two, either cause another to be written begging a direct answer, or at once proceed to the court and resort to the remedy under the 145th section. Again, it certainly is an element in the case, not entirely to be disregarded, that it seems almost impossible to believe that these assignees could have intended to take this lease at a rent of not less than 600*l.* a year for a term of seven years, some four or five years of which had still to run. As soon as they had become assignees, a resolution was adopted to abandon the proceedings in bankruptcy, and at once to wind-up the bankrupt's affairs, and convert his estate into money; all they had to do therefore, before the bankruptcy and consequently their character and duties would be at an end, was to convert the effects into money, which could have been done within the space of a month, or six weeks at furthest. It seems impossible then that they could have contemplated taking to this lease under those circumstances. The plaintiff, too, is much in the same situation, for he had, upon sending in the distress in March, before the assignees were appointed, himself gone into possession of the premises under an arrangement, and so knew what the premises were, and what property and effects were on them, and why, as the case states, the assignees had gone into and remained in possession at all, namely, "for the purpose of realising the stock, fixtures, and furniture, and not otherwise." Could he then have possibly supposed that they were going to remain in possession, and that the not answering the letter of the 12th June testified their intention and determination to elect to become the assignees of the term? I think the plaintiff ought to have resorted to the course open to him under the statute, and that not having done so, and being fully aware of all the circumstances to which I have adverted, he was not justified in treating this as an election, and that, under the circumstances of this case, which ought to govern our decision, the facts stated do not amount to that unequivocal act of election that the law requires. But then it is said that the plaintiff is entitled to recover for use and occupation. Now, without doubt, it was held in Goodwin v. Noble that, although the assignees had not elected to take to the lease, yet the plaintiff was entitled to recover for use and occupation for the time the assignees had been in the actual possession of the premises. But there were some circumstances in that case—that is to say, there were some letters between the parties—from which possibly the court inferred an agreement constituting a tenancy. It may be so, and I hope that it was so, because, if it were not, I do not hesitate to say that the decision is contrary to the first princi- of the law, and cannot be maintained. The stances of the present case are that there is a lease under seal between the plaintiff, the lessor, and Robertson, the bankrupt, for seven years. We must assume, for this purpose, that that lease is in the bankrupt still—that the assignees have not elected to take to it, and have not become the assignees of it. They have been, say for three months, in possession, but does that give authority to the lessor to sue them for use and occupation? The lessor's tenant is the lessee, the bankrupt, and he alone is liable to the payment of the rent, unless there has been some collateral agreement between the lessor and the persons occupying, which would estop them from disputing that he was their landlord and they his tenants. The bankrupt is the only person liable under the lease to the payment of the rent to the lessor; and if the latter is entitled to recover in the action for use and occupation, he might recover the money against the assignees in this action for use and occupation, and over again against the bankrupt, the lessee liable under the covenant for payment of the rent during the period in question. Here again we must refer to the statute, which says that if the bankrupt's assignees elect to take the lease, the bankrupt shall not be liable to payment of rent from the time of his bankruptcy. If they take to the lease they are liable to the performance of all the covenants, but, as they do not elect to take it, the bankrupt still remains liable. Again, even if the assignees do not take to the lease, but expressly disclaim and reject it, if the bankrupt, within fourteen days of such disclaimer, surenders the lease to the lessor, he is no longer liable. But that has not taken place here. It is not stated that he has surrendered it, and if we are to draw inferences at all, we cannot infer that he has done so. Had he done so, it would have settled one point in this case; but the fact appears to be that the lease was not in his possession, so he had no power to surrender or do any other act in relation to it. It had been pledged by him for a debt, and therefore, not having availed himself of the provisions of the statute and surrendered the lease, he still remains liable to the rent. I am clearly of opinion that it is quite impossible, upon any principle of the law of England, that the lessor should be entitled to recover the same rent for the same premises and for the same period, under the covenant from his lessee, the bankrupt, and at the same time for use and occupation against the assignees. There is yet one more consideration to which I may also advert, though perhaps it is not necessary. I doubt, extremely, if the assignees had elected to take this lease, whether when it was discovered that instead of being in the bankrupt's possession, and so available or of any value or benefit to the estate, the lease itself had been pledged to a creditor, and was no longer under the bankrupt's control, or within their reach, they could not have at once repudiated the election, and set themselves free from the obligations of the covenants of the lease. I pronounce no opinion on that, however, because on the other points adverted to I am of opinion, though not without some doubt and difficulty, that no such unequivocal act has been done, testifying the election of the assignees to take the lease, as precluded them from disclaiming at the time they did so. I think, therefore, that the defendants are entitled to the judgment of the court; but as my learned brothers are of a contrary opinion, the judgment will be entered for the plaintiff.

Digitized by Google

Judgment for the plaintiff for a quarter's rent. (a)

Attorneys: Cree and Last, 13, Gray's-inn-square; Reed, Phelps, and Sidgwick, 3, Gresham-street, E.C.

(a) See now the B. A. 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 171).

Digitized by Google

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Reported by John Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, Nov. 13.

(Before Kelly, C. B., Martin, B., Blackburn, Lush and Brett, JJ.)

Reg v. Raudnitz.

Evidence—London Gazette—Production.

The mere production of a copy of the London Gazette purporting to be printed by authority, containing an advertisement of adjudication of bankruptcy is sufficient proof of the adjudication of bankruptcy under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 240.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by the Recorder of the City of London.

At a session of the Central Criminal Court on the 19th Aug. 1869, Sidney Raudnitz was tried before me on an indictment charging him with obtaining goods on credit, within three months of adjudication of bankruptcy against him with intent to defraud.

To prove the adjudication of bankruptcy against him, there was tendered in evidence and admitted by me the annexed printed document purporting to be the London Gazette, and purporting to advertise the adjudication of bankruptcy. It does not upon its face purport to be printed by the Queen's printer.

Mr. Metcalfe, for the prisoner, objected that this document must be proved to be the London Gazette before it could be admitted as evidence of its contents or of the adjudication.

The prisoner was convicted, and there being no other evidence of the adjudication of bankruptcy, I reserved the question for the decision of the Court for the consideration of Crown Cases Reserved: Whether the above document was sufficiently proved to be the London Gazette?

If the court should be of opinion that the above evidence was insufficient, the conviction must be reversed.

The prisoner is in gaol awaiting judgment. See R. v. Forsyth, Rus. & Ry. 277 (a).

Russell Gurney.

Metcalfe for the prisoner. The evidence received was inadmissible. The objection to the reception of the evidence is based upon Reg. v. Wallace, 17 Ir. Com. Law Rep. 207, where the defendant was charged upon an indictment under the statute 11 Vict. c. 2, for the better prevention of crime and outrage in Ireland, for having a pistol and gunpowder within the proclaimed district of Shankhill, and a copy of the Dublin Gazette was tendered in evidence containing the proclamation of the district purporting to be printed and published at the Dublin Gazette Office, No. 87, A. street, by A. T. of, &c., and under the title were the words, "Published by authority," but it was held not to be evidence within the 11 Vict. c. 2, s. 21, which enacted that the production of the Dublin Gazette. purporting to be printed by the Queen's printers, containing the publication of any proclamation under the Act should be deemed and taken as conclusive evidence in all courts of justice in Ireland of all facts, &c. In that case there was nothing to show by what authority the paper was printed. So in this case all that appeared was a paper purporting to be the London Gazette. Surely that is not sufficient to let it in as evidence of the London Gazette. In Rex v. Holt, 5 T. R. 436, the London Gazte put in evidence purported to be printed by the King's printer. [Lush, J.—Sect. 240 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, says that a copy of the London Gazette, and of any newspaper containing any such advertisement as by the Act directed, shall be evidence of any matter therein contained. The only question is, was this shown to be the London Gazette?] To show that it should have appeared to purport to be printed by the Queen's printer. [Brett, J.—If there is evidence on which the judge was reasonably satisfied that it was the London Gazette, was it not admissible?] More must be shown than the mere title London Gazette.

Giffard, Q. C. and Besley, for the prosecution, were not called upon to argue.

Kelly, C. B.—The conviction must be affirmed. In Reg. v. Wallace, the words of the statute which makes a copy of the Dublin Gazette evidence of the proclamation are, that the production of the Dublin Gazette purporting to be printed by the Queen's printers, containing the publication of any proclamation under the Act should be conclusive evidence of all such facts, &c., but there are no such words in sect. 240 of the Bankruptcy Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106) upon which the present question depends. Reg. v. Wallace, is in effect an authority against Mr. Metcalfe's contention, for the judges said if the paper had purported to be printed by the Queen's printers it would have been sufficient. The objection therefore fails, and the mere production of the paper purporting to be the London Gazette, and to be printed by authority, was sufficient proof of the adjudication of bankruptcy of the defendant.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

(a) In Rex v. Forsyth, Rus. & Ry. 274, to prove notice in the London Gazette of issuing a commission of bankruptcy, a paper purporting to be the Gazette was put in but no evidence was given that it was bought at the office of the King's printer, nor any further evidence beyond the mere production. The judges seemed to think (sic) that the production of the Gazette would be sufficient without proof of its being bought of the Gazette printer, or where it came from.

CONSTANTINOPLE SUPREME CONSULAR COURT.

Dec. 16, 17, and 27, 1869.

(Before C. A. Cookson, Esq., Acting Judge.)

The Brothers v. The Fingal.

"Leaving port"—Tug lashed to vessel—Collision—Arrest of ship on voyage with cargo—Practice of the Consular Court—The law of England—Security for costs and damages of detention.

This court being constituted by sect. 41 of the Order in Council of Nov. 20, 1864, a court of vice-admiralty, the only procedure which can be followed in it is that of the High Court of Admiralty in England.

In a suit for damage by collision, a ship was arrested which was in the course of a voyage with a cargo of corn on board:

Held that the ship was not protected from the effects of its own wrong because it had cargo on board, and that as the law of England gave the remedy of arrest to the plaintiff, the registrar of the court had no discretionary power to refuse the warrant, but

Held, in opposition to the usual practice of the High Court of Admiralty in England, that the plaintiff must give security for the defendant's costs and the damages arising from detention.

The term "leaving port" is to be taken to include the whole time during which preparations were being made for leaving port.

A tug being lashed on to a ship is to be taken as part of the ship; and a defence which is open to the ship is also open to the tug.

Digitized by Google

This was an action for damages through collision, laid at 475*l.*, and brought by the Brothers, of which paddle-wheel steamtug Capt. James Kinnach was owner, against the Fingal (s.s.), of Leith, Captain R. Baines, under Admiralty arrest in the port, and bound to Barcelona, with a cargo of grain from the Danube.

The alleged collision occurred in the Horn about 4 p.m. on the 17th of November last, the Brothers, with fires banked up, being at the moment lashed alongside the Mizpah, near the Galata Custom-house, with the two steamers Malvina and Fingal at anchor ahead of her, and the Mendoza astern. An official survey was held on the Brothers, and her damages ascertained and reported upon The defendant refused to pay this sum, denying that his was the vessel which occasioned the accident.

The Fingal having been arrested, a motion was made by Clifton, as advocate for the defendant, to supersede the arrest, which was opposed by Knight, for the plaintiff.

His HONOUR:—This is a motion for a supersedeas of the arrest of the Fingal, which took place under the following circumstances: It appears from the affidavit of the master that on the 17th November last, while the steamtug the Brothers was lying in the harbour off Constantinople, a steamer which was leaving the port came into collision with her, from the effects of which she, the Brothers, received considerable damage. On the following day the master made an application to this court for a survey, in which he stated that the vessel which caused the damage was the Fingal. In consequence of this application a survey was ordered (at which the late agents of the Fingal declined to be present), and on this a report was made estimating the damage to the Brothers at a sum from 200*l.* to 250*l.*, and the time required for putting her in working order at one month. On the 30th Nov. the Fingal being still absent, the owner and master of the Brothers filed an affidavit, in which he swore that the ship which ran into his was the Fingal, and stated his damages at 475*l.*, and at the same time, or shortly afterwards, he made a request to this consulate that the papers of the Fingal on her return to Constantinople might be detained for a time sufficient to allow of an arrangement, if possible, being made between the parties. On the 13th December the Fingal arrived in Constantinople, and on the same day—the hope of arranging the case having proved illusory, from the fact that the master of the Fingal denied her identity with the vessel which came into collision with the Brothers—a petition in rem was filed in this court on behalf of the master of the Brothers, praying for the arrest of the Fingal, and on the following day, 14th Dec., the warrant of arrest was executed by the marshal of the court. Before this warrant was granted, according to the general practice of this court, security was required from the Brothers for the damage to the Fingal for detention, which was perfected on the 15th Dec., by a bond for 100*l.*, the sum agreed upon between the parties. The present motion on the part of the Fingal is, that the arrest be superseded, and that the Brothers be decreed to pay damages for the detention of the Fingal. The grounds on which this motion was supported are, that the Fingal is chartered from Galatz to Barcelona, and laden with grain to the value of 8500*l.*, and that it is contrary to the practice of this court and of the consular courts of the Levant to arrest a vessel in cargo in the course of her voyage, or anywhere except at the port of discharge. This rule the learned counsel for the Fingal stated to be one which has always been recognised in the consular court of the Levant; and to show this he referred to the instructions addressed to consuls in the Levant by the judge of this court in Nov. 1860, where, at page 7, it is said: "It is, moreover, a rule of the Supreme Consular Court never to stop a ship under charter while prosecuting a voyage;" and this principle, he contended, has been invariably acted upon since, and become a recognised rule of this court. Now, an argument of this kind may admit of three answers:—First. It may be shown that the caution as to not stopping ships in cargo never was intended to apply to such an arrest as that under this suit. Secondly. That, in fact, ships in cargo have been arrested in suits of the same nature as this. Thirdly. That no such rule, if it existed, would be binding on the court. And, in my opinion, on all these grounds, the argument for the motion before me can be shown to be defective. In the first place, as to the paragraph in the instructions issued while this court was presided over by Sir E. Hornby, it is quite clear to my mind that it was never intended to apply to an arrest which, like this, is a regular step in a suit of damage in rem in a vice-admiralty court. The whole section from page 4 to page 8 refers to exceptional cases, in which a court, on the application of a plaintiff, exercised a discretionary power of granting an order affecting the interest of a defendant in his absence. It is true that, as Mr. Clifton ingeniously argued against the objection of Mr. Knight, in the case of The Laconia, 33 L. J. N. S. 11 Ad.; 9 L. T. Rep. N.S. 87, establishes that the Order in Council of the 9th Jan., 1863, which first expressly constituted this court as one of Vice-Admiralty, "did not create a jurisdiction in rem, but only expressed more distinctly and with greater detail the authority already conferred by former orders." But still, at the time when Sir E. Hornby issued these instructions on which Mr. Clifton relies, it appears from the same case of the Laconia that even this court expressly disclaimed being an admiralty court, and, therefore the practice followed in the consular courts generally could not have been that of the High Court of Admiralty, and he cannot be supposed to have had in view any such case as an arrest under a warrant in a suit when he laid down the rule quoted by Mr. Clifton. Secondly. In point of fact I have discovered several instances in which a ship in cargo has been arrested by the marshal of this court. I will only now mention the case of the Hebe, arrested in a case of salvage on the 12th Feb. 1869, in cargo, under the warrant of this court. But, in the third place, I go further, and I say that even if it had been the practice of this court to refuse the arrest of vessels in cargo, I cannot (with every possible respect for those who have presided in this court) see how such a practice would establish a precedent, in the teeth of the plain instructions of sect. 7 of the Order in Council of Nov. 20, 1864, which makes it obligatory on this court to follow the procedure of the courts at home in all cases, where it is not especially superseded by the other provisions of the Order in Council or the rules framed under it. Now this being constituted, by sect. 41 of the Order in Council of Nov. 20, 1864, a court of vice-admiralty, the only procedure which can be followed in it is that of the High Court of Admiralty in England; and in that court an arrest of a ship is the most convenient and ordinary, though not the only, means of commencing a suit of damages for collision, and this arrest of the ship does as a matter of fact in many cases necessitate the detention of the cargo. Nor can I find any instance of such an objection as that now made being ever raised in the English courts. But an arrest and such an incidental detention are two quite distinct things. It is indeed clear from many cases (among which I need only cite The Flora,

Digitized by Google

L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 45; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 192) that, according to English law, the cargo, not having in any way caused the collision, cannot be arrested except as security for freight already earned; but it by no means follows from this that the ship is protected from the effects of its own wrong because it has cargo on board. For any breach of this contract of affreightment or damage arising therefrom the owners of the cargo have their remedy against the shipowner, and the ultimate loss falls on the party who, in equity as well as in law, is responsible. For this reason, while I attach much weight to Mr. Clifton's arguments as to the possible loss to the owners or consignees of the cargo by the detention of the ship, I do not feel that it is possible for me to accede to his request; and the law of England giving this remedy to the plaintiff, the registrar of this court had, in my opinion, no discretionary power to refuse the warrant of arrest. Nor do I think that the court can supersede such an arrest, when once legally made, on the ground that this initiative step in the practice of the courts in England has not been usually taken here. It is not necessary for me to defend the policy of procedure objected to, though I think it follows logically from the peculiar nature of an action in rem, in which the ship itself is regarded as a defendant, and responsible for all the consequences of a collision. In fact, to make the exception contended for would, in the majority of cases, render the jurisdiction in admiralty of this court useless and nugatory, and so directly annul the intention of the Order in Council. The ship arrested can, of course, be arrested on a caveat, or a bail bond perfected according to a admiralty practice, but the motion for the supersedeas of the arrest must be now dismissed, though without costs.

Clifton moved that security for defendant's costs and damages, at 100*l.* per diem, should be given by the plaintiff; and he cited the case of the Hebe, in which the Supreme Consular Court had ordered such security about a year ago.

Knight said 100*l.* security for costs had been given already, and objected to any further security being required. He relied upon the practice of the High Court of Admiralty in England, the practice of which, he contended, should be now strictly followed by the Vice-Admiralty Court of Constantinople. The security of 100*l.* per diem, asked by Mr. Clifton, was far too much; as to the security for damages, it is always in law confined to an estimate only of the loss by additional wages and provisioning (Coote, 87, 2nd edit.); and not until the final decree in favour of a defendant is obtained will the court award demurrage for detention: (Fortitude, 2 Dods. 72.) In the case of the Peri, 1 Lush, 544; 32 L. J., N. S., 46, Adm., it was decided that "security for damages arising, and to arise, out of the detention of a defendant's vessel arrested and unbailed, will not be ordered." To give security at all, there must be a special reason (Minerva, 1 W. Rob. 72), such as being out of the jurisdiction.

The Sophie. 1 W. Rob. 369;
The Seringapatam, 5 No. Ca. 66;
The Frans et Elize, Lush, 377;
The Volant, Br. & L. 321.

But Capt. Kinnach resided within the jurisdiction, and was a resident for nearly twenty years last past.

His HONOUR.—Mr. Knight's argument would have great weight in the Admiralty Court of London; but, on examining the dossiers in this court —that of the Hebe for instance—I find security has been, and therefore should be, given. I shall call for it here.

Knight.—I object to 100*l.* per diem as too high.

His HONOUR.—I think that sum should, at least, be verified.

Dec. 27.—Knight, in opening the case, said that the plaintiff had stopped the Fingal pending the decision of his claim, but it should be remembered that he had stopped the vessel and not its cargo. In admiralty, cargo laden on board a vessel at the time of a collision was in no case liable to be sued for the damage: (The Victor, 1 Lush. 72.) The Fingal might transship her cargo to-day or to-morrow, if she liked. The plaintiff had given security for eventualities, security not required in the admiralty at home, but by custom security had been hitherto given here in Constantinople, and this had been followed in the present case. As to this collision, the plaintiff's case was that the Fingal was entirely in fault, and that, therefore, he was entitled to an entire compensation from the Fingal. What was entire compensation? It was compensation for the wrong, and for the loss, direct and consequential, which might have resulted from it: (Shee's Abbott, 11th edit., p. 614.) It was true that the defendants, in any case, might show that a collision was an inevitable accident, which meant, in law, one that could not possibly be prevented by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, or maritime skill: (The Virgil, 2 W. Rob. 205.) If the present collision might have been, by care and caution, avoided by the Fingal, the owner of the Brothers was entitled to a restitutio in integrum, which restitutio included, first, a complete repair (Coote, 2nd edit., p. 82) of all damage done, though the tug should be thereby rendered more valuable than before the collision:

The Pactolus, Swab. 173;
The Gaselle, 3 No. Cas. 79;

Secondly, in addition to the repairs rendered necessary by the damage, compensation should include all loss from the ship's detention resulting from the collision:

The Countess of Durham, 9 Law Mag. 279;
The Pensher, Swab. 1;
The Linda, Swab. 306.

Thirdly, in estimating the damage the Brothers had received, the loss through the collision of the benefit of any agreements—for towing, for instance—must legally be taken into account:

The Betsey and The Yorkshireman, 2 Hagg. 28, 30;
The Matchless, 10 Jur. 1017.

Fourthly, any expenses in the way of dues or otherwise which had been incurred and paid through and by reason of the collision were claimable: (Coote's Admiralty Practice 1868, 85, 86.) Such was incidental towage, for which we now claim 6*l.*, paid to Captain Ridley Whale. Another additional incident of damage was the wages and provisioning: (Coote, 87.) And, notwithstanding a judgment in rem in our favour, or even the sale of the Fingal under it, an action for the same cause may be maintained at law, if the damage actually done exceeds any amount that may be received by us as plaintiffs under the present proceedings in Admiralty:

The Ann and Mary, 2 Wm. Rob. 190.

Clifton having been heard for the defendant, and Knight in reply,

The COURT delivered the following judgment:—This is a case of collision, in which the plaintiff's petition charges that, on the 17th Nov., as the Fingal was leaving port, she came violently into collision with the steamtug Brothers, and did damage, for which compensation is claimed. It appears from the evidence that about two o'clock in the afternoon of the 17th Nov. the Brothers took up a position near the harbour office, lashed alongside of the Mizpah, and having other vessels near her, the Mendoza astern of her, and the Malvina a-head, and the Fingal, the defendants' steamer, on the port bow of the Mizpah, at a distance, according to the original place assigned to her by the captain of the port, of about a length and a half or two lengths of the Fingal. The wind was from the S.S.W., and a current was running after the ordinary rate of a Bosphorus current. About ten minutes after taking this position, the officer in command of the Brothers went ashore, and, later in the day, after the departure of the Fingal, he received notice that a collision had occurred. He went on board with the engineer and examined the vessel, and he found that both paddle-boxes had been injured; the port paddle-box had been driven in, and the starboard paddle-box had been driven out. [Having examined the evidence on both sides, the COURT concluded]:—We are of opinion, therefore, that the colliding vessel certainly was the Fingal. As to the question of identity we have no doubt whatever. Having delivered our joint opinion on that, it only remains for me to consider what is the weight to be attached to the legal objections which are raised by the defendants. The defendants objected, in the first place, that the petition alleged that this collision took place when the vessel was leaving the port, and contended, and with some force, that the evidence showed that if the collision did occur, it did not occur when the vessel was steaming out of port. On that point I must give my opinion that inasmuch as the terms of the petition were sufficiently loose—I may say—to allow the defendants an opportunity of disclosing the whole facts and of considering what their defence ought to be, the term "leaving the port" may be fairly extended to the whole time during which preparations were being made for leaving the port. There only remains for us to consider whether, under the circumstances of the position of the two vessels, there is any ground for the defence that the Brothers contributed to or was in any way the cause of this accident. We are of opinion that the position of the Brothers, lashed on to the Mizpah, being one which she might be considered to have rightly taken up, and that we may almost say that in that position she formed, as it were, a part of the Mizpah—that a tug lashed as she was to a vessel was very little different to being a large boat belonging to it, and that, therefore, any defence which would be open to the Mizpah would be open to the Brothers, and inasmuch as we believe that this collision was caused in consequence of some want of proper precaution on the part of the officers of the Fingal at the time when they made their preparations or when they were about to leave the port, the judgment of the court is that the Fingal alone is responsible, and she must be condemned in the amount of the damage, which will be settled in the usual way before the registrar.

Digitized by Google

Judgment accordingly for the plaintiff; damages to be assessed before the registrar.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Reported by A. A. DORIA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, Jan. 5, 1870.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Re A TRUST-DEED.

Trust-deed—Registration, right to—316th Gen. Rule Jan. 1, 1870.

A deed of composition executed by the debtor two days before the 1st Jan. 1870, the day upon which the Bankruptcy Act 1869 came into operation, but in respect of which no application had been made under the 3rd section of the Bankruptcy Amendment Act 1868 to enlarge the time for registration, is to be regarded "as in course of registration," within the meaning of the 316th General Rule of Jan. 1, 1870, and as such entitled to be registered.

This was an application on behalf of the debtor, ex parte, under the 20th section of the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvent Court Act 1869, and the 316th General Rule of Jan 1, 1870, for leave to register a deed of composition executed by the debtor on the 30th Dec. last, but not yet lodged for registration, upon the ground that the twenty-eight days allowed by the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 had not expired, and that the registrar at the registration office in Quality-court had refused to receive the deed without the order of the court.

By the 20th section of the Bankruptcy Repeal Act 1869, by which the Bankruptcy Act 1861 and the Bankruptcy Amendment Act 1868 are repealed, it is enacted that "this repeal shall not . . . interfere with the prosecution or affect the course of any legal proceeding pending in bankruptcy or otherwise under any such enactment before the commencement of this Act; but, subject to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and the Debtors' Act 1869, such proceedings shall be prosecuted as if this Act had not passed."

By sect. 3 of the Bankruptcy Amendment Act 1868, it is provided that, "notwithstanding anything in the Bankruptcy Act 1861, the time for the production and leaving of any such deed or instrument at the office of the chief registrar, as therein provided shall be twenty-eight days from the day of the execution thereof by the debtor, or such further time as the court may allow."

By the 316th General Rule of Jan. 1, 1870, it is provided that "the Chief Judge of the London Bankruptcy Court shall have and exercise all the powers, jurisdictions, and authorities of the old London Bankruptcy Court, and the judges of the local bankruptcy courts shall have and exercise all the powers, jurisdictions, and authorities of any district court of bankruptcy, or of any County Court, with respect to any trust-deed or deed of arrangement, composition, or inspectorship executed by a debtor, whether registered or in course of registration, on or before the 31st Dec. 1869, in the same manner as he or they may exercise jurisdiction, powers, and authorities with respect to any other legal proceedings pending on that day under any of the enactments repealed by the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvent Courts Act 1869, as provided by sect. 20 of such Act."

By the 317th Rule, "every such deed in respect of which an order has been made extending the time for registering the same to a date subsequent to the 31st Dec. 1869, shall be deemed to have been in course of registration within the meaning of the last rule."

By the 318th Rule, "the chief registrar of the Old London Bankruptcy Court shall complete the registration of any such last-mentioned deed in manner required by the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and the Bankruptcy Amendment Act 1868, and shall retain and exercise all necessary authority for that purpose."

Reed appeared in support of the application.—He referred to the 316th General Rule of Jan. 1, 1870, and contended that the words contained in the order, "whether registered or in course of registration" on or before the 31st Dec. 1869, must be read as complete or incomplete. He also referred to the case of Wishart v. Fowler, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 608, Q. B.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—I think you have undoubtedly the right to have the deed registered. The great importance of the case no one can doubt, considering the number of deeds that might have been inchoate when the Act passed. But I think the Act is free from all doubt and ambiguity upon the subject. The Bankruptcy Amendment Act 1868 is an Act of Parliament relating to proceedings in bankruptcy. No doubt it particularly deals with deeds only, but the recital is that it is expedient to amend the Bankruptcy Act 1861, which provides for the registration of deeds, and the 3rd section of that Act gives the court power to extend the time for twenty-eight days, or for such further time as the court may allow. The repealing bankruptcy clause of the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvent Court Act 1869, which repeals the Act of 1868, and all the others mentioned in the schedule, provides that this rule shall not interfere with the prosecution, or affect the course of any legal proceeding pending in bankruptcy. The deed, in my opinion, is a proceeding in bankruptcy, and I think that the Act of 1868, for all the purposes of the 3rd section of that Act, remains in full force as to any deed that was executed before that repeal takes effect, and the 316th Rule defines and points out the way in which the power of the court shall be exercised with respect to any trust-deed executed by a debtor, whether registered or in course of registration, in the same manner that its jurisdiction should be exercised with respect to any other legal proceeding on that day pending. Then a difficulty seems to be suggested by the 317th Rule, but I think that must be read as only introduced for greater clearness and explicitness so as to render it impossible that there should be any doubt that a deed for which the time had been extended should be deemed to be in the course of registration. It does explain that a deed for which the time has been extended shall be held to be in the course of registration; but it does not exclude from the operation of the Rule deeds in which no extension had taken place, but which were in every fair sense, in the course of registration. I think, therefore, it must be registered.

Digitized by Google

Ordered accordingly.

Solicitors: Appleby, Wright, and Crowther.

Monday, Jan. 10.

Ex parte BENNOCK; Re A PETITION FOR ADJUDICATION.

Practice—Petition for adjudication—Form of in schedule to Form No. 10—Gen. Rules 29 and 32.

In the petition for adjudication, according to the form specified in the schedule of forms annexed to the General Rules of Jan. 1, 1870, No. 1, the party against whom the adjudication is sought must be described at length, as of, &c., adding his occupation.

It is no objection to the validity of a petition that the affidavit filed with the petition is not made by a person who can depose to the facts as within his own knowledge, under the 29*th General Rule, but it is sufficient if it be made by the petitioning creditor, and the petition be proceeded with under the* 32*nd rule.*

Phelps (solicitor) applied for leave to file a creditor's petition, the officer in the Chief Registrar's office having refused to file it upon the ground that although the petition was in the form specified in Form No. 10, annexed to the General Rules of Jan. 1, 1870, yet he was not so described as to enable the Chief Registrar to comply with the requirements of the 240th General Rule, and to fill up the description in the petition book, to be kept by the Chief Registrar, as in Form No. 102.

The petition stated that "A. B. carried on business within the district of this court, that is to say, at , in the city of London," following the form specified in Form No. 10; an allegation was also added in the body of petition that the debtor was a trader.

The case came before one of the registrars, but by consent and by leave it was submitted for the decision of the Chief Judge.

The CHIEF JUDGE decided that it was necessary to insert the particulars of the debtor's trade, so as to enable the Chief Registrar to insert a proper description in the petition book.

Leave was for that purpose given to amend the petition by inserting such particulars under the 27th General Rule.

A further objection had been raised by the officer in the Chief Registrar's office to the filing of the petition, upon the ground that, although the petitioning creditor had verified all the statements contained in the petition that were "within his own knowledge as true," in the Form No. 11 to the General Rules annexed, yet he had not, in accordance with the 29th General Order filed any affidavit made by any person who could depose to such statements as were not within the petitioning creditor's knowledge being true. It was submitted that it was impossible to obtain any such affidavit, as the persons able to depose thereto as required were unwilling to do so, and that it would be requisite to subpœna them to give evidence. This objection was waived at the suggestion of the court, and it was held to be sufficient to file the petition and affidavit of the petitioning creditor, and to proceed under the 32nd General Order.

Solicitors, Reed, Phelps, and Sidgwick.

Wednesday, Jan. 12.

Re A DEBTOR'S SUMMONS.

*Practice—Debtor's summons—Dismissal of—Notice of hearing—*22*nd Gen. Rule of Jan.* 1, 1870.

Three clear days' notice, pursuant to the 23*rd General Rule of Jan.* 1, 1870, of an application by the debtor for the dismissal of a debtor's summons upon the ground that the debt is not due is sufficient.

It is of importance that no unnecessary delay should be placed in the way of the hearing of a debtor's summons.

An application was made ex parte under the following circumstances: On the 3rd Jan. a debtor's summons was granted under the 17th General Rule, and in the Form No. 4 thereto annexed upon the application of a creditor. The summons was duly served upon the debtor the same day. On the 10th the debtor appeared before the registrar and filed an affidavit pursuant to the 22nd General Rule in the Form No. 8 in the schedule annexed disputing the debt. The registrar thereupon appointed the 24th for the hearing of an application by the debtor for the dismissal of the summons, and the point was whether an early day should not be fixed if the business of the court would admit of it.

Bagley, for the creditor, contended that under the 23rd General Rule it was necessary only to give three days' notice of the day being fixed for the hearing of the application.

The CHIEF JUDGE decided that as it was most important that no delay should be placed in the way of a petitioning creditor, and as the 23rd General Rule specifies three days as the necessary time for notice to be given in all cases, as early a day as possible should be appointed after the lapse of three days as the business of the court would allow, but his Lordship expressed an opinion that the time of notice should be three clear days.

Solicitors, Parker, Lee, and Haddock

Digitized by Google

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, Nov. 12.

Re THE JOINT-STOCK DISCOUNT COMPANY (LIMITED); Ex parte THE WARRANT FINANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Company—Winding-up—Bills of exchange—Double proof against drawers and indorsees—Winding-up order—Satisfaction of debt up to—Interest subsequently.

The W. Company held bills of exchange drawn upon and accepted by the C. Company, and indorsed by the J. S. D. Company. These two last mentioned companies went into liquidation, and the W. Company proved against them for the amount of principal and interest due at the commencement of the windings-up, and received from the one company 4s. 6d., and from the other 15s. 6d. in the pound.

The Master of the Rolls having decided, on the authority of Re The Humber Iron Works Company, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 859, that the W. Company were excluded from the further dividends for the interest which accrued after the winding-up order, until the other creditors of the J. S. D. Company had been paid in full, on appeal, Giffard, L. J. reversed the decision, being of opinion that the case was not governed by the authority mentioned, and that the rule in bankruptcy applied.

This was an appeal by the Warrant Finance Company (Limited) against an order of the Master of the Rolls, whereby his Lordship decided that the appellants were not entitled to participate in any further dividends of the Joint-Stock Discount Company (Limited), now in course of winding-up, until all the other creditors of that company had been paid 20s. in the pound upon the amount of the debts which they had proved.

The circumstances are sufficiently stated in the report of the hearing at the Rolls (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 345).

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., Eddis, Q. C. and Langley, supported the appeal, relying on Kellock's Case, Re Barned's Banking Company, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 769; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 671;

Ex parte Waring, 19 Ves. 345;
Ex parte Rushforth, 10 Ves. 109;
Bower v. Marris, Cr. & Ph. 351.

Jessel, Q. C. and Locock Webb supported the decision of the Master of the Rolls, and contended that the case was governed by Re The Humber Iron Works Company, Ex parte The Warrant Finance Company, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 859.

In order that the court might be accurately informed as to the practice of the Court of Bankruptcy in similar circumstances, the following certificate from Mr. Graham, the official assignee in bankruptcy, was produced: "I, George John Graham, certify as follows: I have for thirty-eight years and upwards been an official assignee, and am now the senior official assignee of the Court of Bankruptcy in London. I have never known an instance of an application in bankruptcy to expunge a proof upon a bill of exchange, on the ground that the creditor had been fully paid his full claim upon the bill for principal and all interest, whether accrued before or after the bankruptcy. The practice in bankruptcy is when the estate of a bankrupt acceptor having paid to the holder 4s. 6d. in the pound, and the estate of the bankrupt drawer having paid to the holder 15s. 6d. in the pound, that the holder retains his proof on the two estates until the first of them pays the full sum that his interest in the said bill amounts to. Supposing that the drawer's estate is the first to pay the full amount, the holder remains trustee for all future dividends for the assignees of the drawer, but what is generally done is to hand the said bill to the drawer's assignees, with orders from the holder directed to the official assignee of the acceptor's estate authorising him to pay all the future dividends to the official assignee of the drawer. Thus it remains unless some creditor of the acceptor's estate shows to the commissioner ground for concluding that the drawer's estate has no claim upon the acceptor's."

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—I am clearly of opinion that this case is not governed by the Humber Iron Works Company's case, and that the order of the Master of the Rolls must therefore be discharged. It certainly is in principle, though not in form, like Kellock's case—the other estate being equivalent to having a separate security, and the rule in bankruptcy, not only as appears from the certificate of the official assignee, but from what one has understood the practice to be, is quite clear, certain and definite, and the only ground on which the argument to the contrary could be put is the ground which Mr. Jessel has urged, namely, that there has been appropriation. But that is a mistake, for there has been none. There has been a rule made and adopted, because in point of fact it is a just and proper rule for the distribution of assets under the particular bankruptcy on the particular winding-up, but that rule is not meant at all to interfere with the rights of the creditor if he can get them from other sources combined, to bring together from all these sources he can get, and retain from all those sources everything that he can until he is paid not only his principal, but all his interest also—indeed, till the debt is entirely satisfied.

The order will therefore be discharged, and I suppose that the costs of both parties in the court below and here will come out of the estate.

Solicitors for the official liquidator, Lawrance, Plews, and Boyer.

Solicitors for the official liquidator of the Warrant Finance Company, Flux, Argles, and Rawlins.

Nov. 12 and 19.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re THE HUMBER IRON WORKS COMPANY (LIMITED); Ex parte THE WARRANT FINANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Winding-up—Appeal from chambers—Practice—Creditor with security—Security on the estate of the debtor—Proof—Principal—Subsequent dividend—Interest.

When a case has been disposed of in chambers by the judge in person, an appeal from his order will not in future be heard unless upon a certificate from him that the case has been argued before him so fully that he does not wish to have it re-argued before himself in court.

The H. company being indebted in the sum of 23,000l. to the W. company, assigned as a security (inter alia) all calls then in arrear to trustees, who were to receive the same, and, if default were made in payment of the debt, were to pay what they might so receive in or towards satisfaction of the debt, or the unpaid part thereof, and to pay the surplus to the H. company. And it was further agreed that in the case of default in payment of the debt, or any part thereof, the H.

company should pay interest at the rate of 20 per cent. on the debt, or the unpaid part thereof. The H. company was ordered to be wound-up, and by means of receipts and payments of the trustees, and of the dividends declared in the liquidation, the W. company received a sum exceeding the principal of their debt, which excess the Master of the Rolls ordered the W. company to refund, but on appeal from that order, it was Held, that, although upon the construction of the assignment the calls were assigned to the trustees upon trust to pay the principal only, yet that in accordance with Re The Joint-Stock Discount Company, ante p. 626, the W. Company, notwithstanding that they had received in full the principal of the debt due at the commencement of the winding-up, were entitled to participate in all dividends which might be declared by the H. Company, until they had received principal and interest to the time of payment.

The fact that the security is on the estate itself, against which the proof is made, is immaterial.

This was an appeal by the Warrant Finance Company (Limited) against a decision of the Master of the Rolls in person in chambers, that the appellants must refund to the official liquidator of the Humber Ironworks Company (Limited), which is being wound-up, a sum of 1195*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*, being the amount by which dividends paid to them exceeded the principal of their debt, although, even allowing them to retain the whole amount paid, the amount due for principal and interest was not satisfied.

Upon the case being called on, and it being represented to the Lord Justice that the matter had been so fully argued by counsel in chambers that the Master of the Rolls was unwilling to allow it to be re-argued before him in court,

Lord Justice GIFFARD consented to hear the case, but said that he must make it a rule that when matters were to be brought before the Court of Appeal direct from chambers, the judge must certify that it had been so fully argued there before himself that he did not wish to have it again argued in court.

The hearing of the appeal was then proceeded with, and the following were the circumstances of the case —

In Dec. 1865 the Warrant Finance Company accepted for the Humber Iron Works Company bills for an aggregate amount of 25,000*l.*, which was secured by three promissory notes for that amount of the latter company, by a debenture bond of that company for 25,000*l.*, and by a document assigning to trustees for the Warrant Finance Company certain arrears of calls due on the shares constituting the capital of the Humber Iron Works Company.

By an agreement dated the 22nd Dec. 1865, made between the Humber Iron Works Company of the first part, the Warrant Finance Company of the second part, James Alexander Mann of the third part, and William Knapp Henderson of the fourth part (Mr. Mann and Mr. Henderson being the trustees of the above-mentioned assignment), after reciting the loan and the securities given for the same, it was declared between and by the parties thereto, and especially the Humber Iron Works Company thereby agreed and declared that they the said Humber Iron Works Company should pay to the credit of the said trustees all moneys then already received or thereafter to be received on account of calls in arrear, and that such trustees should stand possessed of such moneys upon trust, in the event of default being made by the Humber Iron Works Company in payment of the 25,000*l.* on the appointed day, or any part thereof, to pay the arrears of calls which should have been so paid in to their account to the Warrant Finance Company in or towards satisfaction of the moneys so remaining unpaid, and to pay over any surplus to the Humber Iron Works Company. And it was also agreed and declared that in case of default in such payment by the said Humber Iron Works Company of the sum of 25,000*l.*, or any part thereof, interest at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum should be paid on the said 25,000*l.*, or the unpaid part thereof.

In Feb. 1866 resolutions were passed and confirmed for the voluntary winding-up of the Humber Iron Works Company, and on the 13th March an order was made for winding-up that company by the court.

Amongst the claims which were brought in under the winding-up was one by the Warrant Finance Company for 27,583*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*, being the amount of the loan, together with interest at 20 per cent. per annum, and this amount was duly certified by the chief clerk, after deducting the sum of 854*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.*, which had been, previously to the certificate, received by the trustees under the assignment in respect of arrears of calls, and by them handed over to the Warrant Finance Company. Subsequently, and before the 19th Jan. 1869, a further sum of 10,250*l.* was handed over to them in respect of arrears of calls, and the official liquidator of the Humber Iron Works Company paid to the creditors dividends on their debts, namely, early in 1867 4*s.* in the pound, later in the same year a further 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound, and later a further 6*s.* in the pound—in all 12*s.* 6*d.* in the pound. By these payments the whole of the principal of the debt was paid off, together with a further sum in excess of that principal of 1195*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*, and by the order appealed from this last-mentioned sum was ordered to be repaid to the official liquidator of the Humber Iron Works Company, the Master of the Rolls being of opinion that the security covered the principal only of the debt, and not the interest.

From that order the official liquidator appealed.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., Eddis, Q. C., and Langley supported the appeal.

Southgate, Q. C. and Wickens supported his Lordship's order.

The authorities referred to were:

Re the Humber Iron Works Company, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 859;
Re The Joint Stock Discount Company; Ex parte The Warrant Finance Company, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 626;
Re the Xeres Wine Shipping Company; Ex parte the Alliance Bank, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 769; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 671; Ashwell v. Staunton, 30 Beav. 52;
Bower v. Marris, Cr. & Ph. 351.

At the conclusion of the appellant's argument,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that he was of opinion that the appropriation question was conclusively in the respondent's favour, but that if his counsel desired it, he would hear him as to the construction to be put on the agreement.

Sir R. Baggallay, Q. C. thought it unnecessary to trouble his Lordship,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—I quite agree with the Master of the Rolls in this case as to the construction he has put upon the agreement, namely, that it really is an assignment of the principal sum to two trustees, upon trust to pay a certain sum of money, and not upon trust to pay a principal sum of money and interest, and therefore those rules which apply when you come into court to redeem a mortgage, have no application here, and you must take the assignment in its strict form. But I do not think that is conclusive on this question; on the contrary I think this case is concluded entirely by the case I decided the other day (Re The Joint-Stock Discount Company; The Warrant Finance Company's case) which I decided in accordance with the well known rule in bankruptcy, and which has been acted on for many years. I take that rule to be very simple. You prove in bankruptcy (and you prove in the same way in a winding-up), for whatever the debt may be up to a particular date. But that is for the purpose of convenience in the administration of the winding-up, and it is not to affect any other rights the parties may have, or to amount to an appropriation of the dividends in any shape or form. The result of that is, as in many cases you may have two, three, or four estates to go against, you prove against each of those two, three, or four estates, for what is due up to the date of the winding-up, but you may take, after proof, from each of those estates every single sixpence you can get, until the debt is extinguished in the proper sense of the term. That is the rule which has been adopted in bankruptcy, and which has been acted upon for a series of years. The whole notion of proving up to a particular date is, in fact, more or less, one can hardly call it a rule of principle, but it is at least a rule of convenience, and a rule which must be taken now to be the law. Applying those rules to this case, I can see no distinction whatever. This case stands exactly as the case would have been in bankruptcy, provided there had been proof against the joint estate, and the security had been on the separate estate. In winding-up it makes no difference that the security is on the estate against which the proof is made. That being so, although the proof in terms is in respect of principal, that does not amount to any appropriation at all, or preclude the party who has proved from dealing with that proof so as in point of fact as to be a sum which can be appropriated for the payment of interest so long as interest is due. That being so this order must be discharged.

The official liquidator to have his costs of the appeal out of the estate.

Solicitors for the Warrant Finance Company, Flux, Argles, and Rawlins.

Solicitors for the official liquidator of the Humber Iron Works Company, Davidson, Carr, and Bannister.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, Dec. 8.

FENWICK v. BULMAN.

Demurrer — Improper parties — Agreement and sub-agreement — Bill for specific performance by sub-purchaser — Original vendor a party — Demurrer overruled.

B. agreed to sell certain property to W., who, before the completion of the agreement, contracted to sell a portion of the property to F. Subsequently F. filed a bill against B. and W., praying for the specific performance of his agreement, and of so much of the agreement between B. and W. as related to the property comprised in his agreement:

Held, on demurrer, that B. was a proper party to the suit.

This was a demurrer. The facts were shortly these:—

By an agreement, dated the 4th Sept. 1868, the defendants, the Messrs. Bulman, trustees for sale, agreed to sell to the defendant William Wilson, a builder, certain freehold lands, situate near Newcastle-upon-Tyne, for the sum of 1200*l.*, the purchaser having the option of purchasing at 300*l.* an acre certain adjacent land.

On the 3rd March 1866 the defendant Wilson, who had been put into possession of the property, for the purpose of carrying on building operations, exercised his right of purchasing the adjacent lands, by entering into an agreement with the plaintiff Fenwick to sell to him two acres of the same for 600*l.* Thereupon the plaintiff was let into possession of that portion of the property, and had since expended nearly 3000*l.* in the erection of a house.

Subsequently the solicitor of the plaintiff prepared a draft conveyance which was settled and approved of both by the solicitor of Wilson and the solicitors of the defendants Bulman, but in consequence of differences arising between the plaintiff and Wilson, the latter refused to execute the conveyance until the former had paid him certain moneys. The engrossment, however, had been executed by the defendants Bulman, and had since remained in their possession.

In June 1868, the defendant Wilson was adjudicated bankrupt, and the defendant Stephenson was appointed creditors' assignee.

In May 1869, the plaintiff tendered to the defendant, Bulman the purchase-money (678*l.*, principal and interest) in respect of the two acres, but they declined to accept it on the ground that they had not been paid the purchase-money under their agreement with Wilson.

Subsequently negotiations took place with a view to a settlement of the differences, but they having failed, Fenwick, on the 22nd Oct. 1869, filed this bill aghinst the Messrs. Bulman, Wilson, and Stephenson, praying that the agreement of the 3rd March 1866, and so much of the agreement of the 4th Sept. 1866, as related to the piece of land comprised in the agreement of March 1866, might be specifically performed, and that the defendants Bulman might be ordered to deliver to the plaintiff the conveyance of the two acres.

To this bill the defendants Bulman demurred, on the ground that they were improper parties to the suit.

It appeared, and it formed one of the allegations in the bill, that the Messrs. Bulman had, on the 19th Nov. 1869, filed a bill against Stephenson and Wilson, and afterwards, by amendment, against Fenwick, praying for the specific performance of the agreement of the 4th Sept. 1863, as against all the defendants, or some or one of them, or, in default, that the agreement might be rescinded.

Greene, Q. C., and Davey, in support of the demurrer, contended that as the Messrs. Bulman were no parties to the plaintiff's contract they had been improperly brought before the court. It had been distinctly laid down by Lord Cottenham in Tasker v. Small, 3 M. & Cr. 64, that a stranger to a contract could not be made a party to a suit for the specific performance of that contract. Of course there were exceptions to this rule, in cases of fraud, for instance, but it was good in all ordinary suits for specific performance. The facts of the present case, however, showed that it could not be taken out of the general rule, and that the defendants were strangers to the plaintiff's contract. The defendants' rights and liabilities were regulated by their own contract, and in filing their bill against the plaintiff, they had prayed either for the performance or the rescission of their contract. The difference between a suit for specific performance, and one to rescind a contract was obvious. In the one case only those bound by the contract could be made parties, but in the other new equities might arise involving the rights of persons not directly interested under the contract, and necessitating their being brought before the court. This distinction was recognised by Lord Cairns in the case of the Aberaman Iron Works v. Wickens, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 110; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 89. Moreover the bill was demurrable on another ground. It prayed that so much of the agreement of the 4th Sept 1863, as related only to that portion of land which the plaintiff had agreed to purchase from the defendant Wilson, might be performed. The plaintiff's equity (if any) consisted of the performance of the contract in toto, and he could not, consistently with the rule of the court, ask for a part performance. They also cited

Chadwick v. Maden, 9 Hare, 188;
Dyer v. Pulteney, Barnard, C. C. 160.

Dickinson, Q. C. and Marten, for the bill, were not called on.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This bill is filed by a sub-purchaser of property purchased from a Mr. Wilson. It appears that Wilson, after contracting with the defendants, Messrs. Bulman, for the purchase of the property comprised in the agreement of the 4th Sept. 1863, contracted with the plaintiff for the sale to him of a portion of the same property, viz., that comprised in the agreement of the 3rd March 1866. Both of the contracts remain unperformed, and in that state of things the plaintiff files his bill against Messrs. Bulman and Mr. Wilson for the specific performance of his contract, and the Messrs. Bulman also file a bill for the specific performance of their contract with Wilson, in which the plaintiff is made a defendant. With regard to the first bill (which forms the subject of the present demurrer) it is said that as the contract of the Messrs. Bulman was only made between them and Wilson, to whom they sold the whole of the property, they are not proper parties to the plaintiff's suit. In support of the demurrer the judgment of Lord Cottenham, in Tasker v. Small (sup.), has been referred to as an authority for the proposition that a stranger to a contract cannot be brought before the court in a suit for the specific performance of that contract. But that is not only a well-known rule of equity, but of common sense; Lord Cottenham, however, took especial care to point out that a stranger to a contract could only be described as a person who was neither entitled to the rights, or subject to the liabilities of it. Now, as the Messrs. Bulman are subject to the liabilities under this contract, they cannot be said to come within Lord Cottenham's definition of strangers. But a dictum of Lord Cairns in the case of Aberaman Iron Works v. Wickens (sup.) has also been relied on, as showing that Lord Cairns considered that the decision in Tasker v. Small applied to every case of a sub-purchaser, and that there was a distinction between a bill to rescind a contract, and a bill for specific performance, but with all due respect to so learned a judge, I think this dictum, if intended to convey the meaning suggested, is founded on a misapprehension. The dictum was not necessary for the purposes of the decision of that case, and I consider that it is hardly doing justice to Lord Cairns, whose attention could not have been sufficiently called to the question, to refer to it as an authority in the present instance. I know of no such distinction. A bill for specific performance which says nothing about rescinding the contract, has no other force or effect, when dismissed, than a rescission of the contract; and, on the other hand, where a bill filed to rescind a contract is dismissed, the parties remain bound by the contract, and the result is specific performance. But if there could be any doubt about the question it would be dispelled by the authority of Lord Hardwicke, in Dyer v. Pulteney (sup.), which has been cited in support of the demurrer. That was a suit for specific performance instituted by a sub-purchaser, and Lord Hardwicke, while deciding the case against the plaintiff on other grounds, distinctly pointed out the obvious equity which a sub-purchaser had. The present case, moreover, is in my opinion further relieved from all doubt by the fact that the demurring defendants have made the plaintiff a party to their suit for the performance of their contract. The demurrer must be overruled with costs.

Solicitors: Cookson, Wainwright, and Co., for J. and N. G. Clayton, Newcastle-upon-Tyne; Theodore Waterhouse, for J. and R. S. Watson, Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, Nov. 18.

Re HEATON STEEL AND IRON COMPANY (LIMITED); SIMPSON'S CASE.

Joint-stock Company—25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, s. 35—Summary application not in a winding-up.

A contract was entered into by the H. Company to purchase the L. Company for 34,000l., with a proviso for rescinding by either party in case 2500 preference shares were not taken by a day fixed. S., chairman of the L. Company and a director of the H. Company, also undertook that if the shareholders did not take 2500 shares according to the proviso, he would take 1708. The 2500 shares were not taken, and the contract was rescinded, and S.'s name put on the register for the 1708 shares.

A motion by S., under the summary powers conferred by the 35th section of the Companies Act 1862, to rectify the register, by striking out S.'s name, refused, without prejudice to filing a bill.

Cotton, Q. C. and C. T. Simpson moved in this matter under the summary power conferred on the court by the 35th section of the Companies Act 1862 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 85), to rectify the register of shareholders in this company by striking out the name of John Simpson in respect of 1708 preference shares. The facts were these:—On the 4th Nov. 1868 the Heaton Steel and Iron Company (Limited) was incorporated, with a nominal capital of 400,000*l.*, in 30,000 ordinary and 10,000 preference shares, the ordinary shares being treated as fully paid-up. A contract was entered into between the Heaton Steel and Iron Company (Limited) and the Langley Mills Steel and Iron Works Company (brought out about the same time) for the purchase of the Langley Mills Company by the Heaton Company for 34,000*l.* This contract contained this proviso:

Provided always that in case on or before the 1st July 1869 there shall not be allotted to and registered in the books of the said Heaton Iron and Steel Company (Limited), in the names of responsible parties, as members of the same company, according to the statutes in force in that behalf, at least one-fourth of the said 10,000 preference shares of the said company, it shall be lawful for either of the said companies, or their successors, by notice in writing, to the other of them, given on or within ten days after the said 1st July 1869, to determine these presents, without prejudice nevertheless to any existing right of action on either side, but otherwise these presents shall remain and be in full force and virtue, notwithstanding that the whole of the said shares of the said company should not be subscribed for or allotted.

Upon the arrangement for this contract, the directors and promoters of the respective companies came to an agreement that in case the contract was carried out, such of the shareholders as choose to do so, might take shares in the Heaton Company of the same nominal value as the shares held by them calculated as paid-up. Such shares to be taken as part of the 34,000*l.* purchase-money under the contract. This was proposed to be carried out by signing the following form:

Digitized by Google

I, the undersigned, as a shareholder of the Langley Mills Steel and Iron Works Company (Limited), do hereby consent to the directors of the company negotiating and completing the sale and transfer of the effects and assets of the company to a new company about to be formed, upon the terms that such new company shall either discharge the liabilities of the company, or pay a sum sufficient to enable the directors to do so, and allot to the shareholders in the above-mentioned company, shares in the new company equivalent in nominal value and calculated as paid-up to the same amount as the shares held by them in the above company, or upon such modification of the above terms as the directors may think reasonable. And upon such shares being allotted to me, I undertake to execute such transfer of my shares in the said company as shall have been agreed upon between the directors and the new company or the directors thereof.

Dated this 21st day of July 1869.

All the shareholders of the Langley Mills Company signed this document, and John Simpson, who was chairman of that company, also signed the following separate one:

4th Nov. 1868.

Gentlemen,—In consideration of your agreeing at my request to affix the seal of your company to a provisional contract dated this day, and made between the Langley Mills Iron and Steel Company (Limited) of the one part, and the Heaton Steel and Iron Company of the other part (such contract providing for the purchase of the last-mentioned company of the whole of the freehold hereditaments, plants, tools, utensils, and manufacturing implements and effects of the Langley Mills Iron and Steel Company for the sum of 34,000*l.*, payable at the times and in manner mentioned in such contract), I hereby undertake and agree that the persons mentioned in the schedule to this undertaking who are respectively at the present time shareholders in the Langley Mills Company, shall apply for preference shares in the Heaton Steel and Iron Company (Limited), to the same nominal amount as their present holdings. And for the consideration aforesaid, I hereby undertake and agree in the event of the shareholders to whom I have referred, not making such applications, I will myself apply for and take an allotment of the said shares, it being understood that 644 of such shares are, when issued, to be credited with the sum of 10*l.* per share, and 1064 when issued to be credited with the sum of 6*l.* per share. And that the Langley Mills Steel and Iron Works Company (Limited) shall give credit to the Heaton Steel and Iron Company (Limited) for the aggregate amount of the said preference shares so to be allotted as aforesaid as against the balance of the sum of 34,000*l.* being the purchase-money hereinbefore referred to.

John Simpson being a director of the Heaton Company, on the 20th June 1869, received the following notice from that company:

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the directors have, in pursuance of the terms and stipulations contained in your undertaking, given to the directors of this company, dated 4th Nov. 1868, allotted to you 1708 preference shares in the above-named company, upon 644 of which you are credited with 10*l.* per share; and I am instructed to request that you will pay the amount of 4*l.* per share upon 1064, being the remainder of the shares in respect of which you are credited with 6*l.* per share into the hands of the company's bankers, Messrs. Ransome and Co., Pall Mall East.

(Signed) James Malley, Secretary.

Due notice will be given when the bankers' receipts will be discharged for share certificates.

On the 27th June 1869 John Simpson, through his solicitor, refused to accept this allotment, or pay the money demanded, insisting that he had never applied for shares, and that the directors had no right to do as they had done. On the above letter being written, the name of John Simpson was entered on the register for 1708 shares. It appeared that 4178 shares (including the 1708 so purported to have been allotted to John Simpson) had been registered in all. On the 8th July the Langley Mills Company gave notice of rescinding the contract, reciting it, and that one-fourth of the 10,000 preference shares, or 2500, had not been taken. Under these circumstances this motion was made by John Simpson. There were therefore three points, first, an undertaking by Simpson, under which he could not be put on the register so long as the contract of the 4th Nov. was not positive; secondly, when he was put on the register on the 20th June 2500 preference shares were not in existence; and, thirdly, that the contract was not absolute, it being a mere guarantee by Simpson, that at a certain time shareholders should be placed with shares, and that there was no application by him to take shares, and no contract until other shareholders had failed. Even if the provisional contract was absolute, it did not follow that it was complete; it might fail, either from the inability or unwillingness of the Heaton Company to carry it out. The contract was made up of two sums, 6440*l.* and 6384*l.*, contingently payable, and not until all these questions were settled was the contract complete.

30 & 31 Vict. c. 131, ss. 24, 25.

Glasse, Q. C. and Cracknall for the company, insisted that the 1708 shares were included in the 2500 (or one-fourth of the 10,000 preference shares). If not, it was an ingenious contrivance to prevent the contract being carried out by excluding them. Simpson was the chairman of the Langley Mills Company, and a promoter of the Heaton Iron and Steel Company; he was to help to carry on the purchase of the company of which he was chairman; but, having received 6000*l.* into his own pocket, and the contract being rescinded, and his name put on the register, he now asked to have it taken off by excluding the 1708 shares, which would render the contract impossible of completion, and release him from his undertaking. This was not a case for a summary application, it was a subject for a bill:

Parker's Case, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 685;
Ward's Case (ibid), 431;
Bullock v. Chapman, 2 De G. & S. 211;
Re British Sugar Refining Company, 3 K. & J. 408.

The Vice-Chancellor.—This is an application by John Simpson to take his name off the list of contributories in respect of 1708 shares in the Heaton Iron and Steel Company (Limited). It is a summary application under the 35th section of the Companies Act 1862, relating to a company not arranged to be wound-up, or having anything to do with winding-up, on the ground that John Simpson's name is improperly on the list of contributories. Now no doubt this section confers great powers as far as the language goes, but the authorities have now settled the construction of it to be, that it can only be applied in cases that are clear and free from doubt. Is this a case that can be so described? The transaction under which the question arises is this. On the 3rd Nov. 1868, Heaton's Steel and Iron Company (Limited) was formed for the purpose of working Heaton's process of manufacturing steel, with the usual memorandum and articles of association, consisting of seven persons who each took one share and signed those documents for those shares. John Simpson was a director of the Heaton company. There was another company called "The Langley Mills Iron Works Company," which I must regard as part of the same transaction, being constituted by a document dated the next day, and it impossible not to see that the arrangement for the purchase of the Langley Mills Company by the Heaton Company and the formation of those companies was all one and the same transaction. By a contract dated on the 4th Nov. 1868, the Langley Mills Company were to sell their concern to the Heaton Company for a considerable sum of money—34,000*l.*; and the Heaton Company being formed only the day before, the contract would be an absolute nullity, unless they got the shares taken; and therefore the provision was not unreasonable that if by a certain time, 1st July 1869, there should not be allotted to the Heaton Company, in respect of responsible parties according to the statutes in force, one-fourth of 10,000 preference shares, it should be lawful for either company or their successors, by notice within ten days, to withdraw. This was on the 4th Nov., and on the same day John Simpson gave this undertaking to the Heaton Company, that is, to the directors, that in consideration of their agreeing, at his request, to affix the seal of the company to a provisional contract between the companies, such contract providing for the purchase by the Heaton Company of the Langley Mills Company for 34,000*l.*, he agreed that the persons mentioned in the schedule of that undertaking, then shareholders of the Langley Mills Company, should apply for shares in the Heaton Company (Limited) to the same nominal amount as their then holdings, and he undertook and agreed, for the consideration aforesaid, that in the event of the shareholders not making such application he would himself apply for and take an allotment of the shares, 644 to be credited with 10*l.* per share, and 1064 with 6*l.* per share, the Langley Company to give credit to the Heaton Company for the aggregate amount of the shares as against the 34,000*l.* purchase-money. This was signed by John Simpson. On the 26th of June, very close indeed upon the time mentioned in this undertaking with reference to the power of rescinding the contract if 2500 shares were not applied for, the Heaton Company finding the shares not taken, and being anxious that the Langley Mills Company should not rescind the contract (the Langley Mills Company having received 7000*l.* odd for deposit), put John Simpson's name on the list for 1708 shares; and if it was rightly put on, 2500, the shares mentioned in the proviso, were made up; if not, there was a right to rescind on the part of the Langley Mills Company. The Langley Mills Company I must regard as put in action by Simpson, and the requisite number not being made up on the 8th July, they therefore rescinded the contract, reciting that one-quarter of the shares had not been applied for. I cannot sever Simpson from these proceedings of the Langley Mills Company as to the non-taking of the 2500 shares, of which the 1708 shares were to form part. I think this is a most unfair attempt to vitiate the contract on the proviso in case the 2500 shares were not taken, and to regard his shares as not to be reckoned in addition to those applied for, which would be the case if Mr. Simpson and the Langley Mills Company have taken a right view of the contract. Is it so clear that Simpson was not to take the shares? I cannot on this summary application decide that he was right to take his name off in the absence of the Langley Mills Company. They may be wrong, or they may file a bill, and succeed in sustaining the contract. The interest of the Langley Mills Company is to have as many shareholders as they can procure; and, therefore, can it be said to be a question in which the Langley Mills Company have no interest? They are not here, and I had rather not express an opinion; but if I were dealing with the whole transaction, I should be of opinion that the true meaning of the affair was that Simpson himself, who was the moving spirit, was to put the company in possession of a valuable contract by contributing 1708 shares, and an attempt to vitiate that is unsustainable. The motion cannot succeed, and, so far as I have heard, my opinion is against Simpson. It is a complicated, difficult, and doubtful question, and not one in which I am justified in acting on the decisions in Ward's and Parker's cases (supra). In Musgrave's case, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 193, I was obliged to come to a conclusion, contrary to my own judgment, which was that the 35th section ought to receive a liberal interpretation; I thought that Messrs. Musgrave ought to be taken off and Mr. Hart put on. I am bound to leave the parties to file a bill. This is a case which I could not think of deciding, and if I were to do so, it would be against Simpson. It must be without prejudice to filing a bill.

Digitized by Google

Solicitor for the motion, W. Coates Stoker.

Soliciior for the company, Manning.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET, and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, Dec. 8.

FINNEY v. GODFREY.

Practice—Exceptions to bill—Scandal.

The plaintiff's bill charged that a certain bill of exchange ought to be delivered up to be cancelled, on the ground of fraud, and that "A. B., one of the defendants, had knowledge that another of the defendants, C. D., had been mixed up with irregular transactions connected with bills of exchange."

Held to be not scandalous, and that such defendant was bound to answer.

This was a bill filed by the plaintiff, John Finney, against three defendants, Godfrey, Turner and McCraw, and it prayed that a certain bill of exchange, particularising it, might be delivered up to be cancelled, on the ground of fraud, as therein alleged. It was stated that the plaintiff had indorsed such bill for the accommodation of one James, not a party to the suit, and the bill also alleged that the bill of exchange had come into the possession of the defendant Godfrey, who had commenced an action at law on such bill, and which was intended to be supported by a fraudulent contrivance between the defendants before mentioned, without any consideration having been given for the amount of such bill of exchange.

The bill had been amended, and contained the following additional charge: "That the defendants Turner and M'Craw were in concealment, and that plaintiff had been unable to ascertain where they were to be found. That both such defendants were and are to the knowledge of the other defendant Godfrey men of no means, and each or one of them had been declared bankrupt. That defendant M'Craw has in particular to the knowledge of the defendant Godfrey been mixed up with several irregular transactions connected with bills of exchange." The defendant Godfrey excepted to the latter part of this charge for scandal.

E. E. Kay, Q.C., and Horsey, for the exceptant.

G. Hastings for the bill.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that in his opinion there did not appear anything in this particular chagre in the bill of which the defendant Godfrey was entitled to complain. What ground of complaint the defendant M'Craw might have was a different matter. A general ground had been advanced that "the court was bound to keep the records of the court clean." He, the Vice-Chancellor, did not, however, require the assistance of the defendant Godfrey to effect this. The whole as respects this rested with the discretion of the court. The defendant must consequently answer, and the exceptions disallowed with costs.

Order accordingly

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Deane and Chubb.

Solicitor for the defendant, T. Apps.

Digitized by Google

Saturday, Dec. 11.

BAKER v. WAIT.

County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act 1865, ss. 8, 10—Transfer of plaint to Court of Chancery.

Where all the substantial defendants to a County Court plaint resided out of the district of the court, the plaint was ordered to be transferred to the Court of Chancery.

This was an application by adjourned summons that a plaint might be transferred from the Bristol County Court to the Court of Chancery.

The plaint stated that the defendant, J. W. R. Brooks, was a customer of the plaintiff (an ironmonger at Bristol), and was largely indebted for goods supplied by the plaintiff to him, and to a company of which Brooks was promoter. That in payment of the amount due to the plaintiff, the defendant gave him acceptances which turned out to be valueless. That the defendant Brooks then stated that the defendant Alice A. W. Wait was in his debt to a considerable amount, and promised to obtain a bill of exchange from her to secure the amount of his debt to the plaintiff. That shortly afterwards the defendant Brooks handed to the plaintiff a bill of exchange for 300*l.*, accepted by the defendant Mrs. Wait, and a few days after the defendant as further security for the amount due from him to the plaintiff, handed to the plaintiff a promissory note for 500*l.* signed by Mrs. Wait.

Both the bill for 300*l.* and the note for 500*l.* were payable to the order of Brooks, and indorsed over by him to the plaintiff.

The plaint alleged that both the bill and the note were due, but that the defendant Mrs. Wait had refused to meet them.

The plaint then set out a marriage settlement, by which certain real and personal property was settled to the separate use of Mrs. Wait.

The plaint stated that the defendant Brooks had left Bristol, but that the plaintiff was unable to find out where he had gone to, or where he then was.

The plaint alleged that the plaintiff was willing to give up the bill of 300*l.* in lieu of and in substitution for which the note for 500*l.* was given him, and prayed (inter alia) that the trustees of the settlement, who were made defendants, might be ordered to pay out of the trust property what might be found due in respect of the bill and the note.

The plaintiff stated in his affidavit that the defendant Brooks, though at present absent from Bristol, had a residence at West Clifton-terrace, Bristol.

The defendant Mrs. Wait stated, in an affidavit, that she and her husband resided at Bournemouth, in Hampshire, which was more than ninety miles from Bristol; that one of her trustees resided at Plymouth; and that the other resided at Chew Stoke, within the County Court district of Temple Cloud.

Locock Webb appeared for the defendants in support of the application.

Ford, for the plaintiff, opposed.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the intention of the Legislature was that the County Courts should only dispose of matters bonâ fide within their jurisdiction. Here none of the substantial defendants were in the jurisdiction, the only one residing in the County Court district being a sort of pocket defendant of the plaintiff, and in his interest. He should make a simple order for transfer. The order to be subject to any order the court might hereafter make as to costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Robins and Burges.

Solicitors for the defendants, Jones, Blaxland, and Son.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PRAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dec. 18 and 20.

Re THE HEYFORD COMPANY (LIMITED); FORBES'S AND JUDD'S CASES.

Company — Contributory — Winding-up — Subscribing memorandum of association — Allotment of shares to nominee of vendor—Fully paid-up shares—The Companies Act 1862, ss. 18, 23.

P., F., J., and I. subscribed the memorandum of association of a company for 1350, 50, 50, and 50 shares respectively in the ordinary way, there being nothing to show that the shares were to be treated as fully paid-up. In the articles of association an agreement was embodied, and thereby ratified, by which P. was to transfer certain property to the company, and was to accept 1500 fully paid-up shares in part payment of the purchase-money. He transferred the property to the company, and 1350 shares were allotted to him, fifty shares apiece (the remainder of the 1500 shares) being allotted to his nominees F., J., and I., who made no payment at all in respect of the shares.

On a summons by F. and J. to have their names removed from the list of contributories of the company which had been ordered to be wound-up on a creditor's petition:

Held, that their names must remain on the list of contributories.

Re South Blackpool Hotel Company, Migotti's Case, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 271; L. Rep. 4, Eq. 238, and Evans's Case, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 252; L. Rep. 2 Ch. 427 followed.

Pell's Case, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 412; L. Rep. 9 Eq. 11; and Drummond's Case, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 317; L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 772, held to be irreconcileable with Migotti's and Evans's Cases.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application on behalf of Messrs. William Forbes and Clarence H. Judd, to have their names removed from the list of contributories of the above named company, on which they had been placed by the official liquidator, in respect of fifty shares each.

The circumstances of the case were as follows:

The Heyford Company (Limited) was registered on the 26th Aug. 1865. It was formed for the purpose of carrying on the Heyford Iron Works, and of adopting a certain agreement, dated 1st Aug. 1865, and made between George Pell, the promoter of the company, of the one part, and the company of the other part. By this agreement, which was embodied in the articles of association of the company, and thereby ratified and confirmed, it was agreed that Pell should sell to the company the goodwill of the business carried on by him at the Heyford Iron Works, together with the stock-in-trade, &c., and that the price or consideration to be paid by the company to Pell should be as follows:—The company to issue to the said George Pell, his nominee or nominees, 1500 shares in the company of the nominal value of 20*l.* each, which shares should be respectively credited in the books of the company as fully paid-up, and the said George Pell to accept the same in part payment of the purchase or consideration-money for his interest in the premises sold to the company. The company were, moreover, to issue to Pell debentures of the value of 45,000*l.*, and to pay him 7000*l.* in cash within the next six months.

There were at no time any other members of the company than the following seven persons who subscribed the memorandum of association: Judd, who subscribed it for fifty shares; Samuel Isaac for fifty shares; Forbes for fifty shares; H. W. Cresswell for twenty shares; J. Percivall for one share; Pell for 1350 shares; and Charles Barratt for one share. There was nothing on the memorandum of association to show that the shares subscribed for by Pell, Forbes, Judd, and Isaac, were to be treated as fully paid-up, but by an arrangement made with the company in Dec. 1865, 1350 shares, credited in the company's books as fully paid-up, were allotted to Pell, and by his direction, fifty shares apiece were allotted to Forbes, Judd, and Isaac (which shares were also credited in the company's books as fully paid-up), making, together, 1500 shares, which was the number of fully paid-up shares to which Pell was entitled under the agreement of the 1st Aug. 1865 with the company.

Digitized by Google

No money payment was ever made in respect of these 1500 shares, the only consideration given for them being the property handed over to the company by Pell. The company incurred debts to the extent of some 11,000*l.*, in the purchase of coals and other materials for the purposes of their works, and in Dec. 1866 a petition was presented by one of the creditors for the winding-up of the company, which was accordingly ordered to be wound-up. The official liquidator placed Pell's name on the list of contributories in respect of the 1350 shares for which he had signed the memorandum of association; and he also placed on the list the names of Forbes, Judd, and Isaac in respect of the fifty shares each, for which they had respectively signed the memorandum of association.

On a summons by the official liquidator to have Pell's name fixed on the list in respect of the 1350 shares, it was held by the Master of the Rolls that he must be fixed on the list, but that he would only have to pay the balance found due from him after deducting the value of the property transferred by him to the company: (See Pell's case, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 320; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 222.) On appeal, it was held by Giffard, L. J. that Pell's shares, so long as the agreement set forth in the articles of association was not impeached, could only be treated as fully paid-up shares. The case on appeal is reported in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 412.

Forbes and Judd, in consequence of the decision of the Lord Justice in Pell's case, took out the present summons to have their names also removed from the list on the ground that they had signed the memorandum of association on the understanding that the shares for which they signed it should be allotted to them out of the 1500 fully paid-up shares agreed to be issued to Pell and his nominees. The summons was now adjourned into court.

It appeared that Pell had resumed possession of the iron works under a clause in the agreement of the 1st Aug. 1865; that Cresswell, who had signed the memorandum of association for twenty shares, had become bankrupt; and that, consequently, if the present applicants were removed from the list there would be nothing to meet the liabilities of the company, and the costs of liquidation, except the two shares of 20*l.* each, for which Percivall and Barratt had subscribed the memorandum of association.

Westlake, in support of the summons.—This case is governed by Giffard, L. J.'s decision in Pell's case (sup.), in which his Lordship followed Re The China Steamship and Labuan Coal Company (Limited), Drummond's Case, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 317; L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 772. The distinction between this and the cases in which it has been held that persons who had signed the memorandum were contributories notwithstanding the fact that fully paid-up shares had been allotted to them, is that here there was an agreement of the applicants directly with the company to take the shares as fully paid-up, while in those cases the agreement was not with the company, but with one of the shareholders. In the present case there was what the Lord Justice calls "direct action" between the applicants and the company, which clearly distinguishes this from

Re The South Blackpool Hotel Company, Migotti's case, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 271; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 238;
Re South of France Wine Company, Baron de Beville's Case, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 11.

Roxburgh, Q.C., for the official liquidator. It is impossible to distinguish this case from Migotti's, which is thus stated by Lord Justice Giffard in his judgment in Drummond's Case, L. Rep. 4 Ch. 778: "Where M. subscribed the memorandum of association of a company for five shares, and, eight months afterwards, five fully paid-up shares, which the company had agreed to allot to C. as part of the purchase-money for property sold to them by C., were, by C.'s direction, allotted to M., and the company was wound-up: Held, that M. was a contributory in respect of five shares, upon which nothing had been paid." And his Lordship continues:—"I take that case to decide this, and to decide no more; that Migotti, by signing a memorandum of association, contracted as between himself and the company, to take five shares, and that taking the five paid-up shares which did not belong to the company, but which did belong to C., was, in reality, taking the shares from C., and not from the company, and therefore that he had never fulfilled that contract with the company which he had entered into by signing the memorandum of association." So in the present case Forbes and Judd, by taking the fifty fully paid-up shares apiece which did not belong to the company, but to Pell, have never fulfilled the contract with the company which they entered into by signing the memorandum of association, and, therefore, their names must be fixed on the list. This case is on all fours with Migotti's case, which, in Lord Justice Giffard's opinion, was "most correctly decided," and which your Lordship is, I submit, bound to follow. He also referred to Re The London Hamburgh and Continental Exchange Bank, Evans's Case, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 252; L. Rep. 2 Ch. 427.

Westlake replied.

Dec. 20.—Lord ROMILLY.—I have considered this case very carefully, and I cannot in any way distinguish it from Migotti's case (sup.), and therefore I must follow that case, and keep these gentlemen on the list. It is impossible, however, to say this without adding a few words of explanation. Evans's case (sup.) was decided by me (not reported below), and went to the Lords Justices, who affirmed my decision; but Pell's case (sup.) and Drummond's case (sup.) appear to me to be quite irreconcilable with it and with Migotti's case, although Lord Justice Giffard seems to have distinguished them; but the distinction which he draws between taking fully paid-up shares under an agreement with the company and taking them under an agreement with somebody else appears to me to be much too fine to be acted upon. The question appears to me to depend on this, What is the meaning of the 8th and 23rd sections of the Act (Companies Act 1862)? Do they mean this, which is the construction I have put on them—that they require that a person who subscribes the memorandum of association for shares shall, in order to satisfy that agreement, take separate and distinct shares from those which are mentioned in the articles of association, to be given in payment of any contract which he may have entered into; in other words, that the shares subscribed for by the memorandum of association cannot be satisfied by any relaxation of any then existing or antecedent debt, and that they must be paid for after the memorandum of association has been signed, and after the company has been registered, and that no antecedent debt can in any way be applied in payment of those shares? Of course I assent to the remark made by Giffard, L. J., that they may be paid for either in meal or in malt (to quote the expression used in his judgment), because unquestionably they may be paid for afterwards in goods delivered for the benefit of the company. If the company wants goods they may say, "Instead of paying us 100*l.* for four shares of 25*l.* each, deliver to us goods wanted for the company, and we will take them in discharge of your shares." I do not doubt the accuracy of that; but I do consider that the statute does not allow the memorandum of association to be signed in respect of a then existing debt. This is exceedingly important for one or two reasons, and it is necessary that I should call attention to them. In the first place, it is be observed that the statute is exceedingly precise about it. Why is a memorandum of association directed, and why are persons directed to subscribe the memorandum of association unless it is to inform the public that it is a bonâ fide concern, and that there is something really to be acted upon? Observe that the 8th section of the Act requires that the memorandum of association shall contain the following things. [His Lordship stated the effect of the 8th section, and continued.] Then after specifying various matters it is subject to these regulations, that no subscriber shall take less than one share, and that each subscriber to the memorandum of association shall write opposite to his name the number of shares that he takes. I do not think that that is consistent with this, that the taking of shares is merely nominal, and that the shares may be paid-up shares without being so expressed in the memorandum of association. The next section is the 23rd, which is as follows: "The subscribers of the memorandum of association of any company under this Act shall be deemed to have agreed to become members of the company whose memorandum they have subscribed, and upon the registration of the company shall be entered as members upon the register of members hereinafter mentioned, and every other person who has agreed to become a member of a company under this Act, and whose name is entered on the register of members shall be deemed to be a member of the company." Is it possible, consistently with the object of this Act, to hold that that means that he is to be a member of the company to receive profits, but not to pay debts? That is what it literally amounts to. I wish also to point out what the effect of this is. I think they were 20*l.* shares in the company. I mention what has happened in the case of this company merely as an illustration of what may take place, without at all meaning to impute to anybody the intention of committing any fraud of any kind. This company was formed for the working of an iron mine. The owner of the mine agrees to sell it to the company for (amongst other things) 1500 fully paid-up 20*l.* shares. Thereupon he subscribes the memorandum of association, and this agreement is stated in the articles of association, so that nobody can complain of it. He subscribes the memorandum of association for 1350 shares, and the two gentlemen, who are now applying to me to have their names struck off the list of contributories of the company, also subscribe the memorandum of association for fifty shares, which fifty shares each are given to them by Mr. Pell (the vendor of the mine) out of the 1500 fully paid-up shares which are taken for the mine. It so happens that there are upon the memorandum of association the following persons who subscribed the memorandum of association—namely, Mr. Pell for 1350 shares, Mr. Judd for fifty shares, Mr. Isaac for fifty shares, Mr. Forbes for fifty shares. All these are supplied by Mr. Pell, and make up together the 1500 shares. Then there is Mr. Cresswell for twenty shares, Mr. Percivall for one share, and Mr. Barratt for one share. Those twenty-two shares are the only shares not paid up. It so happens that the gentlemen who subscribed the memorandum of association are the only shareholders of the company; there is not another shareholder belonging to the company, so I am assured by counsel on the one side, and it is not contradicted by counsel on the other side. The consequence is one of a very singular description. The facts are these: Mr. Pell gives up this mine to the company; they incur debts to the extent of upwards of 11,000*l.* in the supply of coals and other material for the working of the mine; the creditors are not paid, and thereupon a petition is presented to have the company wound-up, and accordingly the company is ordered to be wound-up. A result occurs which it is difficult to mention seriously. The very persons who had signed the memorandum of association and who, in their character of individuals, are liable to take the shares in the company, in their character of the company agree that the shares for which they have signed the memorandum of association shall all be taken to be the 1500 paid-up shares; so that the identical same persons having agreed to form a company, and having incurred debts to the amount of 11,000*l.* in their character of company agree that they shall not pay them. Nobody can touch them. I hold that the statute does not allow that. The statute says that these 1500 shares mentioned in the articles of association cannot be applied to the shares taken upon the memorandum of association. They must be separate and distinct shares. That was intended for the benefit and security of the public. Giffard, L. J. has held the contrary. In this company the poor man who signed the memorandum of association for twenty shares has become bankrupt, so that the consequence of Giffard, L. J.'s decision would be that there would be only two shares of 20*l.* each to pay the whole debt of 11,000*l.*, and all the cost of the liquidation. That may be the true construction of the Act of Parliament, but it does not appear to me to be so. It seems to me to be a most monstrous result, and to be a most extraordinary premium upon every possible species of, I was almost going to say, swindling, but certainly fraud. Although I do not mean to accuse these gentlemen of having intended to do anything fraudulent, yet what they have done is this: They have determined to form a company upon these conditions—that if it succeeds they are to receive the profit, and if it fails they are to pay nothing. The probability is that that state of circumstances the company would fail, and it has failed. I think this is a matter of great importance, and it is very important that it should be set right, and that the public should really know what they are doing when dealing with companies of this description. It would be a very different thing if the memorandum of association said "paid up shares"—shares already paid; but the public has no notice further than this, that there was 150 times 20*l.*, which they believed to be the assets of the company applicable for the purposes of the company; that is to say, they believed there was 30,000 subject to deductions, applicable to the payment of the expenses of the company, and then this is the result. I am very anxious that this should go further and be settled. I must say that I cannot distinguish this case from Migotti's case (sup.), a case which Lord Justice Giffard seems to have distinguished and approved of in another case (Drummond's case, L. Rep. 4 Ch. 778, and sup.) Therefore I shall keep these persons on the list, and shall dismiss the summons with costs, which is absolutely necessary. If this case goes further I should very much wish it to be mentioned that I should request the Lord Chancellor to consider it, and that he would be one of the judges to hear it, in order that it may be finally settled what the real construction of these sections of the Act is, for really the sole question upon these sections is, whether the shares subscribed for by the memorandum of association can be satisfied by an existing or antecedent debt, whether the paid-up shares mentioned in the articles of association to be given for the purchase of the mine, which is only another mode of stating it, can be applied in payment of the shares subscribed for in the memorandum of association? I am of opinion that they cannot, and that these gentlemen's names must be placed on the list of contributories.

Digitized by Google

Solicitors for the applicants, Elmslie, Forsyth, and Sedgwick.

Solicitors for the official liquidator, Denton, Hall, and Barker.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, Nov. 8, 1869.

RICHARDSON v. DU BOIS.

Husband and wife—Husband a lunatic—Authority of wife to pledge husband's credit—Repairs to house.

Where necessary repairs were done to the house of a lunatic by a tradesman taking orders from the lunatic's wife, she being in the receipt of an allowance sufficient for all domestic purposes, including the repairs, the Court Held, that the wife had no authority under these circumstances to pledge the credit of her husband, and that his estate was not liable.

This was an action for work and labour done, and materials supplied and goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, to which the defendant pleaded never indebted.

From the facts as proved in evidence at the trial it appeared that the plaintiff is a house decorator and builder, carrying on business in Sloane-street, and that the defendant is a proctor, and was at the time the work was done a lunatic and in an asylum. The plaintiff did not, however, know till after a portion of the work had been done that the defendant was a lunatic, and after he discovered that such was the case, he continued to perform the work under the directions of the defendant's wife, who had given the orders in the first instance.

The house to which the repairs were done was held by the defendant on a long lease. The whole of the defendant's income, which amounted to 350*l.* per annum, was, after payment of the expenses of his maintenance in the lunatic asylum, paid over to the defendant's wife, who continued to reside in the house with her children. Further sums of money had also been paid to the wife of the defendant by his partner and others, amounting altogether in the space of two years and four months to 2219*l.*

The learned Judge, Hannen J., at the trial left it to the jury to determine (1) whether credit was given by the plaintiff to the husband; (2) whether the repairs were reasonable and proper to be done, having regard to the defendant's estate, and such as would be proper irrespectively of any allowance to the wife; and (3) whether the allowance made to the wife was sufficient for all purposes, including the repairs done to the house. The jury found that the wife acted as agent for her husband, that the repairs were reasonable and necessary, and that the allowance made to the wife was sufficient for all purposes, including the repairs. On these findings the learned judge directed the verdict to be entered for the defendant, giving the plaintiff leave to move to enter the verdict for him.

O'Brien, Serjt., having obtained a rule nisi, calling on the defendant to show cause why the verdict should not be entered for the plaintiff,

Keane, Q. C. and Robins, now showed cause against the rule. The defendant is entitled to have the verdict entered for him, the jury having found that the allowance to his wife was sufficient for every purpose, including the repairs done to the house. The estate of a lunatic is no doubt bound to pay for necessaries supplied to the lunatic's wife; but the present is not such a case. The class of cases in which a wife is enabled to pledge her husband's credit is stated by Alderson, B. in Read v. Legard, 6 Ex. 642, "If she is compelled by his misconduct to procure the necessary articles for herself, as for instance if he drives her from his house, or brings improper persons into it, so that no respectable woman could live there, according to the decided cases, he gives her authority to pledge his credit for her necessary maintenance elsewhere, which means that the law gives that authority by force of the relation of husband and wife. So if a husband omit to furnish his wife with necessaries while living with him, she may procure them elsewhere, otherwise she would perish. Then if, as here, the husband becomes lunatic by the visitation of God, and therefore unable to provide his wife with necessaries, he is in the same situation as a husband omitting to furnish them; and as by the relation which he originally contracted, he undertook to provide her with them himself, he becomes liable to any person who does it for him."

The Court here called on

O'Brien, Serjt., and Beasley, to support the rule. The ordinary doctrine applying to the case of a wife who lives apart from her husband has no application to a case like the present. The expense was here incurred for the benefit of the husband's estate, and not for the personal benefit of the wife. There might be a lease of the house, which would become forfeited for non-repairs. In Williams v. Wentworth, 5 Beav. 325, it was laid down that the law will raise an implied contract, and give a valid demand or debt against a lunatic or his estate for moneys expended for the necessary protection of his person and estate. The jury have found that the defendant's wife acted in this matter as his agent. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Simply in the sense of being his wife, and as such ordering necessary things. MELLOR, J. And the jury have found that she had money enough to pay for these repairs.] How can that consideration affect the plaintiff? [COCKBURN, C. J.—In this way, that the wife's implied authority to bind the husband is limited to cases where the expenses are necessary and the allowance to the wife is not sufficient.] There is no living apart from her husband by the wife in this case; neither has she a separate allowance in the ordinary sense. [LUSH, J.—If you give your servant or anybody else money to pay for a certain thing, can he pledge your credit for it?]

COCKBURN, C. J.—I do not think it is necessary to add anything to what we have said in the course of the argument. Where a man's wife has sufficient means allowed her for defraying all necessary expenses connected with the house, there the law will not imply any authority on her part to pledge his credit. And I do not think that the lunacy of the husband makes any difference. The rule must be discharged.

Digitized by Google

MELLOR, LUSH, and HANNEN, JJ., concurred.

Rule discharged.

Attorney for plaintiff, J. Wright.

Attorney for defendant, J. Aldridge.

Nov. 1 and Dec. 13, 1869.

THE COMMISSIONERS FOR ADMINISTERING THE LAWS FOR THE RELIEF OF THE POOR FOR IRELAND (apps.) v. THE SELECT VESTRY OF THE PARISH OF LIVERPOOL (resps.)

Poor law—Order of removal—Removal of a married woman to the place of settlement in Ireland, without her husband.

A woman born in Ireland, married an Irishman, whose place of settlement was unknown. They came to England, and the husband having deserted his wife she became chargeable to the parish of L., which parish obtained an order for her removal to the union in Ireland within which she was born:

Held, that there was no jurisdiction to make such an order, which was therefore bad.

This was a case stated as follows, under sect. 11 of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45.

At a petty sessions of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the borough of Liverpool holden on the 28th May 1868, a warrant for the removal of one Ellen Keating by mistake called in the said warrant Ellen Caton, and her two children Margaret and John, from the parish of Liverpool to the union of Fullamore, a copy of which order is hereunto annexed, marked B, was granted by Thomas Darnley Anderson and John Woodruff, Esqrs., the justices present at the said petty session. The said warrant was made upon the examination of the said Ellen Keating, taken before the said two justices, according to law, hereunto annexed and marked A.

And whereas the appellants have given due notice of appeal against the said warrant to the court of quarter sessions for the said borough of Liverpool, pursuant to the 7th section of the stat. 26 & 27 Vict. c. 89, on the grounds set forth in the notice of grounds of appeal hereunto annexed, and marked C.

And whereas it has been agreed by and between the appellants and respondents, that pursuant to the 116th section of the stat. 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, the facts of the said case should be stated in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench.

And whereas, in pursuance of the said agreement and the said statute, an order has been made by Master Manley Smith, and such order is as follows:

"Upon hearing the attorneys, or agents, on both sides, I do order that the facts of this case be stated in special form for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench pursuant to the statute.

"Dated 4th Jan. 1869. "C. M. SMITH."

The facts of the case are as follows:—

That owing to the peculiar manner in which the said Ellen Keating pronounced her name, and her inability to write the same, the said Ellen Keating's name was by mistake spelled Caton in the said examination and order of removal. Ellen Keating, by mistake called Caton in the warrant of removal is the lawful wife of John Keating, and the said Margaret and John, in the said warrant mentioned, are their legitimate unemancipated children.

On Sept. 30, 1867, Ellen Keating and her said two children, Margaret and John, were admitted into the Liverpool Workhouse as the wife and children respectively of the said John Keating, and there remained until removal to Fullamore Union, Ireland, by warrant, dated 28th May 1868.

The said John Keating, the husband, was born in Ireland, but not within the district of the union of Fullamore, nor has he ever resided for three years within the district of the said union.

The said Ellen Keating was born within the district of Fullamore Union, and both of the said said children, Margaret and John, were born in Ireland.

On the 31st Oct. 1867, the respondents laid an information on oath before the magistrates against the said John Keating, the husband, for having, on the said 30th Sept. 1867, run away from the parish of Liverpool, leaving and deserting his said wife Ellen Keating, and his two children, Margaret and John, chargeable to the said parish of Liverpool, and a warrant was granted thereon; and on the 17th Sept. 1868, being after the appeal in this cause was entered at the court of quarter sessions for the borough of Liverpool, and after the same was respited to the next quarter sessions of the said borough, he was brought before Thomas Stamford Raffles, stipendiary magistrate for the said borough, and convicted of his said offence.

The warrant of removal was issued in the absence of the said John Keating, and without any summons having been issued requiring his attendance before the magistrates for the said borough at the sessions at which the said warrant was granted.

At the time of the granting of the said warrant of removal, viz., 28th May 1868, and up to and until the time of his apprehension, viz., on the 17th Sept. 1868, the said John Keating, the husband, was living and residing in Hull, in the county of Yorkshire, and not in and within the said parish of Liverpool; but the respondents did not at the time such order was made, know where the said John Keating, the husband, was, or where he was to be found.

The examination of the said Ellen Keating, the warrant of removal, and the notice and grounds of appeals hereunto annexed, and marked A, B, and C respectively, are to be taken as admitted, and the court is to have the same powers of amendment and otherwise as might have been exercised by the court of quarter sessions.

The questions for the consideration of the court are, first, whether the warrant of removal under the above facts should have been granted by the magistrates; and, secondly, if so, whether it was rightly granted for removal to the union at Fullamore.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative of both the above questions, then the appellants agree that a judgment in conformity with such decision and for such costs as the court may adjudge may be entered on motion by the respondents at the sessions next or next but one after such decision shall have been given. If the court shall be of a contrary opinion on either of the above questions, then the respondents agree that a judgment in conformity with such decisions and for such costs as the court may adjudge may be entered on motion by the appellants at the sessions next or next but one after such decision shall have been given.

A—COPY OF EXAMINATION.

The examination of Ellen Caton, taken on oath before us, the undersigned, two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said borough of Liverpool, in petty sessions assembled this 28th May 1868, who on her oath saith that she hath become and is now chargeable to the parish of Liverpool, in the said borough; that according to the best of her knowledge and belief she is about thirty years of age, and was born in Ireland, in the parish or town of Fullamore, in the King's County, now contained in the union of Fulla-more, in the county of Westmeath and King's County, in Ireland aforesaid; that she hath not a settlement in England, and is not otherwise exempt from removal from the said parish of Liverpool; that she hath two children, named Margaret (of the reputed age of thirteen years) and John (of the reputed age of two years), which children are not exempt from removal from the said parish of Liverpool; and that the said Ellen Caton and her said children are in such a state of health as not to be liable to suffer any bodily or mental injury by removal to Ireland.

Digitized by Google

The × mark of Ellen Caton.

Sworn the day and year first above written, before us at Liverpool, in the said borough. T. D. ANDERSON.
J. WOODRUFF.

B.—COPY OF WARRANT OF REMOVAL.

To the Select Vestry of the parish of Liverpool, in the borough of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, and the guardians of the poor of the Fullamore Union, in the county of Westmeath and the King's County in Ireland.

Borough of Liverpool to wit.—At a petty sessions of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the borough of Liverpool, holden in and for the said borough at the police-court in the said borough, on the 28th May 1868, before us, the undersigned, Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said borough.

Whereas complaint is now made by the Select Vestry of the parish of Liverpool, in the borough of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, as guardians of the poor of the said parish, that Ellen Caton hath become and is now chargeable to the said parish of Liverpool; and whereas the said Ellen Caton having been brought before us, application having been made to us in petty sessions assembled, by James Alexander McImnes, an officer of the said select vestry, on their behalf, we have made due examination on oath and find that the said Ellen Caton is of the reputed age of thirty years, and was born in Ireland in the parish or town of Fullamore, in the King's county now contained in the same union of Fullamore, and she hath not a settlement in England, and is not otherwise exempt from removal from the said parish of Liverpool, and that she hath two children, named, Margaret, of the reputed age of thirteen years, and John, of the reputed age of two years; which children are not exempt from removal from the said parish of Liverpool; and we have seen the said Ellen Caton, and are satisfied that she and her said children are respectively in such a state of health as not to be liable to suffer bodily or mental injury by removal to Ireland.

These are therefore to require you, the said select vestry of the said parish of Liverpool, as such guardians as aforesaid, to cause the said Ellen Caton with her family to be safely conveyed to the said union of Fullamore, and to be delivered at the workhouse of such union.

Given under our hands and seals at the session aforesaid.
J. D. ANDERSON.
J. WOODRUFF.

By sect. 2 of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 117, it is enacted—

That if any person born in Scotland or Ireland, or in the Isle of Man or Scilly, or Jersey or Guernsey, not settled in England, become chargeable to any parish in England by reason of relief given to himself or to herself, or to his wife, or to any legitimate or bastard child; such person, his wife, and any child so chargeable shall be liable to be removed respectively to Scotland, Ireland, the Isle of Man, Scilly, Jersey, or Guernsey; and if the guardians of such parish or of any union in which the same may be comprised, or where there are no such guardians, if the overseers of such parish complain thereof to any one justice of the peace, such justice may, if such person do not attend voluntarily, summon him to come before any two justices of the peace at any time and place to be named in the summons and at such time and place, or on the attendance of such person, any two justices may hear and examine into the matter of such complaint, and if it be made to appear to their satisfaction that such person is liable to be so removed as aforesaid, and if they see fit, they may make and issue a warrant under their hands and seals to remove such person forthwith at the expense of such union or parish.

By sect. 1 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 76 it is enacted that—

No application for a warrant ordering the removal from any place in England to Ireland of any poor person who shall have become chargeable in such place, shall be heard and determined except by two or more justices in petty sessions assembled, or by a stipendiary magistrate, or metropolitan police magistrate sitting in his court, which justice or magistrate (as the case may be) shall see such poor person, or the person who is the head of the family proposed to be removed, and shall be satisfied that every person who is proposed to be removed by the warrant is in such a state of health as not to be liable to suffer bodily or mental injury by the removal.

Sect. 2 enacts that—

Such warrant of removal shall be granted only on the application of the relieving officer, or other officer of the guardians of the union or parish where such poor person shall become chargeable, and shall contain the name and reputed age of every person ordered to be removed by virtue of the same, and the name of the place in Ireland where the justice or magistrate shall find such person to have been born, or to have last resided for the space of three years, and a statement of such examination having been made as to the state of health of every person ordered to be removed as aforesaid; and such warrant shall be addressed to the party applying for the same, and to the guardians of the union or parish to which such poor person is to be removed, and a copy shall be given by and at the cost of the person applying for such warrant to the person or the head of the family about to be removed by virtue of it.

Francis (Higgin, Q. C. with him) appeared for the respondents (a).—The question is a novel one; and turns upon whether, when a wife who has a birth settlement in Ireland becomes chargeable in England, she having a husband living whose place of birth settlement in Ireland is unknown, she can be removed without him to such settlement? He submitted that she could be under the provisions of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 117, s. 2.

Mellish, Q. C. (Temple with him) for the appellants, contended that there was no power to remove a wife without her husband, if living, and that the order of removal was bad.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 13.—HANNEN, J.—This was a case stated by consent under the stat. 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, upon an appeal against an order or warrant made by two justices of the peace for the borough of Liverpool, on the 21st May 1868, for the removal of Ellen Keating and her two children from the parish of Liverpool, where they had become chargeable to the union of Fullamore, in Ireland, the birthplace of the said Ellen Keating. The pauper Ellen Keating, was the wife of one John Keating, who was an Irishman. Neither of them had acquired any settlement in England. The children were the issue of the marriage, and were both born in Ireland, they were infants and unemancipated, one being aged thirteen, and the other two years. At the time when Ellen Keating and the children became chargeable, and also at the time of making the warrant of removal and of executing it, John Keating was not living in the parish of Liverpool, he had some time previously deserted his wife, and was living at Hull, in Yorkshire, but the respondents did not then know where he was or could be found. He was consequently not summoned or brought before the removing magistrates, nor does it appear from the examinations, warrant of removal, or any statement in the case, that inquiry was made as to him, or as to his place of birth; in point of fact, he was not born in Fullamore, nor had he resided there for three years. Under these circumstances it was contended on behalf of the appellants that the warrant of removal of the wife and the two children to Fullamore, the place of the wife's birth, was invalid, and ought not to have been granted, and we are of that opinion. The statute under which the removal of Irish paupers is now regulated is the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 117, as amended by the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 33, the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 76, and the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 89; the material clause is the 2nd section of the first mentioned statute. The language of the section, according to its plain natural meaning, appears to require that where there is a husband as well as a wife and children liable to be removed, they are all to be removed together. With regard to the place to which the removal is to be made, by the 4th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 117, the justices of a county or borough were empowered to make regulations for the removal of such poor persons, their wives, and children, but this section is now repealed, and by (a) The case had proceeded some time when the court called the attention of counsel to the fact that the practice as now established is, that the counsel for the appellants should begin in every case

Digitized by Google

stat. 24 & 25, Vict. c. 76, sect. 2, the warrant of removal was required to contain, amongst other things, the name of the place in Ireland where the removing justices shall find such poor person to have been born, or to have last resided for three years, and a copy of the warrant was thereby required to be given to the person or "the head of the family" about to be removed by virtue of it. This shows that the Legislature intended that where there was a head of the family the removal was to be to his or her place of birth or place of residence, and the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 89, which makes further regulations concerning these removals, and gives the right of appeal by the Poor-Law Commissioners of Ireland, prescribes the particular form of warrant issued in this case. No provision is made in any of these Acts or in any of the former statutes which were repealed by the 1st section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 117, where a woman has been deserted by her husband, for her being removed without him, or being removed to any other place than the husband's settlement if he were living; and, upon a review of the statutes and the decisions upon them, we think that such a case in left unprovided for. In Rex v. Cottingham, 7 B. & C. 616, which case arose on the construction of a former Act (the 59 Geo. 3, c. 12) which is now repealed, but which in its enactments closely resembled the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 117, s. 2, it was held that the wife of an Irishman who had no settlement in England and had deserted her, might be removed without him to her own maiden settlement which revived on her desertion by her husband; but it was there laid down by Bayley, J. in delivering the judgment of the court, that the statute of the 59 Geo. 2, c. 12, s. 83, which in this respect is undistinguishable from the present, did not authorise the removal of the wife alone to the place of birth of her husband, and that as the husband had quitted the parish, she could not be removed there without him, and the case was therefore not within the Act. It had been previously held in R. v. Leeds, 4 B. & A. 498, that the wife and unemancipated children of a Scotchman who had not deserted his wife but was living with her, could not, even with his consent, be removed to her maiden settlement, but that all were removable with the husband to Scotland. In R. v. All Saints, Derby, 19 L. J. 14, M. C., the question of the construction of the present Act arose in the case of the children of an Irish father by an Irish mother. The mother had died and the children had been deserted by the father. It was there decided that they were removable to the parish of their birth in England, and not to Ireland, under the 2nd section of the statute. Coleridge, J., there laid down that, according to the Act, the father must be dealt with as the subject of removal, and Wightman, J., said that the statute, for the purpose of removal, applied directly to the father only, and to the children not otherwise than incidentally as a part of his family, and that if the father cannot be removed, there is no power over the child. Coleridge, J., also observed that the section might mean that if the father were summoned, the order might be made at the time and place named, whether he appeared or not, or at any time when he did come, and that if he were absent, service of a summons upon him must be shown, so that, at all events, the proceeding should relate to him. This case, which recognised the previous case of Rex v. Cottingham, appears to make it clear that the wife and children cannot be removed except with the father, and, at all events, as a part of the father's family, and in a proceeding having reference to him, and, therefore, at all events, a warrant of removal, which ignores the father and the father's place of birth, and removes to that of the mother, must be considered as unwarranted by the statute. The subsequent case of R. v. Much Hoole, 17 Q. B. 548; and R. v. St. Giles Cripplegate, 17 Q. B. 636, are substantially in accordance with the cases previously mentioned, as showing that neither a wife deserted by her husband, an Irishman, nor a daughter, though unemancipated and becoming chargeable in a different parish from that in which her parents, who were Irish without a settlement, resided, can be removed to Ireland under the statute now in question. And as we have had no instance brought to our notice of such a removal having been made, and having been unable to discover any such case, we consider that this order of removal ought to be reversed as illegal, and that the respondents should, according to the 7th section of the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 89, pay the expenses at the preliminary inquiry and appeal, and also those of maintaining the persons removed, and of conveying them back to Liverpool.

Judgment for the appellants.

Attorneys for the respondents, Monckton and Monckton, Gray's-inn.

Attorneys for the appellants, Solicitors to the Irish Poor Law Board.

Monday, Jan. 17.

Ex parte H. M. TRENCHARD.

Articled clerk—Former service under expired articles——Fresh articles—Computation of former service.

Where an articled clerk served two years under his articles, and then ceased to serve any longer, and the articles expired, and he then desired to enter into fresh articles, and obtain the previous consent of the court to such two years' service being computed in the period of service under such new articles: the court refused such consent, leaving it open, however, to the applicant to apply to have such period computed when he shall have served a sufficient time under such new articles.

This was an application on the behalf of a Mr. Henry Montagu Trenchard that he may now be at liberty to complete service as an articled clerk under articles dated the 22nd Oct. 1856, without paying any further stamp duty, and that the time during which he did serve under the said articles may be allowed in computing the period of five years, and that he may be exempted from passing any intermediate examination, he having been originally articled before the Act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, and the regulations made thereunder came into operation, and that production of the original articles may be dispensed with, the same being lost.

The affidavit upon which the rule was moved was as follows, made by Henry Charles Trenchard, attorney and solicitor of Taunton, which stated,

1. My son, Henry Montagu Trenchard, was on the 22nd Oct. 1856, then being eighteen years of age, by articles of clerkship of that date articled to me for a term of five years to learn the profession of an attorney and solicitor.

2. That the stamp duty of 80l. was duly paid for the said articles of clerkship, and the stamp duty imposed thereon, and the same were filed on the 22nd Dec. 1856.

3. That the said articles of clerkship have been by accident mislaid and lost; that diligent search has been made for the same, and that no trace or copy of them can be found.

4. That the said Henry Montagu Trenchard served me faithfully for the term of two years and eighteen days, from the 22nd Aug. 1856 to the 9th Nov. 1858, and then became out of health and unable to follow his intended profession. That he was placed under the care of several medical men, who urged his seeking some other occupation which would lead him into more active life.

5. That accordingly, but with great regret, as he was becoming of great assistance to me, and with the approval of the said medical advisers, I obtained a commission for him in the army on the 3rd June 1859.

6. That he is now a captain in the 51st Regiment (King's Own Light Infantry); that he has served his whole service in that regiment, having during such service served five years and some months in India.

7. That his health is now completely re-established, and I am desirous of having him again in my office, and he is willing and ready to resume his original profession, and assist me therein.

Digitized by Google

8. That for this purpose he is desirous, of and from the date of his selling out of the army, to complete his service under his articles of clerkship of the 22nd Oct. 1856, if he may be permitted to do so.

9. That while he was in my office he showed great aptitude for business; and that in his regiment he has, at different times, filled different acting appointments (such as acting adjutant at home), and that he would, in my judgment, resume the study of his profession with aptitude and earnestness.

10. That it would be of the utmost importance both for him and me that he should be enabled to get admitted at the earliest possible period, and for that purpose that he may be permitted to return into my office under his original articles, and that the term of two years and eighteen days already completed, may be reckoned as part of the original five years.

By sect. 3 of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, it is enacted—

That except as hereinafter mentioned no person shall from and after the passing of this Act be capable of being admitted and enrolled as an attorney or solicitor, unless such person shall have been bound by contract in writing to serve as clerk for and during the term of five years to a practising attorney or solicitor in England or Wales, and shall have duly served under such contract for and during the said term of five years, and also unless such person shall after the expiration of the said term of five years have been examined, and sworn in the manner hereinafter directed, &c.

By sect. 13 it is enacted—

That if any attorney or solicitor to or with whom any such person shall be so bound shall happen to die before the expiration of the term for which such person shall be so bound, or shall discontinue or leave off practice as an attorney or solicitor, or if such contract shall by mutual consent of the parties be cancelled, or in case such clerk shall be legally discharged before the expiration of such term by any rule or order of the court wherein such attorney or solicitor shall have been admitted, such clerk shall and may in any of the said cases be bound by another contract, or other contracts, in writing to serve as clerk to any other practising attorney or solicitor, or attorneys or solicitors, during the residue of the said term; and service under such second or other contract in manner hereinbefore mentioned shall be deemed and taken to be good and effectual, provided that an affidavit be duly made and filed of the execution of such second or other contract or contracts within the time and in the manner hereinbefore directed, and subject to the like regulations with respect to the original contract and affidavit of the execution thereof.

Lopes, Q. C. now moved accordingly. The court has power to comply with this gentleman's request, for he is only desirous of not losing the benefit of the time he has already served. If his original articles had not expired he might clearly, under the 13th section, have been permitted to enter into fresh articles and have had the benefit of his former services. [LUSH, J.—In Ex parte Keddle, 4 Best & Sm. 993, which was a very similar case, this court refused the application.] That case would hardly be followed in the present instance. The equity of the case is clearly with the applicant. [LUSH, J.—In Ex parte Keddle it was held that where the time of the articles of clerkship had expired, and the service under them had not been completed, the court would refuse an application for leave to enter into fresh articles, and to serve under them to complete the service under the original articles, and so overruling the previous case of Ex parte Smith, 1 E. & E. 928. COCKBURN, C. J.—You desire to enter into fresh articles and to have the benefit of the service under the old articles. There is nothing to prevent your entering into fresh articles, but as you must come to the court again before you are admitted, we cannot bind ourselves by anticipation; it will hereafter be the proper time to take the former service into consideration.] I submit, if the court has power to permit the former service to count hereafter, it can permit it now; and it is certainly more desirable that this gentleman should know at once what time he has to serve than to be left in uncertainty, especially as it may determine his future conduct with reference to selling out of the army. If the court were now to say that the former service shall be considered, that will be binding hereafter. [COCKBURN, C. J.—We certainly cannot say that the old service shall be taken into account. You will have to come to the court again, and then will be the proper time for such consideration. I cannot distinguish this case from Ex parte Kiddle. LUSH, J.—You are asking us to decide now that he has properly served for the two years; we cannot do that, for that is a proper subject for the consideration of the examiners.]

COCKBURN, C. J.—We are sorry we cannot assist this gentleman, especially as I know him to be the son of a gentleman in practice on the Western Circuit of great respectability; but we must see that there has been such a service as the Act requires, and this we cannot do by anticipation. I agree that it is to some extent a hardship upon this gentleman to give up his present profession upon the uncertainty of being permitted to avail himself of his former articles, but we must be guided by what we deem to be the law upon the point.

Application refused.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by M. W. MCKELLAR, and H. H. HOCKING, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, Nov. 15, 1869.

HOOPER v. MARSHALL.

Departure in pleading—Composition-deed—Sureties—B. A. 1861, s. 192.

In an action by drawer against acceptor of a bill of exchange, the defendant pleaded a composition-deed executed by him before the bill was due. The deed contained a clause reserving the rights of creditors against sureties. In the declaration the bill was stated to be payable to the plaintiff, without suggesting that it was a negotiable instrument. The repliction alleged that the said bill was payable not to the plaintiff only, but to the plaintiff or order, that plaintiff had indorsed the bill, that the holders of the bill, at the time of the making and registration of the deed, presented the bill for payment, and it was dishonoured by the defendant. The plaintiff never assented to the deed, and was compelled to pay the amount of the bill to the holders, upon which he became the holder. The replication concluded that "the plaintiff, except as in the replication mentioned, was not a creditor of the defendant in respect of his claim on the said bill:"

Held, on demurrer to this replication, that there was no departure from the declaration, but that the replication was bad, because the plaintiff was a creditor within the 192*nd section of the B. A.* 1861, and was barred by the deed.

This was a demurrer to a replication.

The declaration consisted of common counts, and also a count upon a bill of exchange by drawer against acceptor as follows: "For that the plaintiff, on the 7th Feb. 1868, by his bill of exchange now overdue, directed to the defendant, required the defendant to pay to the plaintiff 24*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.*, two months after date, and the defendant accepted the said bill, but did not pay the same."

The pleas, which applied to the whole declaration, were:—

1. Except as to 5*l.* 10*s.*, that after the accruing of the plaintiff's claim, and after the 11th Oct. 1861, the defendant was indebted to divers persons, and thereupon a deed, bearing date the 26th March 1868 was made and entered into in the words and figures following, that is to say:

This indenture, made the 26th March 1868, between the creditors of one Marshall (the defendant), of, &c., and hereinafter called "the creditors," of the one part, and the said Marshall, of the other part, witnesseth that in consideration of the covenant of the said Marshall, hereinafter contained, the creditors of the said Marshall do hereby release and for ever absolutely discharge the said Marshall from all actions, suits, debts, sums of money, accounts, reckonings, contracts, agreements, promises, bills, notes, judgments, claims, and demands, which they the creditors, or any or either of them, now have, or at any time had, against the said Marshall. Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that nothing herein contained shall in any wise prejudice or affect any lien, or other security, held by any creditor who would not have been prejudiced or affected by proceedings in bankruptcy, if the said Marshall had been duly adjudicated a bankrupt; and that no creditor shall, by or in consequence of these presents, be prejudiced or affected as to his right or remedy against any person or persons, other than the said Marshall, whose names shall appear on any bond, bill of exchange, guarantee, or other document, held by such creditor. And the said Marshall, in consideration of the aforesaid release, doth hereby for himself, his executors and administrators, covenant with the creditors, severally and respectively, and their several and respective executors and administrators, that the said Marshall, his executors or administrators, will or shall pay to the creditors, severally and respectively, their several and respective executors or administrators, a composition of 5*s.* in the pound sterling upon the several debts now owing from the said Marshall to the creditors, within two months from the registration of this deed. In witness whereof, the said parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written.

Digitized by Google

The defendant then averred performance of all the statutory requirements; and that at the time of the execution of the said deed the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendant in respect of the claim herein pleaded to within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act 1861; and that the plaintiff was bound by the deed as if he had been a party thereto, and had duly executed the same.

2. As to 5*l.* 10*s.*, the amount of the composition due to the plaintiff under the deed, payment into court.

There was a replication as follows to the defendant's first plea, so far as it related to the bill of exchange in the declaration mentioned;—"That the said bill was payable not to the plaintiff only, but to the plaintiff or order, and that before the making of the said deed, and before the said registration thereof, he, the plaintiff, endorsed the said bill for value to Herring, Dewick, and Hardy, who, at the time of the making and registration of the said deed, were the holders thereof in their own right and for value; that the said bill was duly presented for payment while the said Herring, Dewick, and Hardy were the holders thereof, and was dishonoured by the defendant, of all which the plaintiff had due notice; that the plaintiff never assented to or executed the said deed; that after the registration of the said deed, and before suit, the plaintiff was compelled to pay, and did pay, to the said Herring, Dewick, and Hardy, the amount of the said bill, in discharge of his liability, as drawer thereof, whereupon the said bill was returned to the plaintiff, and he became, and was, and until and at the commencement of the action continued to be, and still was, the owner of the said bill; and that the plaintiff, except as in the replication mentioned, was not a creditor of the defendant in respect of his claim on the said bill."

This was the replication demurred to.

Barnard argued for the defendant in support of the demurrer: First, the allegation in the replication is a departure from that in the declaration; the replication states that the bill sued upon was a negotiable instrument, whilst the declaration avers only that it was payable to the plaintiff, without any suggestion of its being also payable to his order. Secondly, although at the time the deed was made, the bill had not become due, yet the plaintiff was then a creditor of the defendant in respect of the bill, within the meaning of that word as laid down by the Exchequer Chamber in Wood v. De Mattos, L. Rep. 1 Ex. 91; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 142. The case of Ex parte Petrie, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 232; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 169, which may at first appear to be against this contention, really only decides that the assent by an indorser, who is not at the time the holder of a bill, is inoperative, although he may become the holder after the registration of the deed.

Raymond, contra.—First, there is in the deed an express reservation of the rights of creditors against sureties, and this implies at common law, and it appears from Solly v. Forbes, 2 B. & B. 38, and other cases, that the rights of the sureties against the principal debtor are also reserved. The Bankruptcy Acts do not affect the interpretation of the deed on this point, and the deed does not release the plaintiff's claim against the defendant in respect of the debt which he has paid as his surety. It would be unreasonable if the debtor and creditors had the power to alter the liability of the sureties without their consent. Secondly, the plaintiff was not a creditor of the defendant at the time the deed was made. [WILLES, J.—Would he not come within the provision for proof by sureties contained in the 173rd section of the Act of 1849?] That relates only to a bankruptcy, and could not apply to a deed with such a condition as this concerning sureties. The plaintiff, unless he paid, could never become a creditor, and at the time of the execution of the deed he had no claim as a creditor under the 192nd section:

Ex parte Petrie, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 232; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 169.

Barnard was not heard in reply.

BOVILL, C. J.—The first point argued by Mr. Barnard for the defendant was that the replication was a departure from the declaration. I think, however, that it is not, but that it merely fortifies the declaration. The plaintiff claimed as holder of the bill, and the replication states how he became so. The only other question is whether the plaintiff's rights are excepted from those released by the composition deed. It is true that the rule of law is that the release of a principal is a release of the surety, and that if the principal agrees, as he may do, that the right of the creditor against the surety shall continue, the surety is entitled to recover against him anything that he is compelled to pay. This deed, however, if binding on the plaintiff at all, is so by statute, and the question is therefore what is the effect of the Bankruptcy Acts? Under the general law of bankruptcy there is no doubt that the subsequent parties to a bill would remain bound, notwithstanding the discharge of the acceptor, and composition-deeds are intended to have very much the same effect as bankruptcy. And the special provision in this deed, reserving the rights of creditors against sureties, seems designed to put all parties in the same position as they would have been under a bankruptcy. There is no doubt much difficulty in placing a construction on the exact terms of the Bankruptcy Acts; and in the case of Ex parte Petrie, it was certainly held that persons in the position of the plaintiff ought not to be taken into account in reckoning the amount of the assents to a composition-deed; that decision turned mainly on the words of the 200th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and seems to leave untouched the question whether the plaintiff is bound by such a deed under the 192nd section. But looking at the case of Wood v. De Mattos, it seems to me that the plaintiff's claim is barred by sect. 192, though he paid the amount of the bill after the registration of the deed, and such deed contained a reservation of rights against sureties.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff sues on the bill, and so far as the replication goes, he does not rely on the count for money paid; in this he is right, for there would be a clear answer to a claim on that ground, in that as the defendant was not liable to the holder, there would not have been a payment on request. Now on the bill the plaintiff was primarily liable, and the plaintiff, if he paid in default of the defendant, on payment might have sued the defendant, and on the bill getting into the hands of third parties, if the holder, who had the sole control over it, simply released, then the defendant would be discharged and the defendant also; but if he reserved the rights against sureties, then according to Solly v. Forbes such release would be a covenant not to sue, and would not prevent the holder bringing an action against the plaintiff, the drawer, who, if he paid, could then go against the defendant, the acceptor and original debtor. This would be the result under the common law, and therefore the defendant must resort to statute. The statute is no doubt applicable to discharge the plaintiff, if he is to be considered a creditor; and the question is whether the word includes not only those who at the time of the registration of the deed have against the compounding debtor a debt in præsenti, but also includes persons who might on a future contingency become so, i. e., whether the word also extends to persons who are in a position which may result in a subsequent debt against him; and if it includes the latter the plaintiff is bound by the deed, which operates as a release by him. Now the case of Wood v. De Mattos decided that the word "creditor" in 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 192, is used in the sense of a person having a claim provable in bankruptcy, and decided, therefore, that the having a contingent debt so provable constituted such a man a creditor for a composition-deed; and, indeed, that such a deed applied not only to a contingent debt so provable, but also to claims provable under sect. 173 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. I am, therefore, of opinion that the deed which has been pleaded is an answer to the plaintiff's claim, and our judgment must be for the defendant.

Digitized by Google

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. At the time the deed was made, the plaintiff had indorsed away the bill, and was then a party only contingently liable; but the case of Wood v. De Mattos decides that as he could prove in bankruptcy, he is bound by the deed. Mr. Raymond says that by the words of the deed, the effect of the statute is got rid of, but the words do not affect the statute which applies, and, therefore, the defendant is entitled to our judgment.

BRETT, J.—The question of departure was but faintly pressed on behalf of the defendant, and requires little notice. As to the other question, Mr. Raymond says that the replication discloses facts which, if stated in the declaration, would show that the deed reserved to the plaintiff a right to sue; and he says that such right is reserved on the ground that the defendant, without the plaintiff's consent, reserved to the holder of the bill the right to sue the plaintiff, and, therefore, is to be taken to have reserved a right to the plaintiff to sue the defendant. This contention is ingenious but is not sound, because, according to the statute as interpreted by the case of Wood v. De Mattos, the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendant, and his claim, by the terms of the deed and force of the statute, was released.

Judgment for defendant.

Attorney for plaintiff, J. Craven.

Attorneys for defendant, Phillips and Willicombe.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, Nov. 13, 1869.

MANN v. HARBORD AND ANOTHER.

Costs—Taxation—Review of—Commission to examine witnesses abroad—Legal advice—Letter of instruction to commissioners.

A commission was obtained by defendants to examine witnesses abroad. The commissioners were empowered by the commission to put questions vivâ voce in addition to the written interrogatories to be administered:

Held, that the costs of a letter of instruction sent to each of the commissioners by the plaintiff's attorneys stating the nature of the case and the points in dispute ought to be allowed to the plaintiff as costs in the cause, he having subsequently obtained judgment.

This was an application for a review of taxation. The defendant had obtained an order for a commission to examine witnesses in India. The commission empowered the commissioners to put vivâ voce questions to the witnesses in addition to the written interrogatories to be administered. In order to assist the commissioners in the discharge of their duties, the plaintiff's attorneys sent them each a letter of instructions, stating the nature of the case and the points in dispute between the parties to which the evidence should be directed. On the return of the commission the defendants withdrew their pleas, and judgment was signed by plaintiff for an agreed sum in respect of the claim in the action, and costs. On taxation the master refused to allow the plaintiff the costs of the letters of instruction.

Lord showed cause against the rule for review of taxation.

Herschell supported it.

The Court (CHANNELL, PIGOTT, and CLEASBY, BB.), expressed a desire to see the letters of instruction before deciding whether it was proper or not to allow the costs of them, and the court not being prepared to deliver their decision on the last day of term, the parties, to avoid postponement of the matter, consented to be bound by an intimation of the opinion of the judges, without waiting for a formal judgment till the next term. It was subsequently intimated to them that the court were of opinion that the costs of the letters of instruction ought to be allowed.

Plaintiff's attorneys, Chester and Urquhart.

Defendants' attorneys, Lyne and Holman.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

Reported by J. SHORTT, Esqr., Barristers-at-Law.

ERROR FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

Monday, Nov. 29, 1869.

(Before KELLY, C. B., WILLES and KEATING, JJ., CHANNELL, PIGOTT, and CLEASBY, BB.)

HUDDART v. RIGBY.

Trespass—Right of way.

To a declaration for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close (which was set out by abuttals) and breaking the plaintiff's gates, hedges, and fences standing thereon, and destroying the grass growing thereon, the defendant pleaded the existence of a common and public footway over the plaintiff's close, and justified the pulling down and destroying the plaintiff's gates, hedges, and fences as obstructing the said right of way and preventing the convenient use thereof. To this plea the plaintiff replied by joining issue in the statutory form. At the trial the plaintiff admitted the existence of the right of way, but tendered evidence to show that there were no gates, hedges, or fences across the admitted footway, but that there were such gates, &c., on another portion of his land by which the defendant passed, and that they had been pulled down by the defendant. This evidence having been rejected, and a verdict directed to be entered for the defendant:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench), that the evidence was rightly rejected, and that to render it admissible the plaintiff should have new assigned.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, against the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench given on the 5th Nov. 1868, in refusing to grant a rule to show cause why the verdict found for the defendant in this cause should not be set aside, and a new trial had between the parties upon the ground of misdirection.

Declaration. For that the defendant broke and entered certain land of the plaintiff, called the Moor Croft, otherwise the Maiden Croft, situate at Ribbleton, in the county of Lancaster, abutting on the northerly side thereof, in part upon the land of Richard Holden; and on the easterly side thereof in part upon land of Sir Thomas George Hesketh, Bart.; and in other parts upon land used as a public cemetery, by and belonging to the Burial Board of the borough of Preston, and broke open, damaged, broke to pieces, and destroyed the plaintiff's gates, hedges, and fences standing and being upon the said land of the plaintiff, with his feet trod down, damaged, and destroyed the grass and other herbage there growing, and thereby interfered with the plaintiff in the enjoyment of his said land, and prevented him having the use and benefit thereof, and of the said hedges and fences in so ample a manner as he would otherwise have done.

Pleas: 1. Not guilty. 2. That at the time of the alleged trespass there was, and of right ought to have been, a common and public footpath over the said land of the plaintiff for all persons to go and return on foot at all times of the year, at their free will and pleasure, and the defendant having occasion to use the said way, then entered into and upon the said land of the plaintiff and along the said footpath, then using the same as he lawfully might for the cause aforesaid, and because the said gates, hedges, and fencing had been erected, and were wrongfully in and across the said highway, and obstructing the same, and preventing the convenient use thereof, the defendant necessarily pulled down and destroyed the said gates, hedges, and fences for the purpose of using the said footpath, doing no unnecessary damage in that behalf, which are the alleged trespasses.

The plaintiff joined issue upon defendant's pleas.

The cause came on to be tried before Hannen, J., at the summer assizes 1868, held in Lancaster, in and for the county palatine of Lancaster.

The defendant's counsel proposed to give evidence at the trial of a common public footpath running east and west over the said land of the plaintiff in the declaration mentioned.

The plaintiff's counsel admitted such common public footpath, but offered to prove that the trespasses complained of were committed elsewhere.

The plaintiff's counsel offered to prove that there were no gates, hedges, or fences erected upon or across the said admitted footpath, or obstructing the same, or preventing the convenient use thereof; but that there were such gates, hedges, and fences on the plaintiff's said land, across the track by which the defendant so passed as aforesaid, and that some of such gates, hedges, or fences were pulled down by the defendant.

Upon the admission that a common public footway did exist over the said land, the learned judge ruled that the defendant, without further evidence, was entitled to a verdict, and he accordingly directed the jury to find, and the jury did accordingly find, a verdict for the defendant.

Within the time in that behalf allowed, namely, on the 5th Nov. 1868, the plaintiff, by his counsel, applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a rule, calling upon the defendant to show cause why the said verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial had between the parties, on the ground that the learned judge misdirected the jury.

The Court of Queen's Bench decided against the said application, and refused to grant any rule to show cause, but gave the plaintiff leave to appeal.

Plaintiff's points: First, that the defendant having admitted the acts alleged to be trespasses, cannot justify the same by proving a right of way elsewhere; secondly, that the trespass complained of is specified in the declaration, namely, breaking gates, and the defendant having pleaded a right to do the act specified, must prove what he has alleged; thirdly, that the defendant has in his plea identified the highway alleged as one obstructed by gates, and cannot prove his plea by giving evidence of a highway which is not so obstructed.

Defendant's points: First, that the common public footpath of which the defendant proposed to give evidence at the trial, having been admitted by the plaintiff, it was not open to the plaintiff to give evidence of trespasses committed elsewhere; secondly, that upon the admission that a common public footpath did exist, as proposed to be proved by the defendant, the defendant was entitled to a verdict without any further evidence; thirdly, that the direction given to the jury by the learned judge at the time was correct; fourthly, that the plaintiff's replication puts in issue every material allegation in the plea of the defendant, and that defendant was therefore bound to prove that the gates in the declaration mentioned had been erected and then were wrongfully in and across the highway in the plea mentioned; fifthly, that as the plaintiff had no cause of action against the defendant different from that which the plea professed to justify, or for an access over and above what the defence set up in the said plea justified, the plaintiff was forbidden by the 87th section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 to plead a new assignment.

Gorst (Holker, Q.C., with him) for the plaintiff.—There are two trespasses alleged in the declaration, and the defendant, by pleading to both, has made them both matter of substance, though otherwise the breaking of the gates, hedges, and fencing might be regarded as matter of aggravation only. The joinder of issue puts the justification of both trespasses in issue; and as the place where both were committed is identified by the declaration and plea, there was no need of a new assignment, as there was in Glover v. Dixon, 9 Ex. 158. It is stated in the notes to Taylor v. Cole, 1 Sm. L. C. 122 (5th edit.) that "if the defendant necessarily state in his plea some fact on the existence or non-existence of which the question whether he be a trespasser ab initio or not depends, there it will be sufficient, as the plaintiff might have replied, de injuriâ, to take issue in the statutory form." The present case falls within that rule. Before the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, the proper replication would have been the replication de injuriâ.

Bracegirdle v. Peacock, 8 Q. B. 171;
Boyd v. Danton, 2 A. & E. 26;
Ellison v. Isles, 11 A. & E. 665.
1 Wms. Saunders, 299

Digitized by Google

But sect. 79 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, now provides that "either party may plead in answer to the plea or subsequent pleading of his adversary that he joins issue thereon . . . and such form of joinder of issue shall be deemed to be a denial of the substance of the plea or other subsequent pleading, and an issue thereon; and in all cases where the plaintiff's pleading is in denial of the pleadings of the defendant, or some part of it, the plaintiff may add a joinder of issue for the defendant." The breaking of the gates and fences in the present case was a substantial trespass. In Bush v. Parker, 1 Bing. N. C. 72, where the plaintiff declared for an assault in seizing and laying hold of him, pulling and dragging him about, striking him, forcing him out of a field into and through a pond, and there imprisoning him, it was held that the dragging of the plaintiff through a pond was a distinct and substantive trespass, and therefore that a plea justifying the assaulting, seizing, and laying hold of the plaintiff and pulling and dragging him about, was not a sufficient answer to the entire charge in the declaration. "How much do the defendants justify?" asked Tindal, C. J. "The assaulting, seizing, and laying hold of the plaintiff, and a little pulling and dragging him about, altogether omitting to notice the allegation in the declaration that the plaintiff was forced through a pond. The question is, whether this was a separate and distinct trespass, or a mere aggravation of the original assault; and it is plain that this was one link in a chain of trespasses following each other, and not a mere aggravation of the first assault." So in Noden v. Johnson, 16 Q. B. 48, where a count in trespass alleged that defendant assaulted, beat, and ill-treated the plaintiff, and then knocked him down on the deck of a ship, and the defendant justified as to the assaulting, beating, and ill-treating, it was held that the plaintiff must recover for the knocking down, that being alleged as a distinct trespass from the assaulting, beating, and ill-treating, and not covered by the justification. Webber v. Sparkes, 10 M. & W. 485, and Phillips v. Howgate 5 B. & A. 220, were also referred to.

Quain, Q. C. (with whom was Kemplay) for the defendant.—In the case of an action of trespass to land all beyond the entry on the close is matter of aggravation merely, and affects only the question of damages: (Taylor v. Cole, ubi sup.) The cases cited on behalf of the plaintiff were not cases of trespass to land, and are distinguishable on that ground. In Pratt v. Pratt, 2 Ex. 413, it was held that in trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's dwelling-house, and seizing, taking, and converting his goods, the conversion was mere matter of aggravation, and that a plea which only justified the seizing and taking was good on special demurrer, though it did not in its commencement except the conversion. Robertson v. Gantlett, 16 M, & W. 289, is also in favour of the defendant's contention. [WILLES, J. —Is not the declaration divisible; and must not the plea furnish an answer to the whole declaration?]—No doubt the plea must answer the whole declaration, but the substance of the plea is the right of way, and the old replication de injuriâ only put in issue the material portion of the plea; the plea here is the ordinary plea of a right of way: (See sched. B. 46, C. L. P. A. 1852.) It is still necessary for the plaintiff to new assign, wherever he must have done so before the Common Law Procedure Act 1852. In Glover v. Dixon, 9 Exch. 158, it was distinctly held that the general form of replication by way of traverse given by the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 puts in issue those facts only which the plaintiff could have traversed before the Act, and that all matters which must have been pleaded by way of new assignment must still be so pleaded. "The new form," said Parke, B., "merely enables a party to traverse what he might have traversed before the Act, but does not do away with the necessity of pleading in confession and avoidance." And Pollock, C. B., "Such matters as before the Act must have been replied specifically, must still be so replied." And that before the Common Law Procedure Act the proper form of replication was by new assignment is shown decisively by Webber v. Sparkes, 10 M. & W. 485. There to a declaration in trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close, and pulling down certain posts and bars standing thereon, the defendant pleaded the existence of a public footway over the close, and that because the posts and bars obstructed the way he pulled them down; to which the plaintiff replied, traversing the footway; and it was held that on these pleadings the defendants were entitled to a verdict on proof of a right of footway in any direction over the close, and were not bound to prove a way over the place where the posts and bars stood. "On this replication," said Parke, B., "the only question is, whether there is a right of way over the close—the piece of land—described in general terms in the declaration. If there be, but the trespass was committed out of the way, there should have been a new assignment." And during the argument the same learned judge says of the plaintiff, "He might have traversed and new assigned; then the question on the first issue would have been only whether there was a right of way across the close at all; if there was, but the defendants beat down the posts and rails in another part of the close, they would be liable on the new assignment." In Monprivatt v. Smith, 2 Camp. 175, where the trespass was breaking in a house and remaining there three weeks, it was held that if the plaintiff desired to justify the excess he must do so by a new assignment. The plaintiff new assigned in both Bracegirdle v. Peacock, 8 Q. B. 174; and Ellison v. Isles, 11 Ad. & E. 665.

Dean v. Taylor, 11 Ex. 68;
Pritchard v. Long, 9 M. & W. 666; and Norman v. Westcombe 2 M. & W. 449, were also referred to.

Holker, Q. C., in reply.—The plaintiff is not bound to new assign where there is only a single trespass. Chitty on Pleading, pp. 483 and 720, and Monprivatt v. Smith (ubi sup.) were referred to. If the plaintiff had new assigned he must have proved two trespasses. Pratt v. Groome, 15 East, 235, and Taylor v. Cole, 3 T. R. 292, were also referred to.

The judgment of the court was delivered as follows by KELLY, C. B.—In this case we are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be affirmed. My brother Willes certainly entertained some doubts upon the case, and, but for the high authority of the late Baron Parke and the other judges who decided the cases which have been referred to, the cases of Glover v. Dixon and Webber v. Sparkes (ubi sup.), the case would have raised a question which might well have been otherwise decided. I must venture to say for myself, that, but for the doubt thus entertained by my very learned brother Willes, J., I should have thought this case entirely free from difficulty. The plaintiff here sues by a count in the ordinary form, in which he alleges that the defendant broke and entered his close—that is, that he, in fact, entered upon his land, and there broke down and destroyed certain gates and fences. Now if to that declaration there had been a plea of not guilty, and of not guilty alone, it would have been quite sufficient for the plaintiff to prove that the defendant broke and entered his close without justification.

and if it had turned out that there were no gates and fences upon the close at all, or that if there were any they had never been broken or touched by the defendant, the plaintiff would still have been entitled to maintain the action, and to a verdict with damages greater or less upon that count. If he had proved that upon the spot on his land upon which the defendant had committed the trespass there were a gate and a fence, and the defendant had destroyed the gate and the fence, he would have been entitled to maintain an action, and likewise entitled to damages in respect of the value of the gate and of the fences thus destroyed. But it appears upon this record that there is a plea which, again I must observe, is in the usual and common form, where it is an action in which the defendant sets up a claim to a right of way. He admits, for the purpose, the trespass complained of, and the whole of the trespass complained of, and alleges, by way of defence, that there was a right of way over the land in question, that is, over the land thus admitted to belong to the plaintiff, and that before the trespass there were certain fences and gates across that way and obstructing the way, so that he by reason of that obstruction was unable to exercise the right of way which he was entitled to do, and that he destroyed and pulled down the gates and fences in question. Now to this, under the statute, there is a general replication taking issue upon the whole of that plea. When the parties came to trial the defendant might no doubt have proved a right of way over the close in question; but the plaintiff very properly (as it seems there was no dispute about the existence of the right of way over that close) at once admitted it, and I suppose what he admitted was a right of way over the close in question from spot A to spot B. He then proposed to go further, and there it is that it will be necessary to see what is the form of the case and what raises these questions, and what it was proposed to prove. Having admitted a right of way over the close in question (and I again assume from A. to B.) the plaintiff offered to prove that the trespasses complained of were committed elsewhere; in other words, although there was a right of way from A. to B. which he did not dispute, he said that the trespasses of which he really complained were committed at another spot on his land within that same close, and not upon any part of that portion of the land upon which he had admitted the existence of the right of way. If the case rested there is it really open to an argument? It is not the common case which has existed for centuries in pleading, as I observed in the course of the argument, in which the plaintiff brings an action for a trespass in entering upon his land, and the defendant pleading a right of way, the plaintiff proposes to admit a right of way; or the defendant having proved it, the plaintiff could no longer dispute it, and proceeds to insist that the real trespass of which he complains was committed, not upon the land or that portion of the land on which he had admitted the right of way to exist, but upon another spot in another portion of the land, as stated in the declaration. This is not in fact the common case of a new assignment, and in which the evidence tendered can only be given upon the new assignment. It is only necessary to look at what is relied upon on the part of the defendant, and the 87th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, and no doubt can be entertained. Sect. 87 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, provides that "one new assignment only shall be pleaded to any number of pleas to the same cause of action, and such new assignment shall be consistent with and confined by the particulars delivered ion (if any), and shall state that the ceeds for causes of action different from all those which the pleas profess to justify." What the plea in the present case professed to justify, taken together with the plaintiff's admission, was a right of way over the plaintiff's close from A to B, and what the plaintiff proposed to establish his claim to was damages for the committing of trespasses, not upon that portion from A to B, but upon another portion of his land. That would clearly be a case for a new assignment. Now for this, the two authorities to which I have adverted, the case of Glover v. Dixon, and the other case of Webber v. Sparkes, are, I think, absolutely conclusive. It may indeed be said that the observations of Parke, B. in Webber v. Sparkes are mere dicta, and not applicable to the present case; but the case of Glover v. Dixon is identical with the present case. In Glover v. Dixon it is expressly laid down that all matters that must have been pleaded by way of new assignment before the Common Law Procedure Act must still be so pleaded. Pollock, C. B. in his judgment says, not exactly in these terms, but in language which is equivalent, that such matters as before the Common Law Procedure Act must have been replied specially in a case like that, by way of new assignment, must still be so replied. If the case rested there we have this authority clearly and directly in point, but I must say for myself I need no authority. This case does not stand in need of authority to show that there must be a new assignment, when the plaintiff claims to show after an admission or proof of a right of way which prima facie would justify the trespasses complained of that they were, in fact, committed not in or upon the land over which the right of way existed, but upon another portion of his land. Then it is said that the breaking of the gates and fences is a substantive trespass. We must consider what is the meaning of these words. I think it will appear manifest on a moment's consideration that we may really lay out of the question altogether the breaking of the gates and fences. First of all, let us see how it was proposed to raise the question. It was thus. The plaintiff offered to prove that there were no gates and fences upon the way which he (the plaintiff) had admitted. That evidence was rejected, and I should say was properly rejected, not so much because it was inadmissible as because it was wholly irrelevant. The very substance and gist of this action was the committing of the trespass on the plaintiff's land, and he proposed to show, when the right of way was established or admitted, that the trespass had been committed on other lands, which he could not do except by way of new assignment. Then he wished to raise the question whether on the land over which there was a right of way, there happened to be any gates or any fences. That was perfectly immaterial; the plaintiff had admitted that there was a right of way upon his land from A to B, and if there were fences and gates upon that land the defendant had a right to break them down in the exercise of that right of way. If there were no such gates and fences upon the right of way, then the only result of this action would be that although the plaintiff might have proved the rest of his case he could not recover damages for the breaking and destroying of these gates and fences. When we look at what the real substance of the whole action is, we find the declaration is for breaking and entering the close of the plaintiff, and entering upon the land of the plaintiff: and the plea is that there was a right of way over that land, and the reply to that, in point of fact, and that which the plaintiff proposed to show, is this, that although there was a right of way upon his land, by which the defendant had a perfect right to pass, and which was obstructed by gates and fences, and the defendant had a right, in order to pass, to destroy and break down the gates and fences, still that the trespass was, in fact, committed upon a different part of his land. That could only be shown by way of new assignment. By that he could have shown the trespass to have been committed on other land, and if there were gates and fences on that other land which were broken and destroyed by the defendant, he would be entitled to damages in respect of the value of the gates and fences so broken. But the destroying of the gates and fences is merely a matter of aggravation, in an action of this kind. It is a matter of substance in one sense to the plaintiff if he establishes that the trespass was committed upon his land, and that the gates and fences were upon his land, and there was no justification; for he would then be entitled to recover damages for the injury done to the gates and fences. But in no other sense could the breaking of the gates and fences be treated as matter of substance, or otherwise than as mere aggravation of the trespass complained of as having been committed. We have heard a very learned argument, and a great variety of cases have been referred to, but the result of the whole is this, that where the plaintiff has admitted a right of way upon his land, and then proposes to show that the trespass complained of, and the breaking of the gates and fences, were committed on another portion of his land, over which there was no right of way, it is common learning to say, he can only be permitted to give that in evidence under a new assignment. On these grounds we are of opinion that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Attorneys for the plaintiff, Morris, Allen, and Carter, agents for Plant and Abbott, Preston.

Attorneys for defendant, Shaw and Tremellen, agents for J. Forshaw, Preston.

JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

BOSTON ELECTION PETITION.

Tuesday, Dec. 21, 1869.

(Before MELLOR, J.)

JONES (petitioner) v. MALCOLM AND COLLINS (resps.).

Parliamentary Elections Act—Withdrawal of petition—Costs.

A judge ordered a petition against the return of two members to be withdrawn on payment of costs. Twelve months after the presentation of the petition, and eight months after the order for withdrawal, application was made for the discharge of the sureties, and the payment to the petitioners of the money deposited as security in the Bank of England:

Held, that the fact that certain questions affecting costs were pending before the Common Pleas was no ground for refusing the application. The bill of costs incurred by the respondents ordered to be delivered within a fortnight.

In this case a petition had been presented by Mr. Mason Jones against the return of the present members, and in April last it was withdrawn, on which occasion Mr. Collins, M.P. complained that persons were permitted to make charges which were not supported, and afterwards to withdraw the petition. On that occasion Willes, J. made an order for the withdrawal, on the payment of costs to the sitting members. No bill of costs had been delivered, and on the part of the petitioner, Mr. Mason Jones, a summons had been taken out for payment of the deposit money.

Rickard (Wyatt and Hoskins) attended for the petitioner.

Buck (Baxter, Rose, and Norton) for Mr. Malcolm, one of the sitting members.

Rickard, applied to his Lordship for an order for the withdrawal of the sum of 500*l.* paid into the Bank of England under the Parliamentary Elections Act, and that the recognisances entered into by two persons for 250*l.* each, making up the 1000*l.* required to be deposited on an election petition, should be discharged.

Buck opposed the application, on the ground that certain questions connected with costs on election petitions were now pending before the Court of Common Pleas relating to preliminary charges before particulars were delivered. He had to ask the Lordship to allow the matter to stand over until his questions he had referred to had been decided.

Rickard stated that nearly twelve months had elapsed since the presentation of the petition, and eight months since the withdrawal, so that ample time had been afforded, and no sufficient reason had been given why the money deposited should be kept any longer; the only plea was that the respondents had not thought proper to deliver their bill of costs.

MELLOR, J., made an order that the bill of costs incurred by the respondents should be delivered to the petitioner within a fortnight, and adjourned the summons for that period.

COURT OF PROBATE.

Reported by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 6, and Dec. 14.

(Before Lord PENZANCE.)

GRANT v. GRANT.

Will—Doubtful description of executor—Nephew—Parol evidence.

A testator by his will appointed as his executor "my nephew Joseph Grant." There were two persons of that name, nephews of the deceased, one his brother's son, the other his wife's nephew. The court, on demurrer, Held, that evidence was admissible to ascertain which of the two the testator intended to appoint, and being satisfied from the facts that it was the wife's nephew, granted probate to him.

John Grant died in 1869, leaving a will duly executed, of which he appointed a person whom he described as "my nephew Joseph Grant" executor. He also left a legacy of 500*l.* to the same person. Two persons answering to the description claimed probate, one being Joseph Grant, the son of the deceased's brother, and the other Joseph Grant, the deceased's wife's nephew. The question now before the court on demurrer was whether the court could admit evidence to show the person intended by the testator was his wife's nephew, or whether the court was bound to exclude that evidence and grant probate to Joseph Grant the brother's son.

The point was argued before the court Nov. 6.

Field (Dr. Middleton with him) on behalf of the wife's nephew.

Dr. Swabey (Chapman with him) on behalf of the brother's son.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 14.—Lord PENZANCE.—The question in this case is the proper construction of a will. The facts to be found in the affidavits make the testator's real meaning abundantly clear. The question is, how far and to what extent these facts can be properly used by the court to aid in construing the will. The words to be construed are, "I appoint my said nephew Joseph Grant, executor," &c. In the former part of the will "my nephew Joseph Grant" is named as a legatee. To construe this provision and apply it to the proper individual, some evidence is necessary to ascertain whether the testator had a nephew named Joseph Grant. It turns out that there was living at the date of the will a son of the testator's brother, whose name was Joseph Grant. It further appears that there was also living another Joseph Grant, who was a nephew of the testator's wife, and consequently in ordinary parlance a "nephew" of the testator. If the word "nephew" can be properly construed by the court to include his wife's nephew, so that there are two persons to either of whom the words of description might be applied, it is not denied that some further parol evidence would be admissible to ascertain which of the two the testator meant; and it is clear that if this field of inquiry is once entered upon the facts will abundantly show that his wife's nephew, who lived with him, and not his own nephew, with whom he had no intimacy, was the person intended. But here it is contended that the word "nephew" cannot possibly be construed to include the nephew of the testator's wife. It is said that the court is bound by the primary signification of words used in a will, and that nothing but the primary signification in its strictest sense can be resorted to, unless that signification would produce some absurdity or render the meaning insensible. A proposition of this kind is, no doubt, to be found in Sir James Wigram's book; but a great deal turns upon the question what is meant by the expression "primary signification." It will not do to carry it too far. When a man makes a will, it is right to presume that he uses ordinary language in its ordinary sense; and if the original signification of a word is scrupulously followed in all cases, to the exclusion of that which by the common consent and use of mankind it had in process of time acquired, the court would be carried in some cases a long way from the testator's intention in the endeavour strictly to follow it. Furthermore, the use and custom of particular counties and places affix to certain words and terms particular meanings. Evidence of such meanings has always been permitted in the construction of written contracts, and why not in that of a will? Thus, in the case of Richardson v. Watson, 4 B. & A., 799, the testator had devised "the close in the occupation of Watson." Watson occupied two closes. It was contended that the word "close," though primarily and strictly applicable to an inclosure or field, was popularly applied to a farm; and Lord Wensleydale, a great authority on niceties of construction, said: "No doubt evidence might be given to show that Watson occupied two closes, and, generally speaking, evidence might be given to show that the testator used the word 'close' in the sense which it bore in the county where the property was situate, as denoting a farm." Now, if the popular use of a word in a particular locality may be proved and accepted, why is the popular use of the word all over the country to be rejected? Another thing has to be considered when the court is dealing with a personal description. It may be that the testator has been in the habit of applying a particular designation to an individual. And if the evidence may be referred to, it is plain in this case that the testator did constantly use the word "nephew" to designate his wife's nephew. If this designation, then, so used, is not at variance with its ordinary and popular meaning, it seems unreasonable to reject it wholly in favour of some primary meaning which excludes that individual. The strength of such evidence ought, no doubt, to determine whether the court can act upon it or not in each particular case; but what I am now considering is, not its effect, but its admissibility. It may be that the word "nephew," when used as the sole description of a class who are to take benefit under a will, must be construed to include only the sons of brothers or sisters of the testator, and in one of the cases cited; it appears to have been so construed. But this does not appear to me to preclude a wider signification being attached to the word when used as an additional description of a person specified by name, to whom the word is in an ordinary and popular sense applicable. Upon the whole, then, I am of opinion that so much of the evidence as shows the relation and circumstances in which the respective parties stood to the testator, and the sense in which he habitually used this word "nephew" when referring to Joseph Grant, his wife's nephew, is admissible as placing the court in the position of the testator, and thus enabling it to understand the meaning of his language. And the court construes the appointment of executor to have been intended to apply to Joseph Grant, the nephew of testator's wife.

Solicitor for plaintiff, Shepherd.

Solicitor for defendant, Dubois.

Tuesday, Nov. 16, 1869.

SMITH v. FLETCHER.

Testamentary suit—Probate of previous will revoked—Contentious proceedings discontinued—Costs.

A widow having taken out probate of her husband's will, dated three years before his death, on the supposition that it was his last will, a subsequent will was discovered and propounded by the executor. The widow brought in her probate, and gave notice that she did not mean to contest the suit further.

The court, in ordering contentious proceedings to be discontinued, refused to condemn the widow in costs.

T. Fletcher died May 13, 1868, at Iroquois, in Canada, and on June 14, 1869, his widow took out probate in this country of a will dated Oct. 1865, of which she was appointed sole executrix. Subsequently a will was discovered of later date, viz., May 1868, of which James Aspinall was appointed sole executor. On July 31, 1869, John Smith, the attorney for James Aspinall, took out a citation in this court, calling on the widow to bring in the probate granted to her, for the purpose of having it revoked; and on Aug. 10 she entered an appearance and brought in the probate. The plaintiff Smith then propounded the will of May 1868, and on the 14th Oct. last the widow served him with formal notice that she would not proceed further in the suit.

Dr. Swabey now moved the court to decree probate of the later will, and to condemn the widow in costs.

Inderwick, for the widow, submitted that she ought not to be condemned in costs, as she had a right to put the executor to proof in solemn form.

The COURT ordered contentious proceedings to be discontinued, but declined to make any order as to costs.

Attorneys for plaintiff, Edwards, Layton, and Jacques.

Proctor for defendant, A. Ayrton.

Digitized by Google

Tuesday, Dec. 21, 1869.

RAYSON v. PARTON AND PAGE (JOHNSON intervening).

Testamentary suit—Issues found partly for the will, partly against—Executors condemned in all the costs.

The executors propounded a will which was opposed by the next of kin, who pleaded incapacity, that the testator did not know and approve of the contents, undue influence, and fraud. The heir at law, an infant, obtained leave to intervene, though the executors opposed it. The jury found against the executors on the two first issues, but for them on the two last:

The court, on the ground that the evidence was not separable, condemned the executors in the costs of all the issues, and also in the costs of the intervener.

The defendants propounded the will of Charles Johnson, late of Sheerness, bearing date March 20, 1867, who died Feb. 1868, at upwards of 80 years of age. He was a retired baker, and by his will, after some small annuities to his nieces, he left the bulk of his property, which was principally realty, and was of the value of close upon 12,000*l.*, to the defendants, millers in partnership at Sheerness, with whose firm he had had dealings. The plaintiff contested the will as one of the next of kin, and pleaded incapacity, that the testator did not know and approve of the contents of the will, undue influence and fraud. The heir-at-law, who is an infant, had obtained leave to intervene, against the opposition of the defendants, and gave notice that he merely intended to cross-examine.

There had been a former suit, which had been compromised by an arrangement between the parties; but the court, in the absence of the heir-at-law, had declined to grant probate in solemn form.

This case was tried before the court with a special jury on Dec. 10, 11, 15, and 16.

Sir J. Karslake (M'Intyre and Bayford with him) for the defendants.

Serjt. Parry (Inderwick and Turner with him) for the plaintiff.

Chambers, Q.C. (Searle with him) for the heir-at-law intervening.

The jury found for the plaintiff on the issues of incapacity, and that the testator did not know and approve of the contents, but they found the issues of undue influence and fraud for the defendants. The court pronounced against the will, and condemned the executors in costs, subject to argument on the next motion day.

Dec. 21.—Bayford, on behalf of the executors, now showed cause against the order. He submitted that they ought not to be condemned in the costs of the two issues of undue influence and fraud, on which the verdict was for them. [Lord PENZANCE.—How can you draw a distinction when the evidence went altogether?] Most of the evidence was given specially to prove the two issues of fraud and undue influence. With regard to the heir-at-law, the defendants ought not to be condemned in his costs, since he had not been compelled by them to intervene, for they had opposed his intervention; and as he had given notice only to cross-examine witnesses, if he had failed the executors could not have got costs out of him. The effect of his intervention had been materially to increase the costs of the trial.

Lord PENZANCE.—As to the first point, if there were any substantial part of the evidence given with respect to the pleas of fraud and undue influence which differed from the rest of the evidence, the executors ought not to be cast in the costs of it; but, applying all the facts to the issues as they stood, I should say that the whole evidence applied to all the issues as they stood, and that no part was separable from the rest. As to the heir-at-law, I think it is not a fair view of his position to say that he has created these costs. You did not seek to bind him, and he was not, therefore, bound to have come in at the trial at all. He might have stood aside and have said, I will let you take your verdict as to the personalty, and at the proper time I will come in and bring my action on the realty, so that the whole will, as regards the realty, would have had to be gone through again, and you would have had to pay the costs of both proceedings. It seems to me that it would be setting a bad example if this court were to say to an heir-at-law, If you choose to come in and litigate the realty at the same time as the personalty, and so make it one, and therefore a less expensive proceeding, you shall not have your costs; but you shall have them if you stand aside and make the executors go over the same ground again. It seems to me that the heir-at-law has done that which is most desirable in your clients' interests. He has carried on the contest with you in much the least expensive way. The order, therefore, is confirmed, condemning the executors in the costs of the suit, with the costs of this motion.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Sismey.

Solicitor for the defendant, Jennings.

Solicitor for the intervener, Crosse.

COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

Reported by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Dec. 21, 1869.

YEATMAN v. YEATMAN AND RUMMELL.

Dissolution suit—Costs of former suit not paid—Stet processus refused.

A husband having failed in one suit for dissolution, brought a second, but charged the adultery with a different co-respondent. The court held that it was not the same cause of action, and refused a motion to stay proceedings until the husband had paid the costs of the former suit.

This was a husband's suit for dissolution of marriage, on the ground of adultery with the co-respondent. The petitioner had brought a former suit for dissolution with a different co-respondent, in which he had failed, and his wife had also brought a suit against him for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty, in which she had succeeded.

Searle, on behalf of the respondent, now moved to stay proceedings until the petitioner had paid the costs of the former suit. He submitted that the cause of action was the same, and cited,

Plows v. Locksley, 32 L. J. 227, Q. B.;
Hoare v. Dickson, 7 C. B. 164;
Colbet v. Warner, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 108.

Lord PENZANCE, J. O.—I have looked into the authorities, and I find that where a plaintiff having failed in one action brings another for the same cause, the court will order him to pay the costs of the former proceedings before he goes further. That is not the case here. The petitioner is asking for the same remedy—to get rid of his wife, but it is with a different co-respondent, and it cannot be said, therefore, that the cause of action is the same.

Petitioner in person.

Attorney for respondent, Edwards.

Digitized by Google

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT—IN ADMIRALTY.

EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Tuesday, Nov. 23, 1869.

(Before BENEDICT, J.)

THE UNITED STATES v. THE STEAMER MISSOURI.

Lien on ship—Maritime law—Revenue laws—Penalty—Jurisdiction—Proceedings in rem and in personam in admiralty.

By the revenue laws of the United States no goods, wares, or merchandises shall be imported in a ship or vessel belonging in whole or part to a citizen or citizens without having a proper manifest or manifests on board, under a penalty equal to the value of the goods not included in the manifest or manifests. To enforce payment of the penalty the vessel may be seized and proceeded against summarily by libel in any court having jurisdiction:

Held, that the seizure of the vessel referred to by the statute meant a seizure by the marshal of the Admiralty Court in the ordinary course of a proceeding in rem, and not by the Government; and that the penalty forming a maritime lien upon the vessel, a proceeding in rem in the Admiralty Court, and not a suit in a court of law, was the proper course to adopt, that being the only proceeding known to the law which is competent to determine the rights which are liable to be involved by an attempt to enforce a lien upon a ship.

Held, further, that it was not necessary to postpone proceedings against the ship until proceedings had been taken against the master or owner.

BENEDICT, J.—This is a proceeding in rem, instituted in behalf of the United States against the steamer Missouri, to recover the sum of 2998 dollars, for which sum it is claimed that this steamer is holden to the United States under the laws thereof. The averments of the libel are, that at a certain specified time certain goods, wares and merchandise, which are particularly described, were imported and brought into the United States from a foreign port in this vessel, which were not included in her manifest, contrary to the Act of Congress, passed 2nd March, 1799, and which belonged to, or were consigned to the master, mate, officers, and crew of said vessel; that the value of said merchandise was 2998 dollars, and by reason of the premises, and by force of the statute in such case made and provided, the said vessel, her tackle, apparel and furniture, became liable to the United States for the payment of the sum of 2998 dollars as a penalty. Wherefore it was prayed that process in rem issue against said vessel, her tackle, apparel and furniture, to enforce the payment of said penalty, and that the vessel might be arrested, and the said penalty pronounced for by the court, and the vessel condemned and sold to pay the same. Under this libel the usual process in rem, according to the course of the admiralty, was issued against the vessel, by virtue of which she was duly seized in waters within the jurisdiction of this court; whereupon the claimants duly appeared and filed their claim, and at the same time excepted to the libel, which exceptions are now to be disposed of. The question raised as to the jurisdiction is first to be considered. A statement of the provisions of law under which this libel is filed, is necessary to show the precise questions which the case presents. The Act of 2nd March, 1799 (sect. 24, 1 stat. 646), which is referred to in the libel, provides as follows:—"If any goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be imported or brought into the United States in any ship or vessel whatever, belonging to the whole or in part to a citizen or citizens, inhabitant or inhabitants of the United States, from any foreign port or place, without having a manifest or manifests on board agreeable to the directions in the foregoing section, or which shall not be included or described therein, or shall not agree therewith; in every such case the master or other person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel shall forfeit and pay a sum of money equal to the value of such goods not included in such manifest or manifests." Subsequently it was by statute enacted (see Act of 18th July, 1866, sect. 8, Laws of 1866, 180):—"That in any case where a vessel, or owner, or master, or manager of a vessel shall be subject to a penalty for a violation of the revenue laws of the United States, such vessel shall be holden for the payment of such penalty, and may be seized and proceeded against summarily by libel to recover such penalty in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offence." Under these two provisions of law, it is here contended, on the part of the Government, that by reason of the facts set forth in the libel a lien has been created upon this steamer for the sum of 2998 dollars, which lien may be enforced by ordinary proceedings in rem upon the instance side of the court, and that such proceedings may be taken in any district where the vessel may be found without previous seizure thereof; all which propositions the claimants deny. The Act of 18th July, 1866, under which this libel is filed, is an instance of incorporating into the revenue laws that marked feature of the maritime law which treats a ship as a person, and makes her personally responsible for the acts of those who own or control her; such legislation is but the offspring of that necessity out of which sprung the rule of the maritime law. It was long ago found necessary, in order to regulate the business and conduct of ships, which wander everywhere, and are the efficient agents, both for good and evil, of persons often entirely unknown, or impossible to be found—as between man and man, to charge the ship—which is always known, and can always be found, not only with the contracts, but the torts of her master and her owners. The same necessity has been felt in respect to the dealings of the shipmaster and shipowner with the Government, and accordingly the Act of 1866, in order to secure obedience to the revenue laws, causes the unlawful acts of the shipmaster and shipowner to charge the ship herself with the penalties prescribed for the violation of those laws. The legal effect of this statute, therefore, taken in connection with the Act of 2nd March, 1799, is to cause the unlawful transportation by the master contrary to the Act of 2nd March, 1799, to charge the ship with the penalty there prescribed, in the same manner as according to the maritime law a violation of the sailing rules by the master, which causes a collision, charges the ship with the damages ensuing. In construing such a statute—milder as it is than many statutes—it should be borne in mind that it is a revenue law, and like all revenue laws, to be so construed as effectually to accomplish the intention of the Legislature, and not necessarily with great strictness in favour of the defendant: (Taylor v. United States, 3 How. 210.) Let it be noticed, then, that the Act does not declare a forfeiture, but simply creates a charge upon the ship, and that the case made by the libel is not one of seizure, but of lien. Property forfeited to the Government may be seized, but I am not aware that a seizure is ever permitted except when the title to the property has changed by operation of law. A seizure is an assertion of title in the Government, and the subsequent proceedings in court are proceedings to try the title so asserted. When the object of such a seizure is a ship, the subsequent proceeding is in substance a petitory suit, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States. The Act, therefore, would not support a seizure, for it does not declare a forfeiture. But it is said this cannot be so, because the Act expressly provides for a seizure when it declares that the ship "may be seized, and proceeded against summarily by libel." The word "seizure," as here used, cannot, however, be considered as referring to a revenue seizure, but to that seizure by the marshal under the process of the court, which forms part of every proceeding in rem in the admiralty. So construed, the provision for a seizure and summary hearing upon a libel is simply a statutory averment of the jurisdiction of the district courts to enforce the lien which the Act creates, according to the course of the admiralty. This construction of the Act is certainly reasonable, while to hold that the word "seizure" as used was intended to authorise an assertion of title to property not forfeited but simply subject to a lien—perhaps insignificant in amount—would be to give to the statute a strange and harsh effect. My opinion, therefore, is that the objection to the libel that it does not aver a seizure within the district must fail. No such averment is necessary because no prior seizure could be legally made in a case like this. The case being, then, simply a proceeding to enforce a lien, the next question is whether it is a civil case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. It might be deemed a sufficient answer to this question to say that the Act, when it declares that the proceeding against the ship shall be by libel, clearly intended to declare the cases under it to be cases of admiralty jurisdiction. But if this were not so, or if a doubt be entertained as to the competency of the Legislature to require a proceeding according to the course of the admiralty in a case not within the constitutional provision, I hold the present case to be within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction conferred by the constitution, and for two reasons. One reason—to my own mind entirely satisfactory—is that it is a proceeding to enforce a lien upon a ship. A ship is never free from liens. From her cradle on the stocks to her grave in the sand, she is always, to a greater or less degree, encumbered by those charges which attach to her under the rules of the maritime law. These liens are necessities of her existence and usefulness as a ship. They are to the ship what credit is to the merchant; without them she must lie by the wall; by means of them she ploughs the sea. A proceeding to enforce any lien upon a ship by her sale—which is the only method of enforcing a lien—must, if injustice is to be avoided, call in question all the liens upon her, and must accordingly involve an adjudication upon liens created by the maritime law and exclusively maritime in their nature. It would seem, therefore, that it might well be held for this reason, if for no other, that all such proceedings should be taken in that court to which the determination of maritime questions more especially belongs. And all such proceedings should be held to be within the jurisdiction of the admiralty for the further reason that the proceeding in rem of the admiralty is the only proceeding known to the law which is competent to determine the rights which are liable to be involved by any attempt to enforce a lien upon a ship. An illustration such as might be presented any day will serve to show the correctness of this proposition. Suppose then the case of a lien upon a ship to the extent of her value, under this Act of 1866, and that the ship proves to have been heavily bottomried abroad, and on the voyage home to have sustained a collision by which a ship equal to her in value has been sunk. Of course upon arrival she owes a considerable sum to her crew, and her cargo turns out damaged by the disaster. If in such a case the lien of the Government is to be enforced by a suit at law, who is to be the defendant? Do you say the owners? They have no interest to defend until they have successfully disputed both the bottomry and the collision demand. If you say the bondholder, his interest depends upon the validity of his bond and the invalidity of the collision demand, and that in turn can only be recognised after it appears that the cause of the collision was faulty navigation of the vessel proceeded against, and what, in such a suit, is to become of the sailors and of the demands of the numerous freighters? To such a state of facts—and I have supposed no unreasonable case—a suit at law is inadequate. In all such cases the proceeding in rem of the admiralty to which all the world are parties—a proceeding which is, in some sense, a ship's bankruptcy proceeding, whereby she is discharged of all her debts, and her value distributed among her creditors—a proceeding of which the Supreme Court in the case of the Moses Taylor, 4 Wal. 427, say: "The distinguishing and characteristic feature of a proceeding in admiralty is that the vessel or thing proceeded against is itself seized and impleaded, defended, and judged, and sentenced accordingly." Such a proceeding, I say, is a necessity, if injustice is to be avoided. By means of that most sensible and useful of legal proceedings, the conflicting demands of the Government, of the bondholder, of the owner, of the crew, and of the freighters in the case supposed, are all easily adjudicated and disposed of at once—perhaps, even the ship meanwhile earning a sum equal to them all, to the advantage of her owners and the benefit of mankind. My own opinion therefore is that a sufficient reason for sustaining the jurisdiction of the admiralty in a case like this is to be found in the nature of the thing to be proceeded against—namely, a ship. But a second reason can be given, and that is, that the subject matter, which is the foundation of the charge upon the ship, is clearly maritime in its character, and therefore within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States. The lien which is sought to be enforced arises under the statute out of an alleged unlawful importation of cargo by this ship. This is as clearly "a water transaction"—to use the words of Chief Justice Marshall, as the exportation of cargo; and in the case of the Vengeance, 3 Dal. 297, the jurisdiction was sustained upon the sole ground that the exportation of cargo in a ship was a water transaction. Such matters have indeed long been conceded to be within the lawful jurisdiction of the admiralty: (Godolphin, 43.) If, then, the subject matter out of which the lien arises be maritime, the lien, although created by statute, may be enforced in the admiralty: (The St. Lawrence, 1 Black 522.) Because of the subject matter, therefore, I hold the present proceeding to be a case within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States. Nor do I see any difficulties in the way of enforcing the Act of July, 1866, in accordance with these views, such as seem to have occurred to the minds of some in considering the effect of similar provisions in the passenger laws. The provision of the Act which requires the proceeding to be by libel in the admiralty would, doubtless, be held to import that the lien is to be treated according to the principles and rules of the admiralty, which are ample to prevent injustice and also to protect commerce. Again, it is objected to this libel that it fails to show jurisdiction in this court, inasmuch as it does not appear that this court would have jurisdiction of a criminal prosecution for the illegal importation of the cargo in question, while the Act of 1866 declares that the proceedings against the vessel shall be "in the district court having jurisdiction of the offence." There remains to consider one other objection to this libel, which is, that it contains no averment of a prior judgment against the master for the penalty now sought to be recovered against the vessel. Upon this question my opinion is that under the Act of 1866 proceedings like the present may be taken against the vessel in the absence of any proceedings against the master or owner. The obvious intention of the Act was to enable the Government to enforce the revenue laws by a prompt seizure and prosecution of the vessel in case of a violation of them. It therefore declares that when the master or owner incur a penalty, the vessel may be seized and proceeded against summarily. If a forfeiture had been declared any previous proceedings against the master would not have been suggested, and a forfeiture to be followed by instant seizure without prior proceedings against any one is frequently declared for acts of the master. Thus the Act of 2nd March 1799, forfeits the vessel for the unlading of cargo before arrival at the place of discharge, and also for the unlading without permit, or otherwise than in open day. The Act of 27th June, 1864, forfeits the vessel for unlading except in presence of an inspector, and for a refusal of the person in charge to deliver the key. The Act of 18th July 1866, forfeits the vessel for failure of master to report at the first port, all goods bought for use of vessel in British provinces. The Act of 28th March 1826, forfeits the vessel for neglect of the master to deliver his manifest. In place of instant forfeiture of the whole vessel, the Act of 1866 creates a lien which is by far the milder form of punishment, and if so construed as to render it as effective as possible, it will still be much less rigorous than many laws. It is easy, therefore, to say that the words, "holden for the payment of such penalty," used in this Act are intended to create an original liability on the part of the ship for a penalty equal to that imposed upon the master or owner; and that the words, "seized and proceeded against summarily," preclude the idea of delay, and import that the proceeding may follow the unlawful act, and rest upon that alone, thus adopting the rule of the maritime law—that a ship may be treated as a person, and "judged and sentenced accordingly:" (The Moses Taylor, 4 Wal. 427.) And it will be found that great difficulties attend any other construction of the Act, for if it be held that the ship becomes chargeable by the unlawful act when committed, but can only be proceeded against at the termination of proceedings against the master or owner, which may be commenced at any time within three years, a most dangerous class of secret liens upon ships will be created to the great detriment of commerce, with but little, if any, advantage to the Government; while if it be held that under the Act the vessel first becomes chargeable upon the rendition of a judgment against the master or owner, the ship would become first chargable long after the transaction, when she might meanwhile have been sold to innocent parties, or encumbered by liens to her full value, or removed to foreign parts. A further objection to the latter construction seems to me also entitled to great weight, namely, that under either the owners and other parties interested in the ship would be debarred from the right to contest the question of liability for the penalty. A judgment against the shipmaster in an action where he would be the only defendant, and of which no others would have notice, would be conclusive of the liability of the ship. I cannot believe that such was the intention of the Legislature. On the other hand it may be said, that under the construction here sought to be given to the Act, the proceedings against the ship would often be a proceeding to collect an uncertain sum, inasmuch as many of the penalties imposed for violation of the revenue laws are, within certain limits, left in the discretion of the court which tries the offender. To which the sufficient answer is, that the same discretion can as well be exercised in the proceeding in rem against the ship as in the proceeding in personam against the master. Proceedings in rem for sums uncertain and dependent on the judicial discretion are common proceedings, in the admiralty, as, for instance, actions for salvage, personal injuries, and the like. The considerations I have thus endeavoured to present seem to me to lead forcibly to the conclusion to which I have arrived, that under the Act of 1866, taken in connection with the 24th section of the Act of March 2, 1799, the facts alleged to exist in the present case are sufficient to create a lien upon this steamer for the amount of the penalty claimed, which may be enforced by a proceeding in admiralty in this court, without proof of a prior seizure of the vessel, or of a prior judgment against the master for such penalty.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, Dec. 2, 1869.

(Present, the Right Hon. the LORD CHANCELLOR, the ARCHBISHOP OF YORK, the BISHOP OF LONDON, Lord CHELMSFORD, Sir JAMES W. COLVILE, and Sir JOSEPH NAPIER.)

THOMAS BYARD SHEPPARD (app.) v. the Rev. WILLIAM JAMES EARLY BENNETT (resp.)

Practice—Appeal from Arches Court to Privy Council—Rule 14—Period between bringing in petition of appeal and hearing—Contumacious non-appearance in court below.

Rule 14 of the Rules for Appeals in Ecclesiastical and Maritime Causes applies to an appeal from the Arches Court, as to the form of articles of charge against a clerk for heresy, although the clerk contumaciously refused to appear to the citation of that court.

In such a case, therefore, as well as in the ordinary case where an appearance has not been entered, the appeal shall not stand for hearing before the Judicial Committee until a period of four months has expired from the bringing in of the petition of appeal.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Dean of Arches (Sir Robert Phillimore), dated 30th Oct. 1869, in a cause of the office of the judge promoted by the appellant, of the parish of Frome Selwood, Somersetshire, against the respondent, the vicar of that parish.

The cause came before the Arches Court by letters of request from the Bishop of Bath and Wells. The respondent was charged with having caused to be printed and published within the diocese of London, certain works in which he advisedly maintained or affirmed doctrine directly contrary or repugnant to the articles and formularies of the Church of England, the said works being entitled respectively "Some Results of the Tractarian Movement of 1833," forming one of the essays contained in "The Church and the World," printed and published in 1867; and "A Plea for Toleration in the Church of England, in a letter to the Rev. E. B. Pusey, D.D., &c." second and third editions, printed and published in London in 1867 and 1868.

Certain passages from the said works were set out in the letters of request and citation. In the articles, further passages from the same works were set out. At the hearing on the admission of the articles, after the arguments of counsel on behalf of the appellant, the Dean of Arches determined that these further passages referred to a separate and distinct charge of heresy, and were, therefore, a variance from the letters of request and citation, and accordingly directed the articles to be reformed by omitting all such parts thereof as charged the respondent with contravening the 29th Article of Religion, entitled, "Of the Wicked which eat not the Body of Christ in the use of the Lord's Supper." The Dean of Arches in the course of his judgment, remarked on the inconvenience arising to the court from the contumacious refusal of the respondent to appear to the citation.

Leave to appeal to the Judicial Committee was given to the appellant, and on 13th Nov. 1869, the petition of appeal was filed, and transmitted to the registrar of the Judicial Committee, who acknowledged the receipt thereof by letter of the same date.

Dec. 2.—Stephens, Q. C. and Dr. Tristram (with whom were Archibald and Shaw) for the appellant.—A preliminary point would be submitted to their Lordships, viz., whether the hearing of the appeal was not too soon, under rule 14 of the Rules for Appeals in Ecclesiastical and Maritime Causes. That rule provided that four months must elapse between the bringing in and hearing of the petition of appeal, where an appearance has not been entered. It would be submitted that this rule did not apply to the present case, since this was a mere interlocutory application, by which the respondent could not be in any way prejudiced or benefited. The respondent had been pronounced contumacious for non-appearance in the court below; he was, therefore, in no way before the court below, nor had he any right of appeal, nor could he benefit by that appeal:

Herbert v. Herbert, 2 Phill. 430;
Hanley v. Edwards, 4 Moo. P. C. 407.

The LORD CHANCELLOR delivered judgment to the following effect:—Their Lordships are all of opinion that this appeal stands for hearing too soon. Rule 14 is that, "as soon as the time allowed for bringing in the cases has expired, the appeal shall stand for hearing before the Judicial Committee, provided that where an appearance has not been entered, a period of four months has expired from the bringing in of the petition of appeal:" (Rules for Appeals in Ecclesiastical and Maritime Causes, Dec. 11, 1865; 32 L. J. Priv. Co. p. ii.) It was contended that the rule does not apply to the present case, because this was an interlocutory application, and because the respondent had contumaciously refused to appear in the court below. Their Lordships, however, consider that the rule applies, and will therefore order that the case stand over till four calendar months have expired from the bringing in of the petition of the appeal.

Proctors for the appellant, Moore and Currey.

Equity Courts.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PEAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, Dec. 10, 1869.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE DRAPERS' COMPANY.

Costs—Taxation—Surveyor's charges—Commission on purchase-money—"Ryde's scale."

On taxation of a bill of costs, the master allowed an item in respect of surveyor's charges calculated according to "Ryde's scale," by which a commission of from one-half to one per cent. on the amount of the purchase-money, according to the nature of the case, is allowed to surveyors.

Summons to review the taxation in respect of this item dismissed with costs.

"Ryde's scale" approved of.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons taken out by the South-Eastern Railway Company, asking that the taxing master should be directed to review his taxation of a bill of costs payable by the railway company under the following circumstances:

The South-Eastern Railway Company had taken for the purposes of their works certain real estate belonging to the Drapers' Company. The bill of costs sent in to the railway company in respect of this purchase comprised an item of 73*l.* for surveyor's charges. The purchase-money was little more than 1200*l.*, and the surveyor's charges were made in accordance with a scale of charges prepared by Mr. Ryde, an eminent surveyor in the city of London, and known as "Ryde's scale." By this scale a commission of from one-half to one per cent. on the amount of the purchase-money, according to the nature of the case, is allowed to the surveyor. On taxation this item of 73*l.* was allowed by the taxing master, and the railway company, being of opinion that the charge was excessive, took out the present summons to have the master's decision reviewed.

Phear, for the railway company, submitted that the system adopted in common law taxation of allowing the surveyor a quantum meruit was preferable to that adopted by the taxing masters in Chancery of making an ad valorem allowance on the amount of the purchase-money.

Bowring, for the Drapers' Company, was not called upon.

Lord ROMILLY.—I am quite clear that this application is wholly misconceived. I am asked to set aside the taxing master's decision, not on a question of principle, but on a mere question of amount. I never enter into calculations of this kind. Moreover, I am of opinion that the allowance of a commission of from one-half to one per cent. on the purchase-money is a reasonable charge, and that if Ryde's scale has been generally adopted, it should not be interfered with, as regular allowances of this kind are very convenient, and prevent disputes as to the amount of charges. The summons must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the railway company, E. P. Cearns.

Solicitor for the Drapers' Company, Lawford and Waterhouse.

Friday, Dec. 10, 1869.

KERSHAW v. KERSHAW.

Vendor and purchaser—Appropriation of purchase-money—Interest.

A purchaser contracted to buy certain real estate for 38,500l., and was by the terms of the contract liable to pay interest at 5 per cent. up to the time of payment. Completion being delayed, he transferred 38,000l. to a separate account at his banker's, and gave notice that he would not pay any further interest. The vendor denied the sufficiency of the notice, and the purchaser afterwards finding that he had not paid in the whole amount of the purchase-money, paid in the remaining 500l. with interest thereon:

Held, that he was not liable to pay interest from the date when he transferred the 38,000l. to a separate account, notwithstanding that the amount so transferred was less than the amount of the purchase-money:

Winter v. Blades, 2 Sim. & Stu. 393, distinguished.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by the plaintiff in the suit that the purchaser of certain real estate, part of the estate which was being administered in the suit, might be compelled to pay interest on his purchase-money at 5 per cent. under the following circumstances.

The amount of the purchase-money was 38,500*l.*, and by the contract it was provided as follows: "Purchase to take effect from the 30th June 1868, and interest at 5 per cent. to time of payment, and timely notice to be given as to requirement of the purchase-money." Possession was given to the purchaser on the 30th June 1868, but completion being delayed in consequence of certain difficulties which arose with regard to the title, the purchaser on the 12th Nov. following gave notice to the vendors that he had appropriated the sum of 38,000*l.* for the purpose of the purchase, and had transferred it to a separate account at his bankers', and that he would not pay any further interest. In a letter acknowledging the receipt of the notice, the vendors' solicitors stated that they denied the sufficiency of the notice. About a year later the purchaser, finding that he had appropriated 500*l.* less than the amount of the purchase-money, transferred to the separate account at his banker's a further sum of 500*l.* with interest at 5 per cent. up to that date.

Humphreys (with him Southgate, Q. C.), for the vendors, contended that the purchaser, having appropriated a sum less than the amount of the purchase-money, and having been informed by the vendors' solicitor that the sufficiency of his notice that he would not pay any further interest was denied, must now pay interest on the whole amount of the purchase-money. He cited

Dickenson v. Heron, Sugd. V. & P. 14th edit., p. 630;
Esdaile v. Stephenson, 1 Sim. & Stu. 122;
Binks v. Lord Rokeby, 2 Swanst. 222;
Winter v. Blades, 2 Sim. & Stu. 393; Sugd. V. & P. 14th edit., p. 628.

Jessell, Q. C., and Brett Ince, for the purchaser, were not called upon.

Lord ROMILLY.—I consider this quite clear, that if he had paid in the full amount of the purchase-money, and given notice, he would thereby have freed himself from the liability to pay interest. The vendors might have called upon him to invest the sum in their joint names, so that they might get interest on it; but they do nothing of the kind. He pays in 38,000*l.* to a separate account, and they give him no notice that it is 500*l.* under the amount of the purchase-money. This is not the case of a floating balance, as in Winter v. Blades (sup.), the purchaser here fairly appropriated the money, and from the date of his notice derived no benefit from it. I am of opinion that in substance he paid in the whole amount, and that he is not liable for any interest from the date when he paid the money into the bank.

Solicitors for the vendors, Johnson and Weatheralls.

Solicitors for the purchaser, Clarke, Woodcock, and Ryland.

Nov. 20 and 22, 1869.

THRUPP v. GOODRICH.

Annuity—Survivorship—Construction of order of court —Consent binding on married woman.

A testator directed his residuary estate to be invested in the purchase of a Government annuity for the joint lives of his wife and daughter, and the life of the survivor, and directed the annuity to be paid to them during their joint lives in equal shares, and on the death of either the whole to be paid to the survivor during her life; and he declared that his wife and daughter, or the survivor of them, should not have the power of electing to take the money in lieu of the annuity:

It being found in a suit for the administration of the testator's estate that such an annuity would only amount to about 4½ per cent. on the residue, the two ladies applied to the court, and, by an order made with their consent, it was ordered that the residue should be invested, and it was declared that the difference between the amount of the residue and the price for the time being of such a Government annuity as the residue would have purchased at the testator's death would belong to the two ladies during their joint lives, and that they had each power to dispose by will of one moiety of such difference.

The testator's widow married again before the date of the order. The daughter died intestate, and the price of the annuity was much reduced in consequence of her death:

Held, that both the ladies, having consented to the order, were, notwithstanding the fact that they were under disability, bound by the order, but that it must be adhered to strictly, and that the daughter not having exercised the power given her by the order to dispose by will of one moiety of the difference between the amount of the residue, and the price for the time being of such a Government annuity, the whole of such difference must go exactly as if the power of disposition by will had been struck out of the order, viz., to the survivor.

By his will dated the 16th Feb. 1849, John Collett, after directing the payment of his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and making some specific legacies, gave, devised, and bequeathed all the residue of his estate, property, and effects of every description unto and to the use of J. W. Thrupp, O. Vile, and W. Batty, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust to sell the same, and after making the payments thereinbefore directed out of the proceeds of sale, to invest the residue in their names in the purchase of one or more Government or other well secured annuity or annuities to be payable during the joint lives of his wife Ermingarde Collett (now Mrs. Goodrich) and of his daughter Charlotte Eustatia Atkinson, and the life of the survivor or longer liver of them. And the testator directed and declared that his said trustees should stand and be possessed of and interested in the said annuity or annuities so to be purchased or acquired by them as aforesaid, upon trust to pay the same by quarterly or half yearly payments or otherwise when received unto and between his said wife and daughter during their joint lives in equal shares and proportions, and on the death of either of them to pay the whole of such annuity or annuities to the survivor of them for her life. And the testator directed and declared that such annuity or annuities should be for the sole and separate use and benefit of his said wife and daughter as aforesaid respectively without power of anticipation, and particularly the said testator declared that his said wife and daughter, or the survivor of them, should not have the power of electing to take and receive the money to be appropriated as aforesaid for the purchase of the said annuity or annuities in lieu of such annuity or annuities being actually purchased, but that the said annuity or annuities should be purchased and applied for their respective, separate, and inalienable use and benefit during their joint lives, and the life of the survivor of them in manner thereinbefore directed.

The testator died on the 28th Nov. 1856, and his will was proved on the 12th Dec. following, by his executors, J. W. Thrupp, O. Vile, and W. Batty, who soon afterwards instituted a suit for the administration of the testator's estate.

In pursuance of an order made in the suit, the sum of 15,852*l.* 0*s.* 11*d.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities was carried over to an account entitled "The Indemnity Fund."

Digitized by Google

By the chief clerk's certificate, dated the 1st June 1860, it was, amongst other things, certified that a Government annuity of 2620*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, payable during the joint lives of the said Ermingarde Collett and Charlotte E. Atkinson, and the life of the survivor of them, could have been purchased on the 28th Nov. 1857, being the end of one year after the testator's death, with the sum of 58,567*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*, being the amount or value of the testator's residuary estate.

By an order made in the said suit, at the instance and with the consent of the two ladies, and dated the 16th July 1860, it was, amongst other things, declared that the difference for the time being between the total amount or value of the Bank Annuities therein mentioned, or other the stocks, funds, or securities in or upon which the proceeds thereof should for the time being be invested, and the said sum of 15,852*l.* 0*s.* 11*d.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities (the indemnity fund), on the one hand, and the price or sum at which the Government annuity of 2620*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, payable during the joint lives of the said Ermingarde Collett and Charlotte E. Atkinson, and the life of the survivor of them, could for the time being be purchased, on the other hand, would belong during their joint lives to the said E. Collett and C. E. Atkinson, in equal shares for their separate use respectively, and with liberty for them to apply to the court as advised, having regard to such declaration. And it was declared that the said E. Collett and C. E. Atkinson had each power to dispose by will of one moiety of so much of the capital of the residuary estate of the testator, including the indemnity fund, as, having regard to the declaration aforesaid, should not be required to be retained as the price or sum of money at which such Government annuity as aforesaid could for the time being be purchased.

The testator's widow, Ermingarde Collett, before the date of the order, intermarried with, and was now the wife of, Thomas White Goodrich.

Charlotte Eustatia Atkinson (the testator's daughter), died on 2nd Aug. 1869 intestate, and letters of administration to her estate and effects were duly granted to her husband Adam Atkinson.

The result of Mrs. Atkinson's death was, that the sum required for the purchase of a Government annuity of 2620*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* was very considerably reduced, and a surplus of over 8700*l.* was left.

Petitions were presented by Mr. Atkinson and Mrs. Goodrich for payment of the moiety of the amount, and the question which arose on these petitions was, whether Mrs. Goodrich, the survivor of the two annuitants, was to take the whole amount, or whether one moiety went to the administrator of Mrs. Atkinson.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., Southgate, Q.C., and Chitty, for Mrs. Atkinson's administrator, submitted that the 8700*l.*, being a surplus after providing for the annuity, one moiety of it must go to Mrs. Atkinson's administrator, in accordance with the declaration in the order of the 16th July 1860, that the ladies had power to dispose of a moiety of the surplus by will. They cited, Woodmeston v. Walker, 2 Russ. & My. 197.

Jessel, Q.C., Hardy, Q.C., and Montague Cookson, for Mrs. Goodrich, contended that she was not bound by the order of the court, having been under disability at the time when she consented to the order; but assuming her to be bound, the order must be construed strictly, and the construction could not be carried one jot further than Mrs. Goodrich had consented.

Freeman appeared for mortgagees of Mrs. Goodrich's interest.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C. replied.

Nov. 22.—Lord ROMILLY.—This is a very singular case, because the question has been raised in fact by an order of the court, and the more one looks at it the more one doubts whether the court had any power to make such an order. The court sometimes, in the interest and at the request of the parties, is induced to strain a little for their objects and purposes, and this is one of those instances. The state of the case, which is very singular, is this: A testator had a very considerable sum of money; he desires that on his death it shall be converted into a Government annuity for the joint lives of his widow and his daughter, and the life of the survivor, and that they shall not be allowed under any circumstances to take the capital of the fund which is to be converted into an annuity, and that they shall have it as an annuity. Upon inquiry what a Government annuity could be obtained for, they found that at the death of the testator the amount of the annuity for the joint lives, and the life of the survivor, would be less than 4½ per cent. on the fund. They thought that this was rather hard, and amounted to throwing away the money, and thereupon they come and ask the court to make a particular order, and the court makes the order which I am about to refer to and read. Now this I am certain of, that this is the effect of the will—whether the court had power to make the order or not I am not at this moment considering; but the will gives the property, whatever it is, absolutely to the survivor, and the survivor takes the whole of the property There is no gift over, and there is nothing undisposed of. Of that I have no doubt. The only question is what the order has done. Now, in the first place, I must say I am willing to adopt Mr. Montague Cookson's argument, that the construction of the order must not be carried one jot further than this lady, Mrs. Goodrich, consented. That I admit. But also I must say this, that not only was it made with her consent, though it does not appear to be a consent order, but it was made at her request and instance, therefore I cannot allow her to dispute the effect of the order, or to say that the court had no power to make the order. What is the order? I take it with these two considerations—that she is bound by it, but not one jot further than the order expressly states. The order was to this effect. [His Lordship read the order of 16th July, 1860.] The younger life (Mrs. Atkinson) has died, the consequence of which is that a very much smaller sum than was anticipated would be sufficient now to buy this annuity of 2620*l.* for the older life. The result is that there is at least 8700*l.* surplus, and the question is to whom that belongs. I do not at this moment discuss whether the court had power to make that particular order. But I do not think that the court, if it has strained a point, has injured anybody, and it has benefited certain persons that are now before the court. I do not think it probable that any interest can arise which would induce any person to contest the propriety of the order, or that the order could be now successfully appealed from; and I assume that I am bound, as are all the parties who are before me, by the order. The order takes away nothing from any of the persons that was given to them by the will, with this exception, that, having created a certain surplus fund, it has declared that each party has a power to dispose of the moiety by will, and, as Mr. Hardy very justly said, the court has added something to the will for them. They have power to dispose of this moiety by will, but if they do not dispose of it, what is the consequence? Has the court dealt with it? Has the court professed to deal with it? Was it agreed between the parties that they should deal with it? Nothing of the sort. This lady has died, and she has left no will at all. Can this court make a will for her? An arrangement was made between the two ladies, by which in possible events a sum of 8000*l.* might arise, and they agreed that though this would belong to the survivor, unless otherwise disposed of, the one who died first should have power to dispose of one half of it by will. She does not dispose of it by will. Does it not belong to the survivor? Can I in any way interfere with it and say that the survivor is not entitled to it? This is a very singular case. Sir Roundell Palmer stated it very fully to me at the time, and I thought I could make the order, and I am sure it was a very beneficial order for all parties. I am not now disposed to affect it; but of this I am certain, that I must adhere to it strictly, and that having given this lady a power to dispose of one-half by will, and she not having done so, it must go exactly as if this clause as to disposition by will had been struck out of the order. If so, there can be no doubt that it would belong to the survivor, because it was expressly so given by the testator's will. I am of opinion, therefore, that I cannot comply with the prayer of the husband's petition, and that I must comply with the prayer of Mrs. Goodrich's petition, and declare that she is entitled to the whole amount in question.

Digitized by Google

Solicitors for Mrs. Atkinson, Shum and Crossman.

Solicitors for Mrs. Goodrich, Bargoynes, Milnes, Bargoyne, and Thrupp.

Dec. 4 and 11, 1869.

WALL v. ROGERS.

WALL v. OGLE.

Married woman—Compromise of suit—Power of court to sanction—Practice.

On a petition presented by a husband and wife for the compromise of a suit, relating to the reversionary interest of the wife in a certain trust fund in which suit she and her husband were plaintiffs:

Held, that the court had power to sanction the compromise, but that the wife should be made a respondent to the petition, and appear separately.

The above suits were instituted by Mr. and Mrs. Wall and others, to compel the trustees of a certain settlement to replace a trust fund, to an undivided share in which Mrs. Wall was entitled, subject to the life-interest therein of her mother, Mrs. Ogle.

An agreement was entered into and signed by all the parties to the two suits, of whom Mrs. Wall alone was under disability, for a compromise of both suits. By this agreement the defendants were to pay 100*l.* to Mrs. Wall, and to each of the other plaintiffs who were entitled to shares in the trust-fund, and also to pay the costs of the suits; it was also thereby agreed that all proceedings in the suits should be stayed, and the defendants released from all further liability.

The plaintiffs in the suit now presented a petition to obtain the sanction of the court to the compromise, and the only question which arose was, whether the court had power to bind Mrs. Wall by the compromise, her interest being reversionary.

Jessell, Q. C., and D. Jones appeared in support of the petition.

Stirling, for the trustees of the settlement, suggested that the bills should be amended by making the husband a defendant, and the wife, by her next friend, a plaintiff. He cited

Wilson v. Hill, 25 L. J. 156, Ch.;
Clarke v. Green, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 38; 2 H. & M. 474.

Cottrell appeared for the other respondents.

Jessel, Q. C. in reply, contended that the course suggested by Stirling could not be adopted, as the property was not settled to the separate use of the wife. He cited Doane v. Hart, 2 Russ. & My. 360.

The following case was also referred to:

Brooke v. Lord Mostyn, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 392; 2 De G. J. & S. 373.

Dec. 4.—Lord ROMILLY.—I think I have power to sanction the compromise so as to bind Mrs. Wall, but she must be made a respondent and appear separately on the petition.

Dec. 11.—The petition having been amended in accordance with his Lordship's judgment, an order was made in the terms of the prayer of the petition.

Solicitors for the petitioners, Allen, Colley and Edwards.

Solicitor for the respondents, H. J. Adcock.

Saturday, Dec. 11, 1869.

Re THE PATENT PAPER MANUFACTURING COMPANY; ADDISON'S CASE.

Company — Winding-up — Contributory — Conditional allotment of shares — Ultra vires.

In 1858 A. applied for 100 shares in a company, on the faith of a resolution by which the directors were authorised to enter into negotiations with parties for the investment of capital in the shares of the company on condition of such shares being cancelled, and the amounts so invested therein being returned to the parties on their giving one month's notice within a limited period. The shares were duly allotted to A., and registered in his name, and he paid 500l. in respect of them. He afterwards, in 1859, gave notice in accordance with the condition; the 500l. was thereupon repaid to him, and he transferred the shares to a nominee of the directors, and his name thenceforth ceased to appear on the register. The winding-up of the company commenced in 1868.

Held, that the condition subject to which A. took the shares was ultra vires and void, and that his name must be fixed on the list of contributories, notwithstanding the lapse of time during which his name had not appeared on the register.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by Mr. Joseph Addison to have his name removed from the list of contributories to the above company, which was being wound-up under the supervision of the court, in respect of 100 shares.

In Feb. 1858, a resolution was passed by which the directors were authorised to enter into negotiations with parties for the investment of capital in the shares of the company, "on condition of such shares being cancelled, and the amount so invested therein being returned to the parties on their giving notice of their requiring the same to be done, one calendar month previous to the 31st Dec. 1859."

In the same month Mr. Addison, wishing to lend 500*l.* to the company at interest, and relying on the resolution above set forth, applied for 100 5*l.* shares. The shares were allotted to him, and registered in his name, and he paid 500*l.* to the company. Towards the end of the year 1859 he gave one month's notice to the company that he wished the shares to be cancelled, and the 500*l.* to be repaid; the 500*l.* was accordingly repaid to him, and in Jan. 1860 he executed a transfer of the shares to a nominee of the directors for and on behalf of the company. Since the transfer of the shares his name had ceased to appear on the register; but on the winding-up of the company in 1868, the liquidator placed his name on the list of contributories, on the ground that the condition under which the shares were cancelled was ultra vires.

There was no clause in the articles of association authorising the investment of the funds of the company in the purchase of its own shares.

Swanston, Q. C. and J. Napier Higgins, in support of the application, submitted that the condition was either intra vires or ultra vires, and that in either case the applicant was entitled to have his name removed from the list; if it was intra vires then the cancellation of the shares was valid; if the condition was ultra vires it was void, and the allotment of shares was also void, so that the applicant was at no time a shareholder. They cited

Re Waterloo Life Assurance Company, Saunders's case, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 3; 2 De G. J. & S. 101;
Re Richmond Hill Hotel Company, Pellatt's case, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442; L. Rep. 2 Ch. 527;
Re The London and Northern Assurance Company, Stace and Worth's case, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 182; L. Rep. 4 Ch. 682.

They contended that the present case was quite distinct from Spackman v. Evans, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 151; L. Rep. 3 H. of L. 171.

Jessel, Q.C., and Jackson, for the official liquidator, contended that the present case was not governed by Pellatt's case (sup.), where the condition was precedent; here the condition was subsequent, and therefore collateral as in Re Richmond Hill Hotel Company, Elkington's case, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 301; L. Rep. 2 Ch. 511.

Swanston, Q.C., in reply contended that the company were guilty of laches in allowing Addison's name to remain so many years off the register, and that, therefore, he could not now be fixed on the list, even assuming that the condition under which he took the shares was ultra vires. He cited

Re European Central Railway Company, Parson's case, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 656.

Lord ROMILLY.—It is unfortunate for this gentleman that he ever had any dealings with the company, but I have no doubt that he has been properly placed on the list of contributories. Pellatt's case (sup.) is quite distinct from this; in that case there was an agreement that the calls should be set-off against goods to be supplied by the shareholder, but no letter of allotment was sent to him. Here the shares were duly allotted to Mr. Addison, who applied for them on the faith of a condition that he might give them up and have his money repaid on giving a certain notice. But it is quite clear that a person cannot accept shares on condition that in a year or two he may give them up. Such a condition was ultra vires, but the invalidity of the condition does not make the whole transaction void. The reservation of the right to retire was ultra vires, but the allotment of the shares was valid. I am also of opinion that there has been no laches on the part of the company in this case, inasmuch as they, as well as Mr. Addison, acted throughout in the belief that the transaction was intra vires, and no one has been injured by the delay. I have, therefore, no doubt that Mr. Addison must be fixed on the list of contributories.

Solicitors for the applicant, Waller and Scott.

Solicitors for the official liquidator, Kimber and Ellis.

Friday Dec. 17, 1869.

WEEKES v. GALLARD.

Vendor and purchaser—Contract for sale at price to be fixed by valuers—Valuers named in contract—Inadequate valuation—Specific performance.

A. entered into a contract with B. for the sale of certain property to him at a price to be fixed by two valuers, named in the contract, who afterwards valued the property at an inadequate price:

Held, nevertheless, that B. was entitled to a decree for specific performance, there being no proof of fraud or collusion on the part of the valuers.

Parken v. Whitby, 1 Turn. & Russ. 366, not followed.

This was a purchaser's suit for specific performance.

In Feb. 1868, the defendant entered into a contract to sell to the plaintiff a brewery, situate at Cliftonville, near Brighton, and known as the Brighton Brewery, with the plant, fixtures, and public-houses belonging to it, at a price to be fixed by Messrs. Mason and Thomas, who were named in the contract, and who subsequently valued the property at a little over 12,000*l.*

The vendor's defence to the suit was that the valuation was grossly inadequate, the valuers not having duly estimated the value of the public-houses belonging to the brewery, which were under covenants to purchase beer from the brewery at an increased price.

The defendant had caused the property to be valued by four different valuers, and produced their valuations in support of his case; the lowest of them was 13,200*l.*, and the highest 18,300*l.*

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. (with him Everitt) for the plaintiff, submitted that the defendant was bound by the price fixed by the valuers named in the contract, and that the plaintiff was entitled to a decree for specific performance.

Jessel, Q. C. and Cecil Russell, for the defendant, contended that the court was not bound by the judgment of the valuers named in the contract, and that where there was evidence that the valuation was inadequate, the court would not decree specific performance, a remedy in which the court had a wide discretion, but would leave the plaintiff to his legal remedy. They cited

Parken v. Whitby, 1 Turn. & Russ. 366;
Clowes v. Higginson, 1 V. & B. 524.

Lord ROMILLY.—This is a very unfortunate case, assuming the property to be valued too low, which seems probable. But that is no defence to the plaintiff's suit. The plaintiff and defendant agreed to be bound by the valuation of two persons named in the agreement, and it is the duty of the court to enforce specific performance of such agreements. The court has really no discretion in the matter. The discretion of the court is bound, as Lord Ellenborough says, by fixed rules. In one case of this kind a house and furniture were valued at three times their value, and yet there was a decree for specific performance. The only defence to such a suit would be fraud or collusion. There is no proof here that the valuers did not value the property as fairly as they could; there is no suggestion of fraud or collusion. There must, therefore, be a decree for specific performance of the contract with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Tilleard, Son, Godden, and Holme, for Black and Freeman, Brighton.

Solicitor for the defendant, E. M. Hore, for Williams and Greaves, Brighton.

Digitized by Google

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, Dec. 22, 1869.

Re THE RAILWAY COMPANIES ACT 1867, AND Re THE SOMERSET AND DORSET RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Scheme of arrangement—Confirmation—Dissent of outside creditors—Railway Companies Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127).

Where upon a petition for the confirmation of a scheme of arrangement between a railway company and their creditors some of the outside creditors appeared and opposed the scheme:

The court, on its appearing that their opposition was reasonable, and based on a due regard to their own interests, dismissed the petition.

This was a petition presented by the Somerset and Dorset Railway Company for the purpose of obtaining the court's sanction to a scheme of arrangement between the company and its creditors.

The facts were briefly these:—

The company, by its Acts, was authorised to raise about 1,250,000*l.* stock and shares, and 439,000*l.* debentures, of which 833,215*l.* stock and shares and debentures had been issued. Debts amounting to 356,750*l.* had been incurred on the personal guarantee of the directors, which were partially secured by the deposit of various amounts of debenture and other stock. The total amount of the company's liabilities was 450*l.* per annum for rentcharges, 90,000*l.* for rolling stock and land, 70,000*l.* for other debts; on debentures deposited with creditors, 100,000*l.*, on other debentures, 282,000*l.*, on stock and shares, 833,215*l.*

The proposed scheme contained (inter alia) the following provisions:—

That the revenue of the company should be applied in the first instance, towards payment of the rentcharges. That the superfluous lands should be sold, and the proceeds applied towards repaying the directors the amounts they had been obliged to pay on their guarantees. That 160,000*l.* should be raised by the issue of a debenture stock (which was to have a priority over all other debenture stock) of which 40,000*l.* was to be issued in lieu of deposited securities, the remainder applied in payment of debts incurred for rolling stock, and the purchase of land, and the residue in payment of other debts, other than debenture debts. That three other classes of debentures should be created, all like the first carrying interest at 5*l.* per cent, which were to be issued to the holders of existing securities in specified proportions. That the receiver who had been appointed in the suit of Miller v. The Somerset and Dorset Railway Company, should continue to act, and that the balance of certain sums in that suit should be applied in payment of the costs of the scheme, and the residue be paid to the company.

Dickinson, Q. C., Speed, and Smith Osler, in support of the petition, submitted that the scheme came within the Railway Companies Act, and deserved the approval of the court. They had obtained the assent of the requisite majority of share and debenture-holders, and of all unpaid vendors of land, except one who was a creditor for 4000*l.* The scheme was the result of a compromise effected with great difficulty, and there was every reason for believing that it would act most beneficially for all parties interested in the company. The affairs of the company were steadily improving. The net income amounted to about 16,600*l.* per annum, which far more than sufficed to pay the interest on the debenture stock proposed to be raised. There would be no difficulty in raising the required fund.

Osborne Morgan, Q. C. and Byrne, on behalf of Mr. Drax, the landowner above referred to, opposed the scheme. They stated that his land had been taken possession of by the company in May 1857, and his purchase-money had not as yet been paid. In 1865 he filed a bill against the company, and obtained a declaration of lien and a decree enabling him in February next to take possession of the land in default of payment of his purchase-money. They contended that if the scheme were confirmed, Mr. Drax would be deprived, not only of his rights under the decree, but of his land. The 14th clause of the scheme empowered the directors to dispose of all superfluous lands, and the directors might thus, after keeping Mr. Drax out of his purchase-money for thirteen years, declare his land superfluous, and sell it for the benefit of the company. There was no clause in the Act which enabled a majority of the creditors to bind the minority. It had recently been decided in two instances that a creditor might successfully resist a scheme if he could show that he did so consistently with his own interest, and the present case came within those authorities. They referred to

Re Cambrian Railway Company's Scheme, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 278; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 374;
Re Bristol and North Somerset Railway Company, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 448, 454; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 70.

Ince for the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, also opposed the scheme.—He stated that his clients were creditors of the company, and had a demand against a sum of money at present in the hands of the receiver of the court. One of the clauses of the scheme proposed to deal with that money, and he therefore submitted that he was perfectly justified in his opposition. He relied on the authorities cited.

Martineau for a debenture-holder for 13,000*l.*, and for a preference shareholder, also opposed the scheme. He submitted that it was unjust to the preference shareholders as a body; they were creditors as well as shareholders, but it was not proposed to deal with their claims like the other creditors, but to postpone them. He submitted that the company ought not to be permitted to make a distinction between the two classes of creditors.

Dickinson, Q. C. in reply, contended that the court ought not to listen to the objections of persons whose consent was not required, and whose rights and remedies were not affected. The rights of the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company would not in the least be affected; but, even if they were, the company had no lien on the fund which it was proposed to deal with, and could not successfully oppose the scheme. But the scheme in fact instead of being prejudicial to them would, if carried out, operate in their favour. With regard to Mr. Drax he would not be injured. The clause of which he complained dealt only with surplus lands, and his property could not come under that description. In short the scheme was the most beneficial that could be arranged for all parties. It had the approval of every person who was likely to be injuriously affected; it had been drawn up with a strict regard to the requirements of the Act, and it ought not now to be upset by the unsubstantial opposition of parties whose interests were in no way interfered with Greene, Q. C., Hardy, Q. C., E. K. Karslake, Q. C., Charles Hall, Lindley, Everitt, Humphrey, Chitty, Langley, Hemming, Currie, Youl, Batten, Currie, Whitaker, and W. Pearson, appeared for other parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I should certainly confirm this scheme if I were in a position to do so. It has been brought forward with primâ facie evidence of the assent of all the classes of persons in which the Legislature has invested the majority with the power of binding the minority. On this occasion, however, the scheme is opposed by creditors, who are not members of a class which is bound by the decision of the majority. It is perfectly clear, upon the construction of the Act, that these creditors may appear and ask the court to withhold its assent, provided that their opposition is reasonable, and based on a due regard to their own interests. It has been observed that there is no clause in the Act enabling a majority of creditors to bind the minority; but I entertain no doubt that the court has jurisdiction to bind by its order an obstinate creditor whose dissent is unreasonable. In the present instance three dissentients have appeared to oppose the scheme. One of them is a debenture-holder to the extent of 13,000*l.*; as to his position it is clearly defined by the Act; he is bound by the assent of the requisite majority of his class. His opposition, therefore, is a circumstance of no great weight, and would not in itself have prevented the confirmation of the scheme; but when I find that it is also opposed by two other creditors, one of whom is a landowner, who has already obtained a declaration of lien, and who was on the point of being put again into possession of his land, the case becomes different. One of the objections taken on behalf of this landowner is founded on one of the clauses of the scheme, which enables the directors to dispose of superfluous land. I consider this objection not unreasonable, and that the opposition offered by this creditor comes within the principle laid down by Lord Cairns and Lord Justice Giffard in the cases referred to in the course of the argument, as one which the court would be justified in countenancing. With regard to the other set of opposing creditors, the Bristol and Exeter Railway, represented by Mr. Ince, they claim a sum of money now in the hands of the receiver of the court. Mr. Dickinson has contended that they have no right to this sum, but that even if they have, they have no lien upon it. They have, however, a summons pending for payment of the money. Whether they can establish a right to it is a question now sub judice; but if I had now to decide the question, I should say that they had shown a clear primâ facie right. In the presence, therefore, of the opposition of these creditors, I cannot confirm this scheme. Looking at the large interests that are involved by it, and to the number of persons who have thought it consistent with their interests to support it, I regret that I am unable to do so; but that regret is modified in some measure on looking at the complex nature of the scheme itself, which, I am bound to say, appears likely to involve all parties in new perplexities and fresh litigation. All these difficulties have arisen from proceedings under an Act of Parliament which it is, of course, the duty of the court to carry out, but with regard to which it is also the duty of the court to point out that it is an Act which has caused more delay, expense, vexation, and difficulty than could ever have been contemplated by its framers. As to the costs, all has been done so honestly by those directors, struggling with Parliamentary difficulties, that although I am bound to dismiss the petition, it will be dismissed without costs.

Solicitors, Toogood; Edward Byrne; Whitaker and Woolbert.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 16, and 17, 1869.

WALTERS v. WEBB.

Demurrer—Copyholds—Seizure quousque—Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27.)

W. filed a bill against the lords of the manor of W., alleging that he was entitled to be admitted, but that the defendants refused to admit him; that previously to 1819 his grandfather was in possession of lands, portion of the manor, and from 1811 to other portions in right of his wife, the plaintiff being unable to describe them by reason of the defendant's refusal to allow him to inspect the court rolls; that the plaintiff's grandfather was entitled through his father, who died in 1793, and his wife was entitled through one J., who died intestate, and without issue, about 1811; that for sixty years before 1819 no court had been holden, and the plaintiff could not set forth who was last admitted. The bill then alleged neglect of the grandfather to be admitted, seizure quousque, and entry on the rolls that the lands were thenceforth held in trust for the persons entitled to be admitted; that the plaintiff's grandfather died in 1831 intestate, leaving a son, who was during the greater part of his life beyond the seas, and died in 1864, leaving the plaintiff, his eldest son, one of his co-heirs; and the bill prayed admission, or payment of what was due in respect thereof.

General demurrers to this bill allowed.

This case came on upon four general demurrers for want of equity to a bill filed stating as follows: That the defendants, Elizabeth Frances Webb, George Eyston, Henry White, the Rev. Hugh Evans, George Payne Kitson, Richard Snead Cox, the Rev. William Howell Evans, and William Dawes Freshfield and Edwin Freshfield, were the lady and lords of the manor of Wentsland and Bryngwyn, in Monmouthshire. That the plaintiff was entitled to be admitted as tenant in fee simple, according to the custom of the said manor, to certain lands and tenements, portion thereof thereinafter more particularly described or referred to; but the defendants had refused, and still refused to admit the said plaintiff. That for many years previously to the year 1819, and down to the time of the seizure thereinafter mentioned, William Walters, the grandfather of the plaintiff, was in possession of and entitled as tenant in fee simple, according to the custom of the said manor, to certain lands and tenements, portion of the said manor, which formed part of an estate then, and still commonly known as the Gelly Pistill Estate.

The said William Walters had also been in possession from the year 1811 in right of his wife Elizabeth Walters, of the remaining portions of the said Gelly Pistill Estate. The plaintiff was unable to set forth a particular description of the lands comprised in the said Gelly Pistill Estate, and to identify the same with the description thereof on the court rolls of the said manor by reason of the fact that the defendants had wrongfully neglected and declined, and still declined, to allow the plaintiff to inspect the said court rolls as the plaintiff was entitled to do; that the said William Walters had become entitled and possessed of the portion of the Gelly Pistill Estate, through his father, Charles Walters, deceased, who died about the year 1793. The portion of the said estate of which the said William Walters was possessed and to which he became entitled in right of his said wife Elizabeth Walters, had descended to her as the heiress-at-law, according to the custom of the said manor, of one John Jones, her deceased nephew, who died intestate and without issue about the year 1811; that for nearly sixty years previously to the year 1819 no court baron of the said manor had been held at which the copyholder could have been admitted, and neither the said William Walters nor his wife, the said Elizabeth Walters, nor the said John Jones, had ever been admitted as tenants of the said manor.

Digitized by Google

The plaintiff was unable to set forth who among the predecessors in title, as copyholders of the said manor of the said William Walters and John Jones were the last persons whose names were entered on the court rolls of the said manor as tenants thereof, in respect of the said lands and tenements comprised in the Gelly Pistill Estate, by reason of the fact that the defendants, by their steward, refused to produce either the said court rolls to the plaintiff, or allow the same to be inspected on his behalf. That the said William Walters being in possession of, or entitled to, the said lands and tenements, called or known as the Gelly Pistill Estate as aforesaid, and having neglected to procure himself to be admitted as tenant thereof, the then lady and lords of the said manor, the predecessors in title of the defendant, caused successive proclamations to be made for the heir or heirs, according to the custom, to come in and be admitted as a tenant or tenants of the said lands and tenements, and no one having appeared to demand admittance thereto, the said lands and tenements were duly seized, quousque, acording to the custom of the said manor, and thereupon an entry was made upon the court rolls thereof, from which it appeared that the said lands and tenements were thenceforth to be held in trust for the person or persons entitled to be admitted thereto as copyholders of the said manor, and the same had ever since been held accordingly.

The said William Walters died about the month of July 1831 intestate, leaving Charles Walters his only son and heir according to the custom of the said manor, him surviving.

The said Charles Walters was also the heir-at-law, according to the custom of the said manor, of his mother the said Elizabeth Walters, then deceased, and on the death of the said William Walters the said Charles Walters became entitled to demand admittance to one portion of the said lands and tenements forming a part of the said Gelly Pistill Estate as the heir-at-law according to the custom of the said manor of his father the said William Walters and to the remaining portion as the heir-at-law, according to the said custom, of his mother the said Elizabeth Walters. The said Charles Walters, who was a soldier, and the greater part of his life beyond the seas, never made any demand or claim to be admitted to the said lands and tenements, and died in the year 1864, leaving the plaintiff, his eldest son, and one of his co-heirs according to the custom of the said manor, him surviving, and the plaintiff thereupon became, and still was, entitled to be admitted as a customary tenant of the said manor. That on or about the 3rd June 1868 the plaintiff made a formal claim in writing to be admitted to the said lands and tenements, and caused the same to be served on the defendant, Elizabeth Frances Webb, who was the only one of the defendants then known to the plaintiff, and afterwards on the 23rd of the same month the plaintiff, by himself and his attorney, appeared before the steward of the manor at a court baron of the lady and lords of the said manor, and demanded to be admitted as tenant of the said lands and tenements, and the plaintiff at the same time offered to pay the proper fine due to the said lady and lords in respect of such admission, but the defendants by their steward declined and refused, and still declined and refused, to admit the plaintiff. The defendants, or some of them, pretended that some persons other than themselves, or jointly with them, or otherwise, were entitled as lords or ladies of the said manor, and ought to be made parties, but declined to inform the plaintiff who such parties were, and the plaintiff was unable to obtain redress without the assistance of the court. And the bill prayed that the defendants might be decreed to admit the plaintiff as tenant, according to the custom of the said manor, of the said lands and tenements, the plaintiff thereby offering to pay what should be due to the defendants in respect of such admission. That the defendants might pay the costs, and for further relief. To this bill the demurrers were put in.

Wickens and Cracknall, in support of the demurrer of Elizabeth F. Webb, Henry White, the Rev. Hugh Evans, George Payne Kitson, Richard Snead Cox, and the Rev. William Howell Evans, insisted that, under the provisions of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, the plaintiff on his own showing had no title to sue, this being a bill to recover land or rent, and the seizure having taken place, necessarily before the year 1831, the form of the seizure being quousque made no difference. Moreover the allegation of seizure quousque stated no date, nor by whom the entry was made, and therefore did not amount to an allegation even of that fact.

Bampton v. Birchall, 5 Beav. 67;
Jackson v. North Wales Railway Company, 13 Jur. 69;
Steadman v. March, 2 Jur. N. S. 39.
Doe v. Truesman, 1 B. & Ad. 336.

[Counsel were stopped by the court.]

Osborne Q.C. and Riddell in support of the demurrer of George Eyston.

Widdowson v. Earl of Harrington, 1 Jac. & Walk. 532;
1 Watk. on Copy. 290; 2nd vol. 75.

Bristowe, Q.C. and Kekewich in support of the demurrer of Messrs Freshfield and Co.

Glasse, Q. C., Cotton, Q. C., and Job Bradford in support of the bill. The only questions are what is the effect of a seizure by the lord of a manor quousque, and whether this is a bill for the recovery of land or rent within the purview of the stat. 3 & 4 Will. 4 c. 27? The Statute of Limitation does not apply to this case. This is a bill simply seeking to compel the lord of a manor to do his duty by admitting the plaintiff who offers to pay the fines and fees. There has never been a forfeiture, and the seizure quousque leaves everything open until the lord does some other act, which he has not done. There is not one authority which shows that any time is a bar, even 100 years. All that are found are dicta: (Doe v. Harrison, 6 Ad. & Ell., N. S.) The seizure quousque creates no adverse title. Doe v. Hellier, 3 T. R. 171, shows that it is not an absolute seizure:

Doe v. Truesman, 1 B. & Ad. 736-45;
Doe v. Muscat, 12 M. & W. 832;
Coke's Copyholder;
Mason v. Day, Gilb. Eq. 77.

The lord is a trustee for the heir, and is bound to admit him:

Doe v. Wilkinson, 3 B. & Cr. 414;
3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, ss. 2, 3;
Dean of Ely v. Bliss, 2 De G. M. & G. 458.

where Lord Cottenham refused to decide that tithes were within the statute. This is a demurrer of the first impression, this being only a bill for production of the court rolls, which alone is an equity. The question stood first, Irrespective of the special circumstance, is this a suit to recover rent? and, under the special circumstances is the statute a bar? This is not a bill to take anyone out of possession, the lord having wrongfully refused to receive the service and homage. All that is asked is to put the plaintiff in feudal relationship to the lord: (Andrews v. Hulse, 4 K. & J. 392.) There has been no forfeiture, no distress on entry, no right accrued after the seizure quousque; it was merely an interruption until something was done.

Digitized by Google

Chichester v. Hall, 17 L. T. 121;
Pickett v. Packham, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 190

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This bill is filed by William Walters, alleging himself to be entitled to certain copyhold property, and it asks that the defendants, the lords and lady of the manor, may be ordered to admit him to such property, he offering to pay all fines, fees, &c. By the allegations in the bill it appears that one William Walters was entitled to be possessed of this land before the year 1831, the precise date not being stated; that he had not paid the fines due in respect of such copyholds, and that therefore the lord had duly seized quousque. Now the date is not given, but it must have been before 1831, as it is alleged that the lord duly seized quousque, and he could only have done so after three proclamations (according to the rule stated in Doe v. Trueman, sup.) at three successive courts, and the lord was in possession, as the bill alleges, in trust for certain persons, and that William Walters died in 1831, leaving a son Charles, who, I suppose, is alleged to be entitled on the death of William Walters, the plaintiff being one of such heirs. To this bill four several demurrers have been put in, and the only question on those demurrers is, whether the plaintiff, under the circumstances stated in the bill, is entitled to call on the lord of the manor to admit him to the possession of the same. Now that a bill can be sustained by a copyholder for admission, and that this court has a concurrent jurisdiction so to decree, is not disputed by Mr Wickens or any of the counsel for the demurrers, because that was decided in Andrews v. Hulse (sup.) before the present Lord Chancellor when Vice-Chancellor; and that in a proper case, and within a proper time, a lord of a manor may be in a situation to admit or refuse to admit a copyholder, and a bill can be sustained to compel him to perform that duty; and the sole question here is, whether the lord of this manor (a very material question, upon which I desire not a shadow of a doubt to exist), under the circumstances alleged, can be compelled to admit the plaintiff. In all questions of right to land the Statute of Limitations is applicable, and no person can recover upon this or any other cause alleged, unless he can allege that the right accrued to himself, or to the person or persons through whom he claims, within the period of twenty years. Now it has been most strenuously urged that this is not a suit for the recovery of land; but I am totally unable to see how that can be, for it is admitted that it is a suit to compel the lord to admit the plaintiff to the property; and if the lord does so he thereby puts him in possession, for a tenant on the court rolls can recover possession, and the lord will be dispossessed, if the tenant can only compel the lord to admit him, and therefore it is recovered possession of the land. The plaintiff may not ipso facto recover it, but the lord loses it if he admits him, and he is no longer able to remain in possession, the other being tenant on the court rolls. It has been argued that if the lord seizes copyhold lands, not for any definite act or positive forfeiture, but quousque, for failure in payment of the fines, after the lapse of a century (or even centuries if the argument is good for anything), a party may recover by compelling the lord to admit him. It is not necessary for me to give any opinion what the law would have been but for the stat. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27; but at all events it is clear that the object of the Legislature was that, after the passing of this Act, after the expiration of twenty years, supposing there is no let or disability, and after the expiration of ten years, supposing there is a disability and it is removed after ten years from the time of its removal, no continued series of disabilities being able to carry it beyond forty years, no person is able to recover the possession of land. Now I am distinctly of opinion that this is a suit for the recovery of the possession of land; not, perhaps, in so strong a sense as an action of ejectment, but this is the case of a person, a copyholder, to which this statute is expressly applicable, the language being, "whether the same shall be a freehold or chattel interest, and whether freehold or copyhold, or held according to any other tenure;" and the question is, can a copyhold tenant, out of possession, as between him and the lord, having been out of possession for a century, where the lord has seized quousque, recover that possession by compelling the lord to admit him as tenant? The 2nd section disposes of this question beyond all doubt. It says this: (The Vice-Chancellor referred to the words of the second, and also of the third section of the Statute of Limitations.) It is not necessary that there should be a public ousting or dispossession. Applying this, what is the estate or interest in respect of which the claim is made as copyholder? Why that of William Walters, and when was he last seised? According to the allegations in the bill, up to 1831. And taking it in the most favourable view, it cannot be later than thirty-eight years ago that the person under whom the plaintiff claims was out of possession. Like the case of a tenant without the receipt of rent, that time is as fatal to the plaintiff's case as centuries; and it is in vain for any person to come into this court to recover that of which he, or those through whom he claims, have not been in possession within twenty years. It is insisted that the seizure quousque is not adverse possession, but that is immaterial. It is certainly not like violent dispossession; but it is possession which the lord has taken, and which he holds until he gets his fines, and there is thus a discontinuance. The receipt by the officiating party is immaterial, and the statute applies. It is not necessary that the possession shall be adverse. Put the case of a tenant holding over, and yet, notwithstanding, the landlord allows him to do so for more than twenty years, that is fatal to the landlord. On every ground, therefore, it appears to me that this is a suit for the recovery of land, and that the right or interest in respect of which the plaintiff claims was last in possession of William Walters thirty-eight years since, that is more than twenty years, and there being no disability alleged, that is fatal to a bill to compel the lord to put the plaintiff in possession of land. With respect to the point as to the seizure quousque by a holding on trust, it is said it is a case of express trust, which takes it out of the statute. An express trust for whom? The person entitled to be admitted? In order to be so entitled, he must show himself to be the party entitled to the land, and he fails to do so here. Therefore, on the broad ground, whether the case be that of landlord and tenant or lord and copyholder, or any other relation, if you show a discontinuance for twenty years, that is fatal, and you have no locus standi in this court. The demurrers must be allowed in the usual way. Mr. White appearing for two defendants must have only one set.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Rooke, Kenrick, and Harston.

Solicitors for the defendants, H. White, Messrs. Freshfield and Co., Messrs. Ward, Mills, and Co.

Digitized by Google

Saturday, Nov. 20, 1869.

CAPDEVIELLE v. CAPDEVIELLE.

Domicil—Property in France and England—French domicil of origin—Vault and burial of wife and child.

C., born in France, succeeded his uncle in business at Manchester, and purchased land and built a handsome house there, and also a vault in which he buried his uncle, wife and child, and, going to Vichy for his health, died at the place of his birth. The evidence of intention was conflicting, and went chiefly to the impression of the witness, but it appeared that he preferred the French climate, and talked of taking his wife's body to France:

Held, that the domicil of origin never was lost, and that C. died a domiciled Frenchman.

This was an adjourned summons on the question whether the domicil of Domingo Capdevielle at his death and the date of his will was French or English, the chief clerk having found that it was French. The facts were these. The testator was born at Montory, in the Basses Pyrenees, and having an uncle in business as a commission merchant at Manchester, he came to England and succeeded his uncle in business; purchased a piece of land, and built a house at Bowden, eighteen miles from Manchester, and expended thereon 5000*l.* He also built a vault in the churchyard, where he buried his uncle, and ultimately his wife and a child. He lived for twenty years in England, and having gone to Vichy for his health, he died at Montory, his native place, in 1866.

There were several affidavits by friends, his solicitor, and one Theodore Darthey, as to the proof of the will, made in the French form, in England. From this it appeared that although he laid out a good deal of money in England, and had a preponderating idea of settling his son (the plaintiff) in his business at Manchester, his own views as to permanent residence were vacillating. Several of the witnesses deposed to their impression that he was settled in England, and his solicitor expressly stated that had he not so considered, he should have advised his becoming naturalised in England. He was stated to have spoken of the superior salubrity of the Continental climate, and retaining his property at Montory. He was greatly depressed after his wife's death, and very uncertain as to his future movements, but entertained an idea of having her remains removed to Montory. It was admitted that his visit to Vichy and Montory, where he died, was merely a temporary one.

Glasse, Q. C. and Bovill, for the plaintiff, contended that there was quite sufficient to support an acquired English domicil. There was a residence in England for twenty years, purchase of land, building a house at a great expense, carrying on trade, an expressed solicitude that his son should settle in England, and the building of a vault, and the burial of his nearest relatives in it. On all these grounds, the domicil of origin had been abandoned, and an English one acquired, and the chief clerk's finding was wrong. The matter had been amicably adjourned into court for decision.

Cole, Q. C. and Bardswell, for the testator's daughter borne before his marriage, and De Gex, Q. C. for the residuary legatee, were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (after stating the facts.)—The domicil of origin is admitted to have been proved, and the onus therefore lies upon those who allege that the domicil of the testator at the date of his will and at the time of his death was English, to show that he abandoned such original domicil. On the whole of the evidence I come to the conclusion that during his wife's lifetime, at all events, he does not seem to have had any fixed or definite intention on the subject of a permanent residence. It is true that he carried on trade in this country, and purchased land and built a house upon it at some expense, but still his views were uncertain and his mind vacillating, and the witnesses only speak from his acts, except the expressions used as to climate. When his wife died, however, it is stated that he was in depressed spirits, and he then is said to have expressed an intention of taking her remains over to France. I don't think the evidence proves that he intended to take up his permanent residence in England; and this those who support an English domicil must show to have been the case, which I think they have failed to do. I am, therefore, of opinion that the chief clerk was correct in his decision, and the summons must therefore be dismissed; but, it being a friendly matter, the costs of all parties must come out of the estate.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Tilleard, Son, Goodden and Holme.

Solicitor for the defendants, H. G. Smith.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, Dec. 9, 1869.

SILVER v. UDALL.

Partition suit—Partition Act 1868, sect. 3—Sale.

In a partition suit, the plaintiff being entitled to one-tenth, and the defendant to seven-tenths of the property and two other persons not before the court to the remaining two tenths:

The court declined to order a sale under sect. 3, of the Partition Act 1868, but directed an inquiry who beside the plaintiff and defendant were entitled to any and what shares, and whether they were within or without the jurisdiction.

This suit was instituted for the purpose of having the trusts of a marriage settlement carried into execution so far as regarded leasehold property, comprised therein, and the bill prayed for a sale or partition of the same.

By the terms of the settlement, on the death of the husband the property became divisible in tenths among the children of the marriage. The husband of the plaintiff as one of the children of the marriage, had become entitled to one-tenth. The plaintiff, as his executrix, instituted the present suit against the defendants, John Udall and E. D. Silver, the trustees of the settlement. The defendant, E. D. Silver, as one of the children of the marriage was also entitled to one tenth, and he had purchased six other tenth shares from the persons entitled thereto. The persons entitled to the remaining two tenth shares were not before the court.

Hinde Palmer, Q. C. and J. T. Crossley for the plaintiff, now asked for a sale under sect. 3 of the Partition Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 40), unless the defendants agreed to purchase the plaintiff's shares at a valuation in the manner provided by sect. 5.

Kay, Q. C. and W. P. Dickins contended that the court could not direct a sale in the absence of the persons entitled to the remaining two tenth shares.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that if he were quite satisfied that the two persons entitled to the other shares were out of the jurisdiction, he might have decreed a sale; but that at present he could only direct an inquiry as to who besides the plaintiff and defendant Silver were interested in any and what shares of the property, and whether they are within or without the jurisdiction, and an account of what, if anything, was due to the plaintiff in respect to her one tenth share in the settled property.

Digitized by Google

Solicitor for the plaintiff, J. A. Stuart.

Solicitors for the defendants, Phelps and Bennett.

Nov. 10, and 12, 1869.

LEATHER-CLOTH COMPANY (LIMITED) v. LORSONT.

An agreement (made on a sale of a business to the plaintiffs) not to carry on in Europe any company or manufactory having for its object the manufacture or sale of an article known as Crockett's leather cloth, and not to communicate to anyone the processes of the manufacture, "so as to in any way interfere with the exclusive enjoyment of the said intended company of the benefits hereby agreed to be purchased:"

Held, not to be an undue restraint of trade, and an injunction granted accordingly.

This was a suit for an injunction to restrain the defendant from manufacturing and selling leather cloth in contravention of an agreement entered into by him, and from using certain trade marks.

The plaintiffs, the Leather-Cloth Company (Limited), were registered on the 22nd May 1857, under the Joint-Stock Companies' Act 1856.

By an agreement in writing dated the 21st May 1857, and made between the defendants, J. B. A. Lorsont, N. S. Dodge, the Crockett International Leather-Cloth Company (by J. P. Crockett, their attorney), and others, of the first part, and Mr John Murrray, as agent for the plaintiff company, it was agreed, inter alia, that the parties of the first part should sell to the plaintiff company for 20,000*l.* and other considerations thereinafter mentioned, certain letters patent obtained in France and England for the manufacture of American leather-cloth, and also the exclusive right of soliciting similar patents in Belgium and all other countries of Europe, together with all the processes of manufacture used by them or their agents or workmen up to the date of the agreement, and also the lands and buildings thereon situate at West Ham, in the county of Essex, where the business or manufacturing of the American leather-cloth was then carried on, together with all the leases and agreements for leases thereof, and the plant of the manufactory as set out in the schedule thereto; and that the parties of the first part should sell, and the plaintiff company should buy at a valuation all the goods in hand, manufactured and not manufactured, raw material and produce, and all the furniture and effects on the premises at West Ham, and it was also agreed as follows:

That the parties of the first part, or any of them, will not directly or indirectly carry on, nor will they to the best of their power allow to be carried on by others, in any part of Europe, any company or manufactory having for its object the manufacture or sale of productions in any way similar to the productions which are the subject of the letters patent, and now manufactured in the business or manufactory so carried on at West Ham as aforesaid, and will not communicate to any person or persons the means or processes of such manufacture so as in any way to interfere with the exclusive enjoyment of the said intended company of the benefits hereby agreed to be purchased.

By the memorandum of association of the plaintiff company, the registered office of the plaintiff company was to be in England, and the objects for which the company were established were, "the manufacturing of leather-cloth, and of moleskins, oil-cloths, and other productions of a similar kind, and of yarns and stuffs necessary or incident to the manufacture of such productions."

The memorandum of association was subscribed by the defendant for 100 shares, and by article 97 of the articles of association, the defendant was appointed general manager and superintendent of the factory or factories of the company to be established in England, France, Belgium, and elsewhere.

Upon the registration of the company the sale and purchase under the agreement of the 21st May 1857 was duly carried into effect, and the defendant was appointed manager of the company. Shortly afterwards the defendant became "the managing director" of the company, and was commonly so described in the circulars and documents issued by the company under his direction.

The patents referred to in the agreement of the 21st May 1857 were taken out by Mr N. S. Dodge for the benefit of, and as trustee for, the Crockett International Leather-Cloth Company, and were at the date of the agreement the property of that company, and the premises at West Ham, mentioned in the agreement, were certain leasehold premises constituting the establishment of the Crockett International Leather-Cloth Company.

By an indenture dated the 8th July 1857, made between N. S. Dodge of the first part, the Crockett International Leather-Cloth Company (by C. P. Crockett, their attorney) of the second part, and the plaintiff company of the third part, N. S. Dodge, by the direction of the Crockett International Leather-Cloth Company, assigned and sold to the plaintiff company all the patents mentioned in the agreement of the 21st May 1857, and the interest of the Crockett International Leather-Cloth Company and N. S. Dodge therein. And by the said indenture C. P. Crockett, as the agent and attorney of the Crockett International Leather-Cloth Company, thereby granted and assigned to the plaintiff company all the machinery, &c., belonging to the Crockett International Leather-Cloth Company at West Ham, and also the goodwill of and in the business hitherto carried on there by the Crockett International Leather-Cloth Company.

The plaintiff company, upon their registration, commenced carrying on the business, comprised in the sale and purchase, upon the premises at West Ham; they also had an establishment in the City of London. Upon commencing business the plaintiff company adopted in their business a trade mark, formerly in use by the Crockett International Leather-Cloth Company, and called in the bill trade mark A. They also adopted two other trade marks, called in the bill trade marks B and C respectively.

In Aug. 1863 the directors of the plaintiff company dismissed the defendant from his post of manager of the company. In March 1868 the defendant commenced to carry on the business of the sale and manufacture of leather cloth at North Woolwich, in the county of Kent, and at 97, Cannon-street.

The plaintiffs alleged that the defendant had thereby acted in breach of the engagement entered into with him by the agreement of the 21st May 1857, and that the conduct of the defendant in his business was calculated and likely to deceive the public into the belief that the defendant was carrying on the business, the goodwill of which had been purchased by the plaintiff company, and to obtain for the defendant custom intended for the plaintiff company. They also alleged that the defendant used trade marks which were evident imitations of their trade marks A, B, and C, respectively.

On the 10th March, 1868, the defendant had issued a circular of that date, which was as follows:

I beg leave to inform you that my works are now in full operation, and that I shall be happy to receive your orders. The goods supplied by me are in every respect similar to those made by the Crockett International Leather-Cloth Company (since known as the Leather-Cloth Company), whilst their works were under my management, and I may state with confidence that with sixteen years' experience, acquired in that business from its origin, I am enabled to adapt and bring to bear upon my works every mechanical, commercial, and other improvement of the present day, and that you will find my leather-cloth equal, if not superior, to any in the market, and the prices most advantageous to purchasers. I am prepared to deliver any quantities of Crockett's cloth and leather-cloth, either at once or periodically, by regular shipments or delivery. My price list is enclosed herewith, and I shall be glad to forward samples by post, or to submit them to your inspection at the above address. I am, yours most respectfully.

Digitized by Google

A. LORSONT.

The bill alleged that the defendant's conduct had occasioned great damage to the plaintiffs, and prayed for an injunction and for damages.

The cause now came on upon motion for decree.

Sir R. Palmer, Q. C., Kay, and A. G. Marten appeared for the plaintiffs.

Eddis, Q. C., Fischer, and A. Cohen (of the Common Law Bar), for the defendants, contended that the agreement, being in restraint of trade generally, was void, as against public policy.

Kay, Q. C., in reply.

The following cases were cited. As to the agreement being in restraint of trade:

Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181; 1 Sm. L. C. 340;
Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 735;
Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 A. & E. 438;
Mallan v. May, 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 258; 11 M. & W. 653;
Tallis v. Tallis, 21 L. T. Rep. 43; 1 E. & B. 391;
Whittaker v. Howe, 3 Beav. 383;
Bryson v. Whitehead, 1 Sim. & Stu. 74;
Harnes v. Parsons, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 815: 32 Beav. 328;
Gale v. Reed, 8, East 80;
Young v. Timmins, 1 C. & J. 331;
Ward v. Byrne, 5 M. & W. 548;
Price v. Green, 16 M. & W. 346.

As to the trade marks:

The Leather-Cloth Company (Limited) v. The American Leather-Cloth Company (Limited), 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 558; 11 H. L. Cas. 523; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 829; Edlesten v. Vick, 11 Ha. 78.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, after stating that in his opinion the plaintiff's case as to the trade marks, had failed, as trade marks A and B were covered by the decision of the House of Lords in the Leather-Cloth Company (Limited) v. American Leather-Cloth Company, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 558; and trade mark C was a palpable imitation of the trade mark of another company, which had been formed after the plaintiff company—continued as follows:—Having disposed of the trade marks, I now come to that question which is a very important one, as it seems to me, with respect to the covenant. The covenant, no doubt, is expressed in very large words, and it is insisted that the mere fact that the covenant is "not to carry on, nor allow to be carried on, in any part of Europe" is in itself what is called a general restraint of trade; as what is called a general restraint of trade, is a restraint of trade throughout the United Kingdom; and that a restraint of trade in that form, extending throughout the United Kingdom, is upon the face of it bad, though something short of it may be admissible, provided the circumstances justify it. I do not read the cases as having laid down that unrebuttable presumption, which was insisted upon with so much power by Mr. Cohen. The truth is, that all the cases when they come to be examined, according to my view of it, establish this principle, that all restraints upon trade are bad, as being in violation of public policy, unless they are natural and not unreasonable for the protection of the parties dealing legally with some subject-matter of contract. Public policy requires that every man should be at liberty to work for himself, and should not be at liberty to deprive himself or the state of his labour, skill, or talent by any contract that he enters into. On the other hand public policy requires this—that where a man has by skill or any other means obtained something which he wants to sell, he should be able to sell it in the most advantageous way in the market; and in order to enable him to sell it advantageously in the market, it is necessary that he should be able to preclude himself from entering into competition with the purchaser; but that then, the same public policy which enables him to do so, does not restrain him from alienating that which he wants to alienate, and therefore enables him to enter into any stipulation, however restrictive it is, provided that restriction in the judgment of the court is not unreasonable, having regard to the subject-matter of the contract. Now in this case the subject-matter of the contract was a particular manufacture, carried on partly under patents, and partly by processes which were known to the vendors, and it is to be assumed not known except to the vendors, their agents, and workmen. That being the subject-matter of the contract, the stipulation is that the vendor will not set up a similar manufacture in Europe, and will not communicate the process of the manufacture anywhere, so as to interfere with the exclusive enjoyment by the intended company of the benefits thereby agreed to be purchased. It seems to me that the case resembles the sale of a secret which has been held to be perfectly good, and as connected with the sale of that secret, an unlimited stipulation as to time or place with regard to communicating the secret or dealing with it so as to interfere with the purchaser, because, in truth, there were particular processes for the manufacture. These processes were to be communicated, and they were to be communicated for the exclusive benefit of the purchaser. It is settled by authority that a man may bind himself not to communicate such a process under any circumstances in any part of the world to anybody else. But how would it be possible to enforce a covenant not to communicate the process, if he were at the same time to be at liberty to carry on that same trade with the same process in such a way that it would have to be communicated to every servant and workman engaged by him in the trade? Therefore the mere fact that he is entitled to restrain himself simply amounts to this. It is not that he is restrained, but that he is entitled to restrain himself from communicating the process, and is thereby enabled to get a higher price for that which he is selling. The fact that he is so entitled to restrain himself, entitles him also to restrain himself from carrying on a manufacture which would involve the communication of the process. Therefore, independently of those words, "so as to in any way interfere with the exclusive enjoyment," I am of opinion that there is nothing in the covenant which violates the rules of law, or which is in contravention of the decided cases, when the principles upon which those cases have been decided come to be properly considered. But if there were anything in a covenant so standing which might be supposed to be in contravention of some of the decided cases, I am satisfied that those words, "so as in any way to interfere with the exclusive enjoyment of the company" do properly and sufficiently qualify it, the principle being that you are not to have any more restraint than is necessary for the benefit of the company. The company says "in order to obviate any objection, we do not ask for any unreasonable restraint, for any capricious restraint upon you, we only ask you to tie yourself not to do something which will interfere with that which you profess to sell to us, and for which you have received a consideration." Therefore I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are right in saying that the covenant is one which is capable of being enforced in this court. Then the next question is, Does the defendant Lorsont violate the covenant? Has he been doing anything which is in violation of that covenant? I am of opinion that he is doing so, that he is engaged in a manufactory for the manufacture of productions similar to those which were the subject of letters patent, and which were then manufactured in the manufactory so carried on at West Ham at the time of the contract, that is to say, it is proved to me that the particular production is the production of an article known as Crockett's leather-cloth, and that Crockett's leather-cloth was manufactured at West Ham at that time. The leather-cloth known by that very name is manufactured by the defendant, and sold by him under that very name, with an advertisement from him to the effect that the goods supplied by him "are in every respect similar to those made by the Crockett International Leather Company, since known as the Leather-Cloth Company, while the works were under my management;" and then he states his sixteen years' experience, and so on. That is to say, having covenanted that he would not be engaged in the manufacture of products similar to those which were then being made, he circulates to the world a letter, saying, I am now actually making productions which are in every respect similar to those which were made by the vendors and afterwards made by the purchasers. I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction. The injunction, I think, ought to be in these words—"to restrain the defendant from carrying on any manufactury for the production of Crockett's leather-cloth, or being engaged in any company for the sale of Crockett's leather-cloth, or any cloth or any production similar thereto, and from in any manner holding himself out as the manufacturer of such Crockett's leather-cloth, or any production similar thereto." Then with regard to the costs, the plaintiffs are entitled to the costs of the suit, except so far as they have been occasioned by the litigation as to the three trade marks, as to which I should have given the defendant the costs if he himself had not been personally concerned in the introduction and use of them by the company. I do not give him any costs, but he will not have to pay any costs in respect of that part of the suit. He will have to pay the costs of the rest of the suit.

Digitized by Google

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Thomas and Hollams.

Solicitors for the defendant, Combe and Wainwright.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, Dec. 8, 1869.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley).

Re YATES' PATENT.

Petition for letters patent—Objections by a prior patentee—Certificate of law officer against grant—Dismissal of petition with costs.

On a petition for the grant of letters patent, which petition was opposed by a prior patentee on the ground that the alleged invention for which such letters patent were sought was an infringement of his own patent, a reference was directed to the proper law officer to ascertain whether the prayer of the petition should be complied with.

The law officer certified against the patent. The court therefore dismissed the petition with costs, notwithstanding no opposition had been made to the petitioner's application for a patent until he had applied to have it sealed, and he had given all the requisite notices.

This was a petition to have the great seal affixed to letters patent under the following circumstances: The petition set forth that the petitioner, William Yates, was in possession of an invention for improvements in furnaces for effecting the consumption of smoke, and that he was the true and first inventor thereof, and that the same was not in use by any other person or persons before or at the time when he obtained his provisional specification; that on the 15th June 1869 he applied by petition for a grant of letters patent in respect of his said invention; that on the 21st June 1869 provisional protection was granted in respect of the said invention; that on the 2nd July 1869 the petitioner gave notice of his intention to proceed with his application, which was duly advertised, and no notice of opposition thereto was given; that on Aug. 25 the Solicitor-General gave his warrant for the sealing of letters patent for the said invention; that the sealing of the letters patent was prevented by an opposition entered into at the patent office on behalf of the respondent, John Fletcher, who had alleged for grounds of opposition that the petitioner's invention was not new, and was not the invention of the petitioner, but was a mere colourable imitation of an invention of the said John Fletcher, for which he had applied for letters patent in April 1869; that such grounds of opposition were false and groundless, and that the petitioner's invention was wholly different from that of John Fletcher; and the petitioner prayed that letters patent might be granted to him in respect of his said invention; and that John Fletcher might be ordered to pay the costs occasioned by his said opposition. The letters patent to Fletcher in respect of his alleged invention were dated 2nd Oct., 1869. The law officer having certified that the letters patent ought not to be granted to the petitioner, the only question before the court was whether the petition should be dismissed without costs. On behalf of the petitioner it was alleged that he had no knowledge of the respondent's patent until after he had applied to have his patent sealed; that as the petitioner had acted in good faith, and had duly given all notices which it was incumbent on him to give, and as the respondent had offered no opposition until the last moment, the petitioner ought not to be called upon to pay the respondent's costs.

Macrory appeared for the petitioner.

Aston for the respondent.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley).—I can see no reason for distinguishing this case from the ordinary case of an unsuccessful petition, and must dismiss the petition with costs in the usual way.

Solicitor for the petitioner, Bristow Hunt.

Solicitor for the respondent, W. Wynne.

Digitized by Google

Saturday, Dec. 4.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Ex parte CYRUS; Re BROADBRIDGE.

Bankruptcy—Adjudication—Petitioning creditor's debt—Bills accepted by bankrupt and taken up by the drawer after the act of bankruptcy—Whether they constitute a good petitioning creditor's debt.

Bills of exchange were drawn by C. upon, and accepted by B. B. committed an act of bankruptcy, and at this time the bills were in the hands of bona fide holders for value. Afterwards C. took up the bills, and petitioned for an adjudication of bankruptcy against B. An adjudication was made, but was afterwards annulled by the commissioner on the ground that there was not a good petitioning creditor's debt.

On appeal, held, that the decision of the commissioner was wrong, and that there was a good petitioning creditor's debt.

Re Petrie, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 232; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 169, where it was held that the persons to assent to a creditor's deed in respect of bills on which the debtor was liable were the holders of the bills at the date of the registration of the deed, had no application to the present case, it being well settled law that it is not necessary that the petitioning creditor's debt should have been due to him before the act of bankruptcy if it was due from the debtor before that time.

This was an appeal from an order made by Mr. Thring, the commissioner of the Liverpool District Court of Bankruptcy, annulling an adjudication of bankruptcy which had been obtained against George Broadbridge, a broker at Liverpool, on the ground that the petitioning creditor's alleged debt on which the adjudication was founded, was insufficient to support it.

The petitioning creditor was Frederick Cyrus, a merchant at New York, for whom Broadbridge had acted as agent in Liverpool. The adjudication of bankruptcy was made on the 28th Oct. 1869, the act of bankruptcy on which it was founded being the execution by Broadbridge of a deed of assignment for the benefit of his creditors, on the 23rd April 1869. There had been various transactions between Broadbridge and Cyrus, and when the dispute as to the sufficiency of the petitioning creditor's debt arose, it was referred to Mr. Banner, an accountant, to investigate the accounts, and to determine whether there was any balance due from Broadbridge to Cyrus. Mr. Banner made a certificate in which he stated that he had investigated the account, and that he was of opinion that upon the proved items, there was a balance owing by Broadbridge to Cyrus amounting to 170*l.* 7*s.* 2*d.* He added that there were further claims made by Cyrus which, if established, would increase the above balance, but would not diminish it. In estimating this balance, Mr. Banner included among the sums due from Broadbridge to Cyrus certain bills of exchange for sums amounting altogether to 1687*l.*, which had been drawn by Cyrus upon, and accepted by, Broadbridge. These bills were dishonoured at maturity. At the date of the assignment for the benefit of Broadbridge's creditors, the bills were in the hands of bona fide holders for value, but before the petition for adjudication of bankruptcy was presented, they were taken up by Cyrus. Under these circumstances the commissioner was of opinion that the bills in question could not be taken into account in estimating the balance due from Broadbridge to Cyrus, and consequently that there was not a good petitioning creditor's debt, and his Honour, therefore, on the 26th Nov. annulled the adjudication, with costs to be paid by the petitioning creditor. From this decision Mr. Cyrus now appealed.

The material portion of the Commissioner's judgment was as follows:—"The question which the court has now to determine is, whether a good petitioning creditor's debt can be based on an account of which these bills constituted by far the largest portion. Now this principle is laid down in the books of practice, that in order to support an adjudication there must be a legal debt of sufficient amount, for which, if payable at the time, an action could be maintained by and in the name of the petitioning creditor; but Mr. Etty has insisted very strongly in argument that the rule is to be received with the qualification that it is only necessary that the debt should have been due by the bankrupt before the act of bankruptcy, not that it should be due to the petitioning creditor. He has referred to Griffith and Holmes on Bankruptcy, p. 190, in support of this position, and has cited and commented on a series of cases which are there collected in the notes. It must be observed that all these decisions are of considerable antiquity, and although in point to a certain extent, they cannot be reconciled with more recent cases in which similar questions have been determined. In Ex parte Botten, Mont. & Bl. 412, the very point now before me was decided, and it was there held, that if a creditor has received and transferred a bill of exchange, the holder of the bill is the proper petitioning creditor. The authority of that case was upheld in Ex parte Magnus, 2 M. D. & De G. 604; I now come to the case of Ex parte Petrie, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 169, on which Mr. Potter relies. There bills, to the amount of 9732*l.*, had been drawn by Messrs. Swire and Sons, and accepted by Petrie. Before the registration of a trust deed executed by Petrie part of those bills, to the amount of 2080*l.*, had been taken up and were in the hands of Messrs Swire and Sons; the remainder were held by the Union Bank of Liverpool under discount, but came into the hands of Messrs. Swire and Sons after the registration. Messrs. Swire and Sons were entered as assenting creditors for the whole amount. It was held by the Lords Justices that at the time of the registration the legal holders and owners of the debt to the extent of 7652*l.*, were the Union Bank, the holders of the bills. They were the persons who, if matters had remained so, would have been the persons to sue Petrie, as indorsers and holders of the bills, and consequently the creditors entitled to assent to, or dissent from, the deed. It is contended, on the other hand, that the class of cases which have arisen under the proviso of the statute relating to deeds are not analogous, and have no bearing on the right of petitioning creditors. But I am unable to distinguish the position of a petitioning creditor at the time of an act of bankruptcy from that of a creditor whose assent is required at the time of the registration of a trust-deed. The Act of Bankruptcy in the one case, the registration of the deed in the other, is the hinge of the proceeding. Now it is admitted that the amount of bills (1687*l.*) outstanding at the time of the act of bankruptcy is sufficient to extinguish the petitioning creditor's debt, unless the contingent liability of Cyrus, as drawer at that period, coupled with the fact that the bills were subsequently taken up by him be sufficient to support the petitioning creditor's debt. I am of opinion, on the general principles of the law of bankruptcy, as well as on the authority of the cases to which I have referred, that the debt of the petitioning creditors cannot be supported, inasmuch as the holders of the bills for value were the persons entitled to sue Broadbridge at the date of the act of bankruptcy, and the relative rights of the parties upon this adjudication have not been altered by any subsequent occurrences. The adjudication must therefore be annulled. I have the less reluctance in arriving at this conclusion when I consider the involved state of the current account between the parties on which the debt is founded, for the Lords Justices. in Patton's Case, 30 L. J., Bank.; and in Scott Russell's Case, 30 L. J., Bank.; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 188, have stated, as a general rule, that it is an objectionable, or at least an incovenient mode of proceeding, and one not deserving of encouragement, to found a petition of adjudication upon a disputed balance of a complicated diversity of cross demands and unsettled accounts."

Digitized by Google

De Gex, Q. C. and Hemming, on behalf of the appellant, contended that the law was well settled by a series of authorities that a debt due before the act of bankruptcy, even though not then due to the petitioning creditor, was a good petitioning creditor's debt. If it were otherwise, then, if a legal debt on a negotiable instrument was transferred after the commission of an act of bankruptcy, no one could present a petition for an adjudication in respect of it. That would be an absurd result. The cases relied on by the commissioner were to be distinguished. They referred to

Eden on Bankruptcy, 3rd edit., 47;
Deacon on Bankruptcy, last edit., 127;
Shelford on Bankruptcy, 182;
Ex parte Thomas, 1 Atk. 73;
Anon., 2 Wils. 135;
Glaister v. Hewer, 7 T. R. 493;
Bingley v. Madison, Coke's Bank. Law, 32;
Ex parte Botten, M. & Bl. 412;
Ex parte Magnus, 2 M. D. & De G. 604, 723;
Re Petrie, L. Rep. 3 Ch. Ap. 232; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 169;
Stat. 5 Geo. 2, c. 30, ss. 22, 23;
Stat. 7 Geo. 1, c. 31;
The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act 1849, sect. 89.

W. Potter, on behalf of Broadbridge, supported the commissioner's order.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that the commissioner had mistaken the law. If the law were as the commissioner had supposed it to be the result would be very inconvenient, not to say absurd. The old authorities on the question were all one way, and the later cases did not conflict with them. The argument of Mr. Hemming was really a reductio ad absurdum. The law had been entirely mistaken, and his Lordship would be very sorry that any doubt should be raised about it. The commissioner's order must be discharged.

Solicitors for the appellant, Underhill and Field agents for Etty, of Liverpool.

Solicitor for the respondent, Samuel Forest, of Liverpool.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs: Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, Jan. 15.

ALLEN (app.) v. WORTHY (resp.)

Vaccination—Proceedings for non-vaccination after a conviction for a similar offence—30 & 31 Vict. c. 84, ss. 15, 16, 29, 31 and 34.

The jurisdiction of justices under sect. 31 of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 84 (Vaccination Act 1867) to make an order for the vaccination of a child under fourteen years of age, is not limited to the making of one order only.

Where, therefore, an order had been duly made under that section upon the appellant, which he had disobeyed, and he was thereupon fined, and similar proceedings were again taken against him under the same section for not having his child vaccinated:

Held, that such proceedings were lawful:

Held, also, that upon proceedings before justices under the 31st section, the certificate of a medical practitioner in form of schedule B. is no bar.

This was a case stated by justices under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a conviction under sect. 31 of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 84 (the Vaccination Act 1867), as follows:—

Be it remembered that on the 8th May 1869, at St. Neot's, in the said county of Huntingdon, Alfred Worthy, of Eynesbury, in the said county of Huntingdon, registrar of births and deaths, personally cometh before the undersigned, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, in and for the said county, and informeth me that Henry James Allen, late of the parish of Eynesbury aforesaid, Dissenting minister, within the space of six calendar months last past, to wit, on the 8th May 1869, at the parish of Eynesbury in the said county of Huntington, did disobey a certain order under the hand and seal of Capt. William Humbley, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county of Huntingdon, bearing date the 29th April 1869, whereby the said Henry James Allen was ordered and directed to have Eliza Allen, under the age of fourteen years, and the legitimate child of the said Henry James Allen, vaccinated within seven days of date of said order, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, wherefore the said Alfred Worthy prayeth the consideration of me, the said justice in the premises, and that the said Henry James Allen may be summoned to appear before me and answer the premises and make his defence thereto.—ALFRED WORTHY.

Exhibited before me the day and year at the place first above written.—W. HUMBLEY.

The said justice issued his summons to the said Henry James Allen, to appear at the petty sessions held at St. Neot's, on the 18th May 1869.

At the hearing before us two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Huntingdon, it was proved that the following order had been made and served on the appellant:

Huntingdonshire to wit—To H. J. Allen, of Eynesbury, in the county of Huntingdon, Dissenting Minister.

Whereas, by an information in writing taken before the undersigned Capt. William Humbley, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, in and for the said county, on the 22nd April now instant. Alfred Worthy, of Eynesbury, in the county of Huntingdon, registrar of births and deaths for the district of the St. Neots Union, comprising the said parish of Eynesbury, informed me, the said justice, that Eliza Allen, under the age of fourteen years, the legitimate child of you, the said H. J. Allen, had not been successfully vaccinated, notwithstanding that he the said Alfred Worthy, had given notice to you, the said H. J. Allen, to procure such child to be vaccinated, contrary to the form of the statute for such case made and provided, whereupon I the said justice, issued my summons to you the said H. J. Allen, directing you to appear with the said child before me the said justice or some other justice of the peace for the said county, on the 29th April instant, to show cause why such child had not been vaccinated, and whereas you the said H. J. Allen have this day appeared before me the said justice, and it being now made to appear to me on oath that the said Eliza Allen is under the age of fourteen years, and has not been vaccinated, and has not had the small pox, and you the said H. J. Allen having failed to show any reason why the said Eliza Allen should not be vaccinated now, I, the undersigned, do hereby order and direct you the said H. J. Allen, to have the said Eliza Allen vaccinated within seven days from the date of the order. Given under my hand and seal 29th April 1869, at St. Neots, in the county aforesaid. W. HUMBLEY.

It was proved that the said appellant had neglected to obey the said order, and it was admitted that the said child had not at the time of such hearing been vaccinated. The appellant then stated, and the fact was admitted by the respondent, that he, the appellant, had previously, on the 30th March 1869, been convicted of disobeying an order dated the 11th March 1869 under the hand and seal of a justice for the said county, whereby the said appellant had been ordered to cause Eliza Allen to be vaccinated within seven days from the date of such last-mentioned order.

It was therefore contended on behalf of the said appellant that the information now laid against him was for the same offence, and that therefore the appellant could not be again convicted, and stress was laid on the concluding words of the Lord Chief of England in the judgment pronounced in Pilcher v. Stafford, 33 L. J., N. S., 113, M.C.

We however considered that the jurisdiction of justices under sect. 31 of the Vaccination Act of 1867 was not limited to making but one order directing a child under fourteen years of age to be vaccinated, and that the neglect to obey each order formed a separate offence, punishable on conviction, and that the conviction for disobeying a previous order was no previous conviction of the offence charged in the information before us, and that, consequently, the case was in no way governed by the decision in Pilcher v. Stafford, and that sect. 31 of the Vaccination Act of 1867 appeared to us to have been inserted in such Act with the object of avoiding the mischief found to exist when Pilcher v. Stafford was decided.

The appellant then contended that the said Eliza Allen was then and since the 20th April then last past had been in an unfit state for vaccination, and, in support of this contention, produced a certificate, of which the following is a copy:

The Vaccination Act of 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84). Medical certificate of unfitness for successful vaccination to be delivered (pursuant to sect. 18) to the father or mother of an unvaccinated child, or to the person having the custody of such child.

I, the undersigned, hereby certify that I am of opinion that Eliza, the child of H. J. Allen, of Eynesbury, in the parish of Eynesbury, in the county of Hunts, aged twelve, is not now in a fit and proper state to be successfully vaccinated. I do hereby postpone the vaccination until the 20th June 1869.

W. J. COLLINS, M.D., L.R.C.P.E., M.R.C.S.E., &c.
1, Albert-terrace, Regent's Park.

And it was contended on behalf of the appellant that the justices were bound by the terms of the Vaccination Act of 1867 to accept such certificate as proof that the child was then unfit to be vaccinated, and that the production of such certificate was reasonable ground for the omission of the appellant to carry the order of the 29th April 1869 into effect.

We drew attention to the fact that such certificate was dated on a day prior to the date of the order of the 29th April 1869; and it was admitted that the same certificate had been produced when such last-mentioned order was made, but the justice making such order had refused to attach any weight to such certificate on the ground that the practitioner by whom such certificate purported to have been signed was opposed to the operation of vaccination generally, as had been stated by the appellant on a previous occasion, and such practitioner has signed a certificate under the Vaccination Act of 1867, and which had been on such previous occasions produced in court, stating that the said Eliza Allen ought never to be vaccinated, that the reproduction of such certificate of the 20th April 1869, which had been refused by the justice making the order of the 29th April 1869, formed under such circumstances no reasonable ground for the omission of the appellant to carry into effect such order, and we therefore convicted the appellant and adjudged him to pay a penalty or sum of 7*s*., or the sum of 13*s*. for costs, such sums to be respectively levied by distress, and in default of sufficient distress we adjudged the said appellant to be committed to the common gaol at Great Stuckley, in the county of Huntingdon, for a period of fourteen days.

The appellant subsequently being dissatisfied with our decision, made application in writing to us to state and sign a case pursuant to sect. 2 of the stat. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, setting forth the facts and grounds of our determination in order that he might take the opinion of Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, at Westminster, on the following questions of law:—1. Whether the conviction of the appellant, on the 30th day of March 1869, was a sufficient defence to the information of the 8th day of May 1869. 2. Whether the production of the medical certificate set out in the case was a sufficient answer to the said information of the 8th May, 1869. HY. WELSTEAD, BENJ. HALL PUCKLE.

By the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 84 (The Vaccination Act 1867), it is by sect. 16 enacted that—

The parent of every child born in England shall, within three months after the birth of such child, or where, by reason of the death, illness, absence, or inability of the parent, or other cause, any other person shall have the custody of such child, such person shall, within three months after receiving the custody of such child, take it, or cause it to be taken, to the public vaccinator of the vaccination district in which it shall then be resident, according to the provisions of this or any other Act, to be vaccinated, or shall, within such period as aforesaid, cause it to be vaccinated by some medical practitioner; and the public vaccinator to whom such child shall be so brought, is hereby required, with all reasonable dispatch, subject to the conditions hereinafter mentioned, to vaccinate such child.

Sect. 18 enacts—

If any public vaccinator or medical practitioner shall be of opinion that the child is not in a fit and proper state to be successfully vaccinated, he shall forthwith deliver to the parent or other person having the custody of such child a certificate under his hand according to the form in the schedule hereto annexed marked B, or to the like effect, that the child is then in a state unfit for successful vaccination, which certificate shall remain in force for two months, and shall be renewable for successive periods of two months until a public vaccinator or medical practitioner shall deem the child in a fit state for successful vaccination, and the child shall, with all reasonable despatch, be vaccinated, and the certificate of successful vaccination duly given, if warranted by the result.

Sect. 29 enacts that—

Every parent or person having the custody of a child who shall neglect to take such child, or to cause it to be taken to be vaccinated, or after vaccination to be inspected according to the provisions of this Act, and shall not render a reasonable excuse for his neglect, shall be guilty of an offence, and be liable to be proceeded against summarily, and upon conviction to pay a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings.

Sect. 31 enacts that—

If any registrar or any officer appointed by the guardians to enforce the provisions of this Act shall give information in writing to a justice of the peace that he has reason to believe that any child under the age of fourteen years, being within the union or parish for which the informant acts, has not been successfully vaccinated, and that he has given notice to the parent or person having the custody of such child to procure its being vaccinated, and that this notice has been disregarded, the justices may summon such parent or person to appear with the child before him at a certain time and place, and upon the appearance, if the justice shall find after such examination as he shall deem necessary, that the child has not been vaccinated nor has already had the small-pox, he may, if he see fit, make an order under his hand and seal directing such child to be vaccinated within a certain time; and if at the expiration the child shall not have been so vaccinated, or shall not be shown to be then unfit to be vaccinated, or to be insusceptible of vaccinating, the person upon whom such order shall have been made shall be proceeded against summarily, and unless he can show some reasonable ground for his omission to carry the order into effect shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings.

Sect. 34 enacts that—

In any prosecution for neglect to procure the vaccination of a child, it shall not be necessary in support thereof to prove that the defendant received notice from the registrar or any other officer of the requirements of the law in that respect; but if the defendant produces any such certificate as hereinbefore described on the register of vaccinations kept by the registrar as hereinbefore provided, in which the certificate of successful vaccination of such child shall be duly entered, the same shall be sufficient defence for him, except in regard to the certificate marked B, where the time specified therein for the postponement of the vaccination shall have expired before the time when the information shall have been laid.

Digitized by Google

W. Graham appeared for the appellant.—The question is, can a person who has once been convicted for not having vaccinated his child be again convicted for a similar offence? This point would seem to have been decided in the negative by the case of Pilcher v. Stafford, 33 L. J. 113, M.C., which although a decision upon the old Act of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 100 is applicable to the present case, and where it was held that a parent having been fined for neglecting to have a child vaccinated, no further proceedings could be taken, although the child remained unvaccinated. In giving judgment in that case Cockburn, C. J. says, "I quite agree that the continuous omission to have a child vaccinated is as much within the mischief intended to be remedied by the statute as the not doing it within the prescribed time; but this mischief has not been reached by the present legislation. The 2nd section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 100 imposes the duty of having a child vaccinated within three or four months of its birth as the case may be, and the 9th section requires that the registrar shall give notice of this duty, and if the notice be given and the duty not performed within the prescribed time, then this non-performance is the offence arising and punishable under the Act, and when once that offence is complete and has been dealt with, and the person offending has been punished, no further offence can be committed. It is not enough to say the mischief continues; the answer to that is, the Act does not enact a remedy. If we were to hold otherwise on the present enactment, it would follow that for every day during which the omission to vaccinate a child continues, a penalty would be incurred, so that the penalties might accumulate to a very serious amount, which could never have been the intention of the Legislature." That decision, it is submitted, applies equally to the present case, for if he may be fined twice he may be fined fifty times for the same omission. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Do not the provisions in sect. 31 of the recent statute extend the powers of the former statute, so that the registrar can give notice after notice?] That is really the question, but I submit that he cannot do so. Having committed a breach of the Act, and being fined for it, there is an end. There is nothing in the Act which says that the registrar may give the notice over and over again. If so, justices might go on making orders from day to day. If the Legislature had intended anything of the sort, it would have expressed itself in plain terms. Then, secondly, the certificate was a bar. The 34th section says, "If the defendant produce any such certificate as hereinbefore described," that is, a certificate of a medical practitioner that he is of opinion that the child is not in a fit and proper state to be successfully vaccinated. This he did, and the justices therefore had no jurisdiction to convict. The certificate is in itself a defence, and it matters not whether or not it is a sound opinion that it contains. If it be false, there is a remedy against the person who signs it, given by the 30th section. The justices cannot inquire into the reasons of the medical man who gives it.

The Solicitor-General (Archibald with him).—Looking at the facts of the case, and the old and new statute, it is clear that the latter was passed with reference to the decision in Pilcher v. Stafford. Under the old Act the vaccination was to be within a fixed time, and on disobedience a fine was imposed, and where, therefore, the time had elapsed, no fresh proceedings could have been instituted. This, however, is altered by the late Act, and the words in section 31, "has not been successfully vaccinated," imply that proceedings upon proceedings may be taken until the child is successfully vaccinated. If the parent persists in not having the child vaccinated, he commits a fresh offence. If the child is under fourteen years of age, and is not vaccinated, or not successfully vaccinated, it is within the mischief of the Act. The notice may be given many times so long as the child is under fourteen years of age. [MELLOR, J.—The object of the statute is certainly to have a successful vaccination.] Then, as to the second objection. Is the certificate a conclusive answer? It is not, for though it might be one under sects. 16 and 29 it is not under the 31st. Upon an information under sect. 31 the justices had a right to consider the bona fides of the certificate. If made mala fides they would properly disregard it, especially if it is given not because the child is labouring under a temporary disability, but because the medical man thinks that vaccination ought not to be practised at all. [COCKBURN, C. J.—You admit that under the 16th and 29th sections it would be a bar; but you say that when the proceedings are under the 31st section it is not such, and that the justices may consider it with the other evidence.] That is so.

Graham was heard in reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the justices was correct, and that there should be judgment for the respondents. It is quite clear, when we look at the 31st section, that it was the intention of the Legislature to add additional powers for ensuring vaccination. The Act, however, does not repeal or supersede the machinery which had been provided by the previous Act. The 15th, 16th, and 29th sections recite what proceedings are to be taken. The 15th section directs the registrar to give notice to the parent to have the child vaccinated. The 16th makes it incumbent on the parent to take the child to be vaccinated; and the 29th section makes it an offence if the parent neglects. There is, however, a proviso that if the public vaccinator or any other medical practitioner shall be of opinion that the child is not in a fit state to be vaccinated, and shall give a certificate to that effect, the vaccination may be postponed for two months with a power of renewal for successive periods of two months. If, however, the child is not vaccinated, and there is no certificate, the offence is complete under the 29th section. In Pilcher v. Stafford this court held that where once the parent had been convicted and punished there was no provision in the Act whereby he might be again proceeded against. The question now, however, is, whether the machinery is under the recent Act applicable to a second offence? I think that we are bound to hold that the machinery of the 31st section applies to the present state of things. The section enacts that when there is a child under fourteen years of age that is not vaccinated, the registrar may give notice to the parent to procure its being vaccinated, and if such notice be not obeyed he may be summoned before a justice, and if the justice shall find that the child has not been vaccinated, nor has already had the smallpox, he may make an order directing the child to be vaccinated within a certain time, and if that order shall not be complied with an offence is committed in so disobeying it. Here the appellant received notice to have the child vaccinated, the justices made an order that it should be vaccinated, which was not complied with, and the appellant was convicted. Nevertheless, he still refuses to have the child vaccinated. Then a second proceeding is commenced against him under the 31st section; fresh notice is given, he is again summoned before the justices, and a fresh order is made. This order also is disobeyed, and now he is convicted in respect of that disobedience. It is said that the power of the registrar to give a notice is gone when once such a notice has been given; in short, that the proceedings under the 31st section cannot be renewed toties quoties as often as necessary. At first I was in some doubt, and I still think that the Legislature have not used the best words to express their meaning, but upon consideration I think it is competent to the registrar to give notice, and to the justices to convict toties quoties as often as it becomes necessary, and if indeed we look at the object of the Legislature, which is that of effecting a great public benefit, we ought to give it all the effect in our power. The Legislature has certainly thus far thought that vaccination is of great public advantage, and I cannot but think that its objects were not merely to punish for a single offence, but to enforce obedience in a matter which is considered to be of such vast importance. But then it is said that there is an answer to the proceedings, because the medical man had given a certificate that the child was in a state unfit for successful vaccination; and the question which arises is this, is the certificate a bar? I think that it is not, and that such a certificate has no application to a proceeding under the 31st section. It must be observed that the certificate has reference to the 29th section, and that it does not apply to proceedings under the 31st. The earlier sections amongst which this certificate is found, have reference to what the parents are to do. If they fail to do what is required under the 15th and 16th sections, they are guilty of an offence against the 29th section: and it may very well be, as far as that offence is concerned, that if they have a medical certificate that the child is not in a fit state to be vaccinated, that that would be an answer; but when you come to the 31st section, where the matter comes before the magistrates under it, although a medical certificate may fairly be considered in evidence, it cannot be considered as depriving them of all discretion, and when we look to the language of that section, it certainly cannot be said that a medical certificate was intended to deprive them of jurisdiction. There is nothing which implies it, and there is not a word which puts any restraint upon them. If the magistrate sees fit, he is to make an order under his hand and seal, directing the child to be vaccinated within a certain time; and if, at the expiration of such time the child shall not have been so vaccinated, or shall not be then unfit to be vaccinated, or insusceptible of vaccination, the party may be proceeded against summarily, unless he can show some reasonable ground for his omission. Here, then, there is a total silence as to the effect of the production of any such medical certificate. If such a certificate be produced, the magistrate alone must be the judge of its effect. We must look also to the 34th section, which enacts. [Reads the section.] Now, does this section influence by implication the 31st section? I think that it does not. I do not understand the word "prosecution" to mean proceedings before justices under the 31st section, but to apply to proceedings under the 16th and 29th sections. With reference to the certificate, the question is not what were the motives of the medical man, but whether or not his certificate was a bar. The justices thought it was not such a bar as they ought to give effect to, and I think they were right, and that we cannot interfere with their decision.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I was a party to the decision in the case of Pilcher v. Stafford, which I still consider was rightly decided upon the then state of the law; but the law since then has been altered, for the purpose, I conceive, of meeting the difficulty which that case exhibited. As regards the 34th section, I think it applies only to cases within the 15th, 16th, and 29th sections. Under the 31st section the medical certificate has no application as a bar to the proceedings. It may operate upon the discretion of the justices, but not otherwise. In construing this enactment we must not lose sight of the obvious policy of the Legislature. I think the magistrates were quite right.

HANNEN, J., concurred.

Judgment for the respondent.

Attorney for the respondent, Solicitor to the Treasury.

Attorneys for the appellant, Conquest and Stimson, Bedford.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by M. W. MCKELLAR, and H. H. HOCKING, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, Jan. 13.

SMITH v. LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Negligence, evidence of—Railway—Sparks from engine—Accumulation of cut grass on embankment.

The defendants, in the course of a very dry summer, allowed hedge trimmings and cut grass to accumulate in heaps on the embankment, along which their railway ran; when the heaps had been there for a fortnight, and were in a very combustible state, they caught fire, and the wind being high, and the country in a very parched state, the fire spread through a hedge, over a stubble-field, and across a lane to the plaintiff's house, which it destroyed.

It was proved that just before the fire broke out, two locomotives of the defendants had passed along the defendants' line close to the spot where the fire broke out; but no evidence was given to show that the defendants had not taken all possible precautions to prevent the emission of sparks from their engines:

Held, by Bovill, C. J., and Keating, J. (dissentiente Brett, J.), in an action against the defendants for negligence, that there was evidence from which the jury might infer that the heaps in question were set on fire by a spark from one of the defendants' engines, and that there was evidence of negligence in having left those heaps so long on the embankment during so dry a season.

The first count was for the negligent use of a locomotive. The second count stated that at the time, &c., the plaintiff was possessed of a cottage and premises, and the defendants were possessed of and had the care and management of a railway running near the said cottage and premises, with banks belonging thereto, and part of the said railway, and were possessed of locomotive engines containing burning substances, which were used by the defendants for conveying passengers along the said railway; yet by the negligence and improper conduct of the defendants, and the want of due care on the part of the defendants in the keeping and management of the said railway and banks, quantities of cut grass and hedge trimmings were heaped up on the said railway and banks and became ignited, and a fire was occasioned which spread over and along a stubble field near the said railway to the cottage and premises of the plaintiff, and set fire to the same, &c.

The third count stated that the defendants by their servants so negligently burnt hedge trimmings and grass cuttings on the banks of their railway, that the fire extended, &c.

The defendants pleaded not guilty.

Issue thereon.

Digitized by Google

At the trial before Keating, J. at the summer assizes at Dorset in 1869, it appeared that the summer of 1868 when the plaintiff's house was burnt, was an unusually dry one. A short time prior to the accident the company's servants had been trimming the hedges along the defendants' line, and also cutting the grass and other stuff growing there. These trimmings and other stuff were collected in heaps along the embankment of the railway, and had been lying there for a fortnight on the day when the accident happened. Evidence was given that on the morning of the day in question (but about four hours before the accident) the company's servants were setting fire to some of these heaps, but this was more than half a mile from the place where the fire that consumed the plaintiff's house, began. It was, however, on this suggested that these men had gone along the line, burning the heaps as they went. The main theory, however, in support of the plaintiff's case was, that one of these heaps was set on fire by a spark from one of the engines passing along the line, and this theory was strengthened by the fact that two trains had passed a few minutes before the fire was first observed. At the time a very high wind was blowing, and the whole country was in a very parched state, so that the fire, which no doubt originated in some way or other in one of these heaps, quickly spread up the embankment of the line, through a hedge, over a large stubble field, and across a lane to the plaintiff's house, which was quite 200 yards from the place where the fire originated. When the fire was first observed, some of the company's servants, who happened to be on the spot, tried to put it out, but it burned so fiercely that they were unable to do so.

On this state of facts it was contended on behalf of the defendants that there was no evidence of negligence on their part.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 30*l.*, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for the defendants on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury. In Michaelmas Term Kingdon, Q. C. obtained a rule nisi accordingly.

Cole, Q. C. and Bere, Q. C. showed cause. Under the circumstances there can be no doubt that the fire which consumed the plaintiff's house originated in the heaps of hedge trimmings and what was called "rummidge," which the defendants had allowed to accumulate on the banks of their railway. There was evidence that these heaps were set on fire, either by the company's servants with a view to their destruction, or else accidentally by a spark from the defendants' engines. The latter is by far the most probable view of the case. In the former case there was clear evidence of negligence. If we take the latter view of the case, then we do not find fault with either the construction or the management of the engines, but we say that any engine, however managed, is liable to emit sparks, and, that being so, the company ought not to have allowed the accumulation of combustible material at a season of the year when the country was unusually dry. A prudent man might certainly have foreseen that such an accumulation was very dangerous, and that if a fire once broke out, it might, in the dry state of the country, spread a considerable distance. This action is grounded on the second count of the declaration in Vaughan v. The Taff Vale Railway Company, 2 L. T Rep. N. S. 394; and 3 H. & N. 743; and in Ex. Ch. in 29 L. J. 247, Ex.; and 5 H. & N. 679. They cited also Freemantle v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 31 L. J. 12, C. P.; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 556;

Addison on Wrongs, 209, 2nd edit.

Kingdon, Q. C., Lopes, Q. C., and Murch, in support of the rule.—Supposing it to be conceded that reasonable men might have thought it likely that the heaps of trimmings, &c. would catch fire, no one could even possibly have anticipated that the fire would spread 200 yards to the plaintiff's house. The reason of its spreading so far was the very unusual dryness of the weather and the high wind that prevailed at the time. The practice of cutting hedges and other stuff and letting it lie in heaps for a short time before removing is a very usual one. They cited Blythe v. The Birmingham Waterworks Company, 11 Ex. 781.

BRETT, J.—I am of opinion that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants to go to the jury in this case. I quite feel the difficulty in which the judges are placed in such a case as this, when they have to decide upon a matter of fact rather than of law. The rule in these questions of negligence is clearly laid down by Alderson, B., in Blyth v. Birmingham Waterworks Company, 11 Ex. 784: "Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do." The question then here is, whether the defendants, giving that reasonable consideration of all the circumstances which would require the consideration of reasonable men in their position, have done or omitted to do anything which prudent and careful men would not have done or omitted. The case is put thus: Mr. Cole admits that there is no ground for saying that the engines used by the company were not of the best construction, and that there was no evidence of negligence as to the engines. But he says that the defendants were bound to take notice of the fact, that all engines must necessarily emit sparks, and that the season was unusually dry, and had been so for some time, and therefore they ought not to have left a quantity of combustible material on their banks, for they ought as reasonable men to have expected that sparks from the engines would set light to such material, and if so, that the fire so caused might extend to the plaintiff's property. I agree that the defendants might reasonably have expected sparks to be emitted from the engines, and that these sparks might set fire to the hedge trimmings collected on the embankment; but I think that no reasonable man could be expected to foresee further consequences, nor can it be pretended that they could have foreseen the high wind which was one of the principal causes of the fire spreading in the way it did. The defendants were thus, in my opinion, not guilty of any omission of duty to the plaintiff either as to the emission of sparks or the collection of trimmings. There was no duty imposed upon them to take precautions, unless the plaintiff's property was so situated that it might have been supposed to be put in danger. If the plaintiff's property had been of a combustible nature, and situated near to the railway, the case might have been different, and the remarks of Cockburn, C. J. in Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Company (ubi sup.) might have applied, and it might have been considered that the plaintiff's property was put in danger by the defendants' omission to do something which they ought to have done. But here, bringing to bear my knowledge of ordinary English country life, I cannot suppose that any man would ever have contemplated that a fire would spread over a stubble field and across a road up to the plaintiff's house. I have heard of such things in the American prairies, but not in England. I cannot think that any man is bound to anticipate such a concurrence of circumstances as produced the disaster in this case. On these grounds, I think that this rule ought to be made absolute.

KEATING, J.—I quite feel the difficulty of the position in which the judges are placed, when asked to determine a question of this kind. I come, however, to a conclusion different from that of my brother Brett, and think that in this case there was evidence which could not properly have been withheld from the jury. Notwithstanding any differences of opinion that may have existed on minor points, the broad facts of the case are clear enough. At a quarter to one o'clock on the day in question the plaintiff's house was safe, and between that time and one o'clock a fire unquestionably broke out on the defendants' line. The fire broke out in the heaps of hedge trimmings and other "rummidge" which were lying on the banks of the defendants' line. There is no evidence that these heaps had been there for more than would have been, under ordinary circumstances, an usual time. Owing, however, to the time they had been there, and the dryness of the season, they had become very dry, and on becoming ignited the fire immediately spread with very great violence, so that the defendants' servants, who were on the spot, were quite unable to extinguish it or arrest its progress. This circumstance shows that the heaps in question were of a very combustible nature; if they had not been so, the fire might easily have been extinguished. The fire then extended over the stubble field. The wind at the time was undoubtedly high, and gave an unusual force to the fire. It may have been that, under ordinary circumstances, the fire might have been extinguished; but what weighs on my mind is the accumulation of such material at such a season. It is clear that this material must have been very dry. Moreover, there had been fires all over the country, though I do not recollect that it appeared that there had been fires on the line itself. Under these circumstances there was a collection of combustible material at a spot where trains were continually passing. I quite feel the force of my brother Brett's difficulty, that under ordinary circumstances it was most improbable that the fire should ever have extended so far; still I think that that was a circumstance for the consideration of the jury. My firm impression is that this case could not and ought not to have been withheld from the jury, and I therefore think that this rule must be discharged.

BOVILL, C. J.—The question for us to decide is whether there was any evidence to go to the jury. Now there was abundant evidence to show that the fire was caused by the sparks emitted by one of two locomotive engines belonging to the company. This alone is, however, not sufficient to give a cause of action. The company has the authority of the Legislature to use these engines. Moreover, there was no evidence to show that the engines in question were of an improper or unusual description, or that they were being used in a careless or improper manner. Yet it must be remembered that the company were using a dangerous instrument—dangerous as of necessity emitting a certain quantity of fire. Such being the state of the case, let us look at the circumstances. Locomotive engines emit a greater or less quantity of sparks, according to the manner in which they are used, and the persons in charge of them can regulate their speed and accommodate them to circumstances. The present case is different, then, from Blythe v. Birmingham Waterworks Company, 11 Ex. 781, because there, so soon as the company had laid the pipes, it had no further control over them. But if particular circumstances require it, the company's servants can regulate the speed of a locomotive engine so as to prevent it from being dangerous. It is a question of the speed and power at which the engine was being driven. At the time of this occurrence the weather was very dry, there was an accumulation of hedge trimmings, and what was called at the trial "rummidge." The company had allowed this accumulation to take place. Under most circumstances it might not have been expected that the hedge would take fire, but in a very dry season it might, and if it once caught fire who can say where it would stop? It is contended that no person in the plaintiff's house would ever have expected the fire to spread so far, but I think it very doubtful whether anyone in the house would have gone quietly to bed when he saw the hedge on fire. The company, therefore, is in this position: They allowed an accumulation of combustible material on their property, and used an engine which emitted sparks, so that they caused the fire, which extended over the hedge and stubble field to the plaintiff's house. The plaintiff thus sustained great loss through the act of the company. It does not follow certainly that they can recover compensation from the company; they must show negligence. The company was bound to have regard to circumstances in using a dangerous instrument. It is said that they could not have contemplated the fire spreading so far as the plaintiff's house; but in this case all things tended to reduce the distance, and the extent to which a fire will spread depends on the nature of the material over which it has to pass. I do not think that it is for me to judge whether the spreading of the fire in this case was a probable consequence of the defendants' acts; that was a question for the jury. All that this court has to say is whether there was any material on which the jury could find a verdict against the defendants. I think there was, and consequently the rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged. The verdict to be entered for the defendants on the first and third counts, and for the plaintiff on the second.

Attorneys for the plaintiff, Sole, Turner, and Turner, for Lacy, Wareham.

Attorney for defendants, Crombie.

Friday, Jan. 14.

PECK v. PECK.

Practice at nisi prius—Cross-examination—Reception of evidence.

If a document be given to a witness during cross-examination for the purpose of identifying the handwriting, the counsel for the party whose witness is in the box has a right to inspect the document sufficiently to enable him to re-examine about the writing, and also to identify the document in case it should afterwards be put in evidence. He has, however, no right to read the document through, nor to comment upon its contents, until it be put in by the other side, although he may remark upon its absence if it be not put in.

In an action by executors against a son of their testator to recover money received by him from his father, the Dr. side of the testator's account book, containing entries of the receipt of interest from the son, was held to be admissible in support of the plaintiffs' contention that the money had been lent and not given, although the right of the plaintiffs without consent to put in the other side, which contained no entries opposed to the advantage of the writer, was doubtful.

This was an action by executors against a son of their testator to recover the sum of 1000*l.*

The testator had lent the defendant 3000*l.*, for which the defendant gave a promissory note. 2000*l.* of this sum had been paid back by the defendant before his father's death, and the contention between the parties was as to the residue of the amount originally advanced. The defendant maintained that his father had made him a present of the remaining 1000*l.*, but the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. The trial took place in Middlesex before Brett, J.

Cole, Q. C., moved on behalf of the defendant for a new trial on the grounds of misdirection and improper reception of evidence. In the course of the cross-examination of one of the plaintiffs' witnesses, who was a near relation of the testator, he put into his hand a document, and asked in whose handwriting it was; the witness said it was the testator's, upon which Mr. Francis, who was counsel for the plaintiff, claimed to look at the document; the judge decided in his favour, and defendant's counsel, under protest, handed it to plaintiffs' counsel; afterwards defendant's counsel concluded his case without putting this document in evidence; upon which the other side asked to have it put in, or to put it in themselves. The defendant's counsel refused his consent, and the judge remarked, "Are you not satisfied, Mr. Francis, with Mr. Cole's refusal to put in the document?" In addressing the jury in reply, the plaintiff's counsel commented upon the absence of this document from the defendant's case, and asked the jury to infer that it contained strong evidence in support of the plaintiff. This was the first objection; and it was contended that the plaintiff's counsel had no right to read, or even to see, any document belonging to the defendant until it was put in by the other side; that the request to have the document put in was irregular and improper; and that the remark of the learned judge amounted to misdirection. The second objection related to an account book in the handwriting of the testator, which the plaintiffs proposed to put in evidence. This was opposed; but the learned judge, having consulted Byles, J., ruled that the debtor side containing entries of the payment of interest by defendant to his father was at all events admissible, and, as the judge entered in his notes, if pressed by the plaintiffs' counsel, he should also have admitted the creditor side. The debtor side alone was read. It was now contended that this was an improper reception of evidence.

BOVILL, C. J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule. The first objection was that the opposing counsel had no right to see a document which was put into a witness' hand at the trial for the purpose of proving the handwriting of the signature upon it. I am clearly of opinion that when Mr. Cole, in cross-examination on behalf of the defendant, gave this document to the plaintiff's witness, the plaintiff's counsel had a right to have the document handed to him, and had a right to see it in order to re-examine on the hand-writing of the signature. If this right exists for the object of cross-examination, or, as in this case, re-examination concerning hand-writing, how can a counsel exercise his right without looking at and even reading the document? Certainly he should see as much of the document as the witness does himself. A further objection consisted of a complaint which I do not clearly understand. Mr. Francis, who was counsel for the plaintiff, seems to have proposed that Mr. Cole should put this document in evidence for the defendant, or should allow him to put it in for the plaintiff; no doubt he had no right to put in a document in possession of the opposite side, nor had he any right to demand that the other side should adduce any particular evidence. There seems to have been some irregularity in the proceedings, but I do not see why a verdict should be set aside merely because a counsel made a request about the evidence which he had no right to make. The result was that the document was not put in; Mr. Francis wanted it, but could not do it; Mr. Cole might have put it in, but did not choose to do so. Under these circumstances it would be impossible for a judge to exclude the remarks of either learned counsel as to the conduct of the other side. Mr. Cole says that the remarks in this case created a prejudice in the minds of the jury, to the effect that the contents of the document told against his client: I am inclined to think that such an effect would, under the circumstances, be the result of a fair presumption, and not of prejudice. I am at a loss, therefore, to see any misdirection, or any other ground for a new trial, merely because my brother Brett said, in answer to Mr. Francis's request to have this document in evidence, "Are you not satisfied with Mr. Cole's refusal?" The natural inference from these proceedings, which were necessarily in the hearing of the jury, was that there was something of importance in the document, and it did not require the judge's suggestion to believe that its contents would not assist the contention of the counsel who refused to make it evidence. The last objection taken by Mr. Cole was, that a portion of a certain account book in the handwriting of the testator was admitted as evidence; the ground upon which my brother Brett allowed this page of the book to be put in, was that it contained entries by the deceased against his own interest. The other pages contained entries which were not so clearly against his interest at the time they were made, and my brother Brett thought that Mr. Francis's right to make them evidence was doubtful, although he said he should not consider himself justified in refusing if Mr. Francis continued to press his request to put in the whole of the book; and there can be no doubt that if Mr. Cole had then suggested that a part of the book ought not to be referred to unless the whole of it were made evidence, my brother Brett would have consented, and Mr. Francis would gladly have put in the whole of it. The objection now made that part of an admission ought not to be received was not suggested at the trial. If there had been the least intimation of it by Mr. Cole, the whole book would have been immediately admitted.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is a matter of everyday practice for counsel to hand to a witness a document for the purpose of the proof of its handwriting, which he may or may not subsequently put in evidence in his client's behalf. The object of the proceeding being proof of the writing, the opposing counsel ought to have an immediate opportunity of looking at the document, and, as I think, not only for the purpose of re-examining his witness as to the writing, but also to enable him to identify the document if it should afterwards be put in evidence by the other side. Strictly speaking, I think such a document, when both sides are satisfied as to the proof of the handwriting, ought to be put into the hands of the officer of the court until the counsel for the party in whose possession the document is, has made up his mind whether he will make it evidence or not. There might, however, be inconvenience in such a practice, and it is not commonly enforced; but the document should be so seen and even examined by the counsel that he might recognise it again. I should, however, be sorry to lay down as a rule that the opposing counsel under such circumstances has a right to read the document, or make any comment upon its contents, but it is difficult to draw a line between a proper inspection of the signature and an unnecessary examination of the document. Here my brother Brett ruled that as Mr. Cole had put a question to a witness about a certain document, Mr. Francis had a right to see that document. This being done in the face of the jury, they could not resist the natural inference that it contained something of importance, nor could the judge prevent counsel from commenting upon the circumstance. I think my brother Brett's question to Mr. Francis was merely a remark, which was not likely to affect the verdict. On the second ground of objection, the admission in evidence of entries in the testator's handwriting of interest received from his son, the defendant, it seems to me clear that as these entries were against the advantage of the writer they could not be excluded. They might have been difficult to separate from the rest of the book, and I do not see why the whole should not have been put in. This objection, however, was not taken by Mr. Cole at the trial, and is not therefore valid now.

BRETT, J.—I merely decided that, if a counsel puts a document into the hands of a witness and asks him a question about it, the counsel on the other side has a right to look at the document. In that I consider I was right, but I do not desire to hold that in looking at the document the counsel has a right to read it over. The only question for the jury was whether the testator had lent or given the defendant this 1000*l.*, and with regard to the admission of the account book my restriction in making only the debtor side evidence was in Mr. Cole's favour; Mr. Francis would have preferred to put in the creditor side, because it contained an entry, in which this sum of 1000*l.* was mentioned by the writer as having been lent to his son. Mr. Cole might have complained if I had refused to allow the whole book to be read, but there can be no reason to grant him a rule on the ground of the reception of a part only, when the rest was kept back in his interest

Rule refused.

BRAMWELL v. SPILLER.

Agent—Del credere commission—Right to sue vendee.

An agent upon del credere commission is in the same position with regard to a vendee as any other agent, and cannot sue the vendee in his own name for a debt contracted between the principal and vendee.

This action, for goods bargained and sold, was tried before Bovill, C. J., at the London sittings after Michaelmas Term, when a verdict was, by direction, entered for the defendant, leave being reserved to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict of 191*l.* 2*s.*, if the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs had a right to sue for the goods sold. The court was to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact.

The plaintiffs carried on business as tobacco brokers in the city, and had frequent transactions with a Mr. Jimenez, a large importer of cigars and a general merchant. The plaintiffs sold to the defendant a case of cigars, the plaintiffs acting in the matter as agents for Jimenez on del credere commission. The defendants afterwards repudiated the contract, and the cigars remained at the St. Katherine's Docks in the names of the plaintiffs, Jimenez having transferred the cigars to the plaintiffs' names immediately upon receiving a sold note from the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs had given to the defendant a bought note in their names, and not in that of Jimenez, but the defendant knew throughout the transaction that the plaintiffs were brokers, and that they were acting for Jimenez.

The only question left to the jury was whether at any time an express contract with the plaintiffs as principals was substituted for the original contract entered into by the plaintiffs as agents for Jimenez. The jury found that there was no such substituted contract.

The question reserved for the court therefore was, whether a del credere agent, who has throughout a transaction disclosed his principal, but whose principal looks solely to him for payment, is entitled to sue the vendee in his own name.

H. James, Q. C. (with him English Harrison) moved in pursuance of the leave reserved to enter the verdict for the plaintiffs, and contended that, although agents were unable generally to sue in their own names for debts contracted with them on behalf of their principals, yet this restriction had never been applied to agents on del credere commission; they are expressly excepted from the rule laid down by Blackburn, J., in Fawkes v. Lamb, 31 L. J. 98, Q. B. He also cited

Houghton v. Matthews, 3 Bos. & Pul. 485;
Atkyns v. Amber, 2 Esp. 493;
Williams v. Millington, 1 H. Bl. 81;
Hornby v. Lacy, 6 M. & S. 166.

BOVILL, C.J.—I reserved this point at the trial in order that the plaintiff's counsel might get an opportunity to enter the verdict, if he could find any ground for doing so, but I was then, and am now, strongly of opinion that the plaintiffs had no right to sue in their own names. The action is brought upon a contract of sale between the plaintiffs' principal and the defendants', the latter being aware throughout that the plaintiffs were mere agents, and it has long been settled that under such circumstances agents cannot sue. The first authority is as far back as Houghton v. Matthews, in the year 1803. It was also held in Hornby v. Lacy, that in the case of a del credere commission, the principal might have assumpsit against the vendee. The cases of auctioneers stand upon a different footing, as appears in Spittle v. Lavender, 2 B. & B. 542. From these and other cases the general principle of the law is clear, and the case of Fawkes v. Lamb is a distinct authority against the plaintiffs. There are many cases to the same effect, in all of which I entirely concur, whilst I have considerable doubt about the only case which had any tendency the other way; that case is Atkyns v. Amber, which is not very satisfactorily reported. It may be there was some special property in the goods in that case, or some other reason for the ruling of Chief Justice Eyre which does not apply here. Here the contract is clearly between the principals, and the fact that the plaintiffs were del credere agents makes no difference in their right to sue.

M. SMITH, J.—I think the nonsuit was perfectly right. The plaintiffs sold to the defendant for Jimenez, as appears on the face of the bought and sold notes, and the contract was therefore between the principals. Mr. James contends that because the plaintiffs are to receive a del credere commission they can sue upon this contract; but on principle they cannot do so, and by authority there is no such exception. I adopt the rule laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Hornby v. Lacy,' p. 171: "I own," he said, "I cannot think that a commission del credere is to have an effect attributed to it beyond that which regards the benefit of the principal who gives the commission. The commission imports that if the vendor does not pay the factor will; it is a guarantee from the factor to the principal against any mischief to arise from the vendee's insolvency. But it varies not an iota the rights subsisting between vendor and vendee."

BRETT, J.—This is an action for goods bargained and sold, and therefore a contract of purchase and sale between the plaintiffs and the defendant must be proved. It seems clear that the bought and sold notes were evidence of the only contract, and they show the contract to have been between Jimenez and the defendant. It is said that notice to the defendant that the plaintiffs were to receive a del credere commission made the defendant liable to the plaintiffs personally. But this is not so, and the plaintiffs wholly fail to show their right to sue. The rule, therefore, ought to be refused.

Rule refused.

Attorneys for plaintiffs, Drake and Son.

Saturday, Jan. 15.

THE DERBY COMMERCIAL BANK (LIMITED) v. LUMSDEN AND ANOTHER.

Interrogatories—C. L. P. A. 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), s. 51—Trover—Plaintiff's title.

In trover for barley, the defendants, admitting the prima facie title of the plaintiffs, as holders of the bill of lading, indorsed by the shipper to D. and G., and by D. and G. to the plaintiffs, showed that they (the defendants) had delivered the barley to D. and G. immediately on its arrival in this country, and without production of the bill of lading; that three months afterwards, on D. and G. becoming bankrupt, the plaintiffs, for the first time, claimed the barley as holders of the bill of lading indorsed to them by D. and G.; that the plaintiffs were bankers to D. and G.

Under these circumstances, the defendants sought to interrogate the plaintiffs as to the time at which, and the circumstances under which, the bill of lading was indorsed to them by D. and G., and also as to their relations and dealings with D. and G:

Held, that the defendants were entitled to exhibit these interrogatories.

This was an application for leave to administer interrogatories to the plaintiffs in an action of trover, brought for a cargo of barley. The defendants had pleaded not guilty, and not possessed.

The affidavit on which application was made stated the following facts:

In the month of March 1869 a certain quantity of barley, the subject of this action, was shipped on board a steamer called the Panther, of which the defendants were the managing owners, by a Mr. Heinemann, of Hamburg, whose agent in Hull was a Mr. Stephenson.

That the said barley was sold by the said Heinemann through the said Stephenson to Messrs. Dawber and Gentel, and upon the arrival of the Panther in Hull, on or about the 19th March, was delivered from the said ship to the said Stephenson's order.

That steamers from Hamburg often arrive in Hull as soon as, if not sooner, than bills of lading of the cargoes which they carry, and that on this occasion, as had often been done on previous occasions, the barley was delivered to the said Stephenson for, and to be forwarded to, Dawber and Gentel, under the statement that they had purchased, and were the consignees of and entitled to the barley.

That it was not until more than three months after the said barley had been so delivered, namely, until the end of June, and just after the failure of Messrs. Dawber and Gentel aforesaid, that the said plaintiffs claimed to have any interest in the same, or ever communicated with the defendants on the subject.

That the plaintiffs were the bankers of Messrs. Dawber and Gentel, and, as the defendants had reason to believe, intended that delivery of the barley should be made to them, and knew, or had the means of knowing, that it had been so made before they made any claim on the defendants.

The interrogatories were as follows:

1. When first, and under what circumstances, did the bill of lading for the barley, the subject of this action, come to your hands, and how was it then indorsed?

2. Did you then, or have you since the bill of lading first came to your hands, made or caused to be made any inquiries as to the arrival of the ship or the goods mentioned therein? if yea, state when and through whom?

3. Was the bill of lading indorsed by Messrs. Dawber and Gentel when it first came to your hands? If not, when first and by whom, was that indorsement put on, and what passed on the indorsement being obtained?

4. What (if any) advance did you make when the bill of lading came to your hands, and to whom, and on whose behalf? On whose behalf did you then, and have you since continued to, hold the said bill of lading, and by way of security for what (if any) sum or sums of money?

5. Were not you, at the time the said bill of lading came to your hands and until the end of June following, the bankers of Messrs. Dawber and Gentel? and what payments were made to you by them or on their behalf during that period?

6. Did not Messrs. Dawber and Gentel, or either and which of them, frequently come to the bank on business during that period, and did not you know or had you not reason to suppose before the 29th June 1869, that delivery of the said barley had been made to the said firm, or to some one acting for them or on their behalf, on or soon after the arrival of the barley?

7. Did Messrs. Dawber and Gentel, or either and which of them, some time in April, May, or June 1869, deposit with you, or place in your hands, or of any one for you, or on your behalf, a quantity of barley, or documents representing barley, similar to that which is the subject of this action? or some barley or documents representing some barley; and, if so, for what purpose and on what terms?

8. When did you first intimate to the said Messrs. Dawber and Gentel, or either of them, that a claim was about to be made on the defendants in respect of the barley, the subject of the present action, and what passed on the subject?

9. When did you first know that Messrs. Dawber and Gentel, aforesaid, were insolvent, or unable to meet their engagements?

10. Have you at any time, and when, accepted any and what bill or bills of exchange, either through yourselves or your London agents on behalf of Messrs. Dawber and Gentel aforesaid, receiving at the time the bills of lading against which such bills were drawn, and have you always received the goods represented by such bills of lading? and, if not, state when and in what instance you have not received such goods.

11. Have you received or written any and what letters to Messrs. Dawber and Gentel aforesaid, or either of them, or to any person or persons (other than your attorney) relative to the barley, the subject of this action? if yea, give the dates and particulars thereof.

Mellor, J., refused leave to exhibit these interrogatories, and this was an appeal from his decision.

Crompton Hutton, for the defendants.—The question on which this case must be decided is, who were the holders of the bill of lading at the time that the defendants delivered the barley to Messrs. Dawber and Gentel. This can only be ascertained by the defendants by interrogating the plaintiffs as to the time at which the bill of lading was indorsed to them. For the purpose of these interrogatories, the defendants admit the plaintiffs to be the holders of the bills of lading; but it is all important to ascertain when and under what circumstances they became the holders. The plaintiffs were the bankers of Messrs. Dawber and Gentel, and it seems probable that they intended them to receive the barley.

Digitized by Google

A. L. Smith for the plaintiffs.—One party in an action is not allowed to interrogate the other as to what is his cause of action. The pleas here are not guilty, and not possessed. The defendants thus deny the plaintiff's title, and they cannot interrogate them in order to find out what their title is. The decision of the Court of Exchequer in Finney v. Forwood, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 296; L. Rep. 1 Ex. 6; 35 L. J. 35, Ex., shows that in an action of this description the defendant must lay a foundation for his claim to interrogate by admitting the plaintiffs' prima facie title. [BOVILL, C. J.—Is it not, however, consistent with this application that the defendants may say, "We admit your prima facie title by the possession of the bills of lading properly indorsed; but, if you are entitled to succeed we shall have been defrauded by somebody, and we therefore seek to invalidate your title by showing your connection with the persons from whom you received the bills of lading?] The defendants never admit our title from Heinemann.

Crompton Hutton was not called upon in reply.

BOVILL, C. J.—I am of opinion that these interrogatories must be allowed. They are made for the purpose of supporting the defendant's case, and of showing that a fraud has been committed on the defendants by somebody, and that under the circumstances the plaintiffs cannot avail themselves of their bill of lading. A mere suggestion of such a thing would not be sufficient to entitle the defendants to these interrogatories, as was decided in Finney v. Forwood (ubi sup.), but some facts must be stated to raise a foundation for the charge of fraud, and to connect the plaintiffs with it. In Finney v. Forwood no such thing was stated; the defendants only alleged their ignorance of the nature of the plaintiff's title. As was said in that case by the Lord Chief Baron, "You do not lay a foundation for your application by connecting the plaintiff in any way with Saunders, from whom you received the cotton." Here it is shown that the plaintiffs are connected with the shipper, and that they claim under the bill of lading; also that they are connected with the persons to whom delivery was made. The court sees, then, that the defendants have been defrauded by somebody, and it is the essence of the case that the defendants, who have been defrauded, should interrogate the plaintiffs, so as, if possible, to establish their defence to this action.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that this is eminently a case for interrogatories. The plaintiffs are the holders of the bill of lading, and on the defendants' affidavit it is not denied that they are the holders of the bill, which was indorsed by Heinemann to Dawber and Gentel, and by them to the plaintiffs. But the defendants state grounds for thinking that the plaintiffs rescinded the bill of lading as bankers for Dawber and Gentel; they admit the plaintiffs' primâ facie case, but they seek to get rid of it by showing either that the plaintiffs, as holders of the bill of lading, allowed Dawber and Gentel to receive the goods, or that the bill of lading, being held back by Dawber and Gentel, was given to the plaintiffs after the receipt of the cargo. It may be that there is no ground for either defence, but the defendants can only ascertain the facts by interrogating the plaintiffs. Supposing the facts to be as suggested by the defendants, it would surely be against equity and good conscience that the plaintiffs should succeed. There can be no doubt that, if a bill were filed, a court of equity would compel the plaintiffs to answer, and we must give relief where a court of equity would do so.

BRETT J.—I think also that these interrogatories must be admitted. The plaintiffs sue for a misdelivery of the goods. Their prima facie case is that they are the holders of the bill of lading properly indorsed. This prima facie case is not disputed by the defendants, but the defendants seek to meet it by showing either that the bill of lading was not indorsed to the plaintiffs, by Dawber and Gentel, at the time of the delivery of the goods to them, or that, if it were, the plaintiffs knew of, and acquiesced in the delivery to Dawber and Gentel. These facts can only be ascertained by interrogating the plaintiffs, and I therefore think the interrogatories should be admitted.

Rule granted, the interrogatories to be settled at chambers

Attorney for plaintiffs, F. C. Greenfield.

Attorneys for defendants, Chester and Urquhart.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, Jan. 14.

GLADWELL v. TURNER.

Bill of exchange—Notice of dishonour—Ignorance of drawer's address—Reasonable time.

A bill of exchange was dishonoured on Friday. The holder was then ignorant of the drawer's address, and was not able to learn it until between five and six p.m. on Saturday. After six o'clock on the same evening he posted a letter containing notice of dishonour, which reached the drawer on Monday morning. If a letter had been posted before six o'clock it would have been delivered the same evening.

Held, that the notice of dishonour was sufficient.

Action upon a bill of exchange against the drawer. Plea traversing notice of dishonour. Issue thereon. The case was tried before Kelly, C.B., at the sittings after term in Middlesex, when the facts appeared to be as follows. The bill was drawn by the defendant on one Welch. It was accepted by Welch, and indorsed to Smith, who indorsed it to the plaintiff. It became due on Friday, the 17th Sept., and was presented to the acceptor, but not paid. Plaintiff did not know the drawer or his address. He went to inquire his address of Smith on the same day, but Smith was not at home. Plaintiff called again on the next day, Saturday, the 18th, and succeeded in seeing him, and getting the address, between five and six o'clock. It appeared that both the plaintiff and the defendant resided in London, and if the plaintiff had posted a letter to defendant before six o'clock it would have been delivered the same night. The plaintiff did write a letter to defendant giving notice of dishonour, but did not post it till after six o'clock on the Saturday, so that it was not delivered until the Monday morning. The defendant's counsel, upon proof of these facts, contended that the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited on the ground that he was bound to send notice of dishonour immediately upon finding out the defendant's address, and that the notice not having arrived till the Monday, was too late.

The learned judge was of opinion that the question was, whether the plaintiff had exercised reasonable diligence after learning the address of the defendant, and the verdict was entered for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit on the above ground.

Cole, Q. C. now moved accordingly.—The general rule is clear. Where both parties live in the same town, or where they live in London, notice must be given in time to be received in the course of the day following the day of dishonour. Lord Ellenborough, in the case of Smith v. Mallett, 2 Camp. 208, says: "Where the parties reside in London, each party should have a day to give notice." In this case notice was not given on the next day after dishonour, but it will be contended that ignorance of the drawer's address was an excuse. But admitting that such ignorance may be an excuse, on the principle that Lex neminem cogit ad impossibilia, the indulgence is not to be extended any further than is absolutely necessary. It was quite possible for the holder, on finding out the address, to have immediately written a letter, and posted it to the drawer; the notice would then have been delivered on the day after dishonour. In such a case the ordinary rule applies, and it being possible to give notice within the proper time, the supposed ground of excuse is inapplicable. He also cited

Digitized by Google

Bateman v. Joseph, 2 Camp. 463;
Williams v. Smith, 2 B. & Ald. 500.

KELLY, C. B.—The general rule as to notice of dishonour is quite clear, but ignorance of the address of the drawer or person to be made liable takes the case out of that rule, and the question is, whether a reasonable time is not to be allowed for giving notice after the address is found out. It seems to me that unless a man is bound omissis omnibus aliis negotiis, to use the words of Lord Ellenborough, to devote himself altogether to giving notice of dishonour, and to rush off and write a letter the instant he has ascertained the address of the drawer, this notice was given in time.

MARTIN, B.—I think the verdict was right, and I should be inclined to hold that a man is entitled to a day for the purpose of giving notice from the time when he is in a condition to give it. Here the plaintiff was not in a condition to give notice until between 5 and 6 o'clock on Saturday, and he posted a letter the same evening. That seems to me a sufficient notice of dishonour.

CHANNELL and PIGOTT, BB., concurred.

Rule refused.

Attorney for defendant, Harris, Moorgate-street.

Monday, Jan. 17.

WALLIS v. THE SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Goods carried—Lien on—Tolls—8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 97.

The Railways Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 97, provides that if any person fail to pay the tolls due in respect of any carriage or goods it shall be lawful for the company to detain and sell such carriage, or all or any part of such goods, or if the same shall not have been removed from the premises of the company to detain and sell any other carriages or goods within such premises belonging to the party liable to pay such tolls, and out of the moneys arising from such rates to retain the said tolls payable as aforesaid, and all charges and expenses of such detention and sale:

Held, that this section did not refer to charges made by a railway company as carriers of goods, but only to tolls levied for the use of their line.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff delivered to defendants, as being carriers of goods by railway and steam packet, to wit, from London to Jersey, certain goods of the plaintiff to be by them carried, to wit, from London to Jersey aforesaid, and there delivered for the plaintiff within a reasonable time in that behalf, for reward to the defendants, and the defendants as such carriers received and had the said goods for the purpose and on the terms aforesaid, and a reasonable time for carrying and delivering the same elapsed. Yet the defendants did not within a reasonable time, or at any time afterwards, deliver the said goods for the plaintiff, whereby, &c.

Second count alleging a conversion of the plaintiff's goods.

Fifth plea: That the goods in the first count mentioned were the same as the goods in the last count mentioned, and the same were, after the passing of a certain Act of Parliament entitled the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, carried and conveyed by the defendants for the plaintiff from London to Jersey within a reasonable time in that behalf, and before and at the time of their arrival at Jersey aforesaid, the plaintiff had failed on demand to pay certain tolls due from him to the defendants in respect of the carriage by them of certain other goods of the plaintiff before then, and after the passing of the said Act, carried and conveyed by the defendants for the plaintiff, and which said other goods had before then been removed from the premises of the defendants, and which said tolls were then and still are due, and owing from the plaintiff to the defendants; and the said goods in the declaration mentioned were within a reasonable time after their arrival at Jersey as aforesaid tendered by the defendants to the plaintiff on payment by him to them of their reasonable charges for the conveyance of the same, and also of the said tolls so then due to them in respect of the said other goods as aforesaid, but the plaintiff refused, and still does refuse, to pay to the defendants their said charges and the said tolls, wherefore the defendants detained, and still do detain the said goods in the said declaration mentioned for a lien and security for the said charges and tolls, and which said detention is the non-delivery complained of in the said first count and the conversion alleged in the last count of the declaration.

Demurrer and joinder.

By the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20 (the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act), s. 97, it is enacted as follows:

If on demand any person fail to pay the tolls due in respect of any carriage or goods, it shall be lawful for the company to detain and sell such carriages or any part of such goods, or if the same shall have been removed from the premises of the company to detain and sell any other carriages or goods within such premises belonging to the party liable to pay such tolls, and all charges and expenses of such detention and sale, rendering, if any, the overplus of any of the moneys arising by such sale, and such of the carriages and goods, if any, that remain unsold to the party entitled thereto.

The 3rd section of the same Act (the interpretation clause) provides that—

The word toll shall include any rate or other charge or payment payable under the special Act for any passenger, animal, carriage, goods, merchandise, articles, matters or things, conveyed on the railway.

Thrupp in support of the demurrer.—The English statute is of no force in Jersey, and cannot be pleaded to a failure to deliver or conversion there. [MARTIN, B.—Does the toll referred to in the section relied on mean a charge made by the company as common carriers? It was often made a subject of complaint that the railway companies had altogether altered the mode of carrying on their business originally contemplated by the Legislature, namely, that they should charge a toll for the use of their line, and had become themselves common carriers. The tolls referred to meant a charge for the mere use of the line.]

Wood in support of the plea.—The meaning given to the word "toll" by the interpretation clause is wide enough to cover the charges for the carriage of goods in the ordinary way. The goods were delivered for carriage in England, and part of the transit was to be performed in England. The moment the goods are delivered, the right given by the statute accrues, and it can make no difference that, in addition to the carriage in England they are taken to a place beyond the limits of the country. Even if the argument on the other side be correct, and the statute has no force as a positive enactment in Jersey, the goods having been delivered, and the contract made, in England, it must be taken that the parties meant to do business on the ordinary terms on which the company do business in this country, and so if the plea is not good by force of the statute, qua statute, still it is good by way of contract as setting forth the terms to which the parties consented. He cited Grafton v. The Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, 30 L. J. 273, Q. B.

Digitized by Google

Kelly, C. B.—The defendants claim a lien on certain goods conveyed to Jersey, not merely for the price of the conveyance of these goods, but for the price of the conveyance of other goods conveyed on previous occasions. This claim is based on the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 97. Now it seems to me quite clear that that section applies not to the price of the carriage of goods from one part of the kingdom to another, still less to the carriage of goods partly within and partly without the kingdom, but only to the case of goods conveyed by the carriages of the owner on the railway, where all that is given is the use of the railway. It is perfectly clear, if we look to the 95th and 96th sections, which immediately precede the section in question.

Martin, B.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that the tolls mentioned in the 97th section do not mean charges made by the railway as carriers, but charges made by them for the use of their line, the owners taking the risk and providing the carriage, as people do, I believe, with respect to coal and many other articles.

Channell, and Pigott, BB., concurred.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Attorneys, Flowers; Crombie.

Jan. 14 and 18.

MacManus v. Bark.

Promissory note—Subsequent agreement for payment of amount by instalments—Absence of consideration—Nudum pactum.

To an action against the maker by the payee of a promissory note, payable upon demand, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. from a certain date, the defendant set up a subsequent agreement, made between himself and the payee for the payment of the amount by quarterly instalments, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. upon the amount from time to time remaining due upon the note:

Held that this agreement was no bar to the action, there being no consideration for it.

Declaration by the plaintiff, as administratrix, upon a promissory note, by which the defendant promised to pay to John MacManus, the intestate, or his order on demand, the sum of 520*l.*, with interest at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum from 24th July 1867.

Plea (inter alia) of a recission of the contract contained in the note while the said John MacManus was the holder thereof, and the substitution of an agreement to pay the amount thereof by quarterly instalments of 25*l.* with interest on the amounts remaining due at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum.

The case was tried before Willes, J., at the last Liverpool assizes, when the following agreement was put in:

Agreement between Mr. John MacManus and Mr. John Bark, both of Book-lane, Liverpool. The said John Bark owing the said John MacManus the sum of 520*l.*, for which the said John MacManus has already a promissory note, it has been mutually agreed this day that the principal shall be repaid at 25*l.* each quarter, with interest after the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, the first quarter due the 24th July 1868. John MacManus.

The learned judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit or verdict for the defendant.

Aspinall, Q. C. (with him R. G. Williams) moved accordingly.—The agreement was a bar to the action upon the note. There is sufficient consideration to support it, inasmuch as it varied the mode of payment, and this, amounting to a consideration in law, the court cannot inquire into the adequacy of it. It is quite clear, however, that there is a substantial consideration, because by this agreement the defendant deprived himself of his right to come at any moment and tender the whole amount remaining due on the note, with interest, and so discharge himself. The payee had thereby the advantage of a profitable investment of his money. He cited

Foster v. Dawber, 6 Ex. 839;
Bowerbank v. Monteiro, 4 Taunt. 844;
Cook v. Lister, 13 C. B., N. S., 543.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 18.—Kelly, C. B. delivered the judgment of the court (himself, Martin, Channell, and Pigott, BB.)—In this case the question is whether the agreement entered into is a bar to an action on the note. We are of opinion that it is not, on the ground that there was no consideration for it. It was suggested by the counsel who moved the rule that there was a sufficient consideration to support the agreement in two ways. First that there was an alteration in the mode of payment of the interest, and that a payment of a quarterly instalment was secured. But this did not amount to a consideration, for the whole note was payable with interest on demand, and the whole amount might at any moment have been demanded with the interest. Secondly, it was said that the agreement provided the plaintiff with a safe investment for his money during the time which it gave for payment. That depends entirely on the question whether the agreement deprived the defendant of the right to come at any time and tender the whole amount remaining due upon the note. We see nothing in the agreement to deprive the defendant of this right, or, on the other hand, to deprive the plaintiff of the right to sue at any time for the whole amount of the note. There, will, therefore, be no rule.

Rule refused.

Attorneys for defendant, Cunliffe and Beaumont, for Woodhouse and Pemberton, Liverpool.

Jan. 11 and 12.

Heugh and another v. The London and North Western Railway Company.

Railway company—Carriers—Delivery of goods to persons not entitled to them.—Conversion—Negligence—Involuntary bailee.

The consignors of certain goods by railway sued the railway company for misdelivery and conversion of the goods under the following circumstances. An order for the goods was sent to the town where the plaintiffs carried on their business, purporting to be from a company with whom the plaintiffs had been in the habit of doing business. This order was signed and sent by one N., who had been in this company's service, but had ceased to be so, and was sent without any authority. The plaintiffs, in compliance with the order, consigned the goods in question by the defendants' railway to the company. The goods were duly carried by the railway, and on arrival were sent to the address given as that of the company, the consignees. The place was found to be shut up, and the woman in charge of the premises refused to receive the goods. They were thereupon taken back to the defendants' station, and an advice note sent to the consignees' address stating that the goods remained at their risk, and would be delivered to the person producing the advice note. N. having somehow obtained possession of the advice note, produced it subsequently at the station, together with a delivery order signed by himself for the company, and obtained delivery of the goods, which he made away with. The judge upon these facts, directed the jury, that if the defendants had not been guilty of negligence in so delivering the goods, but had used reasonable care, their verdict should be for the defendants:

Digitized by Google

Held, a right direction.

Declaration contained two counts; the first alleged a delivery of certain bales of cotton by the plaintiffs to the defendants as carriers, and a failure to deliver them according to the contract, the second was for conversion of the same goods. Pleas traversing the allegations of the first count, and to the second not guilty and not possessed. Issues thereon. The trial took place before Kelly, C.B. at the sittings in London after Michaelmas Term, when the facts appeared to be as follows.

The plaintiffs were Manchester warehousemen. They had on various occasions had dealings with a company called the Southwark Indiarubber Company. A man named Nurse, who had been in the employment of this company as a traveller, but whose engagement had been terminated, wrote to the plaintiffs at Manchester an order purporting to be on behalf of the company for two bales of cotton duck. It was admitted that Nurse was not authorised to give this order, and, in fact, when it was given the company had ceased to carry on business.

In compliance with the order the plaintiffs sent by the defendants' railway the two bales in question, addressed to the Southwark Indiarubber Company, 87, Grange-road, Bermondsey. The goods were duly carried from Manchester to London, and on arriving at London were sent by the defendants to the above address. It was then found that there was a board put up on the premises announcing that the lease was for sale, and the only person there was a woman, who stated that she was not authorised to take any goods in, and refused to do so. The company had, in fact, then ceased to carry on business. The bales were then taken back to the defendants' station. The defendants, thereupon following their usual practice in such cases, sent an advice note directed to the Southwark Indiarubber Company, the consignees, at the address to which the goods had been consigned, stating that the goods had been consigned to them, and remained at the defendants' station at their risk and expense, and would be delivered up to them on production of the note. Nurse by some means or another got hold of this note, and on his producing it at the defendants' station, together with a delivery order signed by himself for the company, the bales were delivered up to him. The result was that they were never heard of afterwards, and the plaintiffs, on applying for payment to the Indiarubber Company, were told that they had never received them.

The learned judge left to the jury the question whether the defendants had been guilty of negligence in so delivering the goods to Nurse, and they found they had not. Upon that the verdict was entered for the defendants, leave being reserved to the plaintiffs to move to enter it for themselves for 122*l.*, the damages conditionally assessed, if under the circumstances the plaintiffs were in law entitled to the verdict.

A rule nisi had been accordingly obtained, and also on the ground that the verdict was against evidence.

Giffard, Q.C. and McIntyre showed cause. The defendants' liability as carriers had clearly ceased, for they had performed their contract as carriers by tendering delivery at the address to which the goods were consigned. They were obliged then to take the goods back again to their station, for they could not leave them on the pavement. They thus became what may be called involuntary bailees of the goods. They were not even warehousemen, for they held them under no contract; the only contract that existed between them and the plaintiffs was at an end. Under these circumstances they were not bound absolutely to deliver to the true owner only; they were only bound to use reasonable diligence in order not to do so to the wrong person. The plaintiffs have to show that what they did amounted to a conversion of the goods. The jury have found that they used reasonable diligence, and that finding is amply warranted by the evidence. They referred to

Birkett v. Willan, 2 B. & Ald. 357;
Wyld v. Pickford, 8 M. & W. 459;
Stephenson v. Hart, 4 Bing. 476.

Prentice, Q. C. and Murray.—The responsibility continues to be that of a carrier until responsibility as a warehouseman begins. These goods never were delivered to the consignees under the contract with the defendants as carriers. It will be urged that, delivery being impossible, their responsibility as carriers ceased when an attempt to deliver was made; it is contended that that is not so. Their responsibility as carriers for non-delivery to the consignees may have ceased, but their responsibility for delivery to a person who was neither the consignee nor the consignor remained. The liability remained that of carrier if that of a warehouseman had not commenced: (Story on Bailments, 7th edit. ss. 446, 528, 543.) The original liability continues until the assumption of another relation between the parties. But further, if they had become warehousemen of these goods they were equally bound not to deliver to the wrong persons. They are not, as has been suggested, involuntary bailees. They received the goods under a certain contract, and by that contract a relation is established between the parties which must continue until, by their conduct, some other is established. Whether as carriers or warehousemen, it was a duty imposed upon the defendants to deliver only to the consignees, according to the terms of the contract, or, if that were impossible, then to the consignors:

Stephenson v. Hart, 4 Bing. 476;
Duff v. Budd. 3 B. & B. 177.

If the defendants' contention be correct, still upon the facts the verdict was unsatisfactory. Nurse was a perfect stranger to the defendants, and they ought to have communicated with the plaintiffs before giving up the goods to him. They cited

White v. Humphrey, 11 Q. B. 43;
Crouch v. Great Western Railway Comyany, 26 L. J. 418, Ex.

KELLY, C. B.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. The question is, whether the delivery of the goods to Nurse, necessarily as a matter of law, amounted to an actionable wrong, or whether it became a question of fact if the defendants, in making such delivery, had acted with reasonable care. The circumstances of the case were no doubt somewhat peculiar. The plaintiff was a manufacturer at Manchester, he consigned these goods by the defendants' railway to the Indian Rubber Company at a particular address in London. On their arrival, the defendants, in accordance with their contract, sent the goods to the address given. The person in charge of the house refused to take them in. The question is, what was the duty then imposed on the defendants. They could not deposit them on the pavement and leave them there; they were not permitted to put them in the house; they were therefore under the absolute necessity of taking them back to the station; on their arrival there the question arises what further duty was imposed on defendants. In point of fact the goods were some few days afterwards delivered to Nurse, and the question is whether that delivery was necessarily tortious, or whether it was a question for the jury, if the defendants had employed due care in making such delivery. It appears that the practice of the company in such cases is to put the goods in some safe and convenient part of their premises, and to give notice by letter, containing an advice note, that the goods remain in their hands at the risk and expense of the consignees, and will only be delivered to the persons producing the advice note. This advice note is sent by post, addressed to the consignees, the India Rubber Company, and within a day or two, is brought to their premises, and produced by Nurse, who had been engaged in the service of the Indian Rubber Company, but had been discharged. On its being so produced, and on demand of the goods, they are delivered to him. It is contended for the plaintiffs that in thus delivering the goods the defendants were guilty of what amounted in law to a conversion. No authority has been cited for that proposition. It is true that misdelivery by a carrier generally has the effect contended for, but here the character of carrier had ceased. The defendants had performed all their duties as carriers when they had offered the delivery of the goods. Their position then may most properly be described as that of involuntary bailees. The question is whether, under these circumstances, they were absolutely bound to deliver to the right owners. The only authorities are the cases of Stephenson v. Hart, and Duff v. Budd. They do not support the proposition contended for. In neither case was it held that the misdelivery amounted to a conversion, but it was held by the court, and treated at the bar as a question for the jury whether, under the circumstances, the defendants had conducted themselves with due and reasonable care. That question was here left to the jury. I think that the result is consistent with the justice of the case: it was the act of the plaintiffs that created the difficulty. They originally gave credit to Nurse, and so gave the directions which led to the goods being returned upon the defendant's hands. The defendants after that pursued their usual course. They sent the advice note addressed to the address given them as that of the consignees, and on production they delivered the goods. The cases on the subject, and the doctrines laid down by Story, all agree that a delivery under such circumstances, does not necessarily, as a matter of law, amount to a conversion, but it is a question of fact for the jury whether the defendants acted with reasonable care.

Digitized by Google

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think the right question was here left to the jury. The circumstances were these: A fraudulent person ordered goods in the name of a company who had given him no authority to do so. The plaintiffs at Manchester believed it to be a genuine order. If it had been a genuine order no contract would have arisen between the carriers and the plaintiffs; but between the carriers and the consignees. But here, as there was no real consignee, the property remained in the plaintiffs, and the defendants were bound to obey their orders. They did do so. The goods were brought to London, and sent to the address given. The defendants, therefore, had delivered the goods, or at least offered delivery, which was all that they could do. There was no one to receive it, and consequently they were obliged to take them back. Their position, therefore, may best be described as that of involuntary bailees. They wished to deliver, but the necessity of retaining the goods was forced upon them as a consequence of the plaintiffs' directions. The plaintiffs were not to blame, but still the result occurred through their act. The carrier who contracts to carry goods undertakes a most onerous duty, because he is held to be an insurer of such goods, but when he has done all he undertook to do with relation to such carriage, his responsibility as a carrier is at an end. Here the defendants had done all they undertook as carriers, but they remained in the possession of the goods which was thus forced upon them, and they were bound to use reasonable care not to deliver them to the wrong person. They send an advice-note to the very address given by the plaintiffs as that of the consignees. The goods are demanded by a person producing this very letter. I think that my Lord's direction was perfectly good, and the finding of the jury was in accordance with the facts.

CHANNELL, B.—The arguments for the plaintiff with respect to misdirection must go the length of saying that the delivery to Nurse amounted to a conversion. The authorities fail to satisfy me that any such duty was thrown upon defendants as to make such delivery a conversion. The cases in which the carriers had assumed the position of warehousemen are not in point. Here the possession of the goods was thrown involuntarily on the defendants, and the true question seems to me to be whether they acted with reasonable care.

Rule discharged.

Attorneys: Murray and Hutchins; Blenkinsop.

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Reported by JOHN THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, Jan. 22.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J., BYLES and KEATING, JJ., PIGOTT and CLEASBY, BB.)

REG. v. HAPGOOD and WYATT.

Rape—Attempt to commit—Aiding and abetting.

H. was indicted for rape and W. for aiding and abetting, both were acquitted of felony, but H. was found guilty of attempting to commit the rape, and W. of aiding H. in the attempt:

Held, that W. was properly convicted.

Case reserved by Pigott B., for the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved.

The prisoners were tried before me at the last Winter Assize at Taunton, upon an indictment which charged the prisoner Hapgood with rape, and the prisoner Wyatt with aiding and abetting in the above rape.

The jury acquitted both prisoners of the felonies charged, but found them both guilty of misdemeanor, Hapgood of attempting to commit the rape, and Aaron Wyatt of aiding Hapgood in the attempt.

The prisoner Wyatt's counsel submitted that this finding amounted to acquittal of Wyatt altogether,

Digitized by Google

inasmuch as the case was not within the stat. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9.(a)

I overruled the objection and passed sentence upon him; but, at the request of the defendant Wyatt's counsel, I reserved the point for this Court.

The question is whether Wyatt was properly convicted of misdemeanor.

If the Court think he was not, then the verdict and judgment against him are to be vacated, and a verdict of not guilty is to be entered.

G. Pigott.

No counsel appeared on either side.

Cockburn, C.J.—The Court is of opinion that the conviction was right.

Conviction affirmed.

(Before Cockburn, C.J., Bovill, C.J., Kelly, C. B., Martin, B., Willes, J., Channell, B., Byles, Keating, and Blackburn, JJ., Pigott, B., Mellor, Lush, Hannen, and Brett, JJ., and Cleasby, B.)

Reg. v. Martha Falkingham and Mary Falkingham.

Abandonment or exposure of child—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 27.

The mother (one of the prisoners) told the putative father before the birth of an illegitimate child that she would father it on him, and he would have to pay for it. He said, "I will not pay for it, but if you send it to me I will keep it." About five weeks after its birth the prisoners put the child into a hamper carefully wrapped up, and left it at a railway station, and paid the fare. The hamper was addressed, and the words "with care, to be delivered immediately," added. The transit and delivery occupied about an hour. When opened the child was alive. It was taken to the workhouse and lived for three weeks afterwards, when it died from causes not attributable to the conduct of the prisoners:

Held, by a majority of the judges, that this was a case of abandonment and exposure of a child within the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 27.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court.

The prisoners were indicted at the Michaelmas Quarter Sessions of the North Riding of Yorkshire for a misdemeanor under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 27.

The following is a copy of the indictment:

The jurors for our lady the Queen upon their oath present that Martha Falkingham on the 25th Aug. 1869, unlawfully and wilfully did abandon and expose a certain child then being under the age of two years, whereby the life of the said child was endangered.

The prisoner, Mary Falkingham, was the mother of the child, which was about five weeks old at the time mentioned in the indictment, at which time both prisoners were residing together at Stockton-on-Tees.

It was proved that the prisoner Mary Falkingham about four months previous to the birth of the child, had an interview with the father of the child, who was then residing at Guisborough in this Riding, at which interview they had a conversation relative to the maintenance of the child after it should be born. She told him that she should father the child on him, and that he would have to pay for it, to which the man replied, "I will not pay for it, but if you send it to me I will keep it." Nothing was said by either of them as to the time at which or the mode by which the child was to be sent.

On the day named in the indictment, both prisoners put the child into a hamper wrapped up in a woollen shawl, and packed with shavings and cotton wool, and the prisoner Mary Falkingham, with the knowledge and connivance of the other prisoner, took the hamper by a passenger vessel on the river Tees, from Stockton, where they resided, to Middlesbrough (a distance of about four or five miles), at which latter place she took the hamper to the booking office of the railway station, and there left it, paying sixpence for the carriage thereof, and telling the clerk to be very careful of it, and to send it to Guisborough by the next train, which would leave Middlesbrough in ten minutes from that time. She did not say anything as to the contents of the hamper. The hamper was addressed "Mr. Carr's, Northoutgate, Guisborough, with care to be delivered immediately," at which address the father of the child was then lodging.

The hamper was carried by the ordinary passenger train from Middlesbrough to Guisborough, leaving the former place at 7.45 p.m., and arriving at Guisborough at 8.15 p.m. At 8.40 p.m., it was delivered by a railway porter at its address. On its being opened, it was found to contain the child alive, and packed in manner before mentioned, with a paper on which was written, "Please take care of this child, for George Beaumont is the father of it."

The child was taken by the relieving officer the same evening to the union workhouse, where it lived for three weeks afterwards, at the expiration of which period it died from causes not attributable to the conduct of the prisoners or either of them. It was proved to have been a delicate child.

The prisoner's counsel objected that, upon these facts there was no evidence to go to the jury that the life of the child was endangered, and, secondly, that there was no abandonment, and no exposure of the child within the meaning of the statute.

The court overruled the objections, and left the case to the jury, who found both prisoners guilty.

At the request of the prisoner's counsel this case was granted by the court for the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal whether the prisoners were rightly convicted.

Both prisoners were admitted to bail to appear at the next Court of Quarter Sessions for the North Riding of Yorkshire, to receive judgment if called upon. John R. W. Hildyard, Chairman.

No counsel appeared for the prisoners.

Shepherd was instructed to argue on behalf of the prosecution, but was not called upon.

The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 27 enacts that whosoever shall unlawfully abandon or expose any child, being under the age of two years, whereby the life of such child shall be endangered, or the health of such child shall have been or shall be likely to be permanently injured, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.

Cockburn, C. J.—This was an indictment and conviction of the prisoners for abandoning and exposing an infant child, and having been informed that the case was not to be argued on the part of the prisoners, the Judges have considered the point before coming into Court, and as the majority of the Judges are of opinion that the conviction should be affirmed, it will be unnecessary to hear the learned counsel in support of it. At the same time all the Judges are of opinion, looking to the peculiar cir-

(a) That statute enables a jury to find a person guilty of an attempt to commit the offence, on an indictment for felony or misdemeanor, if it appears that the person charged did not complete the offence, but was guilty only of an attempt to commit the same.

Digitized by Google

cumstances of the case, and to the fact that this is the first case of the kind that has arisen under the statute, and to the possibility that the prisoners were not aware that they were committing an offence, that a lenient sentence would meet the exigencies of the case.

Conviction affirmed.

COURT OF PROBATE.

Reported by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Dec. 21.

(Before Lord PENZANCE.)

In the Goods of FRASER.

Will—Memorandum of revocation—Incorporation refused.

A testator shortly before his death executed on his will a memorandum of revocation in these words, "This will was cancelled this day," &c.

The court refused to include it in the grant of administration.

T. Fraser (late of 21, Bolton-street, in the county of Middlesex), died, leaving a will duly executed on 24th July 1866. On the 19th Oct. 1869, being resident at Florence for the benefit of his health, he executed the following memorandum on the will:

This will was cancelled this day in the presence of Dr. Robert Fraser, Esq., physician, and Margaret Rielly, nurse.
THOS. FRASER.

We have witnessed the signature of Thomas Fraser, both being present, and have signed it as witnesses.—ROBT. FRASER, M.D.; MARGARET RIELLY, nurse, her + mark.

Tristram now moved that the memorandum be included in the grant of administration to the widow, and cited

In the goods of Hicks, L. Rep. 1 Prob. 683;
In the goods of Hubbard, 35 L. J. 27, P. & M.; L. Rep. 1 P. & M. 53.

Lord PENZANCE.—I think this case goes further than the previous cases. I had serious doubts in In the Goods of Hicks, where there were words declaring an intestacy, but ultimately I was induced to grant probate. In this case, what the court has got before it is nothing but a paper stating that the deceased revoked a former will. The 28th section of the Wills Act says "no will or codicil, or any part thereof, shall be revoked otherwise than as aforesaid, or by another will or codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, or by some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same, and executed in the manner in which a will is hereinbefore required to be executed, or by the burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying the same by the testator, or by some person in his presence and by his direction, with the intention of revoking the same." The statute draws a distinction between "wills and codicils" and "some writing." I am clearly of opinion that this is some writing declaring an intention to revoke a previous will, and, being only a writing of that character it cannot be called a will. It disposes of nothing, it throws no light on the testamentary intentions of the deceased, it does not declare an intestacy. It simply revokes one particular paper. The application, therefore, must be refused.

Solicitors, Fielder and Sumner.

In the Goods of PORTER.

Contingent will—Probate refused.

A contingent will is where a testator refers to a period of time or some possible calamity which may happen within that time, not as a reason for making his will, but in language which makes the disposition of property depend upon that event.

A testator being obliged to leave England suddenly executed a testamentary paper in which he said, "should anything unfortunately happen to me while abroad, I wish everything I may be in possession of at that time, or anything I may be possessed of hereafter, to be equally divided," &c.

The court held that the words "at that time" limited the disposing powers of the will to the contingency of his dying abroad, and refused probate.

Colonel Porter died March 1869, leaving a testamentary paper duly executed and bearing date April 1862. It commenced in these terms:—

Being obliged to leave England to join my regiment in China, and not having time to make a will, I leave this paper, containing my wishes and desires. Should anything unfortunately happen to me while I am abroad, I wish every thing that I may be in possession of at that time, or anything appertaining to me hereafter, whether in lands, goods, chattels, or money to be equally divided between my two children, F. C. A. Porter and Ellen C. Porter, share and share alike.

And it concluded by appointing Mrs. Mary Perch, their grandmother, and Mr. Wm. Perch, their uncle, to be the joint trustees and guardians of his children. Col. Porter returned to England in 1863, and died in 1869, having made no other will.

C. A. Middleton, now moved for a grant of probate to Mrs. Perch and Mr. Wm. Perch, as the testamentary guardians of the children of the deceased. The question was, whether this was a contingent will or not. He submitted that it was not contingent, and relied on the words, "appertaining to me hereafter." The words "at that time" referred to anything in the possession at the time of his being abroad, but the words "appertaining to me hereafter," implied a period of time more extensive, and referred to a period subsequent to the time of his being abroad. The words, "being obliged to leave England," &c., were mere introductory averments only intended to assign a reason why the testator did not make a more formal will. He cited

In the Goods of Martin, L. Rep. 1 P. & M. 330; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 32.
In the Goods of Dobson, L. Rep. 1 P. & M. 88; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 758.

Lord PENZANCE.—I am obliged reluctantly to refuse this application. It appears to me that the court is bound to hold that this will is contingent. In looking at the cases which bear upon the point, this appears to me to be the distinction between them. By far the larger part of the cases of contingent wills are cases in which a testator refers to some possible impending calamity in connection with his will, and the question is whether the testator, in referring to the imminence of that event, intends to limit the operation of his will to the period in which that calamity can happen. If the language used be language which by the reasonable construction of the court can be considered to mean that he refers to this calamity, or to the period of time during which it may happen as a reason for making his will, then only the will is not contingent. But if a testator refers to a calamity, or the possible occurrence of an event, in language which is so mixed up with the disposition of property, that he makes the disposition of the property depend upon that event—then the court must hold the will to be contingent, because, if it did not, it must violate the language of the will. The only question is in which category does this instrument fall. Passing in review the previous cases, the first are, In the Goods of Winn, 2 S. & T. 157, and Roberts v. Roberts, 2 S. & T. 357. In both of these the will was held to be contingent, and in both the disposition of property was only to take effect in the event of something happening which did not happen. The strongest case is one cited in the last edition of Williams on Executors, In the Goods of Thorne, 34 L. J. 131, P. & M. In that case the testator directed his property to be disposed in a certain way "in the event of my death while serving in this horrid climate, or in the event of any accident happening to me." That will was held to be contingent, the facts being that though the man did not die abroad, he was invalided and reached England only just in time to die. There are two other cases in which the court held a will not to be contingent, but in both of them the language used in the will may be referred to the intention of the testator merely to give a reason for making his will. In the case, In the Goods of Martin, L. Rep. 1 P. & M. 380, the event of the testator's death is given as a reason for not making the will. The question is whether that is the case in the paper before me. The first sentence alone would have placed it in that category—"Being obliged to leave England to join my regiment in China, and not having time to make a will, I leave this paper containing my wishes and desires. Should anything unfortunately happen to me while I am abroad——" If it had stopped there the court might have said those words are merely intended to give the testator's reason for making a will. The words which create the difficulty are these—"I wish everything that I may be in possession of at that time." Now what time? Clearly the time when, should something unfortunate happen to him, he wishes his property to be disposed of in such and such a way. It is plain that the disposition was to take effect, at the time mentioned, namely, the time of his decease abroad. It is said that the subsequent words, "and anything appertaining to me hereafter," enlarge the scope of the will. I do not think so. It is plain that what he means is this—I wish everything I have in my possession at the time of my death abroad to be disposed of in a certain way, and also anything which may come to me after my death. The words "at that time" in my opinion, tie up the disposing part of the will to a period of time when a certain event was to happen, namely—"his death abroad." The court, therefore, holds the will to be contingent.

Digitized by Google

Solicitor, A. G. Blake.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by HENRY F. PURCELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 13 and 23.

THE NORTHUMBRIA.

Damage — Limitation of liability — Computation of Interest.

In all cases where the liability of the owner is limited, this court will give interest on the limited amount from the time of the collision.

This was a suit for the limitation of liability. Plaintiffs were the owners of the ship Northumbria, which, on the 20th Aug. last, had come into collision with the barque Hesperia, and she, with her cargo, was lost.

The Northumbria pleaded that the collision occurred without the actual fault or privity of the owners; that the Hesperia had instituted a suit against her for the recovery of a sum of 12,000*l.*; that one of the owners of the cargo had also brought an action against her, and that she had reason to believe other suits would be brought by other owners; therefore she prayed limitation of her liability, under the statutes, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 504; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 54; and 24 Vict. c. 10. s. 13. The Hesperia did not now contest the right to the limitation of liability, but claimed interest on the amount as limited, and her costs, which latter claim the Northumbria did not oppose; and the questions before the court were admitted to be these: Whether any interest was payable on the limited amount, and, if so, from what period the interest was to be reckoned.

Butt, Q. C., and Steavenson, for plaintiffs.—No interest is payable in collision cases till after the damages have been assessed. In cases of tort, no court, except under the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, can award damages, which, however, does not apply to collisions at sea. Interest here, if payable at all, can only be recovered as damages, and by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, the amount of the liability for damages is fixed at a definite amount:

Mayne on Damages, p. 69;
Chitty on Pleading, 412, 7th edit.;
Sedgwick on Damages, pp. 263, 434, 446;
Higgins v. Sargent, 2 B. & C. 348.

The Dundee, 2 Hagg. Adm. 137, does not apply; it was founded on the 53 Geo. 3, c. 159. Even if interest is paid for the ship, there can be none for the freight, which is interest on the shipowner's capital, namely, the ship; and interest upon interest cannot be paid: (Attwood v. Taylor, 1 Mac. & G. 279.) But suppose interest can be given, such interest is not payable from the date of the collision, but from the time when the vessel would, under ordinary conditions, have arrived at her port of destination:

The Amalia, 5 N. R. 164 (note), 34 L. J. 21, Ad.; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805;
Straker v. Hartland, 34 L. J. 122, Ch.; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 622;
Nixon v. Roberts, 30 L. J. 844, Ch.; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 679.

Clarkson for the Hesperia—This is a question of lien, the plaintiffs have a lien in a damage suit, which comes into operation at the moment of the collision. It has been the practice of this court, since the time of Lord Stowell, to allow interest from the date of the collision, when it is demanded:

The Bold Buccleugh, 7 Moo. P. C. C. 267;
General Iron Screw Collier Company v. Schurmanns, 29 L. J. 877, Ch.; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 138;
Harman v. Bell, 7 Moo. P. C. 267;
African Steam Company v. Swansy, 2 Kay & J. 660; 25 L. J. 870, Ch.

The Acts limiting liability do not withhold interest, though they do not expressly give it, and the law as laid down in the Dundee (sup.) was well known at the time of the passing of the last Act, wherein if it had been the intention of the Legislature to withhold the right to interest there would have been some special enactment. The question remains from what time is this interest to be computed? No doubt from the date of the collision. The rule referred to in Straker v. Hartland (sup.), that the interest is only payable from the time the ship would reach her port of destination, does not apply in cases of limitation of liability; but only in cases where the owners of the injured vessel receive compensation in full for their lost freight. Interest is given in Chancery from the date of the collision:

Bustin v. Glasebrook, 1869, Stuart, V.C. (not reported).

Gainsford Bruce for owners of cargo.—This court will not be governed by the rules of the common law courts in reference to interest, which are extremely technical. The court, by virtue of its equitable jurisdiction, has full power to give interest: (Tyne Improvement Commissioners v. General Steam Navigation Company, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 452.) The principle of the civil law is that interest is due upo the simple ground that one person delays the payment of money due to another: (Lindley, Study of Jurisprudence, app. 97.) In America, even, the common law courts have acted on this principle to some extent: (Hilliard, on Torts, vol. 2, p. 134, n. 3.)

Digitized by Google

Nov. 23.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It is not disputed that the practice of this court has been invariable as to allowing interest, but it is contended that this practice is erroneous, at variance with the common law, both before and since the passing of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, and, moreover, opposed to the enactments of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63 (The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act). I was referred to the case of Higgins v. Sargent, 2 B. & C. p. 348, and to Chitty on Pleading, p. 412, 7th edit. to show that no interest was allowed at common law in cases of contract, with certain exceptions, or in cases of tort; and that it was not till 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42 (An Act for the further Amendment of the Law and the better Advancement of Justice) was passed, that in certain actions the jury could give damages in the nature of interest (sect. 29), and that in these instances the wrong-doer had not destroyed, but taken possession of the goods; and therefore the Legislature allowed interest to be recovered. If it were necessary to examine this proposition, I should find it difficult to reconcile with the recent case of the British Columbia Saw Mill Company v. Nettleship, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 409; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 604. But it appears to me quite a sufficient answer to these authorities to say that the Admiralty Court, in the exercise of an equitable jurisdiction, has proceeded upon another and a different principle from that on which the common law authorities appear to be founded. The principle adopted by the Admiralty Court has been that of the civil law, that interest was always due to the obligee, when payment was not made, ex morâ of the obligor; and that, whether the obligation arose ex contractu or ex delicto. The American common law has been more liberal than the English. Mr. Sedgwick, in his work on Damages, 4th edit., p. 443, remarks: "There is a considerable conflict and contradiction between the English and American cases on this subject. But, as a general thing, it may be said that while the tribunals of the former country restrict themselves generally to those cases where an agreement to pay interest can be proved or inferred, the courts of the United States, on the other hand, have shown themselves more liberally disposed, making the allowance of interest more nearly to depend on the equity of the case, and not requiring either an express or implied promise to sustain the claim."

I have now to consider whether the practice of the court has been affected on this point by the limitation of liability Acts. In the case of the Dundee (reported 2 Hagg. 137), Lord Stowell decided that the statute 53 Geo. 3. c. 159, s. 1., limiting the liability of owners to the value of the ship, appurtenances, and freight, applies only to the original claim for damage, and does not extend to costs and interest. The words of the statute on which Lord Stowell gave his decision, were, substantially, and for the purposes of this case, the same as those of the stat. 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, invoked on this occasion; unless these words in the 54th section "shall not be answerable in damages" (which are identical with those of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 504), constitute a difference. The contention is, that interest is part of the damages, and that therefore the court is precluded by the statute from giving it, in addition to the statutory limitation of 8*l.* per ton. The answer to this contention appears to me conclusive; first, if it were necessary, I should be inclined to dispute the axiom; but in truth the application of it is at variance both with the decided cases in the Court of Chancery, as well as in the Court of Admiralty, and with the principle on which they are founded; that principle being that the lien attaches from the moment when the injury has been inflicted: (The Bold Buccleugh, 7 Moo. 267.) The cases are, in the Court of Chancery, The African Steamship Company v. Swanzey and Kennedy, 25 L. J. N.S. 870, decided in 1856; The General Iron Screw Collier Company v. Schurmann (sup.), decided in 1860; Nixon v. Roberts (sup.), decided in 1861. All these cases were decided upon the provisions of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 504, and I think it was well remarked by Mr. Clarkson that the Legislature, when it passed the subsequent and last Merchant Shipping Act, must be taken to have been aware of these decisions, and in this last Merchant Shipping Act the words of the former Act, "shall not be answerable for damages," are repeated, without any provision that they shall be deemed to include interest. The cases under this last Act are Straker v. Hartland, in the Court of Chancery (sup.), decided in 1864, and the Amalia, the best report of which appears to be contained in a note at p. 164 of 5 New Rep. In all these cases in the Court of Chancery it is to be observed that they have avowedly followed the practice of the Court of Admiralty. I arrive, therefore, without hesitation, at the conclusion that, notwithstanding the statutes of limitation some interest is payable on the limited amount. I entirely agree with the observations of Wood, V.C., in Straker v. Hartland, "It was quite clear that justice required that a debt which was due, but the payment of which was delayed, should carry interest." The important question remains to be considered as to which perhaps there may be more doubt namely, the period from which the interest is to be reckoned. In order to arrive at a clear understanding on this point it is necessary to consider the practice under the old law, and the practice since the Statutes of Limitation. The practice under the old law, which decreed a restitutio in integrum by the wrongdoer to the sufferer was as follows:—In the case of a vessel sunk with a cargo on board the restitutio in integrum was effected by a calculation of the probable value of the ship at the end of her voyage, and of the freight she would have earned, making at the same time certain deductions as to the expenses which the owner must have incurred in order to complete the voyage, such as the wages of the crew, &c., and also making a deduction for discount, if the value found were paid before the probable end of the voyage. In the event of the vessel sunk having no cargo, then interest upon the value of the ship from the day of the collision was given; the reason being, that in the former case by giving freight, you had really given the interest on the use of the vessel during the interval between the collision and her arrival in port; whereas, in the case of there being no cargo, there was no freight to represent the interest, and it was therefore expressly given. So that in the first case to have given interest as well as freight would have been to place the sufferer in a better position than he would have been but for the collision, and in the second case to have refused him interest would be to place him in a worse position on account of the collision than he would otherwise have been; whereas the principle of restitutio in integrum is to replace the sufferer in the condition in which he was at the time when the wrong was done to him. The question is, how are these principles affected by the statutes which limit the liability of the wrongdoer? In these statutes the Legislature introduced a new principle, the object of which was to give more protection to the owner against the wrong-doing of his servant, the master of the vessel. They preserved the principle of restitutio in integrum in cases where "with his actual fault and privity," the damage had been inflicted on the sufferer; but with this exception they limited his liability for the act of his servant to a certain definite sum. In the latter case, therefore, this limited amount took the place of the restitatio in integrum; but the principle still remains that the liability for this amount attaches from the time of the collision; and there seems no reason why interest shall not accrue on the delay to pay that limited amount as well as in the case where the amount was unlimited. Indeed the equity of the thing is the other way, for to refuse this interest would be to diminish still further the natural right of the sufferer to full compensation for the injury which he had sustained. It is to be observed that the sufferer does not, when interest is awarded, obtain interest on the amount of his damage, but on the limited amount to which the statute has restricted the liability of the wrongdoer. Therefore, in the case of a vessel without cargo, it is clear that the interest would date from the time when the liability attached, that is from the moment of the collision. Nor, when the case is examined, does it appear that a different rule ought to apply when the vessel carries cargo. Under the rule of restitutio in integrum the cargo-carrying vessel did not obtain interest from the date of the collision, because she received it in the shape of freight at the port of delivery; but where the amount of the liability is limited, and the sufferer does not receive full compensation, the reason which fixed the date of interest from the port of delivery does not apply. In the case of the Amalia Dr. Lushington remarked, "Upon what grounds then was interest given? Interest was not given by reason of indemnification for the loss, for the loss was the damage which had accrued, but interest was given for this reason, viz., that the loss was not paid at the proper time. If a man is kept out of his money, it is a loss in the common sense of the word, but a loss of a totally different description, and clearly to be distinguished from a loss which has occurred by damage done at the moment of a collision:" (5 New Rep. p. 164.) This case was cited as an authority for the opposite opinion; but in truth it is not so; the judge in that case gave all that was prayed; and no decision on this point was involved in his judgment. With respect to some of the earlier cases in Chancery, it would seem, from the form of the decree, that a distinction was taken between vessels with or without cargo, but the point seems never to have been raised or formally adjudicated upon; and in the latter cases the practice of the Court of Admiralty appears to have been followed; and that practice, I learn from the registrar, has for some time been to treat the date of the collision as the period from which interest accrues, without discrimination whether the vessel has or has not carried cargo. No such discrimination was attempted to be made either in the case of the Spirit of the Ocean (Bro. & Lush. 336), or in the more recent case of the City of Buenos Ayres. I am of opinion that, in all cases where the liability of the owner is limited, interest should be given upon the limited amount from the date of the collision, and I decree in this case accordingly.

Digitized by Google

Dec. 9 and 21.

THE SAME

Limited liability—Jurisdiction when vessel not under arrest.

The court has jurisdiction in suits for limiting liability where bail has been given by her owners, though no arrest has actually taken place.

This case came again before the court on a question as to the jurisdiction of the court. The vessel not having been technically under arrest when the suit was instituted, the owners had taken out a caveat warrant, and given bail, and the formal warrant of arrest became unnecessay.

The section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, which gives the court jurisdiction, is as follows:—Section 13.

Whenever any ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof, are under arrest of the High Court of Admiralty, the said court shall have the same powers as are conferred upon the High Court of Chancery in England by the 9th part of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—In the present case the vessel has not been under arrest, because the owners, under rule 55 of this Act, took out a caveat warrant, and offered to give bail. Bail having been given, the formal warrant of arrest became unnecessary. Stripped of these technicalities, the plain meaning of this language is this:—The defendant says to the plaintiff, "Don't arrest my ship; I will consent to give that bail which would have released my ship if the warrant had been served upon her." There can be no doubt, I think, what was the intention of the Legislature in the section to which I have referred—namely, that whenever the court was seised of the res, the jurisdiction as to limitation of liability should attach. The bail is the representative of the res, and to all intents and purposes the court is as much seised of the possession as if the res itself had been under warrant of arrest and released. According to the old practice, the jurisdiction of the Queen's Bench was in certain cases only founded on the fact of the defendant being in the custody of its marshal; but this principle was holden to be satisfied by the defendant's appearance, or by his putting in bail, "for," as Mr. Smith observes, "in those cases, though not in the real, he was in the constructive, custody of the marshal:" (Action at Law, 1857, p. 7.) And surely, in the case before me, the res is in the constructive, though not in the real, custody of the marshal of the court. But even if this analogy be unsound, which it does not appear to me to be, I should still be of opinion that, looking to the whole scope and tenor of the Act, the jurisdiction of this court was intended to be founded in suits of this description, when it is in possession of the bail which represents the res, whether the res has been released in the giving of bail after the arrest, or whether the owner has been prevented, as in this instance, by such a caveat as has been issued in this case.

Decree accordingly.

Attorneys for plaintiffs, Hillyer and Fenwick.

For owners of Hesperia, Lowless and Nelson.

For owners of cargo, Waltons, Bubb, and Walton.

Jan, 11 and 18.

LADY OF THE LAKE.

Co-owners—Jurisdiction—24 Vict. c. 10, s. 8.

Where plaintiff, before the institution of the suit, had disposed of all his shares in a vessel:

Held, that this court has jurisdiction to adjust the accounts between him and defendant, one of the owners of the vessel, who had been co-owner with him previous to the sale of his shares.

This was a cause of co-ownership, and came before the court on a motion to reject the plaintiff's petition. The facts and arguments are fully set out in the judgment.

Cohen for plaintiff.

Clarkson for defendant.

Digitized by Google

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—This is a motion by the defendant to reject the plaintiff's petition. The petition states that the plaintiff was the sole owner of the Lady of the Lake; that he sold half the shares in the vessel to the defendant on the 18th July 1868; that the defendant sailed the vessel under his command on a voyage from Sunderland to Brazil; that she returned with a homeward cargo on the 9th Aug. 1869. The plaintiff prays that the 8th section of 24 Vict. c. 10 may be put in force on his behalf, and that this court will decide the questions, and settle the accounts outstanding between him and the defendant as co-owners. But the plaintiff in his petition also states that on the 31st Aug. 1869 he sold all his shares; that is, the other half of the vessel, to one William Snowball, and it is upon this averment that the defendant contends that the whole petition ought to be rejected, inasmuch as the plaintiff has no persona standi under the statute, which it is contended only confers jurisdiction upon the court in the case of persons who are co-owners at the institution of the suit. The 8th section is as follows: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all questions arising between the co-owners, or any of them, touching the ownership, possession, employment, and earnings of any ship registered at any port in England or Wales, or any share thereof, and may settle all accounts outstanding and unsettled between the parties in relation thereto, and may direct the said ship, or any share thereof, to be sold, and may make such order in the premises as to it shall seem fit." It was argued on behalf of the defendant that neither according to the letter nor according to the spirit of this enactment had the court jurisdiction in this case; not according to the letter, because the plaintiff had ceased to be a co-owner; not according to the spirit, because it was the duty of the court to adjust the accounts between the co-owners; and that if it should turn out in this case that the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant, there were no shares of the plaintiff brought into court to answer a decree in favour of the defendant, and the practice of the Court of Chancery upon questions of this kind was referred to. To this it was replied that the jurisdiction of the court was not determined by the status of the plaintiff at the time when the suit was instituted, but by his status at the time when the cause of action accrued. Thus, under the 6th section, the owner or consignee of the cargo at the time when the damage was done to it might bring this suit, though he had subsequently parted with his interest in it; and the mariner might bring his claim for his wages as master, though he had ceased to discharge the duties of, or had been discharged from, that office. In the other sections of the Act, the 4th, 5th, and 6th, the words "at the time of the institution of the cause" are inserted, which are wanting in the 8th section, and were inserted in these other sections for the protection of the defendant. In the case of The Idas (Br. & Lush, 65) my learned predecessor decided that, under the 8th section, this court might order an account to be taken between co-owners relating to matters which occurred before the date assigned for the Act to come into operation, and also relating to a ship lost before the institution of the cause; and it will be difficult to maintain, according to the argument of the defendant in this case, that there were any co-owners after the ship was lost. I am of opinion that I am not prevented by the letter of the statute from taking cognizance of this cause; nor will my exercise of jurisdiction be at variance with the spirit of the enactment, for if the defendant in his answer should claim a balance in his favour, I shall, in pursuance of the provision in the section, make the order in the premises which I think fit, and which in this case will be, that bail to the amount of the other moiety of the shares be given by the plaintiff before the accounts are referred to the registrar for his investigation and report. As this is the first time in which this question has been raised before me, I shall make no order as to the costs of this motion.

Decree accordingly.

Proctor for plaintiff, Rothery.

Proctors for defendant, Clarkson, Son, and Greenwell.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Reported by A. A DORIA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, Jan. 20.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Ex parte KENNARD AND OTHERS; Re HUMPHREYS.

Paying out distress—Right to be recouped.

A person who has paid off a distress on the bankrupt's property, and made other payments after adjudication, whereby the bankrupt's estate is benefited, and the creditors have the advantage thereof, is entitled to be repaid the same before the creditors receive any dividend out of the said estate.

This was a motion on behalf of creditors who had proved their debts under the bankruptcy, "that an order might be made nunc pro tunc, for liberty to Mr. Cutten, the auctioneer, to pay to the landlord of the house and premises of the bankrupt, situate and being No. 123, Holloway-road, in the county of Middlesex, the amount of which might be duly claimed for rent and expenses due to him from the bankrupt in respect of the said house and premises, and that the amount so paid by him (Cutten) might be repaid to him out of the first assets of the bankrupt's estate, and the costs of this application and consequent thereon might be paid out of the estate of the bankrupt." Notice of the application had been served upon the creditors' assignee under the bankruptcy and his solicitor.

The facts were shortly as follows:

The bankrupt was adjudicated upon his own petition in Nov. 1869. Prior to such adjudication, namely, on the 23rd Nov., the Birkbeck society, who were the landlords of the bankrupt, issued a distress upon his goods and stock-in-trade for arrears of rent to the amount of 230*l.* 10*s.*, together with costs of levy and possession money, amounting altogether to the sum of 242*l.* 18*s.* The messenger of the court reported the facts as above stated to the official assignee; thereupon he requested Mr. Cutten, who previously to the passing of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, was an officer of the court, to ascertain whether there was upon the bankrupt's premises sufficient property to satisfy the distress. Mr. Cutten reported to the official assignee (no creditors' assignee having then been chosen) that there was more than sufficient to pay off the distress if the goods and stock-in-trade were not sold at a forced sale. Mr. Cutten then made an offer to some of the principal creditors of the bankrupt at once to pay out the distress, and it was ultimately agreed that he should do so, and that those creditors should, in case they or their nominee should be appointed creditors' assignee, allow Mr. Cutten to sell the property by auction and recoup himself the moneys to be advanced by him. Before, however, the choice meeting could be held, the Birkbeck Society, upon application made for the purpose, declined to wait, unless secured by the guarantee of some responsible person. Mr. Cutten thereupon paid the rent and costs, and the messenger of the court took possession of the premises, goods, and stock in trade of the bankrupt. At the meeting for choice of assignees a creditor was chosen who declined to recognise the agreement between Mr. Cutten and the creditors.

Digitized by Google

A special meeting having been called to consider a proposal by the bankrupt to pay a composition to his creditors, and annul the bankruptcy, the same was held before Mr. Registrar Hazlitt, on the 14th Jan. Mr. Cutten attended at the meeting, and put in a claim for the sum of 242*l.* 18*s.*, the amount paid by him to the Birkbeck Society. This claim being opposed by several creditors, the learned registrar gave leave to the parties to refer the matter to the Chief Judge, and the motion now came on for hearing.

Bagley appeared in support of the application.

Terry (solicitor) objected on behalf of the creditors' assignee to the proposed order upon the ground that Mr. Registrar Hazlitt had only referred this matter to the Chief Judge upon the question as to the locus standi of Mr. Cutten to be heard at a meeting of creditors, the object of such meeting being the consideration of the bankrupt's proposal. He contended that if Mr. Cutten were paid the amount of his claim it would be necessary to sell the estate of the bankrupt, and thus the contemplated arrangement would be frustrated. Mr. Cutten had benefited not the estate of the bankrupt, but the property of the trustees of the Birkbeck Society.

Shapland (solicitor), who appeared on behalf of creditors, also opposed.

The CHIEF JUDGE said there could be no doubt as to the justice of Mr. Cutten's claim, and although he should decline to make an order nunc pro tunc as applied for, he would direct that an order should be drawn up reciting the facts as stated, and directing payment of the sum of 242*l.* 18*s.* to Mr. Cutten out of the estate of the bankrupt when sold, as well as the costs of this application. This would not interfere with any arrangement which might be arrived at between the bankrupt and his creditors, but any such arrangement must have been subjected to the consideration of the court which would not allow any arrangement to be carried into effect until Mr. Cutten's claim had been paid or provided for.

Ordered accordingly.

Solicitors for the application, Morris, Stone, Townson, and Morris.

Re A DEBTOR'S PETITION.

The Bankruptcy Act 1869, sect. 125—Liquidation—Issuing execution by creditor—Application by debtor to restrain.

The court will not, in the case of liquidation upon a debtor's own petition, interfere to restrain creditors from pursuing their legal remedies without proper notice being given to them.

Jones (solicitor) applied under the 260th General Order, on behalf of a debtor who had, on the 19th Jan., filed a petition under the 125th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 for an order to restrain a creditor from issuing execution against the estate of the debtor, the creditor being in a position to issue the same this day. This was a case of emergency, and it was submitted that under the 50th General Order the court would dispense with the usual formalities. [The CHIEF JUDGE.—Do you produce an office copy of the debtor's petition?] I do not.

The CHIEF JUDGE decided that although an affidavit was produced in support of the application, there was no evidence before the court of any such petition being on the file. The court would, at the request of the applicant, but at his risk as to costs, grant a rule nisi; but as the creditor was only acting upon his legal rights he must have proper notice of any hostile application.

Solicitors, Kent and Jones.

Jan. 24 and 25.

Re TIDEY.

Bankruptcy Act 1869, sect. 13—Interim injunction to restrain sale by sheriff.

The court will, after the presentation of a petition, interfere to restrain a sale of the property of the bankrupt by the sheriff, although the sheriff was in possession prior to the adjudication.

Reed applied under the 13th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, ex parte, on behalf of the bankrupt for an interim order to restrain the sheriff of Middlesex from selling the property and effects of the bankrupt. The bankrupt was adjudicated on the 21st Jan., and the meeting for the choice of a trustee fixed for the 11th Feb. next. On the 14th Jan. the sheriff of Middlesex had taken the property and effects of the bankrupt in execution under a fi. fa., for a judgment-debt of 400*l.* and costs recovered in the Court of Exchequer, and the sale was advertised to take place on the 25th Jan.

The CHIEF JUDGE granted an interim injunction till the next day, the 25th Jan., and directed that such order should be served upon the sheriff and the execution-creditor.

Jan. 25.—Reed applied for an injunction to restrain all further proceedings under the judgment. It appeared from the affidavit of the bankrupt in support of the application, that there were four actions pending against him at the suit of one creditor. Notice had been given both to the sheriff and the execution-creditor.

The CHIEF JUDGE said he would grant the injunction, but only strictly in accordance with the terms of the notice of motion. The affidavit in support ought to have contained some evidence that the estate would suffer materially from the proposed sale by the sheriff as advertised.

Ordered accordingly.

Solicitor, H. A. Reed.

Tuesday, Jan. 25.

Re DAVIES (a bankrupt).

The Bankruptcy Act 1869, s. 13—Injunction—Receiver—General Orders, power to make—Sect. 78.

The court will, on the motion of the petitioning creditor, restrain creditors from proceeding in their actions against the debtor, provided it has some guarantee that the petitioning creditor will proceed with his petition.

The General Orders are made by the Lord Chancellor under the 78th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and no question as to their validity can be entertained by the court.

Webb (solicitor) applied on behalf of the petitioning creditor to restrain proceedings under certain actions then pending against the bankrupt, in which, however, no judgment had been obtained. The application was approved of by a considerable number of creditors of the bankrupt. He produced an affidavit in support, setting forth that the bankrupt's estate would be prejudiced by such actions being proceeded with to execution.

Digitized by Google

Harris (solicitor) on behalf of the creditor suing the bankrupt, objected that the General Orders were inconsistent with the terms of the Act of Parliament.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—I cannot hear you upon that point, although I will hear any other argument which you may wish to make. Under the 78th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, the Lord Chancellor has ample powers to make any order for carrying into effect the objects of this Act.

Harris suggested that the creditor would be prejudiced by being restrained in the prosecution of his common law rights.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—He will not be prejudiced in the least. I have nothing before me to show that in case I should make the order asked for, the proceedings in bankruptcy will be carried on. If the creditors will now nominate a receiver to protect the estate, I will make the order.

Webb named a person on behalf of the creditors as receiver.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—If that person accepts the office in writing, the order to restrain may be granted. The order must, however, be drawn up and signed to-day.

Ordered accordingly.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 26 and Dec. 6, 1869.

(Present: The Right Hon. Lord CHELMSFORD, Sir JAMES W. COLVILE, and Sir JOSEPH NAPIER.)

THE GENERAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY (the Owners of the Steamship Velocity, apps.) v. THOMAS, GEORGE, and WILLIAM HEDLEY (the Owners of the Steamship Carbon, resps.)

THE VELOCITY.

Admiralty—Collision—Rule 14—Vessels "crossing."

The ship V. was going down the Thames on a usual and proper course. The ship C. was coming up the river, and her captain wrongly assuming, from the appearance of the red or port light of the V. as she rounded a curve in the river, that the V. was in the act of crossing the river, put the helm to port. The captain of the V., seeing the danger of a collision, first starboarded the helm and then put the helm hard-a-starboard, with the purpose of getting his vessel on shore and saving the lives of those on board. A collision then occurred. In a cause of damage consequent thereon:

Held (reversing the judgment of the Admiralty Court), that the C. was alone to blame for the collision, and that the ships were not "crossing" within the meaning of rule 14 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Court of Admiralty, dated the 26th Dec. 1868, in a cause of damage promoted by the respondents in consequence of a collision which occurred between the steam vessel Velocity and the steam vessel Carbon, on the 5th Sept. 1868.

Early in the morning of that day, the Velocity, a steamship of about 179 tons register, and drawing about 9ft. of water, left London, bound for Calais, with a light cargo, and with twelve passengers on board. After passing Cuckold's Point, up to which point the Velocity had been proceeding along the south shore of the river, she crossed the river, and then kept along the north shore, passing Millwall Pier at a distance not greater than a ship's length. She rounded Millwall Pier under her starboard helm, and continued under the starboard helm so as to hug the north shore. The river there takes a considerable bend, necessitating a vessel going down the river using her starboard helm.

When the Velocity was off the Millwall Pier as aforesaid, a vessel showing a green light, which afterwards proved to be the Carbon, was observed by the master of the Velocity about the distance of a quarter of a mile, bearing two points on the starboard bow, and to the south of mid-channel.

When the master of the Velocity observed the Carbon as aforesaid, there appeared to him to be, and there was in fact, no risk of collision; and, accordingly, he did nothing but starboard his helm a little, for the purpose of keeping as near to the north shore as the depth of water would allow.

Very shortly afterwards, however, the helm of the Carbon was ported, so as to make her come right across the river. It was then impossible for the Velocity to have avoided a collision with the Carbon, whereupon the master of the Velocity put his vessel's helm hard-a-starboard, in order to run her ashore, and thereby save the lives of the passengers. The collision, which had thus become inevitable, took place close to the north shore, the stem of the Carbon striking the starboard bow of the Velocity, and both vessels taking the ground.

On the 22nd Oct. 1868, the appellants brought an action in the Court of Exchequer against the respondents, to recover damages for, or in respect of, the aforesaid collision; the respondents pleaded that they were not guilty, and issue being joined on this plea, the said issue came on for trial on the 11th and 12th Dec. 1868, before the Lord Chief Baron and a special jury at the Guildhall sittings after Michaelmas Term. On such trial the jury found a verdict for the appellants.

On the 22nd Dec. 1868, this cause came on for hearing in the court below, and at such hearing the contention on behalf of the respondents was that the Carbon was right in porting, and that the two steamships were crossing ships within the meaning of the 14th of the sailing and steering rules.

After hearing the evidence adduced by the appellants and respondents, the judge and Trinity masters were of opinion that the two steamers were crossing each other within the meaning of the 14th of the steering and sailing rules, and that the Velocity was solely to blame for the collision, and the learned judge decreed accordingly.

From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

The question turned on the construction of rules 13 and 14 of "The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea," issued in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862. These rules are as follows:—

13. If two ships under steam are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other.

14. If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Nov. 26.—Milward, Q. C., Brett, Q. C., and Cohen, argued for the appellants, and Dr. Deane, Q. C., and Clarkson, for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 6.—Judgment was delivered by Lord CHELMSFORD.—This is an appeal from a decree of

Digitized by Google

the High Court of Admiralty in a cause of damage instituted by the owners of a steam-vessel, the Carbon, against the owners of the steam-vessel the Velocity, for the damage done to the Carbon in a collision between the two vessels, for which collision the learned judge held that the Velocity was alone to blame, and decreed accordingly. In the course of the argument of the appeal their lordships were informed by the counsel for the appellants that the owners of the Velocity, had brought an action-at-law against the owners of the Carbon, and had obtained a verdict with damages. That upon an application to the Court of Exchequer for a new trial the Chief Baron (who tried the cause) expressed his entire satisfaction with the verdict, that the court would not grant even a rule nisi to set it aside, and afterwards refused to give the defendants leave to appeal. This verdict must have proceeded upon the ground of the Carbon, having been solely in the wrong; because, if there had been any fault contributing to the collision on the part of the Velocity, although there was even a greater degree of blame imputable to the Carbon, the owners of the Velocity would not have been entitled to succeed at law. It is, perhaps, difficult to resist the influence arising from the successful issue of this proceeding at law by the appellants, but their Lordships have endeavoured to confine their minds entirely to that which alone is properly before them, the evidence given in the Court of Admiralty, and the reasons stated by the learned judge for the decree which he pronounced. The collision took place in the River Thames a little below Millwall Pier, at about 3.45 a.m., 5th Sept. 1868. It was a fine moonlight morning, and the tide was about high water, and slack. The Velocity, a steamship of 179 tons, was going down the river on her way to Calais. The Carbon, a screw-steamer of 399 tons, was proceeding up the river to London with a cargo of coals. The Velocity had been on the south side of the river until she arrived at Cuckold's Point, when she crossed over to the north shore, and just before the collision was rounding Millwall pier and making her way along the north shore under a starboard helm. The Carbon was going up the river in mid-channel, and at about a quarter of a mile distance saw the red or port light of the Velocity bearing a little on her starboard bow. The helm of the Carbon was immediately ported which carried her towards the Velocity. The captain of the Velocity, seeing the danger of a collision, first starboarded the helm and afterwards ordered it to be put hard-a-starboard, so as to get his vessel ashore, and save the lives of those on board, and the Carbon ran into her starboard bow and cut her from the deck down to the keel. It was admitted on both sides that this was not a case of two steam-vessels meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to require each of them to put the helm to port, in obedience to the 13th article of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. But it was considered by the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty that the 14th article applied, and that the two vessels were "crossing so as to involve the risk of collision," and that it was therefore the duty of the vessel which had the other on her starboard side to keep out of the way. The learned judge, in delivering his judgment, said: "We" (that is, himself and the elder brethren of the Trinity House by whom he was assisted) "think that the evidence establishes that the Carbon saw the mast-head and port light of the Velocity alone. The vessels were therefore crossing under the rule to which I have referred" (the 14th), "and it was therefore the duty of the Carbon to get out of the way of the Velocity. The course which the Carbon adopted was to port, and the Elder Brethren think that this was the only mode of getting out of the way in the circumstances. But the fact of the Carbon having seen the port light of the Velocity does not necessarily prove that the Velocity was crossing the river as the learned judge and his assessors seem to have thought. The relative position of the two vessels when they first came in sight of each other must not alone be regarded, but also the bend of the river in the part where the collision took place. A vessel rounding the curve of the north shore would necessarily, during some part of her course, have her head slightly inclined towards the south shore, so as to exhibit her port light to a vessel in mid-channel coming in a contrary direction; and, in fact, the Velocity was not crossing, or intending to cross, the river when she was seen by the Carbon, but was pursuing the regular course along the north shore; keeping as near to that shore as was convenient under a starboard helm. The appellants alleged that this was the well-known customary track for vessels going down the river, and to establish their case in this respect they called Capt. James, the principal harbour-master of the river, who said, "It is the custom that vessels going down, whatever be their tonnage or their cargo, and whether at flood or ebb tide, invariably keep on the north side, and vessels coming up invariably keep on the south side." The quartermaster of the Dreadnought hospital ship, which is moored not far from the place where the collision occurred, also stated that the regular course of steamers going down the river is to keep on the north side; and the captain of the Velocity, who has been thirty-three years in command of vessels belonging to the Steam Navigation Company, said that for twenty years he had always, in going down the river, gone as close as he could to the north shore, as his usual track and the shortest way. That there has been a practice for vessels going down the river to prefer the north to the south shore is proved by the above evidence, but that there was any custom of this kind in the strict sense of the word, to which all vessels would be bound to conform, is certainly not the fact. On the contrary, from the year 1854 down to the year 1862 the rule laid down by Act of Parliament required vessels going down the river to keep towards the south shore. By the 297th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 it was enacted that, "Every steamship, when navigating any narrow channel shall, whenever it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fair way or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such steamship." Therefore, the captain of the Velocity, in running down the river on the north shore, which he stated to have been his invariable practice for twenty years, was, for some of those years, acting in direct disobedience to the Act of Parliament. But, in 1862, by the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act, the 297th section of the former Act was repealed, and vessels navigating the river were left at liberty to go on whichever side of it they pleased, taking care, of course, to observe the regulations for preventing collisions. The Velocity, at the time when she was seen by the Carbon, was where, under the existing law, she had an undoubted right to be, and was pursuing her regular course along the north shore, when her red light presented itself to the Carbon's view. Now, if the persons in charge of the Carbon knew, as they ought to have known, the bend of the river in that part, and also knew that it was usual for vessels going down the river, to steer their course along the north shore, they had no more right to assume that the Velocity was in the act of crossing the river than that she was pursuing an ordinary course in her way down the river. The learned judge of the Court of Admiralty held that as the vessels were crossing, the Carbon ought to have kept out of the Velocity's way. And the counsel for the respondents argued that, if this were the case, the Velocity, by the 18th article of the regulations, ought to have kept her course, which they interpreted to mean that she should have followed the direction in which her head happened to be turned at the time she was seen by the Carbon. But such an interpretation of the rule would lead to constant uncertainty and perplexity, as the course of a vessel would be continually varying whenever she had to turn out of the way to avoid any other vessel, or might be compelled to follow the turns and windings of a river. If the 18th article applies, the Velocity was bound to keep her course down the river on the north shore, and this course she kept till collision with the Carbon was imminent, when she put her helm hard a starboard to run herself on shore. Their Lordships are of opinion, however, that this was not a case in which either the 13th or the 14th article of the regulations was applicable. It was admitted that this was not a case of two ships under steam meeting end on, or nearly end on, under the 13th article, and in their Lordships' judgment the Velocity and the Carbon were not "crossing" within the 14th article. But putting the regulations aside, they are at a loss to discover what possible blame can be imputed to the Velocity. She had a perfect right to be where she was, and she was pursuing an usual course of navigation down the river, from which she never deviated until forced to do so by the peril of a collision, into which she was brought by the sudden change of course of the Carbon. On the other hand, the Carbon appears to their Lordships to be wholly to blame. She knew, or ought to have known, that a vessel going down the river had a right to run down on the north shore, and that in the position in which she was the appearance to her of the red light of a vessel on that side of the mid-channel was no indication that the vessel was in the act of crossing the river; and yet, there being nothing else to justify the belief, she acts at once upon her hasty and erroneous conclusion, and so occasions the collision. Even supposing the Carbon to have excusably mistaken the course of the Velocity, how can she recover unless she show that the Velocity was in fault? Their Lordships (as already observed) are unable to discover that any degree of blame can be attributed to the Velocity, either by her having pursued a course which she was not at liberty to pursue or having been handled in any way which the course down the north shore did not prescribe. They will therefore recommend to Her Majesty to reverse the decree appealed from, to dismiss the appellants from the suit, and to condemn the respondents in the costs in the court below, and also in the costs of this appeal.

Digitized by Google

Judgment reversed.

Proctors for the appellants, Cattarns and Jehu.
Proctor for the respondents, H. G. Stokes.

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, Nov. 25, 1869.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re THE BANK OF HINDUSTAN, CHINA, and JAPAN (LIMITED);

KINTREA'S CASE.

Company—Transfer — Registration of — Subsequent winding-up — Transfer collusive—Rectification of register—Companies' Act, 1862, sect. 35—Costs under.

In June K., the holder of 145 shares in the above bank, upon which there was a liability to calls amounting to 75l. per share, executed a transfer to M., which was in proper form on the face of it, and stated that the consideration paid to K. was 195*l. The transfer was laid before the directors, who had, by the articles of association, absolute power to refuse to register it; but they, without making any inquiry, approved, and registered the name of M. as the holder of the shares, and when the company was ordered to be wound-up in the following December his name was still upon the register. The official liquidator discovered that M. had never paid any consideration to K., and that he was a person without property, earning about* 1*l. a week:*

Held (affirming the decision of Stuart, V.C.), that under sect. 35 of the Companies' Act, 1862, the court had jurisdiction to rectify the register, and that K.'s name must be substituted for M.'s; and further, that as the application was made in a winding-up, the general practice in Chancery applied, and the court could order the appellant who had failed to pay the costs of all parties, apart from any enactment as to costs in the 35*th section.*

Where a name is not properly on the register, that is being upon the register "without sufficient cause" under that section,

A summons to rectify the register of a company in course of winding-up, should be issued on the application, not of the official liquidators, but of the company itself.

This was an appeal by Mr Archibald Kintrea against an order of Stuart, V.C., by which his Honour ordered that the appellant's name should be substituted upon the list of contributories of the above-named bank for that of a Mr Alexander M'Lachlan as the owner of 145 shares, although before the winding-up of the company commenced, those shares had been transferred by Mr Kintrea to Mr M'Lachlan, who at the date of the winding-up was on the register as the holder thereof.

The circumstances were as follows:

The transfer took place in June, 1866, when the deed of transfer was laid before the directors. On the face of it, it was stated that the consideration was 195*l.*, and that it had been paid by M'Lachlan to Kintrea. Without inquiry or further examination, the directors approved the transfer, and it was duly registered. The shares were nominally of 100*l.* each, on which 25*l.* only had at that time been called up, but the price of the day was about 3*l.* 15*s.* per share.

Five months after the transfer, the winding-up order was made, and official liquidators were appointed. In settling the list of contributories, circumstances came to their knowledge which led to further investigation, when they discovered that M'Lachlan was a steward on board a steam vessel at a salary of 1*l.* a week, and that he had nothing in the world beyond his earnings; that he had paid nothing whatever to Kintrea; and that (as the Lord Justice concluded from the evidence) it never was Kintrea's intention, from first to last, to part with his interest in the shares.

The learned Vice-Chancellor took the same view as to the appellant's intention, and on the application of the official liquidator by name, and not of the company, as would have been regular, directed the register to be rectified by inserting Kintrea's name in place of McLachlan's, ordering Kintrea to pay the costs.

The original summons was heard in chambers by the Vice-Chancellor in person, who declined to have it re-argued in court. His Lordship, after expressing much reluctance, consented to hear the appeal against this order preferred by Mr. Kintrea.

Hardy, Q. C. and Higgins, for the appeal, relied chiefly upon Re The Joint-Stock Discount Company, Sichel's Case, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 119; 17 L. T. Rep.

Digitized by Google

N. S. 363, which, they argued, showed that when a company had accepted and registered a transfer they could not afterwards dispute it. The official liquidator had no right beyond that of his company. The transfer was not shown to be collusive, nor was it shown that the appellant retained any interest whatever in the shares. And though the shares were at a discount in June 1866, there was nothing to show that the bank was embarrassed, and, in fact, the winding-up order was not made till the following December. The Act of 1862 provided that the person on the register was to be deemed the member of the company: (ss. 23, 30, 74 of Companies Act 1862.) If Kintrea's name was to be substituted for McLachlan's, that could be done only under sect. 35 of the same statute, which gave the court no jurisdiction to order costs against him. But, at all events, the order must be varied, as it was wholly informal that such an order should be made on the application of the official liquidator, and not of the company. They referred to

Bugg's Case, 2 Dr. & Sm. 452; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 696;
Re The Anglesea Colliery Company, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 127;
Re The Bahia and San Francisco Railway Company, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 584;
Ex parte Ward, L. Rep. 3 Ex. 180; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 445;
Ward and Henry's Case, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 431; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 254;
Re The British Sugar Refinery Company, 3 K. & J. 408;
Hyam's Case, 1 De G. F. & J. 75; 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 115;
De Pass's Case, 4 De G. & J. 544; 33 L. T. Rep. 322;
Weston's Case, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 20; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 337;
Lumsden's Case, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 31; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 437.

Greene, Q.C. and Lindley, for the official liquidators upon costs only, relied upon the analogy of the Trustee Relief Act, and cited

Re Woodburn's Will, 1 De G. & J. 333.
Ex parte Barry, 2 Dr. & Sm. 321; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 691.

The court had jurisdiction under sect. 35, but, if not, sect. 170 provided that, in the case of a winding-up, the ordinary jurisdiction should be in force until the court had made rules concerning the mode of proceeding.

Hardy, Q.C. having replied on this question,

GIFFARD, L. J. said: It is to be regretted that this case was not discussed before the court below, because it is always of the greatest advantage to this court to have the benefit of the learned judge's observations on the case in the court below, and to that I think I may add that it is really the right of the suitor that he should not come here to have his case considered by the appellate court, from which there is no appeal except to the House of Lords, otherwise than after he has had the benefit of a complete discussion in the court below, and an expression of the opinion of the learned judge in the court below, in such a way as that this court may have an opportunity of really reviewing it. I think this is to be regretted.

However, I cannot say that I feel any difficulty whatever in any part of this case. The greater part of the argument has been directed to the 35th section of the Act of 1862, and the material cases which have been referred to may be readily disposed of. Two cases at law were referred to—one was the case of the Bahia and San Francisco Railway Company, and that was simply a case in which the court of law considered that the company had estopped itself by what it had done. The court there, it appeared, had received certain forged transfers, issued a certificate in conformity with those forged transfers, and some third party dealt on the faith of that certificate. As the position of the third party was altered, the court of law applied under those circumstances the doctrine of estoppel, which is perfectly well known. It is quite clear that that has nothing to do with this case.

The next case was that of Ex parte Ward, and there again the application was refused. That was an application by a member of a company, who said that the company of which he became a member were not to carry on business until the whole of the shares were subscribed, and that they were carrying on business, notwithstanding that all the shares had not been subscribed, and he sought to be relieved on that ground. Kelly, C.B., in his judgment there says that the power, alluding to the 35th section, is given only under certain circumstances, amongst others, when, he says, the plaintiff's name has been put on the register "without sufficient cause." If he had been induced by fraudulent misstatements, or fraudulent suppression, to become a member, and thereupon the name had been entered on the register, that undoubtedly would have been "without sufficient cause." That at all events is a decision of a court of law that, if there is a fraud, or if the transaction is such that it cannot stand, it is equivalent to the name being on the register "without sufficient cause."

Then we have the two cases in this court. First, Ward and Henry's case, in which Turner and Lord Cairns, L.JJ., somewhat differed in their view of the 35th section. Lord Cairns put a narrower construction than Turner, L.J., but I do not apprehend that anything fell from either of those learned judges in that case which would in the least degree interfere with the rule. Turner, L.J., thought the section would extend to equitable owners undoubtedly. There there was a particular name registered; the man whose name was on the register had sold to some one who did not get himself registered, and that some one had sold to some one else. In that state of things the Lord Justices held that there was a proper case to interfere merely under the 35th section. That has nothing to do with the present case.

The last case it is necessary to refer to is Sichel's case. That was clearly a case in which the company, having laid by and taken no steps for a great length of time, all of a sudden turned round, being themselves entirely in default, and sought to put a shareholder's name on the register. Lord Cairns said, as might well have been expected, "You have been in this default; you cannot come here and rectify the register, when in point of fact the state of the register is owing to your own negligence." Those are all the cases, and to my mind they do not touch the present case.

With regard to the section of the Act, whether you consider the latter part of the section as controlled by the former, as was Lord Cairns's view, or whether you take the wider view adopted by Turner, L. J., the result, as regards this case, is, to my mind, quite the same; because, ex concessis, we have a right to inquire whether the man's name is on the register "without sufficient cause," or, to put it in other words, is it or is it not properly on the list of members, because if it is not properly inserted, that is being on the register of shareholders "without sufficient cause."

Now, what are the facts? We must take it that the directors have done their duty (that is the intent), and the facts are these: There is presented to the directors a transfer which states on the face of it that 195*l.* had been paid by M'Lachlan That appears on the face of it to be an ordinary transaction of sale and purchase as between Kintrea and M'Lachlan, and when that representation is made the directors may well trust to it, and may be excused for not asking any questions about it. They are not bound to ask a question. As was said, I recollect, by Lord Cranworth in one of the cases, no man can complain when he makes a representation to other parties, that those other parties happen to believe what he says. I must take it that, in this case, the directors did believe what was said, and, that being so, I must take it that it was not in the least the duty of the directors to inquire further, and that, in the ordinary course of their duty, there being a sale, it would have been wrong if, when there was a bona fide sale, it was to be said, because a man was not rich, he should not be put on the register of shareholders. But that alternative must be taken as the inducing cause, taking that by itself. If the facts had been told to the directors of the company; it is reasonable to suppose that they would have made inquiry. And what are the facts?

Digitized by Google

First of all, the 195*l.* never passed at all. Not a sixpence was paid. The next thing discovered would have been this, if they had made the least inquiry, that M'Lachlan was steward on board a steamer, that he had not a halfpenny in the world, that his wife earned 10*s.* a week, and this further fact, that it never was the intention of Kintrea, from first to last, to part with his interest in these shares. It was simply his desire to put these shares into the name of M'Lachlan for purposes of his own. Mr. Kintrea has not come forward to say what those purposes were, and, therefore, all we can do is to try to come to a reasonable conclusion from the facts of this case as to what those purposes were. And the reasonable conclusion is this. On these shares 25*l.* each had been paid, and they were worth at that time about 3*l.* 15*s.* They were 100*l.* shares, and on every one of the 145 there was a liability of 75*l.* And though true it is that these shares could possibly have been sold in the market for 3*l.* or 3*l.* 15*s.* per share, it is evident that the object of the transaction was this, to put them into the name of a man who was in no degree responsible, to take the chance of the market, but to take it in such a way as that any further liability should be escaped.

That is the reasonable construction of such a transaction as this. Then let us go a step further. Supposing the facts had all been told to the directors, could Mr Kintrea have said now, that his name should not be taken from the register? If this had been done by arrangement with the company, it would have been what in this court is looked upon as a fraud upon the company—a colourable transaction which this court could not allow to stand. That being so, it seems to me to follow, as a matter of course, that Kintrea's name must be restored, and M'Lachlan's name taken from the list. I put it on two grounds. First, it being clear that if a man chooses to make a representation which is untrue, but which reasonably induces the directors to register a name, and it afterwards turns out that that representation is wholly and utterly untrue, he cannot complain of any consequences following upon the directors believing his representation. The other ground consists of those circumstances which bring this case entirely within De Pass's case and Hyam's case. I really should not have thought it worth while to allude much to other parts of the case, but that it has been said in the argument that there is some doubt as to whether the court could, under the 35th section, take upon itself to act upon Hyam's case and De Pass's case.

I do not hesitate to say that I have no doubt whatever that this court can act under the 35th section in such cases as Hyam's and De Pass's, just as much as it could without the passing of that 35th section. And for this simple reason: the other names would be on the register "without sufficient cause," or (as I have explained by what was meant "without sufficient cause") improperly on the register. I have, therefore, no hesitation whatever in putting Mr. Kintrea in the place of Mr. M'Lachlan.

Then there only remains the question of costs, and that is quite a matter of course. I had forgotten the 170th section, but when one comes to consider that section, and when one considers that this is an application under the Winding-up Act, I quite agree I might have have had considerable difficulty if there had been no winding-up, and if I had been confined entirely to the 35th section; but considering that this is under the Winding-up Act, I have just the same jurisdiction as I should have without the 35th section. I have no doubt upon that, and therefore without going to cases under the Trustee Relief Act, which also would probably enable me to do it, I can clearly do so under the 170th section.

Therefore, I am of opinion that the order of the court below is perfectly right, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs. There is only one formal matter in which it is wrong; that is, it so happens that the application is made in the name of the liquidator by summons, and the order is drawn up as being simply on the application of the liquidator. In point of form that is wrong. It does not affect the merits in the slightest degree; the objection was not taken in the court below, and of course one would not have the case delayed, or make any difference as to costs, because of that question of mere form. But in order that the matter may be perfectly right, the summons will be amended by putting the company in the place of the liquidator, and the order will also be amended by putting it on the application of the company instead of the liquidator. Subject to that the appellant must pay all the costs, except those of amending the summons.

Solicitors for the appellant, Kintrea, Lewis, Nunn, Munns, and Longden.

Solicitors for the respondents, Ashurst, Morris, and Co.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PEAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dec. 8 and 9, 1869.

Re POOLEY HALL COLLIERY COMPANY.

Company — Winding-up — Debenture-holders — Simple contract creditors—Priority—Debentures issued ultra vires—Lien for moneys advanced to maintain the property of the company.

By the articles of association of a company, extended by a special resolution, the directors were empowered to incur debts and to borrow on mortgage and other securities to an amount not exceeding 8000*l.* They issued a number of debentures at a time when the liabilities of the company exceeded 8000*l.*:

Held, that the debentures were not voidable, but absolutely void, and that the holders of them could only come in pari passu with the simple contract creditors for the amounts secured by their debentures.

Three of the directors, in whom the lease of the company's premises was vested in trust for the company, had expended their own moneys in payment of rent, workmen's wages, &c.:

Held, that they were entitled to be repaid in priority to all other claimants all sums which they could have been compelled to pay, but that they were not entitled to priority in respect of any moneys voluntarily paid by them on behalf of the company.

Digitized by Google

Re The Exhall Coal Mining Company, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 280; 35 Beav. 449; explained.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by certain debenture holders of the above company, which was being wound-up under supervision of the court, that the liquidators might be directed to apply the moneys arising from the sale of the lease of the colliery, subject to the costs of liquidation, towards payment of what was due to the debenture holders upon their debentures in priority to all other claims.

Under the articles of association, the directors were empowered to incur debts in the ordinary course of business of the company, and to borrow on mortgage and other securities to an amount not exceeding 5000*l.* By a special resolution passed at a general meeting in Nov. 1865, and subsequently confirmed, the amount up to which the directors might incur debts and borrow on mortgage, &c. was extended to 8000*l.*

The debentures in question were issued on and after the 2nd Jan. 1866, under the sanction of a general meeting of the company, and purported to be a first charge on all the property, present and future, of the company.

The application of the debenture-holders was opposed by Messrs. Crux, Alcock, and Trapp, three of the former directors of the company in whom the lease of the colliery was formerly vested in trust for the company, and who claimed a lien on the property for liabilities incurred by them on behalf of the company for rent, workmen's wages, &c. The application was also opposed by the simple contract creditors of the company, who contended that the debentures were invalid, because, at the date of their issue, the liabilities of the company exceeded the limited amount of 8000*l.*, and that the debentures could, therefore, only be treated as simple contract debts, and that their holders could only rank pari passu with the simple contract creditors.

There was evidence that at the date of the issue of the debentures the liabilities of the company did considerably exceed 8000*l.*

Roxburgh, Q. C. and Rowcliffe, in support of the application, submitted that the debentures being on the property, and not on the capital of the company, were entitled to priority over all other claims, and that the directors had no lien for moneys expended by them for the purpose of keeping the concern going. They cited

Re The Marine Mansions Company, L. Rep. 4 Eq. 601; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 50;
King v. Marshall, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 557; 33 Beav. 565;
Re New Clydach Sheet and Bar Iron Company, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 514.

Jessel, Q. C. and Lindley, for the simple contract creditors, contended that the debentures were invalid, as at the date of their issue the liabilities of the company exceeded the amount authorised by the articles of association, and that they were therefore nothing more than simple contract debts. They cited

Re The German Mining Company, Chippendale's Case, 4 De G. M. & G. 19.

Charles Hall, for the official liquidators, took no part in the argument.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., and W. W. Karslake, for the directors, Crux, Alcock, and Trapp, claimed priority in respect of moneys advanced for rent, workmen's wages, &c., on the principle that the trustees of a commercial concern are entitled to a lien for moneys expended by them for the purpose of keeping the concern going. They cited

Clack v. Holland, 19 Beav. 262;
Re The Exhall Coal Mining Company, 14 L. T. Rep. N.S. 280; 35 Beav. 449.

Dec. 9.—Lord ROMILLY.—Mr. Roxburgh, I wish to hear you in reply; but before you commence there are one or two things I can state which will clear the way very much with respect to what Sir Richard Baggallay has said. I will state as clearly as I can what I conceive to be the principles which affect these debentures. In the first place, where a person, whether a member of a company or not, takes a lease at the request of the company and for the benefit of the company, it necessarily follows that all those sums which he is liable to pay compulsorily, which he cannot help paying, and which the lessors can extort from him by action, must be paid by the company in priority to everything else, and that the persons who take a charge upon the land, or a charge upon the lease, who know that the person is a mere trustee for the company, and is liable to pay rent upon an action or the like, take it subject to that liability. They are aware of that liability, and they cannot afterwards complain, if the property is sold, that that liability is first paid. That is what I decided in Re The Exhall Coal Mining Company (sup.), and I still retain that opinion. My opinion is, that his priority is limited to such compulsory payments, and that if he pays anything at the request of the company for the purpose of keeping up the mines, none of those sums is he entitled to have in priority to persons having charges upon them, or to the general creditors of the company; he is a mere general creditor; he is a mere simple contract creditor with respect to such payments, and he can only come in pari passu with the simple contract creditors. It is not for him to determine whether the lease shall be forfeited or not; he has no concern with that. It is for the company to determine whether the lease shall be given up or not, and he cannot exercise any discretion on the subject; but he is to be saved harmless, and is not to be put into a situation in which the lessor can put his hand into his pocket and take his money for payment of rent, and yet afterwards say that he is merely in the same situation as the other creditors of the company. He has a charge on the land for that, and he is entitled to have that paid in priority; but beyond that he is entitled to nothing. If he has voluntarily worked the mine, and paid the wages of the workmen, and the like, he is a mere person who has made a loan to the company, and he is a creditor of the company in respect of that. But suppose the company had granted him permission to carry on the mine entirely for their own benefit; then a new state of things arises, and of a different description. Then, no doubt, they are only entitled to come against him for the profit which he makes; and that profit cannot be ascertained without allowing to him all the expenses he has incurred in carrying on the mine. I do not understand that that arises in the present case. Unquestionably, if (which may arise in this case after the voluntary winding-up of the company) these gentlemen were allowed to carry on the mine by the assent of the creditors, then I am of opinion that they could not come upon them for any payment without allowing them all the expenses which they had incurred on the mine. Having stated that opinion, Sir Richard Baggallay, I would in the order refer it to chambers to ascertain what sums are due to you; because you have paid rent, and I am quite clear that you are entitled to receive the rent. You are entitled to receive the rent from the date of the lease in 1866, but not the premium which you gave for that lease, which is put under the form of a lease from 1863 upon payment of all the back rents, which you were not liable to pay, and which were merely sums of money advanced to the company to enable them to obtain the lease. I now wish to hear from Mr. Roxburgh how he can support these debentures, if it be true that the permitted liabilities of the company had been already exceeded at the date of the issue of the debentures.

Roxburgh, Q.C., in reply, contended that the clause which restricted the amount of liabilities which the directors were to incur, meant only liabilities on bond, mortgage, &c.; but assuming that ordinary business debts were included in the clause, and that the total liabilities of the company at the date of the issue of the debentures, did exceed 8000*l.*, the issue had been sanctioned by a general meeting, and the simple contract creditors, the debts owing to whom had been incurred subsequent to the issue of the debentures, could not be heard to say that the debentures were issued ultra vires, as, under sect. 43 of the Companies Act 1862, they could know at any time what the mortgage-debts of the company were, and must, therefore, be taken to have had notice of the debentures.

Lord ROMILLY.—With respect to the debenture holders, I think the validity of the debentures depends upon the fact of whether the liabilities did or did not exceed 8000*l.* at the date of the issue. That was the amount which was fixed as the limit. It is impossible to say that the liabilities of the company are not to be taken as including all the debts which are incurred in the ordinary course of business. The very passage limiting the amount refers to it. They are to do all things which are due and proper for carrying on the business of the company, and also to incur debts in the ordinary course of business, borrow money on bonds, mortgages and other securities, and issue bills of exchange and promissory notes, but so that the liabilities of the company shall never without the sanction of a general meeting, exceed the sum of 8000*l.* It is quite clear that the debts which are incurred in the ordinary carrying on of the business are expressly included, and are considered to be included, in that amount .But it is impossible to say that a debt which a man owes for carrying on his household concerns is not a liability. Can anyone say that he does not owe his butcher for yesterday's meat, whatever may be the balance at his banker's? Therefore I am of opinion that if the liabilities of the company exceeded 8000*l.*, they had no power to issue these debentures; that they are not voidable, but that they were absolutely void, the directors having had no authority to issue them. Then in reply Mr. Roxburgh has argued the question which was somewhat new to me, as if the creditors had waived this objection. I have not heard anything in the statement that amounts to a waiver of the objection. If the debentures were absolutely void, I do not think that the mere fact of their advancing money, even if they knew the debentures to be void, would amount to a waiver of the objection. I am of opinion that the debentures are void in this sense as against the simple contract creditors, and they must come in pari passu with them for the amount of their debts; and so also I think must the greater part of the claims by Sir Richard Baggallay's clients. I think of making the order in this form to make the matter clear and distinct: "The court being of opinion that Messrs. Crux, Alcock, and Trapp are entitled to be repaid in priority all sums of money paid by them on the lease of the 22nd Nov. 1866, but that they are not entitled to any priority in respect of any moneys voluntarily paid or advanced by them, or any or either of them, for or on behalf of the company, whether they were so advanced for the purpose of carrying on the said mine or otherwise, refer it to chambers to ascertain what is due to them, and each of them, distinguishing between such moneys as are due as were compulsorily paid, and such as were voluntarily paid as aforesaid, and the court being also of opinion that the debenture-holders have no priority over the simple contract creditors, and that the company had no power to issue such debentures, inasmuch as the liabilities of the company exceeded the sum of 8000*l.* at the time of the issue thereof respectively ——" If you dispute that, Mr. Roxburgh, you shall have an enquiry to ascertain the fact, but it will be at your own risk. It is to be understood that in drawing a distinction with respect to Sir Richard Baggallay's clients between payments compulsorily made and payments voluntarily made, I treat all those payments as compulsorily made which they might have been compelled to make. The circumstance that the payments were made without being enforced by a suit or action, does not take them out of the designation of compulsory payments. All parties must have their costs.

Solicitors for the debenture holders, Gregory, Rowcliffes, and Rawle.

Solicitor for the directors and other creditors J. Elliott Fox.

Saturday, Jan. 15.

Re RUSH (a Solicitor).

Solicitor and client—Balance due from solicitor—Writ of attachment—Act for Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4.

The Act for the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62) does not prevent a writ of attachment from issuing against a solicitor who has made default in payment of a sum which he has been ordered by the court to pay.

The common order for taxation of a bill of costs delivered by John Roger Rush, a solicitor, to one of his clients, had been made against the solicitor, and by his certificate, the taxing-master had found a balance of upwards of 27,000*l.* due from the solicitor to his client. Mr. Rush having been ordered to pay this amount, and having made default in doing so, the client now applied for leave to issue a writ of attachment against him. Some doubt had been raised at the Records and Writs Office as to the propriety of issuing the writ on account of the recent Act for the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), by the 4th section of which it is provided that, with the exceptions thereinafter mentioned, no person shall, after the commencement of the Act, be arrested or imprisoned for making default in payment of a sum of money. Amongst the six exceptions to this enactment, the 4th is as follows: "Default by an attorney or solicitor in payment of costs, when ordered to pay costs for misconduct as such, or in payment of a sum of money when ordered to pay the same in his character of an officer of the court making the order."

And the section closes with the following provisoes, first, that no person shall be imprisoned in any case excepted from the operation of the section for a longer period than one year; and, secondly, that nothing in the section shall alter the effect of any judgment or order of any court for payment of money except as regards the arrest and imprisonment of the person making default in paying such money.

F. H. Colt, in support of the application, submitted that this was a case of "default by an attorney or solicitor in payment of a sum of money, when ordered to pay the same, in his character of an officer of the court making the order," and that, the order having been made under the summary jurisdiction of the court, it came within the 4th exception of the 4th section of the Act, and that the writ of attachment ought, therefore, to issue.

Lord ROMILLY.—I think this Act does not prevent you from issuing a writ of attachment, though the language of the Act is not free from obscurity.

Solicitors: Langley and Gibbon.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dec. 16, 17 and 19, 1869.

THE CITY BANK v. LUCKIE.

Mortgage—Security for current cash credit—Bills of exchange—Right of holders of to security.

A mortgage to secure a current cash credit as between the mortgagor and mortgagee.

Held not available as a security to the holders of bills drawn by the mortgagor, and accepted by the mortgagee.

The question in this case was whether the holders of certain bills of exchange were entitled to the benefit of a mortgage, which purported to be a security for a current cash credit, as between the drawer and the acceptor of the bills. The facts were these.

The bill was filed by the City Bank on behalf of themselves, and the other holders of the bills in question, against George John Luckie, Edward Kynaston, Robert Sutherland, Harriett Luckie, and Lavinia Luckie. The defendant, George John Luckie, carried on business in London as a merchant under the firm of Luckie Brothers and Co. The defendants, Edward Kynaston and Robert Sutherland, also carried on business in London as merchants under the firm of Kynaston, Sutherland, and Co. The bills in question, which were renewals of previous bills, were all drawn by Luckie Brothers and Co. upon Kynaston, Sutherland, and Co. The plaintiffs were holders of three of these bills to the amount of 7000*l*. The first was drawn and accepted on the 8th March 1866, for 2000*l*., to become due on the 11th June 1866. The second on the 16th March 1866, for 2000*l*., to become due on the 19th June 1866. The third on the 20th April 1866, for 3000*l*., to become due on the 23rd July 1866. Besides these, there were other bills amounting to 5500*l*., drawn and accepted by the same parties.

The bill stated that previously to the date of the bills it was arranged and agreed between the defendants G. J. Luckie and Kynaston that payment of the bills should be secured by mortgages on two estates in Demerara belonging to the defendant George John Luckie, and known respectively as the plantations of La Jalousie and Johanna Cecilia, in the colony of British Guiana. These mortgages, though acknowledged in favour of the defendant Kynaston only, were agreed between the defendants Kynaston and Sutherland to be held as partnership property and for the purpose of securing payment of the bills.

The first of the mortgages was dated the 25th Nov. 1865, and after reciting (inter alia) that it had been agreed upon by G. J. Luckie and Kynaston, that Kynaston should, through the firm of Sutherland and Co., grant unto Luckie a current cash credit to the extent of 75,000 dols. current money of the colony, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, to be secured by a first mortgage in favour of Kynaston upon the said plantation. And that in pursuance of the said agreement Luckie had already received from Kynaston, through his said firm, divers sums of money on account of the said cash credit, amounting to the sum of 5000 dols., and it had been agreed that the said several sums so already advanced, and all other sums to be thereafter advanced to Luckie upon the said cash credit, under deduction of payments or proceeds of sales of produce by or on account of Luckie, should form and be from time to time the capital or principal sum secured by the said mortgage, the balance of interest appearing at the end of each year against Luckie upon the account current thereinafter mentioned, to be carried forward as capital to the next year's account. The said George John Luckie did thereby bind himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and representatives, within six months' notice given as thereinafter mentioned, to pay or cause to be paid to the said Edward Kynaston, his heirs, executors, administrators, representatives, order, or assigns, such sums of money as should then be due or owing by him (Luckie), his heirs, executors, administrators, and representatives, under and by virtue of the said mortgage, not exceeding the said sum of 75,000 dols. And, as a security for the due and punctual payment of the several sum and sums of money, principal and interest, secured by the said mortgage as thereinbefore mentioned, the said George John Luckie did thereby bind his property in general, his heirs, executors, administrators, and representatives, and more especially, with right of first mortgage, the said plantation of La Jalousie.

The other mortgage (that on the Johanna Cecilia plantation) was dated 19th May 1866, and was in terms similar to the first, except that it purported to be a security for 15,000 dollars.

These mortgages were not executed in the form of deeds, but were passed before one of the judges of the colony in the usual manner in which such securities are there made effective. After the execution of the last mentioned mortgage, both the drawers and acceptors of the bills became involved, and their estates were being wound up.

The bill set out the following letter, written by the defendant Kynaston, to the secretary of the City Bank:

Dear Sir,—Referring to our conversation this morning with respect to bills for 12,500*l*., drawn by Messrs. Luckie Brothers and Co. on my firm of Kynaston, Sutherland, and Co., I beg to assure you that the mortgages on the Demerara estates executed by Mr. George John Luckie in my favour, were done on the understanding that they were to be held as collateral against such acceptances, should produce fail to arrive in sufficient quantity in time to meet and cover the drafts, and that such security is now held by me for your benefit, and I doubt not that it will be found more than sufficient, under careful and judicious management, to reimburse you fully with interest for your temporary lock-up. I shall only be too glad to render any assistance in my power to accomplish this.

No such produce as that referred to in the above letter had arrived.

The plaintiffs, by their bill, charged that they and the other holders of the bills of exchange for 12,500*l*. in the whole were entitled to all the right and interest of the defendants Kynaston and Sutherland, or of Kynaston only, under the above mortgages, and in and the properties comprised therein respectively.

The defendants Harriett and Lavinia Luckie claimed some interest in the mortgaged property, and were therefore made parties to the suit.

The bill prayed for a declaration that the plaintiffs and the other holders of the bills, for 12,500*l*., were entitled to the benefit of all the right and interest defendant Kynaston, or of him and his copartners in the hereditaments and premises comprised in the said mortgages, and so far as was necessary for the payment of all sums due or to become due upon the said bills; and that they were entitled to have the sum secured by the said deed realised and paid to the plaintiffs, and the said other bill-holders respectively, or applied rateably between or amongst them in discharge and satisfaction, so far as the same would extend, amount of the of such bills, without prejudice to their right and title to have and receive the balance or surplus of the amount of such bills, and that the rights and priorities of the plaintiffs and other bill-holders on the one hand, and the defendants Harriett Luckie and Lavinia Luckie might be ascertained and determined. That a receiver might be appointed to receive and get in the rents and profits of the said hereditaments and premises, and to manage the said property, and to sell the said hereditaments and premises for the purpose of realising sufficient to pay the amount due or to become due on the said bills. That in the mean time the defendants might be restrained from receiving the rents and profits of the said hereditaments and premises, and from dealing with the said hereditaments and premises in any manner inconsistent with the rights of the plaintiffs and the other holders of the bills. That so far as might be necessary, an account might be taken of what was due and owing by the defendant G. J. Luckie to the defendants Kynaston and Sutherland; and if it should be necessary that an account might be taken of what, if anything, was due to the defendants Luckie and Lavinia Luckie upon the security of the said mortgaged hereditaments and premises. And that for the purposes aforesaid all necessary accounts might be taken, inquiries made, and directions given.

Digitized by Google

The defendants denied that it was ever arranged or agreed between them that the bills in question, or any other bills, should be secured by the mortgages. The defendant, George John Luckie, deposed that the bills held by the plaintiffs were at his personal request discounted by the plaintiffs, and that he did not before, or at the time of their being discounted, or at any other time, mention or refer to the mortgages, or in any way agree to transfer to the plaintiffs any benefit or interest under the mortgages; and to the best of his knowledge and belief their existence was wholly unknown to the plaintiffs until after his (the defendant's) firm had suspended payment.

The defendant Kynastou deposed that the mortgages were executed in his favour in consideration of his granting to Luckie, through his firm, a current cash credit to the amount mentioned in the mortgages respectively, and also to secure to him the due payment of any balances that might at any time be due from Luckie on the cash credit account in the mortgages respectively expressed. There was no agreement between himself and Luckie, either before or after the execution of the mortgages that they should be securities collaterally or otherwise, for the payment of any bills whatsoever. In explanation of his letter addressed to the plaintiff's secretary, he said, that previously to the stoppage of his firm, he had always supposed that the bills in question would be duly paid at maturity by him or his firm, and that in that case Luckie would be brought into his debt on the balance of the account between them, and that the mortgages would then be a security for such balance within the terms of such mortgages. At the time that the letter was written he was largely indebted to other creditors, on bills, and otherwise, irrespectively of the bills held by the plaintiffs; which other creditors and bill holders were partly secured by property in Ceylon, and what he intended to express to the plaintiffs by his letter was that he held the security referred to in his letter for their benefit, to the exclusion of his other creditors, who were secured by the property at Ceylon. He further stated that at the time he wrote the letter he had not considered whether as between himself and Luckie he was correct in stating that the security therein referred to was held, or could be held, by him for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and all that he meant to express by his letter was, that if any of his creditors could in any manner benefit by the mortgages, such creditors would be the plaintiffs in preference to his other creditors, who were secured by the Ceylon property.

Dickinson, Q.C. and Westlake, for the plaintiffs, submitted that they had clearly by their bill established a right to the relief prayed. The mortgages were intended as a security for past and future advances on the part of the acceptor of the bills. Those advances had previously to and after the execution of the mortgages been made in the form of bills, and it was evident, upon the construction of the terms of the deeds, that "the current cash credit" was meant to include bills. The acceptor of the bills had in the first instance a clear equitable right to the benefit of the security, and the plaintiffs as the holders of the bills were entitled now to stand in his shoes.

Osborne Morgan, Q.C. and Bagshawe, for the defendants (George John Luckie and Harriett and Lavinia Luckie), contended that upon the construction of the terms of the deeds alone the plaintiffs' case must fail. Bills could not be considered cash, and moreover a mortgage for future advances in any shape was of doubtful validity. The equity which the plaintiffs endeavoured to establish was only applicable to the administration of an estate in bankruptcy, and must entirely fail when applied to the case of a bill holder who was in no way connected with the transaction under which he was desirous of enforcing his security. Further, the plaintiffs had failed to make out their case. The evidence clearly showed that there was no such arrangement or agreement between the defendants as that set up by the bill. They cited

Powles v. Hargreaves, 3 De G. M. & G. 430;
Laycock v. Johnson, 6 Hare 199;
Ex parte Waring, 19 Ves. 344.

Marten, for the other defendants.

Dickinson, Q. C. in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I think it is impossible to bring this case within the equitable principle which would entitle the holders of these bills, that is, the plaintiffs, to the benefit of the security in question. The case of Ex parte Waring (sup.) certainly does not go that length. In order to make out the equity of the holder of bills to have the benefit of a security which is held by a person who enters into a transaction upon the bills, I think that the security must by contract be connected with the transaction upon the bills. Lord Eldon, in Ex parte Waring (sup.), points out the general extent to which the equity was argued in that case, and expresses his doubts upon it as a general equity. I confess, however, that the inclination of my own mind would rather be to support the general equity and carry it to its fullest extent. In all cases where a person is called upon to pay a debt for which he is not primarily liable, as, for instance, the holder of a bill of exchange, the doctrine which applies to the case of surety seems to me to apply to a case of the kind. If a surety pays off the debt of the principal debtor he is entitled to the benefit of all the debtor's securities. That is stated in a loose and general way, but I rather think that the proper application of the doctrine is that the surety who pays off the debt is entitled to the benefit of all securities held for that particular debt, but not to all the securities of a more general kind. That I think was the principle in Wright v. Morley, 11 Ves. 12, and has been acted upon ever since. But in this case it seems to me impossible to connect a general mortgage transaction for a cash balance that may be due from time to time with a particular bill of exchange which happens to be unpaid by the person primarily liable. Therefore, in my opinion, the equity of this case fails, and the bill must be dismissed, with costs, as a matter of course. The case of Powles v. Hargreaves (sup.), I think, is important in this point of view: it extends the equity where the case occurs for it beyond the case of bankruptcy or insolvency. It is an equity that does not seem to depend upon that at all, though a notion did prevail, after Ex parte Waring, that it was a case applying only to bankruptcy, or even to a double bankruptcy. That is not the law of this court. I apprehend where you can establish an equity of this kind, it is independent of any considerations which arise from the law of bankruptcy or insolvency; although no doubt the equity may be modified by what happens in bankruptcy and insolvency. The case of Powles v. Hargreaves, which I decided in the first instance, seemed to be a new case in that respect, and although I had no doubt about it, it was very satisfactory to me that it was carried to the Court of Appeal, and that the Court of Appeal supported the view that I took, which was that the equity was not destroyed by reason of a bankruptcy.

Digitized by Google

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Linklaters, Hackwood, and Addison.

Solicitors for the defendants, Parker and Clarke; Thomas and Hollams.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET, Esq., and Hon. ROBERT BUTLER, Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, Jan. 12.

BOUN v. STROUD.

Specific performance—Part performance—Receipt for, and as a deposit—Statute of Frauds—Title—Compensation in damages—Cairns' Act.

An agreement in writing cannot be qualified or altered by subsequent conversations or a presumed intended departure from the terms of the original agreement.

A receipt for the deposit, duly stamped as an agreement, is sufficient to support a bill for specific performance of the contract.

This was a bill filed by Mr. Edward Boun, and stated the following facts:—On the 23rd March 1868 the defendant, Samuel Stroud, alleging himself to be entitled to the residue of a term of ninety-nine years, from Christmas 1810, of two dwelling-houses, Nos. 19 and 20, Chichester-place, Wandsworth-road, agreed to sell to plaintiff the lease and fixtures of said messuages for 620*l.* That plaintiff, by his agent Hancock, paid defendant by way of deposit 10*l.*, and at the same time a memorandum in writing was signed by defendant and delivered to Hancock.

The memorandum of agreement was as follows:

March 23, 1868—Received, this day, of Mr. Boun, the sum of 10*l.*, as deposit upon purchase money for lease of two houses, being 19 and 20, Chichester-place, Wandsworth-road, S., the purchase money being 620*l.*, including fixtures, 630*l.*, purchase money, 620*l.*, deposit 10*l.*, balance 610*l.* to pay.
23/3/68. JAMES STROUD.

The signature to this receipt by the defendant was not denied.

The defendant's solicitors shortly afterwards sent to plaintiff the draft of a further contract in writing, containing stipulations and restrictions as to title and for payment of certain expenses which the plaintiff's bill alleged were properly payable by the defendant, and not by the plaintiff.

On this, the plaintiff's solicitors applied to defendant's solicitors for an abstract of defendant's title to said lease, and, thereupon, the following correspondence took place:

Staple-inn, W.C., 24th April 1868.

Dear Sirs,—Stroud to Boun. We beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter. The title we can make to this property is the same as that under which we purchased, and further than that, we can make none. We therefore inclose memorandum of agreement for your perusal, and before we deliver an abstract it must be signed. We would, however, if for your information you require explanation as to any of the clauses of the agreement, we shall be most happy to give you it. COMBE and WAINWRIGHT.

The answer to this was—

We return the draft referred to in yours of yesterday's date, and beg to refer you to our letter of the 18th inst. We must request that you will furnish an abstract of your client's title to us at once. WATSON and SONS.

This elicited the following reply:

Our client can only make such title as the draft contract we forwarded to you provides for; and unless your client is willing to accept the title as here stated, and we hear from you to that effect to-morrow, we shall deliver no abstract, but hereby rescind the contract, and we are prepared to return your client the deposit of 10*l.*, and shall proceed to resell the property. We wish you to understand that, unless you comply with the terms of this letter as above stated, the contract is hereby rescinded.
COMBE and WAINWRIGHT.

This called forth the following:

We must confess that we are quite at a loss to understand how it is possible for you or your client to rescind the contract herein without the concurrence of our client. All we can say is, that unless we receive an abstract of your client's title on or before Saturday next, there will be no alternative but to commence the necessary proceedings to compel a specific performance of the contract. WATSON and SONS.

The following concluded the correspondence:

30th April 1868.

We can only refer you to our last letter to you.
COMBE and WAINWRIGHT.

The defendant subsequently let one of the houses to a tenant. The plaintiff, wanting possession of the houses, was put to considerable expense to obtain other suitable places to carry on his business as a boot and shoe maker, and it was alleged that the possession of such house was of extreme importance to plaintiff.

The bill as amended, prayed that defendant Stroud might be decreed specifically to perform the agreement of the 23rd March, 1868, and make out a good and marketable title to the lease (the plaintiff being ready and willing &c.), and that if the said defendant should be unable so to do, or to deliver possession to the plaintiffs of the house, No. 20, he might be decreed and ordered to pay to plaintiff such damages as the court might think fit to award.

The defendant by his answer set out the particulars of several meetings and conversations between the plaintiff and his solicitors, Messrs Combe and Co., endeavouring to raise the question that the agreement set forth in the bill was only a preliminary contract, and that something else remained to be done; but it was not denied that no formal or other agreement in writing was ever entered into between the parties.

The evidence of Hancock and his nephew, who were present at the time of the signature of the contract, and payment of the 10*l.* deposit, confirmed the statements in the bill.

The receipt of the 10*l.* deposit was signed on a common receipt stamp, but the memorandum had been stamped as an agreement.

The cause now came on for a hearing.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Shebbeare, for the plaintiff, asked for the common decree for a specific performance, and contended generally that a parol agreement could not be set up to explain the terms or alter the proper construction of a formal written contract, and they asked for an order for compensation in respect of damages in the usual manner, in accordance with the decisions under Lord Cairns' Act. They referred as to the stamp to Evans v Prothero, 1 De G. M. & G. 572. They also cited Kay v. Johnson, 2 Hem. & M. 118.

Digitized by Google

Eddis, Q.C., and Robinson for the defendant, contended that it was manifest from the statements in the plaintiff's bill itself, and from the evidence in the cause that the agreement set up was not a complete and final agreement, and that something evidently remained to be done to make it so. The question as to the title of the defendant was clearly in abeyance, and a good and marketable title, as prayed for by the bill, was utterly inconsistent with the whole facts of the case. The payment of the deposit was not a part performance within the provisions of the Statute of Frauds: (Ogilvie v. Foljambe, 3 Mer. 53.) The plaintiff must be held to have waived specific performance: (Colombine v. Chichester 2 Phill. 27. The character of the damages claimed at the bar was not the same as that stated and alleged by the bill.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said it was quite clear that a person's rights under a written contract could not be taken away by a subsequent parol agreement, which, in fact, was the question which the answer of the defendant set up. The plaintiff was entitled to the common decree for a specific performance of the agreement, and a reference to chambers when a good title could be made by the defendant to the houses in question, the plaintiff not requiring the investigation of the original lessor's title. If a good title could not be made, reserve further consideration as to damages, account of principal and interest on one side, and rents and profits or occupation rent on the other. Defendant to pay plaintiff's costs.

Decree accordingly.

Solicitors: Watson and Sons, Bouverie-street; and Combe and Wainwright, Staple-inn.

Monday, Jan. 17.

SYKES v. DYSON.

Practice—Writ of sequestration—32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, ss. 4 and 8.

The proper mode of enforcing obedience to an order for payment of money into court is, having regard to the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, ss. 4 and 9, by writ of sequestration only, and not of attachment.

By an order of Vice-Chancellor James, James Dyson was ordered to pay into court on or before the 31st Dec. 1869 the sum of 475*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.*, found due from him as the legal personal representative of the testator in the cause. The order served upon him contained the usual notice that if he neglected to obey it within the time limited, he would be liable to be arrested under a writ of attachment, and also to have his estates sequestered. Default was made by Dyson in payment of the money as ordered. A writ of sequestration was then applied for, but the clerk of records and writs refused to issue one until the new practice under the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62 (Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt Act 1869) should be settled by the issue of general orders By the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62 s. 4, it is enacted:

With the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, no person shall, after the commencement of this Act, be arrested or imprisoned for making default in payment of a sum of money. There shall be excepted from the operation of the above enactment—

1. Default in payment of a penalty, or sum in the nature of a penalty, other than a penalty in respect of any contract:
2. Default in payment of any sum recoverable summarily before a justice or justices of the peace:
3. Default by a trustee, or person acting in a fiduciary capacity, and ordered to pay by a court of equity any sum in his possession or under his control:
4. Default by an attorney or solicitor in payment of costs when ordered to pay costs for misconduct as such, or in payment of a sum of money when ordered to pay the same in his character of an officer of the court making the order:
5. Default in payment for the benefit of creditors of any portion of a salary, or other income, in respect of the payment of which any court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy is authorised to make an order.
6. Default in payment of sums in respect of the payment of which orders are in this Act authorised to be made:

Provided, first, that no person shall be imprisoned in any case excepted from the operation of this section for a longer period than one year; and, secondly, that nothing in this section shall alter the effect of any judgment or order of any court for payment of money, except as regards the arrest and imprisonment of the person making default in paying such money.

And by sect. 8 it is enacted that

Sequestration against the property of a debtor may, after the commencement of this Act, be issued by any court of equity in the same manner as if such debtor had been actually arrested.

F. G. Wood referred to the above stated sections of the Act, and suggested that the right course would be to issue a writ of sequestration without issuing a writ of attachment.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion that, having regard to the provisions of the Act, a writ of sequestration, and not of attachment, should be issued.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 16 and 17, 1869.

POUPARD v. FARDELL.

Patent—Injunction—Novelty—Sufficiency of specification—Practice—Admissibility of evidence.

In Feb. 1859 P. obtained a patent for skids or shoes for skidding wheels, with a tail piece projecting from the back part and top of the skid-chamber, carried entirely through the part of the shoe, P. finding the best results from carrying it upwards, but not limiting himself to so shape it, the skid forming a segment of a circle. In 1866 F. made and used skids substantially similar to P.'s, but, being remonstrated with, he had the tails cut off; but after two years again used them by having the tails either drawn out from the existing iron or put on again. The evidence of user was directly conflicting, P.'s witnesses swearing to non-user previously to the patent, and F.'s to actual user for many previous years. Evidence of artillerymen and others on behalf of P. was admitted, after the hearing had commenced, but the admission of evidence to rebut that refused, chiefly on the question of value and novelty:

Held, that the invention was valuable, novel, and the patent valid, and the evidence as to prior user failed, the witnesses being unworthy of credit.

Semble, a specification of a patent may consist of figures, or one figure only, or of a description aided by a figure or figures, and it is not bad if the specification is not complied with, irrespective of the drawings.

This bill was filed by William Poupard, of Blackfriars-road, engineer, against Thomas Fardell, of Hermitage-street, Wapping, carman, to restrain the defendant from making or using any skids or shoes made upon the principle of or according to the pattern of the plaintiff's invention, and from in any manner making or using the plaintiff's said invention, or any copy or imitation thereof. That the defendant might be decreed to give up upon oath any skids or shoes in his possession, made according to the principle or pattern of the plaintiff's said invention or a copy or imitation thereof, and for an account, damages, and costs. The bill stated that the plaintiff was the first and true inventor of a certain invention for an improved skid or shoe for the skidding of wheels in descending inclines, and by letters patent, &c., dated 19th Jan. 1859, the sole privilege was given to him in the usual way during the term of fourteen years to use and vend the invention. The specification was as follows:—"My invention consists in constructing a skid or shoe for the skidding of wheels in descending inclines, with a tail-piece projecting from the back part and top of the skid chamber. This tail-piece may be carried entirely through the front of the shoe. I prefer to form it of wrought iron or steel, while the body of the shoe may be made of cast or wrought iron. I find the best results to be obtained where the projecting tail-piece is carried upwards, but I do not limit myself to so shaping it."

Digitized by Google

This was accompanied by outline sections of the skid, showing it with a wheel entering it, with the usual references to the drawings by letters. The specification also contained this passage:—"And having now decided the nature of the said invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed, I declare that I claim the construction of a wheel-skid or shoe, with a tail piece projecting from the back part and top of the skid chamber, as hereinbefore described and illustrated in the accompanying drawings." The bill then alleged that the plaintiff's invention acquired considerable reputation, and was largely used, and became of considerable value to the plaintiff, and he made and sold large numbers of skids or shoes, made according to the said invention. That the defendant was a carman, carrying on an extensive business in the city of London in the neighbourhood of the docks, and using various vans, waggons, carts, and other carriages for the conveyance of goods and merchandise. That in Feb. 1868 the plaintiff discovered that the defendant was using skids and shoes for skidding the wheels of his vans and waggons, made according to the principle and pattern of the plaintiff's invention, which were not made and sold by the plaintiff, and were in fact direct copies or imitations of the skid or shoe so invented by the plaintiff, for the protection of which invention the letters patent were granted; and upon inquiry the plaintiff discovered that the said skids or shoes so used by the defendant were made by his direction by his own workmen. On the 11th Feb. 1868 the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant in the Court of Exchequer to recover damages, and the defendant entered an appearance; but on inquiry the plaintiff discovered that the making and using of skids in imitation of the plaintiff's by the defendant was on so extensive a scale that it was necessary to apply to this court to restrain such use, and thereupon the plaintiff discontinued the action and filed the bill, alleging further that the patent was in full force, and the contined invasion of it by the defendant, and praying as above. On the motion for the injunction coming on, the case stood over until the present hearing.

The plaintiff's evidence was, that having by chance seen the inefficient way in which an ordinary skid acted one day on Blackfriars-bridge—the carter being obliged to use a wisp of straw, the object of keeping the wheel in the skid even then not being effected; on his return home the idea struck him as to how the difficulty might be obviated. The result was that he constructed the skid (for which he afterwards took out the patent), and tried it at night down all the London hills with perfect success. He then took out his patent, and his skid was supplied to between 500 and 600 omnibuses, besides other carriages. The plaintiff continued to make his skids according to his patent until 1866, when, having discovered that the defendant was using similar ones, which he had caused to be manufactured for his carts, being a carman in Hermitage-street, Wapping, the plaintiff remonstrated with him by letter, and the use of the skids was discontinued—in this sense, that the tails of the skids were cut off. In February 1868 the plaintiff again became aware that the defendant was using skids shaped as before, and the result was the present suit. One hundred and ten witnesses were examined by affidavit, and some others in court. The latter were the plaintiff, some of the defendant's witnesses, Col. Philpot, of the Royal Horse Artillery, and several artillerymen. A great number of skids, models, and articles which had been actually used, or capable of being used, were made exhibits and produced in court, and these might be divided into three classes—the ordinary skids used before the date of the patent, the plaintiff's patented skids, and the field-service skid used by the Artillery for their guns. The old skids were formed flat, with raised sides, a handle, with an eye behind, and finishing at the other end somewhat abruptly, so as to form a sort of short trough for the wheel. Upon that there were improvements by bevelling off the corners or the raised sides, or, in their places, substituting two pairs of lugs or ears, and sloping off the substance of the floor of the skid. The field-service skid was very massive, also with a straight or level bottom, and a large subtension of the hinder part, with an eye in it to hook on to the gun carriage, and two pairs of lugs or ears, one pair having eyes in them. The plaintiff's were formed of two pieces of iron, or one of iron and one of steel, as described in his specification, with a projecting tail-piece of the upper plate, with two lugs or ears standing alternately or in pairs, and the whole chamber or course of the skid between the lugs forming a segment of a circle.

The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff went to show that the invention was a new one, and its action most successful, the idea having occurred to the plaintiff as above stated, and he not being able to discover from all the inquiries he had made that such a skid had ever been made or used. The defendant's witnesses admitted on cross-examination that in 1866 when the defendant was remonstrated with, by his orders the tail pieces of the skids were cut off; but after a lapse of time, nothing further being heard of the matter, they were resumed in the lengthened shape, by drawing out, as smiths technically term it, the iron if there was substance enough, or if not, as the witnesses said, "shoving" on another piece. A question arose as to the admissibility of evidence on behalf of the plaintiff after the cause had come to a hearing, but this being decided in favour of the plaintiff, the evidence was admitted. This consisted of the Royal Artillery witnesses and some others, all examined in court viva voce, and an application subsequently made on behalf of the defendant by W. W. Mackeson, Q C. to allow the examination of the witnesses to rebut this testimony was refused, the Vice-Chancellor considering it inadmissible, as in fact it amounted to new evidence; but he also considered that if admitted it would have made no difference in his view of the case. As to the service skid, it amounted to this, that in place of the tail-piece there was a massive eye-piece, which, being there only for the purpose of hanging on to the gun, was in the way and acted detrimentally, and was dangerous when used by a novice; whereas all the artillerymen, including Col. Philpot, considered the principle of the plaintiff's invention totally different and much better than the service skid. The defendant's evidence was that the plaintiff's invention, so-called, was not new, but had been known for some years antecedently to the patent, and the plaintiff's inquiries had been limited to London, it not being pretended that he had inquired either in Liverpool or Edinburgh—had he done so the result would have been probably different; that the principle of the plaintiff's and the field service skid was precisely the same; that the incline was also the same when used; and that in 1854-5 the defendant had his skid altered and lengthened by a tail-piece put on the upper plate with a curve. The defendant's witnesses were some of them his workmen, but others were quite independent. George Burrows, a wheelwright for forty years, swore that from 1835 to 1843 he was employed as foreman by Mr. Hamilton, a large coach proprietor at Hampstead, and afterwards by one Basil, of Clerkenwell, and he had superintended the making of skids during that time substantially the same as the plaintiffs, with a tail-piece extending four or five inches from the top plate, which was sometimes riveted and sometimes welded, and he referred to the plaintiff's skid as an exhibit. Other witnesses, workmen of the defendant, swore substantially also to prior user, while there were others produced by the plaintiff who distinctly denied that fact. There was, therefore, a direct conflict on this material question of user.

Glasse, Q.C. and Bovill, for the plaintiff, upon the evidence, contended that the value and novelty of the invention had been sufficiently made out, and that it had also been distinctly proved that the defendant had used skids made by his order precisely like the patented article, and that therefore the plaintiff was entitled to what he asked. The evidence of Burrows and the other witnesses was entirely met, and was unworthy of credit.

W. W. Mackeson, Q.C., Stevens, and W. W. Cooper for the defendant.—The question is the novelty of the plaintiff's invention, whether the patented principle of the plaintiff's skid was in use before Jan. 1859; not whether it was better than skids previously in use, not whether it was serviceable, or a better article than that used by the defendant; or the field service skid used at Woolwich, but whether the patented principle was to be found as clearly developed in one as in the other. If that principle was found in any one skid before Jan. 1859 the plaintiff's patent was bad, therefore it was most material for the plaintiff's case to ascertain what that patented principle was, and if even there was a plain principle it was the plaintiff's. The skill of the invention, or of the description of it was not denied; but he was not the first inventor of what he so clearly described. He had separated the essential feature from all the rest, which were merely useful adjuncts. The words of the specification sufficiently showed what it was, viz., "a tail piece projecting from the back part and top of the skid chamber as hereinbefore described." The curvature of the skid and tail were simply useful adjuncts, but not the principle. Therefore a straight tail piece and skid would be as much an infringement as a curved one. It was not stated that the tail was to be long or short, the depth of the side was no part of it, nor the welding nor bolting; and that all these things were mere adjuncts was shown by the concluding sentence: "I prefer to form the tail piece of a curve, &c., but this shape can be varied." Now it had been said that this curvature was the essential feature, and yet the plaintiff, in purchasing the fourteen years' monopoly, distinctly said it was not. The words "hereinbefore described" referred to the "tailpiece," and to nothing else. He told the public it was only a curve that he preferred, and therefore he left the "tailpiece," the naked principle. Drawings might be used for reference, but the principle must be found in the specification itself: Ex parte Fox, 1 Ves. & Beames, 67, where Lord Eldon held that the specification must contain the patented principle without the drawing. Suppose the plaintiff did not know of any other skids, and that he did invent the patented one; if it was not new he was not in a better position, because he was ignorant. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR referred to Fox v. Jones, 15 W. R. 195.] None of the Woolwich witnesses had ever seen the specification before they went into the box: (Crompton v. Ibbitson, Coryton on Pat. 132, Dan. & Lloyd 33.) A patent which fails in any one particular failed entirely:

Jordan v. Moore, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 625;
Reg v. Arkwright, Dav. Pat. 106;
Simpson v. Holliday, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 99; L. Rep. 1 H. of L. Cas. 315;
Young v. Fernie, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 861;
Manton v. Manton, Dav. Pat. 350.

The description was exactly that of the Woolwich field service skid, and anyone following the specification, and making a skid after that description, would be misled.

Glasse, Q.C. in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is a very expensive litigation, the case having occupied six days in hearing, as to the validity of a patent taken out by the plaintiff, there being no less than 110 affidavits and twenty witnesses examined viva voce for the first time at the hearing. The litigation is to be regretted, because the testimony is clear, the facts scarcely being disputed by the defendant's counsel. The improvement introduced by the plaintiff is of great public utility, and extensively adopted and acquiesced in by the public for ten years before the bill was filed. The value of the patent to the plaintiff is, probably, considerable, while the success of the defendant would only lead to this, that during the three remaining years of the patent, which expires in Jan. 1873, he would be entitled to manufacture skids without purchasing them from the plaintiff; the defendant using ten annually, for which he would pay the plaintiff 6*l.*, on which the plaintiff would, probably, make a profit of 5*s.* each; the defendant, therefore, in four years, would be 10*l.* or 12*l.* in pocket. Almost all skilled in this matter have borne testimony to the value of this improvement. The defendant and the plaintiff have no business connection, and the case being most fairly conducted by counsel, why it should be so litigated by the defendant it was difficult to see, for any how he must have considerable costs to pay, and it is deeply to be deplored that I have to perform the function of a judge and jury, to decide on the facts and evidence, on the conflict of testimony, and on the law of the case. With respect to the merits of the improvement they are not in question, the defendant's counsel candidly admitted that it was an improvement, and the use of it by the defendant was the best evidence that he thought it so. The validity of it is in question upon two grounds. First, that the plaintiff was not the first inventor, and therefore that it was not novel; that it is important is not in dispute. Secondly, with regard to the insufficiency of the specification, it was very remarkable that that part was mainly insisted on by the defendant's three counsel, all being men of considerable experience. As to the novelty, the plaintiff asserts, and the defendant denies it, and relies on prior user. On the facts there was the evidence as to user by a Mr. Hamilton, a coach proprietor at Hampstead, by a Mr. Basil, at Clerkenwell, as to the field service skid, of the Royal Artillery, and of the defendant himself. As to Mr. Hamilton, that depends on the evidence of George Burrows, a wheelwright for forty years, who deposed that he was foreman to Hamilton from 1835 to 1843, and he swears that the work being performed under his direction, the skids most commonly in use for Paddington omnibuses and gentlemen's carriages, had a top-plate, with a tail-piece nearly four or five inches long, so formed that the tip caught the wheel, being sometimes welded and sometimes riveted, and that for thirty-two years and upwards [The Vice-Chancellor referred to the evidence.] I need scarcely say that if I believe this witness there is an end of the patent, because the law is clear, as Gibbs, C. J. expresses it that if one witness proves the use of the patented article before the date of the patent, it is bad. But I do not require such citation. Is this evidence true? On the probabilities, if this skid was used for thirty years on carriages so notorious as those running on the Hampstead-road, it must have been known, and yet the testimony of employers of the Omnibus Company was that they had never heard of it, which, if it had been so, is simply impossible. Contrast Burrows's evidence then with that of the other witnesses, and they swore they had never heard of it. He was cross-examined, and the result was most unsatisfactory. I do not mean to say he intended to commit perjury; but from beer, or some other cause, his brain was confused, and he told me he could not remember what took place a week ago. His demeanour was also most unsatisfactory, as was that of another witness, and if it depended on his evidence I should come to the conclusion as I do, that it is not to be relied upon. Other witnesses came and stood the severest test, and they deposed that he was not foreman, and pointedly contradicted him in the most important particulars. Then there were the Royal Artillery witnesses, Col. Philpot, a scientific gentleman, Sergt.-Major Henderson, as intelligent and straightforward a witness as I ever saw, and others; and they all swore that although in the field service skid there is a tail-piece, it is not to guide the wheel, but to hook it to the gun carriage; and although so-far important, was not an advantage, but detrimental. This evidence goes to this, that it is distinct from the plaintiff's, which is far superior and of great public utility, and that they never saw anything like it before. Therefore, on this evidence, on Burrows's and the other witnesses', I come to the conclusion that the case of prior user entirely fails. There are the same number of witnesses on each side, one set saying that it was used years before the patent, the other set that it was not; and I must believe one set and disbelieve the other. The defendant was largely engaged in trade, and employed many vehicles and skids from 1859 till 1866, when the plaintiff wrote to him; and if he had used such as the plaintiff's from 1854, why did he not at once say so. He was not himself cross-examined, but others were, and the evidence was overwhelming, that if the defendant had used any such skid, it must have been known, and it was not. Why cross-examination on this point was abandoned was incomprehensible, for the evidence was diametrically opposed to that of the defendant. [The Vice-Chancellor referred to the evidence.] The evidence is this, that the defendant brought the letter into the forge and said they were going to be transported, and the laugh went round, but the result was that the skid tails were all cut off. This evidence was perfectly satisfactory, and I come to the conclusion, without any hesitation, that the defendant is wrong when he states that from 1854 to 1856 he used and made skids of this description, and involving the same principle with a tail piece, and curvature. This invention, therefore, is properly the subject of a patent, is novel, and that it is important is admitted. Then there is that testimonial signed by eighty of the largest firms and the acquiescence of the public in the user for ten years. On these grounds justice requires that any court before which such a question arises shall incline to support rather than destroy such a patent. That is my view of the law; and if ever there was a case in which the specification required a benignant interpretation this is that case. There are misstatements of the defendant's which amount to untruth, and his objections are most frivolous; and it would have been far wiser to have purchased of the plaintiff and obtained his licence to make, instead of vexatiously opposing him. But, however this may be, the law must be strictly administered; and however great the merits of the plaintiff, and however much the public may have acquiesced, if he fails to comply with the law and has not fulfilled the bargain which he made by the Crown with the public, that, in consideration of the granting of the patent, he should make a full and fair disclosure, so as to enable persons ordinarily skilled, by taking up the specification with the drawings, to produce the subject of the patent, he must fail. Has he complied with the law? I think the argument that he has not, completely falls to the ground. The case relied on is Ex parte Fox (sup.), where Lord Eldon laid down the rule that the specification must be complied with, irrespective of the drawing; and if not the patent is bad. Now, of course I should be most reluctant to suppose that anything laid down by Lord Eldon was wrong, but I confess, although that was the rule then, the great improvements of science since that time, as instanced by the inventions of locomotives, electric telegraphs, &c., have made it impossible that it can be now adhered to. Look at any of these modern inventions, they are utterly unintelligible, even to a skilful engineer, without the drawings; and therefore it is not surprising that that rule can be no longer the law. A specification may consist of figures or one figure only; or it may consist of a description aided by the figure or figures. [The Vice-Chancellor then referred to Coryton on Patents, 140.] That rule, therefore, is no longer a rule, and a specification may be good although it consists of a drawing only. The specification here, although it has had various objections made to it, is very short. [The Vice-Chancellor read it.] I do not think that any ordinarily skilled workman upon perusing it would have any difficulty in reproducing the article for which the plaintiff claims a patent. The specification is, therefore, I consider, sufficient, and there is nothing in it calculated to mislead the public. I cannot come to the conclusion that the addition of the words at the end vitiate the patent, although, perhaps, they had been better omitted. On the rule, therefore, laid down in Lewis v. Marling, 10 B. & C. 27, the specification complies with the law, and the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for a perpetual injunction, with an account and a reference as to damages. The defendant must pay the costs of the suit, including the costs of the motion.

Digitized by Google

Solicitor for the plaintiff, C. Wilkin.

Solicitors for the defendant, Marriott, Jordan, and Cooper.

Friday, Nov. 19.

WARD v. WARD.

Practice—Partition—Demurrer—Joint-owner—Retention of bill for a year.

W. alleged a joint ownership of copyholds by two persons for twenty years and present possession by one of them (who survived the other) and by herself as joint-owners, and, claiming particular shares on special allegations, prayed for declaration of rights and a partition in the usual way. On general demurrer to this bill:

Held, that the allegation of present possession as joint-owners must be taken to mean in fee, and as, on a petition the court might direct an inquiry as to the rights, and the plaintiff might be declared entitled, the demurrer must be overruled. Also, that even if the court considered W. ought first to prove her title at law, the bill would not be dismissed but retained for a year to give her that opportunity.

This was a general demurrer to a bill filed by Caroline Ward against Robert Ward and William Brown praying that the rights and interests of the plaintiff and defendants in certain copyholds might be ascertained, and for a partition. The bill stated that Robert Lenton being seised in fee of certain copyholds holden of the manor of Gretton, in Northamptonshire, and having surrendered the same to the use of his will, executed that testament dated 28th Feb. 1795, by which, inter alia, he gave and devised to his wife Jane Lenton, all the rest of his copyholds situate in Gretton, which he had surrendered to the use of his will, for her life, and from and after her decease he gave and devised the same unto his son-in-law Bryan Ward and his daughter Rebecca, his wife, for the term of their natural lives, and from and after the decease of the survivor of them, then he gave and devised the same to the use and behoof of all the children of his said daughter, Rebecca the wife of the first Bryan Ward, both male and female, in equal proportions, they to take and enjoy the same as tenants in common and not as joint-tenants.

The bill further stated that the testator died the 5th April 1796, and the plaintiff was advised, and it was the fact, that the children of the said Rebecca Ward took only estates for their lives as tenants in common under the will, and the reversion descended to the testator's customary heir. That the widow was admitted at a court holden on the 17th Oct. 1796, and that no admittance had been subsequently made. That on the death of the widow, which occurred shortly after 1796, Rebecca Ward, the second tenant for life took possession, and it was occupied jointly by her two sons, Robert Lenton Ward and Bryan Edward Ward, who paid her rent in equal moieties up to the death of Robert Lenton Ward in Aug. 1836, and thenceforth his son, Robert Ward, and Bryan Edward Ward continued in possession up to the death of Rebecca Ward on the 9th Oct. 1841, her husband Bryan Ward having died in her lifetime, she having only three children, the two sons and Rebecca, who married one Muggleton, and secondly one Laxton. That on the 30th June 1837 15a. 3r. 4p. were awarded by the Inclosure Commissioners to Rebecca Ward in lieu of her copyhold rights and the lands directed by the Act to be inclosed. From the death of Rebecca Ward on the 9th Oct. 1841 up to the death of Bryan Edward Ward on the 12th May 1862 (a period of upwards of twenty years), the defendants Robert Ward and Bryan Ward occupied the entirety of the estates as joint owners without paying any rent (except the quit rents), or making any acknowledgment of title to any person, and without any claim being made by any other person to any part, or share of or in the said estate. That Rebecca Laxton, the only daughter and last surviving child of Rebecca Ward, died in August 1862. That from the death of Bryan Edward, her son John Thomas Ward, and the defendant Robert Ward, continued to occupy the entire estate as joint owners without paying rent (except quit rents) or making acknowledgment, or any person making a claim. That John Thomas Ward by his will, dated in July 1867, devised all his real estates to his wife Caroline Ward (the plaintiff) in fee, and all his personal estates (subject to debts, &c.) to her absolutely, and appointed her sole executrix. That John Thomas Ward died in January 1869, leaving the plaintiff surviving, who proved his will in April following; and by the 10th paragraph of the bill that since his death and to the present time the defendant Robert Ward and the plaintiff had continued and now were in the possession and enjoyment of the said copyholds as joint owners. That the customary heirs of the said Robert Lenton at his death were his three daughters, Mary the said Rebecca Ward, and Jane. Mary was twice married, and had issue first two daughters only, who both died, and, secondly, an only son, William Brown. That Mary Brown died in 1811 intestate (having survived her second husband), and leaving William Brown her customary heir. That he married and had issue a son, William Brown, who died an infant, aged five months, in 1820, and a second son William Brown (the defendant), who on his death intestate he left his customary heir, and also customary heir of Mary Brown. The bill then alleged the deaths of Rebecca Ward (intestate as to real estate), of her eldest son, and of her second son, intestate as to real estate, and leaving the husband of the plaintiff his customary heir. That questions had arisen regarding the rights and shares of the several parties in the copyholds; the defendant William Brown claiming as customary heir of his father or of his grandmother, and as one of the customary co-heirs of the testator's widow, to three equal undivided one-sixths; whereas the plaintiff insisted, and it was the fact, that she and the defendant Robert Ward were entitled by reason of such possessions of Robert Ward and Bryan Edward Ward, and John Thomas Ward, and of the plaintiff, and of the Statute of Limitations, in equal shares to three equal undivided one-fourths in the said copyhold property, and the defendant William Brown to the remaining one equal one-fourth, and the bill prayed a declaration of right and partition as above.

Cole, Q. C., and Horsey, in support of the demurrer, for Robert Ward and William Brown, insisted that the particulars of the title alleged must be shown:

Cartwright v. Pulteney, 2 Atk. 350;
Potter v. Waller, 2 De G. & Sm. 417;
Bolton v. Bolton, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 298; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 296, note to Slade v. Barlow.

Where the legal estate is in question, that cannot be made the subject of an ejectment or partition. The plaintiff's case was founded solely on the statute, and confined to one-third. In 1841 two persons were in possession—one as owner and the other as a stranger as to this one-third—i.e. Robert Ward as customary heir, Bryan Edward Ward as a stranger. Therefore, occupying till May 1862, they acquired a title under the statute, and the bill alleging them jointly entitled in fee on the death of Bryan Edward Ward, the one-third survived to Robert Ward; but then it was alleged that his son, John Thomas, continued to occupy with Robert Ward jointly, and therefore it was useless to talk of the statute. On the death of John Thomas, therefore, Robert continued sole owner; and by the allegations of the bill the plaintiff only alleged a title in herself, not showing how she was in possession, and the title therefore centred in Robert Ward.

Glasse, Q.C., and Townsend, in support of the bill, contended that the defendants, one as occupier and the other as a stranger, could not join in a demurrer to a bill for a partition. The demurrer must be allowed of both or none. Joint ownership was not joint tenancy, and, being copyhold, there could be no disseisin, except as to the lord. One being in possession rightly, the other wrongfully, there could be no joint tenancy; and from 1841 there was adverse possession by those under whom the plaintiff claimed, and a continuing title; and the bill was filed with the consent of one of the demurring defendants. If there was only a prima facie title, it might be necessary to go to law; but then, as in Bolton v. Bolton (sup.), and Slade v. Barlow (sup.), the court would retain the bill for a year. The words "equal moiety" showed that there could not be a joint tenancy. There was uninterrupted possession since 1841, and the statute barred both the remedy and the rights.

Cole, Q.C., was heard in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The allegations in this bill place matters in a great state of confusion. I have seldom seen anything less clear. I need not say that I shall not allow this demurrer, unless I consider that the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief on the allegations in the bill at the hearing. This is a bill for a partition and sale, and that the rights, interests, and shares of the parties may be ascertained and declared under the direction of this court. The case set up was one of adverse possession. I cannot overlook the tenth paragraph of the bill, which I can only read as an allegation that the plaintiff and Robert Ward had continued and now were in possession as joint owners in fee, and, if so, the right of the plaintiff to a partition was a matter of course; but the bill goes on with allegations which raise doubts on the subject. Now, with respect to a suit for partition, what is the practice? It is an inquiry what are the respective rights, and upon the result of that inquiry the plaintiff may turn out to be entitled at the hearing, and, if so, if there is a chance of that it is impossible to allow the demurrer. It may be that the court will not make a decree, but allow the plaintiff to try the case by an action; but it may be otherwise, and it is impossible to say, therefore, that she may not be entitled to some relief. I agree with Mr. Cole that it is for the plaintiff to say what the title is; but, even if she should be put to the legal remedy, the practice is not to dismiss the bill, but, as was decided in Bolton v. Bolton (sup.), by Vice-Chancellor Stuart, which was confirmed by the Lords Justices on appeal, to retain it for a year, in order that the plaintiff may take such proceedings as he may deem necessary to establish his title. The same point came before Vice-Chancellor James, in Slade v. Barlow (sup.), and he followed Bolton v. Bolton (sup.), and directed the bill to be retained for a year, with liberty to the plaintiff to bring an action. Now it may be at the hearing that the court will dismiss this bill; but I cannot see that sufficiently clearly to allow the demurrer. It must therefore be overruled in the usual way.

Solicitor for plaintiffs, Robert Southee.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 3 and 4, and Jan. 12.

KNOX v. TURNER.

Grant of annuity to secure a loan—Assurance on grantor's life—Policy effected by grantee with grantor's money—Repurchase of annuity—Grantee's right to policy.

Where the grantor of an annuity upon repurchase of the annuity, and the extinction of all his obligations to the grantee, filed a bill to have delivered up to him a policy of assurance effected on his life by and in the name of the grantee, but with the money of the grantor;

The court, following the decision in Gottlieb v. Cranch, dismissed the bill, but without costs.

Observations on Gottlieb v. Cranch, 4, De G. M. & G. 440.

The question in this case was as to the right of a grantor of an annuity upon repurchase of the annuity to have delivered up to him a policy of assurance which had been effected on his life by the grantee, under these circumstances:—

By an indenture dated the 26th June 1839, and made between the plaintiff, Brownlow William Knox, of the one part, and William Turner, deceased, of the other part, after reciting (inter alia) that the plaintiff had contracted with the said William Turner for the absolute sale to him of an annuity of 318*l.* sterling to be paid to him the said W. Turner, his executors, administrators, or assigns, during the life of the plaintiff, but repurchasable upon the terms thereinafter expressed, and that the sole and bona fide consideration to be given for the purchase of the said annuity was the sum of 3999*l.* sterling; and reciting that upon the contract for the sale and purchase of the said annuity of 318*l.* it was agreed that the same should be secured by an assignment unto the said W. Turner, his executors, administrators, and assigns, upon the trusts and with the powers thereinafter contained of the dividends to become due during the life of the plaintiff from certain sums of stock to which he was entitled under his marriage settlement. And reciting that upon the contract for the sale and purchase of the said annuity it was further agreed that the same should be secured by a judgment to be entered up against the plaintiff at the suit of the said W. Turner, his executors, administrators, and assigns, by means of a warrant of attorney thereinafter recited. And reciting that in pursuance and further performance of the said recited agreement the plaintiff by his warrant of attorney had authorised his attorneys to suffer judgment to be entered up against him for the sum of 7998*l.*, money borrowed, besides costs of suit, and that judgment was intended to be forthwith entered up against the plaintiff under the authority of the said warrant, subject nevertheless to such defeasance as therein contained and thereinafter noticed. The dividends and interest of the said sums of stock were assigned to the said W. Turner, his executors, administrators, and assigns upon certain trusts for securing payment of the said annuity. And the plaintiff for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators covenanted with the said W. Turner, his executors, administrators, and assigns, that he would at any time thereafter, when required by the said W. Turner, his executors, administrators, or assigns, personally attend at any office or offices of insurance in London or Westminster for the purpose and to the end that a policy or policies of insurance might be obtained by and at the expense of the said W. Turner, his executors, administrators, or assigns on the life of him, the said plaintiff. And further that he the plaintiff should not nor would at any time during the continuance of the said annuity go on the seas or in any parts beyond the seas, or enter or engage, or be employed in actual service in any military or naval capacity, without giving to the said W. Turner, his executors, administrators, and assigns, as early notice thereof as might be, and that in case the said W. Turner should have previously insured, or should insure, any sum or sums of money not exceeding 3999*l.* on the life of the plaintiff, and should pay any additional rate of insurance by reason of the plaintiff's going on the seas, &c., he, the plaintiff, his heirs, executors, or administrators, should reimburse the said W. Turner, his executors, administrators, or assigns, such sum or sums. And it was thereby declared and agreed between the said parties to the deed that the said warrant of attorney and the judgment to be entered up under and by virtue of the same, and also the deed itself were given, and to be entered up in consideration of one and the same sum of 3999*l.*, and not for securing several annuities of 318*l.*, and that no execution should be issued upon the judgment to be entered up as aforesaid until or unless the whole or part of some half-yearly or other portion of the said annuity thereby secured, or intended so to be, should be in arrear for twenty-one days. And it was thereby further declared and agreed that in case the plaintiff or his assigns should, at any time after the expiration of one year from the date of the said deed, be desirous of repurchasing the said annuity, and should pay unto the said W. Turner, his executors, administrators, or assigns, the said sum of 3999*l.*, and also every sum of money which should be then due and owing for or on account of the said annuity, together with a proportionate part of the same annuity, if requisite, up to and inclusive of the day of paying the same; and likewise should pay unto the said W. Turner, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all such sums of money as should be then due and owing to them respectively, for or on account of such costs, charges, and expenses, as respectively should have been advanced, paid, or incurred, in or about the execution of the trusts aforesaid, or in, or about recovering, or enforcing payment of the said annuity, when in arrear, or in or about the payment of any such extra rate of insurance as aforesaid, then and in that case the said W. Turner, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should and would accept the said sum of 3999*l.*, as and for the price of re-purchase of, and satisfaction for the said annuity, and immediately after such re-purchase, the said annuity should cease and determine, and the said dividends, interest, and annual proceeds respectively thereby assigned, or intended so to be, should be re-assigned unto the plaintiff, or his assigns, and satisfaction should be acknowledged on the judgment to be entered up under the aforesaid warrant of attorney. Yet so that every or any such act, deed, matter, or thing, should be at the cost and charges in all things of the plaintiff, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns.

Contemporaneously with the execution of the above deed, judgment was entered up, upon a warrant of attorney, against the plaintiff, pursuant to the provisions contained in the deed.

The plaintiff, by his bill, alleged that the above transaction, although in form a grant of an annuity, was in fact a loan of 3999*l.* at interest; that it was agreed between himself and Turner that an insurance on his life should be effected in the name of Turner, but at his, the plaintiff's cost, as part of the security of the annuity, and that the amount of the annuity should be, and the same was fixed so as to include the amount of the premiums of the assurance. That accordingly either before, or contemporanously with, the execution of the deed, a policy of assurance on his (the plaintiff's) life for 4000*l.* was effected in the Legal and General Assurance Office in the name of Turner, but at his (the plaintiff's) cost, and that he (the plaintiff) paid, in advance, the premium for such assurance, amounting with duty to 112*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*

William Turner died in Jan. 1867, and by his will dated 8th May 1865, he appointed his widow, the defendant Mary Anne Turner, his executrix. Shortly after her husband's death the widow assigned all her interest under the deed of June 1839, and in the policy of assurance, to the defendants James Richard Philip Hoste and Montague Turner.

On the 30th April 1868, the plaintiff repurchased the annuity, and thereupon the defendants re-assigned to the plaintiff the dividends interest, and annual proceeds of the said sums of stock, and caused satisfaction to be entered up upon the said judgment.

The plaintiff alleged that previously to, and as one of the terms of such repurchase, he required the defendants to assign to him the policy of assurance, which, with the bonuses, was now of the value of about 2110*l.* At first the defendants were willing to comply with this request, but subsequently they claimed to be entitled to keep the policy. Eventually it was arranged that the repurchase should be completed without prejudice to the question as to whether the plaintiff or the defendants were entitled to the policy.

The plaintiff further alleged that he had duly paid the annuity, including the premiums of the assurance on his life, up to the time of the repurchasing of the annuity, and he charged that the policy, the moneys thereby assured, and the bonuses thereon were in equity his property.

The bill prayed for a declaration that plaintiff was entitled to the policy, the moneys thereby assured, and the bonuses thereon. That the defendants might be decreed to assign and make over to the plaintiff the said policy, moneys, and bonuses, and that they might be restrained from surrendering, selling, or disposing of the same. That in case the defendants should have surrendered the said policy, moneys, and bonuses to the assurance office, then that they might be decreed to pay to the plaintiff the money received by them for such surrender, and that they might in the mean time be restrained from disposing or dealing with, or applying such money, or any part thereof, to or for their own use or purpose, and might be ordered forthwith to pay the money so realised for such surrender into court to the credit of the cause, to await the decision of the court, and that they might pay the costs of the suit.

The defendants by their answer denied the plaintiff's allegation that the transaction, though in the form of a grant of an annuity was in fact a loan of 3999*l.* at interest, or that it was agreed between the parties that, as part of the security for the same, an assurance on the life of the plaintiff should be effected in the name of Turner at the plaintiff's cost, or that the amount of the annuity was fixed so as to include the amounts of the premiums of such assurance. They admitted that the plaintiff had duly paid the annuity up to the time of the repurchase, but they denied that he paid any of the premiums of the assurance, or that the annuity included the same. They admitted that at the time of the repurchase of the annuity, the plaintiff required them to assign to him the policy and the moneys thereby assured, and the bonuses thereon, but they denied that they had then, or at any time, expressed their willingness to comply with the requisition.

Greene, Q. C, and W. H. Townsend, for the plaintiff, argued that although the transaction was in the form of a grant of an annuity, it was simply a loan on a security. No other construction could be put upon the terms of the deed, and, in point of fact, if the relationship of debtor and creditor did not exist between the parties, Turner could have had no insurable interest on the plaintiff's life: (14 Geo. 3, c. 48.) The debt had been paid off, and it followed, as a matter of course, that in the absence of any express contract to the contrary, the policy, one of the securities for the debt, must be delivered up to the debtor: (Courtenay v. Wright, 2 Giff. 337.) The defendants made it part of their case that the whole expense of effecting and keeping up the assurance had been borne by Turner, but the evidence, on the contrary, clearly showed that the policy had been effected at the plaintiff's cost, and that extra payment had been exacted from him for the purpose of paying the premiums. They also cited:

Drysdale v. Pigott, 8 De G. M. & G. 546;
Freme v. Brade, 2 De. G. & J., 582;
Lea v. Hinton, 5 De G. M. & G. 823.

Dickinson, Q. C. and Bedwell, for the defendants, contended that the plaintiff in order to succeed must show that a contract existed between himself and the grantee of the annuity that he was to have the benefit of the policy after repayment of the money advanced by the grantee: (Law v. London Indisputable Life Policy Company, 1 K. & J. 223.) The deed contained no such contract, and there was none. The transaction was not a loan, but the purchase of an annuity. The ordinary relationship of debtor and creditor did not exist between the parties. By the terms of the deed there was no liability on the part of the grantor to repay the money advanced, but he was simply bound to pay the annuity; and there was no obligation on the grantee to effect the assurance. The case could not be distinguished from Gottlieb v. Cranch, 4 De G. M. & G. 440, which decided that where the grantee of an annuity assures the life of the grantor, the policy effected is the property of the grantee. Moreover, the plaintiff must fail on another ground. He was no party to the contract on the policy; there was no privity between him and the assurance office, and a contract on a policy of life assurance was not a contract of indemnity: (Dalby v. India and London Life Assurance Company, 15 C. B. 365.) It had been said that extra payment was exacted from the grantor for the purpose of securing and indemnifying the grantee against any expenses that he might be put to in effecting the policy. This the defendants denied. But assuming it to be the fact, it would not deprive the grantee of the full benefit of the policy. It was optional with him to have sold it any time before the redemption of the annuity, and if he had done so the grantor could not on redemption have claimed the proceeds of the sale. The policy was now of considerable value, and if it were to be delivered up to the grantor it would really amount to his receiving back a portion of the annuity which he had contracted to pay.

Greene, Q. C. in reply.

Jan. 12.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This case is not distinguishable from the case of Gottlieb v. Cranch (sup.). If that case is to be considered as an authoritative decision, the duty of the court now is to dismiss this bill. In the present case, as in the other, the question was as to the right of the grantor of an annuity, upon the repurchase of the annuity, and upon the extinction by payment of all his obligations to the grantee, to have delivered up a policy of assurance effected by the grantee pursuant to a stipulation binding on the grantor but not on the grantee. If the case of Courtenay v. Wright (sup.) had been brought before the Court of Appeal, the objections there suggested as to the decision in Gottlieb v. Cranch might perhaps have been considered, and might perhaps have been removed on satisfactory grounds, if they are not well founded. In the present case, as well as in Courtenay v. Wright, the arguments took a wider range, and the question was discussed on grounds beyond those which appear in the report of Gottlieb v. Cranch. In the latter case the argument was cut short, and the instruction to be derived from the report is confined to the expression of strong and clear opinions, without the support of any argument, except that founded on the option given to the grantee as to the application of the money supplied by the grantor. What seems to me unsatisfactory as to the authority of that case is that it was assumed and stated by the court to be a general and undisputed rule that, where the grantee of an annuity insures the life of the grantor, the policy effected belongs to the grantee. There is certainly no trace of any such general rule. If there were such a rule, as all arguments are silenced by a peremptory rule, the question presented for the decision of the court need not have been argued. It was, however, upon the ground of the option in the grantee to apply the money of the grantor in effecting the policy that the decision was rested. There would be great force in the argument founded on the option were it not that the terms of the transaction and the contract show that the extra payment was unquestionably exacted for the purpose of securing and indemnifying the grantee at the expense of the grantor. The option which the grantee had of retaining the extra payment for his own benefit without effecting the policy is only the option of another mode of indemnity. The argument that the grantee might at his option sell the policy at any time before redemption, and that the grantor could not on redemption claim credit for the amount produced by the sale of the policy, is a very powerful argument to show that the policy is not a security for the benefit of the grantor. Certainly, if the grantee exercised his option in that way he would seem to exercise a legitimate option of destroying any right of the grantor. In this respect the policy, if it be a security held at all for the benefit of the grantor must stand on a different footing from an ordinary security as to which there can be no such option. But there remains the question whether the grantor can be treated as having no interest in the policy which he supplied money to effect, if the grantee has not exercised the option of selling it. This question seems to be the same which arises on the option in the grantee not to effect any policy at all; and both questions must be resolved on considering the effect of the proviso for repurchase as part of the general transaction, and the reciprocal rights under the whole contract. It has been argued that the grantor and grantee of an annuity of this kind do not stand in the relation of debtor and creditor. Considering the covenants and obligations of the deed, it is impossible to sustain this proposition. What is really meant is that the grantor is not a debtor for the price of the annuity, because he is not bound to repay the price, and that the repayment by repurchase is optional. But if he exercises the option of repurchasing, he has repaid the grantee and has extinguished his debt and obligation for payment of the annuity, and both parties are restored to their previous rights. The equity of a debtor who extinguishes and satisfies the claim of his creditor is to get back all securities exacted from him for the obligation which he has discharged. But it is said that the policy of assurance is not a security because its existence was optional, and its existence and nature as a security so peculiar that not only its creation but its continuance was in the option of the creditor, who, while he remained unpaid, might have sold it for his own benefit without being accountable for the profit. None of these circumstances deprive the policy of its character as a security. It is, however, said that if it be a security it never was the property of the debtor, but is property created by the creditor out of his own money and for his own benefit. The force of that argument seems to be destroyed by the consideration that, in point of fact, and according to the terms of the contract, the debtor supplied the money which purchased the security, and was compelled by the contract to assist in effecting the security. Property purchased with money supplied by the debtor and obtained by his active concurrence, which concurrence he was bound by the contract to give for securing the creditor, is no less a security because the creditor was not bound to procure the security, and after he procured it might, during the subsistence of the debt, sell the security without being liable to account for the proceeds. When the debtor exercises the right of re-purchase, and extinguishes all his obligations to his creditor, and finds the creditor in possession of the security obtained with his money, and at his expense, and by his concurrence, why is the creditor to retain such a security, so obtained, when all his rights as a creditor are satisfied? Why is the equity of the debtor to have the security restored to be denied in such a case? In Gottlieb v. Cranch the argument, which was stopped in the appeal court, was very ably urged in the court below by the counsel for the grantee of the annuity. It mainly turned on the want of privity of the grantor as being no party to the contract on the policy. The same argument was urged in the present case, and supported by reference to the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Dalby v. India and London Life Assurance Company (sup.), which decided that the contract on a policy of life assurance is not a contract of indemnity. That is very true, as between the parties to the policy; but where the policy is effected by a creditor on a contract with his debtor, who is no party to the policy, but supplies the money and the premiums, it is an entirely different question, and unless there be some stipulation to the contrary as between the debtor and creditor, it is a security and an indemnity. And as to privity, if it be part of a written contract between a debtor and his creditor that a policy shall be effected, and money sufficient to pay the premiums be contracted to be supplied, and is supplied by the debtor, it is impossible on any true view which has yet been shown to say that a debtor who has according to the contract concurred in effecting the policy and supplied the money to effect it, is a stranger and not privy to a policy effected on such a contract, or less interested in it when effected, because the creditor had an option not to have effected it, and an option while his debt was unpaid to sell it for his own benefit. If neither option be exercised, and the security at the time of payment is found in the creditor, the debtor's right seems clear, unless it can be shown to be no security at all. A security which a creditor is not bound to obtain, cannot be less a security when it is actually obtained. Nor can the debtor whose money is invested in purchasing the security be less interested in it because his creditor was not bound so to invest it or to preserve it. No true view can be taken of the question which depends so much on the optional nature of the contract unless there is embraced in the view the circumstance that the stipulation for redemption is also an option. The payment of the debt by redemption is no less an absolute satisfaction and extinction of the creditor's rights because it is optional than his right to the security which becomes absolute if he has not exercised any option to destroy it—if, in fact, he exercised the option to take it and to expend the money supplied by his debtor in preserving it. To assume that the question is decided by treating the policy as the property of the grantee of the annuity is to argue on the equivocal meaning of the word property. That he has a property in the security is clear enough, but that his property can be considered absolute and unqualified where it is created by contract between the debtor and the creditor, and created by moneys which the debtor was bound to supply for the purpose, does not seem to me to have yet been proved by any sufficient argument. A peremptory rule would make argument unnecessary. But no such peremptory rule as was assumed by the Court of Appeal in Gottlieb v. Cranch is anywhere recorded. In Courtenay v. Wright, the cases of Lea v. Hinton (sup.), and Drysdale v. Pigott (sup.), were considered and discussed. They are in some degree distinguished from Gottlieb v. Cranch. But the latter case is so entirely similar to the present, that if it is to be overruled, it must be overruled by the Court of Appeal. I have endeavoured to explain the difficulty I have felt as [illegible] principle involved in the decision, in the hope [illegible] the question occurs again before the Court of Appeal, there may be a more full judicial consideration and exposition of the doctrine. In the mean time, for the reasons which I have stated, it is with dissatisfaction and reluctance that I feel bound to dismiss the bill in the present case. It must stand dismissed, but without costs.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Henry Smith.

Solicitor for the defendant, Montague Turner.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET, Esq., and Hon. ROBERT BUTLER, Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, Dec. 21, 1869.

ALCOCK v. GILL.

Affidavit of documents—Further affidavit—Document referred to in an ex parte examination—Costs.

A railway company having been made defendants to a suit, an affidavit as to documents was made by their secretary, who was not a defendant. The company answered, and the bill was reamended, whereupon the secretary made a second and a third affidavit as to documents. He was then examined by the plaintiffs, ex parte, on their behalf, before the examiner; and in the course of such examination deposed to the possession of certain documents not mentioned in his affidavit.

Upon summons by the plaintiffs, that the company might be ordered to make a further affidavit accounting for the documents referred to by the secretary in his examination:

Held, that the application was irregular, and summons dismissed with costs.

The expression of Selwyn, L.J., in Wright v. Pitt (L. Rep. 3 Ch. 811), that "such suspicion must be founded on the pleadings and affidavits" refers only to the affidavits as to discovery of documents, not to the general pleadings and affidavits in the cause.

When a summons is dismissed with costs, the costs will, as a general rule, include all the costs, both of the adjournment and in chambers.

This was a summons adjourned from chambers, on behalf of the plaintiffs, Henry Alcock and Robert Barr, that the defendants, the Great Western Railway of Canada, might be ordered to make a further affidavit as to documents, accounting for the documents mentioned and referred to by the secretary in his examination in the cause before the examiner; and certain papers in his custody relating to a foreclosure suit in 1860 against the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway Company, and relating to the decree in that suit, and the letters of explanation relating to the same papers, also mentioned in the examination; and that the usual directions might be given.

The plaintiffs sued on behalf of themselves and all other the subscribers for free land shares of the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway Company in England, whose shares had not been returned; and the bill prayed for a declaration that the London trustees were bound not to dispose of any of the sums subscribed by the plaintiffs and other subscribers for free land shares until the transfer of 50,000 acres of land, and other arrangements had been completed, and the whole number of 20,000 free land shares allotted.

The bill was filed on the 3rd June 1865; in 1866 the Great Western Railway of Canada were made defendants.

On the 24th Sept. 1867 Mr. Brackstone Baker, the secretary of the railway company (who had not been made a defendant) made an affidavit as to documents in the possession or power of the company.

Digitized by Google

On the 29th Nov. 1867 the company filed their answer, in which they said they were willing to make, by their proper officer, the ordinary affidavit as to the documents in their possession.

On the 21st Dec. 1868 the bill was re-amended and on the 11th March 1869 Mr. Baker made a further affidavit as to documents.

On the 28th June 1869 he made a third affidavit as to documents.

This summons was supported by an affidavit sworn the 3rd Nov., 1869, by a clerk to Messrs. Linklater and Co., the plaintiff's solicitors, who deposed that on the 6th Aug. previously, Mr. Baker, upon being examined ex parte on the part of the plaintiffs, before one of the examiners of the court, deposed that he had in his custody certain papers relating to the foreclosure suit, in 1860, against the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway Company, and relating to a sale under a decree. Deponent said he received them from time to time, no doubt, and they were accompanied by letters of explanation.

Upon the plaintiff's counsel proceeding to read this affidavit,

James Kaye (with him Fry, Q. C.), on behalf of the defendants, objected to its being read, on the ground that it was an affidavit in reply to an affidavit of documents, which, according to the established practice, the court would not allow.

Kay, Q. C., and J. W. Chitty for the application.—The rule is well settled that if it appears from any evidence in the suit that a person has documents and refuses to produce them, the court will order him to make a further affidavit. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—You have examined this gentleman, not as secretary of the company, but as your own witness. If the company make an affidavit through their secretary, and you choose to examine the secretary as a witness, have you any authority to say you can use the depositions? Can you call a public officer as a witness for the purpose of getting discovery from the company?] It is impossible to separate a man into two individuals. The case is the same as if Mr. Baker himself, the defendant to the suit, had put in an insufficient affidavit of documents, and then had himself been examined as defendant, after replication filed. The rule as to production of documents prevails through all stages of a cause, up to decree, after decree, and all through the suit. In Noel v. Noel (1 De G. J. & S. 468) Lord Justice Turner said he saw nothing in the Act to preclude the court from requiring more than one affidavit as to documents. In that case his Lordship thought there was enough to raise "a reasonable suspicion," that the defendant had further documents which might help the plaintiffs to make out their case.

Upon Kay's proceeding to read the affidavit, Kaye again objected that the statement was obtained from the witness ex parte, and the time for publication of the evidence had not yet arrived.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he thought it was irregular; the witness had been examined ex parte. The court could not look at his examination, because it was not time for it, and yet the court was asked to listen to some account of that evidence which was given by somebody who was not present.

Kay.—The publication is for our protection, not for that of the other side.

Fry.—We object to the depositions being published.

Kay.—His statement is made upon oath; it is not a mere hearsay conversation. In Noel v. Noel the further affidavit was made on a summons, as appears from the report. See also

Westminster and Brymbo Colliery Company (Limited), v. Clayton, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 534;
Wright v. Pitt, L. Rep. 3 Ch. 809; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 79.

It would be only doing justice to the parties to the cause, and not only violating no rule, but following the rule as to the balance of convenience which has been laid down by the court, to order this gentleman to make a further affidavit.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The defendants, the company, and this gentleman, their secretary, are the best judges of what is most desirable for themselves. I am not going, as a benefit to them, to force them to make any affidavit. It seems to me that this application is a mere experiment, which the case of Wright v. Pitt, L. Rep. 3 Ch. 809, ought to have prevented being made. The rule seems to me to be clearly laid down by Selwyn, L. J. I quite agree with him that an unfortunate expression was used by Turner, L.J., in Noel v. Noel. You have a right to look at the whole thing—the pleadings and affidavits, that is to say, the pleadings and affidavits given by way of discovery, and the affidavit of documents, for the purpose of seeing whether there is anything upon the face of them to show whether by slip or otherwise, the discovery is not complete. To recur to the illustration which I have adopted throughout. Suppose a man refers to a schedule of documents and says it contains six documents, and it turns out there are only five. If it appears from the answer or affidavit that there is something further in his possession, then you ask for further discovery; but to accede to this summons would be simply to say that you can cross-examine upon an affidavit of documents. The mere fact that you call the man nominally as an ex parte witness, cannot make any difference. The real truth is, that you have called this gentleman, and you have cross-examined him as to the statement made in his affidavit. It is a violation of the practice, and the result is that the summons must be refused, with costs to be paid by the applicants.

Fry asked for the costs of the whole of the summons.

Kay said that was not the usual practice. The court usually gave merely the costs of the adjournment.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I mean in future when I refuse a summons with costs, to do it wholly. I assume that the chief clerk would refuse it with costs. Until I have some reason to the contrary, I shall give the whole costs from the beginning.

Solicitors for the applicants, Messrs. Linklater, Hackwood, and Addison.

Solicitors for the company, Messrs. Maynard, Son, and Co.

Tuesday, Jan. 18.

HEALD v. WALLS.

Family arrangement—Bill—Declaration as to right of parties.

A. and B. were tenants in common of an estate in fee. A. in 1842, devised his moiety to B. for his life, with remainder to C. in fee, and devised the residue of his estate to B. in fee. C. died, living A., leaving D. her heir-at-law. B. and D., assuming that C. was originally entitled to the moiety intended to be devised to her, and that such her title had descended on D., entered into a family arrangement on that basis. In pursuance of that arrangement, B. devised his own moiety upon certain trusts for the benefit of D. and his family, and devised the residue of his estate to the defendants. A bill was filed by mortgagees of the property in question, to ascertain the rights of all the parties thereto:

Held: That the moiety of A. which was erroneously assumed to belong on his death to D., as the heir-at-law of C., passed under the residuary devise in the will of B., and was dealt with accordingly.

The plaintiffs in this suit were mortgagees of the shares and interests of John Bridge and William Bridge (hereinafter mentioned) in the subject-matter of the suit.

The facts of the case were as follow:

John Heaton and Thomas Heaton were, in the year 1842, seised as tenants in common in fee of a piece of land and nine cottages, situated in the Scholes at Wigan. John Heaton, by his will, dated 3rd June, 1842, devised his moiety or share of the lands and cottages to his wife, Mary Heaton, for her life, and after her decease to his brother, Thomas Heaton, for his life, and after his decease to his sister, Jane Dickinson, the wife of William Dickinson, and to her heirs and assigns for ever. The testator devised all the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate and effects, whatsoever and wheresover, to his brother, Thomas Heaton, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns for ever, and appointed his wife and the said Thomas Heaton trustees of his will. The testator's wife, Mary Heaton, died in the lifetime of the testator. His sister, Jane Dickinson, also died in his lifetime, leaving John Bridge her heir-at-law. John Heaton, the testator, died on the 16th Nov., 1857. It was the belief of all parties interested under the will of the said John Heaton that, according to the true construction of that will, the devise to Jane Dickinson in fee in remainder after the death of Mary Heaton and Thomas Heaton did not lapse by reason of the death of Jane Dickinson in the lifetime of the testator, but that that moiety passed, under that devise, to John Bridge as the heir-at-law of Jane Dickinson, subject to the life interest of the said Thomas Heaton. Acting upon that belief, and considering that the other children of Jane Dickinson would not take any interest in the moiety so devised, Thomas Heaton, shortly after the death of the testator, John Heaton, proposed to John Bridge that he (John Bridge) should execute a deed by which that moiety should be settled upon John Bridge and his brothers and sisters, William Bridge, Mary Taylor, and the defendants, Thomas Bridge and Martha Widdows, in equal shares. As an inducement to John Bridge to accede to that proposal, Thomas Heaton agreed that he would make a will devising the other moiety of the same premises in such a manner that John Bridge and his said brothers and sisters should be entitled to the whole of the said cottages and premises in equal shares.

Accordingly, by a memorandum of agreement dated the 23rd day of December, 1857, and made between John Bridge of the one part, and the defendants Henry Walls and Thomas Taylor of the other part, after reciting the will of the said John Heaton, "and that John Bridge had become entitled to the said moiety on the death of the said Thomas Heaton, as heir at law of the said Jane Dickinson," John Bridge agreed to convey to the defendants Henry Walls and Thomas Taylor all his share and interest of and in the said premises, upon certain trusts therein, and in the indenture next hereinafter stated. That agreement was duly executed by John Bridge in pursuance of the aforesaid arrangement, and with the full consent and concurrence of Thomas Heaton.

[illegible] indenture dated the 3rd day of May 1858, [illegible] in pursuance of the aforesaid arrangement, and between John Bridge of the first part, the defendant Thomas Bridge, William Bridge, the defendants Martha Widdows (then Martha Bridge), and Mary Taylor of the second part, after reciting the will of John Heaton, the deaths of the testator's wife and of Jane Dickinson, and that "John Bridge was then entitled to the remainder in fee simple in one moiety of the said premises, expectant on the decease of the said Thomas Heaton," it was witnessed, that in consideration of the natural love and affection which John Bridge had towards the said Thomas Bridge, William Bridge, Martha Bridge, and Mary Taylor, John Bridge granted and conveyed to the defendants Henry Walls and Thomas Taylor, their heirs and assigns, all that the remainder in fee simple expectant and to take effect in possession upon the decease of the said Thomas Heaton, of and in all that said moiety of and in the said cottages and premises, and all the estate, right, and interest of the said John Bridge therein; to hold the same unto the said Henry Walls and Thomas Taylor and their heirs, upon trust that they the said Henry Walls and Thomas Taylor, and the survivor of them, and the heirs or assigns of such survivor, should, immediately on the said remainder taking effect in possession, and thenceforth, hold and apply the same, and the rents and profits thereof, upon certain trusts for the benefit of John Bridge, Thomas Bridge, William Bridge, Martha Widdows (then Martha Bridge), and Mary Taylor, and their issue.

Thomas Heaton, by his will dated the 18th day of May, 1858, devised "his moiety of the land hereinbefore mentioned, with the said nine cottages or dwelling houses thereon," to the said Thomas Taylor and Henry Walls, their heirs and assigns, upon certain trusts in the said will mentioned for the benefit of John Bridge, Thomas Bridge, William Bridge, Martha Bridge, and Mary Taylor, and subject thereto in trust for sale and application of the proceeds as therein mentioned. The said testator devised and bequeathed all other his real and personal estate to the said Mary Taylor and Martha Widdows absolutely. And he appointed the defendants Thomas Taylor and Henry Walls trustees and executors of his said will. Thomas Heaton died on the 7th March, 1860. The questions in the cause were whether, according to the true construction of the will of John Heaton, and by virtue of the indenture of the 3rd of May, 1858, the moiety of the said cottages and premises comprised in the will of the said John Heaton was vested in the trustees of the said indenture of the 3rd of May, 1858, upon the trusts thereof? or whether it had passed under the residuary devise in the will of Thomas Heaton to the defendants Martha Widdows and Mary Taylor?

The bill in the suit accordingly prayed that the rights and interests of all parties claiming under the said indenture of the 3rd day of May, 1858, might be ascertained and declared, and the trusts thereof carried into execution. The bill also prayed that the trusts of the will of Thomas Heaton remaining unperformed might be performed and carried into execution, and the rights and interests of all parties therein and thereunder ascertained and declared by and under the direction of this Court.

E. Fry, Q.C. and North, for the plaintiffs, having stated the facts, were stopped by the Court.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and C. Russell, for the defendants contended that the only ground on which the agreement could be said to be invalid was that there was no consideration, or no sufficient one, for it. But Williams v. Williams, L. Rep. 2 Ch. 294, showed that in family arrangements consideration was always implied, and moreover, that if a sufficient motive for the arrangement is proved, the court will not consider the quantum of the consideration. In Stapilton v. Stapilton, 2 White & Tud. 745, it was held that an agreement entered into upon a supposition of a right, or of a doubtful right, though it afterwards came out that the right was on the other side, is binding, and the right does not prevail against the agreement of the parties; for the right must always be on the one side or the other, and therefore the compromise of a doubtful right is a sufficient foundation of an agreement. The following authorities were also cited for the defendants:

Stewart v. Stewart, 6 Cl. & Fin. 911;
Can v. Can, 1 P. Wms. 723 & 727;
Naylor v. Lynch, 1 Sy. & St.;
Stockley v. Stockley, 1 Ves. & B. 30.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The decree in this case must be to the following effect: First of all declare that the half part or moiety representing the interest of Thomas Heaton in the cottage and premises in question in the suit passed by the specific devise in that testator's will, and that the remaining one half part or moiety which John Bridge erroneously assumed to be his, and dealt with accordingly, passed by the residuary devise in the same will. Then there must be a decree that the trusts of the will, so far as they remain to be performed, may be carried into execution. Direct an inquiry whether any debts of the testator remain unpaid, and take an account of rents and profits since his death, not disturbing settled accounts. Subject to that declaration and decree, and to those inquiries and accounts, I am of opinion that the bill in this suit must be dismissed, but without costs, so far as the same alleges wilful default. The further consideration in the cause must be adjourned, with liberty to all parties to apply to the court as they may be advised.

Solicitors, Norris and Allen; Greatorex; Gregory, Rowcliffe and Rawle.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, Nov. 29 1869.

(Present: the Right Hon. Lord CHELMSFORD, Sir JAMES W. COLVILE, and Sir JOSEPH NAPIER.)

THE OWNERS OF THE SHIP Woburn Abbey (apps.), v. THE OWNERS OF THE STEAM-TUGS Superb AND Conqueror (resps.)

THE WOBURN ABBEY.

Salvage—Direct and indirect services — Respective merits of salvors—Appeals as to amount of salvage awarded.

A collision having occurred between two ships, the W. A. and the B. T., two steam-tugs, the S. and the C. went to their assistance. In order to extricate the W. A. it was necessary that the B. T. should be towed away from her, and the pilot of the W. A. requested the captain of the S. to perform this service. The S. then towed the B. T., but the ships still dragged. The C. arrived about half an hour after the S., and the two tugs together held the B. T. and the S., and prevented the ships from dragging further.

Held (affirming the decision of the Admiralty Court), that the benefit received by the W. A. from the services of the S. was a direct and not an indirect benefit: (The Annapolis, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 418, distinguished.) That there was no substantial difference between the merits of the S. and the C., and therefore that they were entitled to equal amounts of salvage. In appeals as to the quantum of salvage awarded, the court will not interfere with or moderate the amount awarded by the court below, unless that amount was exorbitant or excessive, though the Court of Appeal may be unable to affirm the principle on which the amount was assessed, or would have awarded a less amount than that given by the court below: (The England, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 46, followed.)

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Admiralty pronounced on the 14th Jan. 1869.

In the court below the respondents sued the ship of the appellants called the Woburn Abbey, to recover salvage earned by the respondents during a collision between the ship British Trident, and the said ship of the appellants, the Woburn Abbey.

The case was heard before the judge of the Admiralty Court, assisted by Capt. Pelley and Capt. Close, Elder Brethren of the Trinity Corporation, on the 17th, 18th, and 19th of Dec. 1868.

The circumstances of the earning of the salvage are thus stated in the petition of the respondents filed in this cause in the court below.

The Superb is an iron steam-tug belonging to the port of Liverpool, fitted with disconnecting engines of 65-horse power nominal, but working up to 150-horse power, and has an ordinary crew of eight hands all told. She is of the value of 3000*l.* or thereabouts, and is kept up by her owners at a very great expense, expressly for the purpose of rendering assistance to vessels in distress as well as for general towage purposes, and has been recently fitted up with new boilers, wheels, and feathering floats.

The Conqueror is an iron built steam-tug belonging to the port of Liverpool, fitted with disconnecting engines of 70-horse power nominal, but working up to 170-horse power, with feathering floats, and is of the value of 3500*l.*, and is kept up by her owners at a great expense expressly for the purpose of rendering assistance to vessels in distress, as well as for general towage purposes, and has an ordinary crew of eight hands all told.

The Woburn Abbey is a ship of about 1572 tons register, and was on the night of the 29th Oct. 1868, deeply laden with rice, and lying anchored in the Sloyne, in the river Mersey.

The British Trident is a ship of about 1300 tons register, and on the night in question was lying at anchor in the Sloyne, in the river Mersey, to the southward of the Woburn Abbey, and was timber laden, with a heavy deck cargo.

About 11.45 p.m., while the steam-tugs Superb and Conqueror were lying at anchor in the Sloyne, in the river Mersey, those on board of them observed that the ships Woburn Abbey and British Trident were afoul and in collision, whereupon they slipped and buoyed their anchors and proceeded to the assistance of the said two ships.

The Superb arrived at the scene of collision first, and she found the Woburn Abbey at anchor with her head to the south, and the British Trident with her stern athwart of, and in collision with, the bows of the Woburn Abbey, the head of the British Trident being then about south-south-west. They were both dragging their anchors.

It was a 15ft. 2in. tide, and was high water about 10.28 p.m. At midnight and for some hours after, the ebb tide was running very fast and strong, and the wind was blowing a moderate gale from the WNW, with squalls and showers of rain and hail, and there was a nasty swell on the river.

There were several craft of different descriptions lying to the north, to the north-west, and to the north-east of the said two ships the Woburn Abbey and the British Trident, and they were dragging in the direction of some of them, and in particular in the direction of a large ship at anchor called the Great Northern.

The Superb, after great difficulty, on account of the eddy tide, got to the starboard side of the British Trident, and asked the pilot on board of her if he wanted any assistance. And he said, "You had better go to the other ship," meaning the Woburn Abbey; "she is going to slip her chain." The Superb thereupon went to the Woburn Abbey, and those on board saw that her chain was under the keel of the British Trident, and that the two ships were about 100 yards from and to the south-east of the Halifax south mooring buoy, and dragging in that direction.

The captain of the Superb asked the pilot of the Woburn Abbey if he wanted any assistance, and thereupon the pilot said, "You had better go to the other ship and pull her from us," or words to that effect. He also said something to the effect that he was not ready or could not slip then.

Accordingly, the Superb was going to the British Trident, when the steam-tug Resolute, which had come up to the scene of the collision, being caught on her starboard side by the ebb tide, backed on the Superb's starboard side, and did her a very great deal of injury, and put the Superb in a position of great danger of being sunk.

The Resolute then got hold of the British Trident from the port bow, and commenced towing about south. The head of the British Trident had been, and was still, falling to the westward. During all this time both ships were dragging, and the British Trident was getting more and more broadside on to the ebb tide, which was running very strong.

The Superb then went close under the British Trident's port bow, and in doing so was obliged to put her engines out of gear at great risk, to enable her crew to get their own 9in. hawser on board the British Trident, which was at length accomplished after great difficulty, and it was made fast to the port bow of the British Trident.

The Superb was then ordered to tow ahead full speed, which she did after connecting her engines; this was about one a.m. The ships still continued to drag, though not so fast as they did before the Superb got hold, and about this time fouled the Halifax south mooring buoy, which they dragged with them.

After towing for about half an hour the steam-tug Conqueror came up and got hold of the British Trident, and assisted at towing at the said ship, the Conqueror being on the starboard side of the steam-tug Resolute, and by her aid the three tugs, after towing full speed for some time, held the British Trident, and prevented the two ships from dragging any further. The tide at this time was at its strongest ebb, and was very strong and powerful.

At about four a.m. the hawser of the Superb parted, and it was some time and with great difficulty, that it was again made fast to the port bow of the British Trident. The tugs then continued pulling until between four and five a.m., when the British Trident was pulled so far away from the Woburn Abbey that the latter ship was enabled to slip her chain, which she could not accomplish before, and was then taken away by two other tug-boats.

Before and during the time the Superb, Conqueror, and Resolute were towing, the ships had some of their sails set to endeavour to get clear of each other, and about from one a.m. to two a.m. the Woburn Abbey and the said ship Great Northern burned blue lights, and at the time the British Trident was towed away from the Woburn Abbey the two ships Woburn Abbey and British Trident were so close to the Great Northern that they must have come into collision with her in a very few minutes, and the Great Northern must then have been dragged from her anchor.

Just before the Conqueror, got hold of the British Trident, and while endeavouring to do so, the steam-tug Royal Alfred, one of the boats that subsequently towed the Woburn Abbey away after she had slipped her anchor, came into collision with the Conqueror, doing her great damage and putting her in great peril of being sunk.

The Superb lost two tides in recovering the anchors she had slipped when she first went to the assistance of the colliding ships.

The judge of the Admiralty Court awarded 350*l.* apiece to the Superb and the Conqueror for the services rendered by them to the Woburn Abbey.

Dr. Deane, Q. C., and Clarkson for the appellants.

Aspinall, Q.C., and Temple for the respondents.

Judgment was delivered by Lord CHELMSFORD.—There are two questions which arise on this appeal: first, whether the respondents are entitled to any salvage at all; and secondly, if they are, whether the amount awarded to them is excessive. The only question upon which their Lordships have felt any hesitation, and upon which they desired to hear the respondents, was whether the Superb and the Conqueror were entitled to any salvage services upon the principle upon which the claim against the H. M. Hayes, in the case of the Annapolis (1 Lush. 300; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 418) was rejected; that is, whether the services which were rendered to the Woburn Abbey were direct or only indirect services. Now, with regard to the case of the H. M. Hayes, it was perfectly clear there that the services were indirect, because the Storm King, which had been hired to tow the Annapolis, in the course of the performance of her services, brought the Annapolis, or the Annapolis drove upon the bows of the Golden Light; the vessels were entangled together, and they approached the H. M. Hayes, riding at single anchor. When at a short distance from her, the Storm King and another steamer called the Lioness, which had come to the assistance of the Annapolis, towed the Annapolis clear of the Golden Light. The Storm King continued towing the Annapolis for a few minutes, and then, leaving her in charge of the Lioness, went to the assistance of the Golden Light, which vessel meanwhile had fouled the H. M. Hayes, and with her had drifted to within a short distance of H.M.S. Majestic. No doubt the two vessels, the Golden Light and H. M. Hayes, were foul of each other. "Two small steamers had hold of the Golden Light, but were unable to hold her." The service which the Storm King rendered was, by coming to the assistance of the two steamers, and taking the Golden Light away from the H. M. Hayes, without any intention whatever of rendering services to the H. M. Hayes, which vessel, however, received benefit by being relieved from the Golden Light, which had fouled her. It is clear, therefore, that no other view could be taken of that case, than that the services which were rendered by the Storm King, were services which were rendered to the Golden Light, though indirectly beneficial to the H. M. Hayes. Now, what were the services in this case? It appears to their Lordships that the Woburn Abbey received a direct, and not an indirect benefit from the services of these steam-tugs. The two vessels, the Woburn Abbey and the British Trident, were in close contact with each other, and in such a position that it was impossible for the Woburn Abbey to slip her chain, because the British Trident was upon her. In order, therefore, to extricate the Woburn Abbey from her position, it was necessary that the British Trident should be taken off from her, and that was the particular service which it was suggested on the part of the Woburn Abbey should be performed by the Superb, the first steam-tug that came up. The captain of the Superb states that he went to the Woburn Abbey, "and I asked the pilot whether he would want any assistance; to which he answered, 'Not at present, we are not ready to slip, we can't, owing to the chains; but go to the next ship, the British Trident, and get hold of her, and try to get her from us; tow her clear.'" The same account pretty nearly is given by the pilot of the Woburn Abbey, who said, "I told him (the captain of the Superb) that we were not prepared for towing away, and that he could do no good at towing of us, but that he had better go to the other ship, and tow her up." The difference is striking between the case of the H. M. Hayes and the present. It is quite clear that the Woburn Abbey could not possibly have been extricated from her position except by relieving her from the British Trident, and this the pilot asked the captain of the Superb to do. In the case of the H. M. Hayes, the Storm King, without being asked to do anything to or for her, went and assisted the two other vessels which were not sufficient to take the Golden Light away; but the very thing which was absolutely necessary for the steam-tug, the Superb, to do for the safety of the Woburn Abbey, or at least, in order to extricate her from danger, was that the British Trident should be removed from her, and this service the Superb was expressly requested to perform. That being so, it is quite clear that the benefit she received from the services of the Superb was a direct, and not an indirect benefit. With regard to any alleged distinction between the Superb and the Conqueror, the Conqueror, it appears, did not come up until after the Woburn Abbey had been made fast to the Halifax buoy; but, at the same time, at that very moment, the British Trident was upon her, just in the same way, and the Superb could not have taken the Trident away without the assistance of the Conqueror. There is, therefore, no substantial difference between the merits of the two parties, the Superb and the Conqueror. If they are entitled to any salvage at all, they are entitled, their Lordships think, to an equal amount of salvage. It being then established that the liability to salvage exists, the only remaining question will be as to the amount which has been awarded by the learned judge. In the course of the argument attention was called to the principle upon which their Lordships deal with appeals from the judgment of the judge in salvage cases (see The Chetah, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 621; The England, 20 Id. 46); and their Lordships cannot see that there is anything so excessive or exorbitant in the amount of salvage which has been awarded by the learned judge as to induce them to interfere with and moderate that amount. Under the circumstances, therefore, their Lordships will recommend to her Majesty to affirm the sentence of the learned judge, and to dismiss the appeal with costs. Their Lordships do not mean to say that they affirm the principle upon which the damages were assessed; nor, perhaps, if they had been called upon to determine originally, that they would have awarded as large a sum as the judge has given, but they act entirely upon the principle which has governed the committee in cases of this kind, and say that they cannot interfere with the award which has been made.

Digitized by Google

Judgment affirmed.

Proctors for the appellants, Toller and Sons.

Proctor for the respondent, Ayrton.

Irish Election Petitions.

Reported by F. O. CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE CITY OF LONDONDERRY.

Tuesday, Feb. 9, 1869.

(Before O'BRIEN, J.)

*Bribery—Paying money to get a voter out of prison—Agency—*17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 36*—Authority to canvass—Employment of cars—Payment of money at the revision courts—Costs—The Irish Representation Act* 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 49), ss. 8, 12*—Effect of illegal voting on costs.*

On the trial of an election petition the question of agency as regards the responsibility of a candidate for the acts of his agent, under sect. 36 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, is not to be considered as it would be in an action for penalties brought against the candidate for the corrupt practices of his agent.

P. was appointed by the Liberal Registration Society to conduct the business of the revision, which shortly preceded the election. D., the candidate, subscribed liberally to the funds of the society, and approved of P.'s appointment. The staff of the society, with P. at its head, was afterwards used in promoting the election. The committee of this society directed in a great degree the meetings of the electors, and D. on one occasion communicated directly with P. by letter with reference to the election:

Held, that P. was the agent of D., so as to render him responsible for bribery by P.

A charge of bribery cannot be sustained on mere suspicion, but must be supported by thoroughly satisfactory evidence. Dicta of Martin B. in the Warrington petition, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 812, and of Willes, J., in the Lichfield petition, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 11, approved.

McC. was arrested for debt and lodged in gaol the day before the polling day by a political opponent. On the polling day, when the election was virtually decided, two supporters of the respondent, McI. and H., went to the gaol, paid the amount of the decree, and openly conducted McC. to the booth, where he voted for the respondent:

Held, that this payment unexplained would have been an act of bribery, differing from the Ashburton case, 2 W. & B. 1.

Held, further, that the Ashburton case cannot be regarded as establishing the rule that money paid to get a voter out of prison in order to "enable" him to vote should not, under the above circumstances, be considered as money paid to induce him to vote, and therefore an act of bribery.

McI. canvassed with the respondent uninvited, and the respondent made several attempts to get rid of him. He also, at the invitation of the audience, seconded a resolution at a meeting of electors at which the respondent was present. On one occasion, also, the respondent requested McI. to leave a document for him at a certain place:

Held, that McI. was not an agent of the respondent, so as to affect him by acts of bribery, either expressly or by implication. The definition of agency in the Norwich case, 19 L. T. Rep. N.S. 618, and the Windsor case (sup.) approved, but held not to apply.

Section 12 of the Irish Representation of the People Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 49), declares the payment of money for the conveyance of voters to the poll to be illegal:

Held, that such payment did not vitiate the election; but semble, that excessive payments for cars to induce the owners to vote would be bribery which would affect the election.

Digitized by Google

By section 8 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 49, the paid employment of voters is made illegal and their votes may be struck off on a scrutiny. It was alleged that voters employed at the preceding revision received more than a fair remuneration for their services, and that the excessive payments were made corruptly:

Held, on the evidence, that the payments were not excessive; but, semble, that even had they been, it would not have been bribery, the voters so paid having long previously promised their votes to the respondent (Bradford petition, No. 2, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S., per Martin, B.)

The voting by several of those who voted for the respondent having been illegal, and time having been expended and costs incurred with reference to such votes, the time consumed being not less than two days:

Held, that the respondent was not entitled to receive his costs attending the inquiry on those two days.

O'Brien, J.—At the close of this protracted inquiry, and after having fully and carefully considered the evidence, it is now my duty to state the conclusion at which I have arrived. The petition contains several charges, some of actual bribery and undue influence by Mr. Dowse himself, or with his knowledge and consent, others of bribery by his agents, and others of intimidation. No evidence has been offered in support of the charge of intimidation, and the charges of bribery and undue influence by Mr. Dowse himself, or with his knowledge or consent, were, in the fullest manner, abandoned by petitioner's counsel, both in their opening statement and in their reply. It is, indeed, difficult to imagine conduct more to his honour or credit than that which Mr. Dowse pursued from the beginning of his canvass for the purpose of preventing any bribery or other corrupt practice. The law, however, for obvious reasons of public policy, provides that a candidate shall, so far as the validity of his election is concerned, be answerable for the corrupt practices of his agent, though committed without his knowledge or consent. And I do not concur in the doctrine so strongly urged by Mr. Palles, that, in considering the responsibility of a candidate under the 36th section of the Act of 1854, for the acts of his agent, we are to consider the question of agency as we would in an action for penalties brought against the candidate for the corrupt practices of his agent. That statute and the Elections Act of last session, recognise the distinction between the case of acts of bribery committed by the candidate himself, or with his knowledge and consent (which may be called a case of personal bribery), and the case of bribery committed only by the agents of the candidate, but not with his knowledge and consent. In the former case, the acts of bribery not only vitiate the election, but also disqualify the candidate from sitting in Parliament for seven years, and from voting and holding various offices. Whereas, in the latter case, the acts of bribery, besides vitiating the election, only disqualify the candidate from being again returned for the same constituency during the then Parliament. If, then, this question of agency was to be considered upon the principle contended for by Mr. Palles, the obvious intentions of the Legislature would, in my opinion, be defeated. I need not refer to the authorities on the subject, or to the decisions in various trials already held under the recent Act, which have been all uniform in that respect. In the present case most of the acts of bribery relied upon by the petitioners are alleged to have been committed by Peacock, and the first question which arises respecting them is, whether he was on agent for whose acts Mr. Dowse is to be considered responsible under the statute; and, in my opinion, he was. It appears to me that this is fully established by the evidence in the case. Mr. Dowse was the adopted candidate of the Liberal Registration Society; he subscribed largely to their funds; and Peacock was appointed by them to conduct the business of the last registration, with a view to the election that was immediately to follow. Mr. Dowse, though not actually a party to Peacock's appointment, subsequently approved of it, and we find that when the revision was completed, the funds and staff of that society, with Peacock as the principal of the staff, were, with Mr. Dowse's assent, used for the purpose of promoting the election, in the same manner as they had been employed for the purposes of the registration, and that various payments, first for the purposes of the revision, and, next, for the purposes of the election, were made by and through the hands of Peacock himself, out of moneys which had been given to him by this registration society. There is also the further fact that the committee of this society directed in a great degree the meetings of the electors, which were convened for the purpose of securing their support for Mr. Dowse; and again, we have the letter of Mr. Dowse to Peacock, which of itself would go far to imply that the relation of principal and agent existed between them. From these circumstances, therefore, I think it follows that Mr. Peacock should be considered as having been the agent of Mr. Dowse for the purposes of the election, so far as to render Mr. Dowse responsible under those two statutes for any bribery on the part of Mr. Peacock at the election. I have, however, next to consider a very different question, namely, whether any, and which, of the acts of bribery that are alleged to have been committed were, in fact, committed either by Mr. Peacock or by any other person who should be considered under the statutes as the agent of Mr. Dowse. And in entering upon this consideration, we should bear in mind that the charge of bribery, whether by a candidate or by his agent, is one which should be established by clear and satisfactory evidence. The consequences resulting from such a charge being established are very serious. In the first place, it avoids the election; and in the recent trial of the Warrington Election Petition, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 812, where the petitioner sought to avoid the election, not certainly on the ground of bribery, but on the ground of some illegality or irregularity in the proceedings, Martin, B. is reported to have stated that he agreed with what had been said by Willes, J. at Lichfield (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 11), that before a judge upset an election he ought to be satisfied beyond all doubt that the election was altogether void. In the next place the 43rd and 45th sections of the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868, imposes further and severe penalties for the offence, whether committed by the candidate or by his agent. Mere suspicion, therefore, will not be sufficient to establish a charge of bribery, and a judge, in discharging the onerous and unpleasant duty imposed upon him by this statute, acting in the double capacity of judge and juror, should not hold that charge established upon evidence which, in his opinion, would not be sufficient to warrant a jury in finding the charge proved. In the present case the original bill of particulars contains fifty-one cases of alleged bribery and undue influence, and with respect to these, no evidence whatever was offered to sustain more than twenty-five of them. Three more were added by notice served shortly before the trial, and another by an order made by me during the trial, making in all about fifty-five cases. Mr. Palles opposed the making of that order, but I thought it my duty, under the Act, to afford every facility for investigating the validity of this election. With that view I made orders, whenever they were required by the petitioner's counsel, to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents. Upwards of sixty witnesses have been examined for the petitioners, and the trial has extended to a greater length than I believe that of any other trial which has been had under the recent statute. I may here observe that no evidence was offered to support any of those four further cases which were added by the notice or under the order for amending the bill of particulars. [His Lordship discussed numerous cases of alleged bribery, which he found had not been sustained and proceeded.] The next charge to which I shall refer is that of the alleged bribery of Felix McCloskey, the circumstances of which are certainly very singular in their character. It appears that McCloskey had been arrested the evening before the polling-day under a civil bill decree for about 12*s.*, at the suit of Mr. Ramsay, a supporter of Lord Claude Hamilton, and that about half-past two or three o'clock on the polling-day Philip McIntyre, sen., and Mr. Hanna went to the gaol, and, after some conversation with McClosky, paid the amount of the decree, got McClosky discharged, brought him to the court house, where he voted for Mr. Dowse. This, therefore, was done openly, and at a period when, according to the evidence, the election was virtually decided in Mr. Dowse's favour, as he had then a majority which could not be got over. It was not only done openly, but it was done in the presence and through the instrumentality of Mr. Wilson and Mr. Mooney, the authorities of the gaol, by whom McClosky was discharged, and one of whom, at all events, was avowedly opposed to Mr. Dowse. I do not of course, use the word instrumentality to impute to those two persons any participation in the alleged bribery, but of course they must have known for what purpose all this was done; and, indeed, Mr. Mooney states that soon after McIntyre, Hanna, and McClosky had left the gaol, he followed them to the court-house, where the polling was going on, and which was not far from the gaol, and saw them returning from it, and that Hanna said, "they had made it all right." I need not go further into the facts of this cause, because I have no doubt that upon the evidence before me, unexplained, this should be deemed an act of bribery on the part of McIntyre and Hanna. The facts of this case are essentially different from those of the Ashburton case (reported in Wolf, and B. 2, p. 1), and which is referred to in Rogers "On Elections," p. 348. And I would not regard that case as establishing the rule, that money paid to get a voter out of prison, in order to "enable" him to vote, should not under the circumstances of this case, be considered as money paid to "induce" him to vote, and as therefore being an act of bribery. Every case must, of course, be governed by its own peculiar circumstances; but if any such general principle was laid down it would go far to afford a cloak for bribery, and the means of evading its penalties. The next question, however, is whether either Philip McIntyre, sen., or Hanna was the agent of Mr. Dowse, so as to render him responsible for this act of theirs. With respect to Hanna, there is no evidence at all to show who he was, or to show any connection between him and Mr. Dowse. With respect to Philip McIntyre, sen., however, evidence has been given that he attended some meetings and spoke at them (I shall presently refer to one meeting in particular); and with respect to his having canvassed for Mr. Dowse, the only evidence to establish his evidence on that ground was that of James Lowrie, who voted for Lord Claud Hamilton. He states in his evidence that on the second occasion of Mr. Dowse canvassing him, which appears to have been about the 5th Sept. he (Mr. Dowse) was accompanied by Mr. Dunne and Philip McIntyre, sen., that they were going to pass Lowrie's house, when McIntyre said to Mr. Dowse, "You will have to see Lowrie;" that they then went in at Lowrie's gate, and that after some conversation between Lowrie and Mr. Dowse (which implied that Lowrie did not intend to vote for him), Philip McIntyre said he thought it would be all right. There is not any other evidence in the case of any canvass by this Philip McIntyre in the presence of Mr. Dowse; and with respect to this transaction, Mr. Dowse stated on his examination that on the occasion of his second visit to the waterside (viz., about the 5th Sept.), he had gone there with Mr. Dunne and Mr. Thomas White for the purpose of canvassing, that about one hundred people joined him there, that Philip McIntyre, sen., whom Mr. Dowse had not previously known even by name, came up and asked him how he was; that Mr. White said, "Mr. Dowse, this is one of your supporters;" that Mr. Dowse replied, "Very well, I am glad to see you;" that Mr. Dowse then proceeded through the street, followed by about one hundred men, women, and children, and went into a house, which it appears was Lowrie's, that he asked Lowrie for his vote, and that while they were speaking on the subject, Mr. Dowse heard a voice say behind him, "Oh, he is sure to support you" (which is much the same as what Lowrie stated). Mr. Dowse further swore that on turning round he found the voice which he heard was that of Phillip McIntyre, senior, and that until then he did not even know that McIntyre was with him, or accompanied him to the house. He further states that he never authorised McIntyre to go with him or to canvass, and that after leaving Lowrie's house he saw a crowd still following him, with McIntyre among them; that he then had some conversation with Messrs. White and Dunne, and immediately afterwards asked McIntyre to leave some document for him in Foyle-street rooms, and that accordingly McIntyre went away to do so. It is true that Mr. Dowse made him his messenger on that occasion, but it is clear (as held by Willes, J. in the Windsor case, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 613) that the employment of a man as messenger is not sufficient to constitute him an agent. Mr. Dowse further states that, in about an hour afterwards, he returned to the same place, and found Phillip McIntyre there, who told him he had left that document in Foyle-street; that Mr. Dowse again spoke with Messrs. White and Dunne, and that in consequence of what he was told by those two gentlemen, he immediately went down to another house, and drove away on a car with Messrs. White and Dunne, leaving McIntyre behind him. Mr. Dowse was asked by his counsel, on examination, to state the purport of his conversation with Messrs. White and Dunne, but the petitioner's counsel objected to the question, and I ruled that the evidence of this conversation was not admissible. But whatever was the conversatian between them, it is manifest that in consequence of it Mr. Dowse was desirous to get rid of McIntyre; and he states that he did everything in his power to get him away, as he did not (to use Mr. Dowse's own expression) "want anyone to be foisted on him." He further states, that the occasion of this visit to Lowrie was the only one on which McIntyre was even with him on his canvass; that he never authorised McIntyre to canvass for him, and that he did not believe that he did canvass. Mr. Dowse also explained what passed at the public meeting on the 25th Oct. at Mr. White's stores, at which McIntyre spoke, and seconded one of a set of resolutions that were passed. He states that when the resolution was moved some one in the crowd addressed McIntyre by the name of "Phil," and called out to him to speak; that McIntyre then got up to speak, and second the resolution, but that there was no previous arrangement as to his doing so. It was proved by other witnesses that McIntyre spoke at other meetings in support of Mr. Dowse: but it appears to me that on the entire evidence there is no ground for holding that McIntyre was the agent of Mr. Dowse, so as to render Mr. Dowse responsible for his conduct in this transaction as to McCloskey. With respect to this question of agency, petitioner's counsel referred to the Norwich Petition case, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 618, in which Martin, B. made use of the expression, that "Hardiment's agency is proved to the hilt." But the circumstances of that case are essentially different from those of the present. Hardiment had been seen distributing money on the polling-day to a considerable amount, and it appeared that previous to that day, he and Mr. Stracey, and the sitting member's son had been, with others, appointed as canvassers; and that he and Mr. Stracey canvassed together on one day, having gone out together from the committee-room, and that Hardiment, with others, canvassed on another day, and there was upon the evidence no doubt but that Hardiment had been appointed one of the regular canvassers with the knowledge and consent of Sir H. Stracey, the sitting member. The decision in that case does not therefore apply to the present. The Windsor case, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 613, has also been referred to. Willes, J. does in that case lay down the general proposition that every person who canvassed for a candidate is to be considered as an agent; but he expresses his opinion on the subject in those accurate terms for which he is remarkable, and says, "I have already stated that authority to canvass (and I purposely used the word 'authority' and not 'employment,' because I meant the observation to apply to persons authorised to canvass, whether paid or not for their services) would, in my opinion, constitute an agent, and that authority for the general management of an election would involve an authority to canvass." There is no evidence of any such authority here from Mr. Dowse. He swears he never did give such authority, and what took place on the day of his canvassing, Lowrie would so far negative the existence of any such authority, express or implied. With regard to implied authority, it is to be observed that McIntyre was not even a member of the Liberal Registration Society, by whom Mr. Dowse had been adopted as candidate; I cannot concur in the opinion that any supporter of a candidate who chooses to ask others for their votes, and to make speeches in his favour, can force himself upon the candidate as an agent, or that a candidate should be held responsible for the acts of one from whom, as in this case, he actually endeavoured to disassociate himself. No candidate would be safe, if agency was to be established by the facts of the present case. On these grounds, therefore, I am clearly of opinion, that the agency of McIntyre for Mr. Dowse has not been established, and that accordingly the charge as to M'Closkey's case also fails. The next class of objections to which I shall refer is that relating to the employment of cars. It is not contended that Mr. Dowse, or his agents, violated the provisions of the 12th section of the Irish Representation Act of last session (31 & 32 Vict. c. 49), by paying money on account of cars for the conveyance of voters to the poll, which payment, though illegal, would not, of itself, vitiate the election; and it does not indeed appear in the evidence that any such money was paid by Mr. Dowse or his agents for the conveyance of voters. But the allegation is, that various sums were paid by Peacock, or some other person on behalf of Mr. Dowse, to several voters, who were car owners; that such sums were paid nominally on account of the hire of their cars, but really with the intention of inducing such voters to vote for Mr. Dowse; that such sums exceeded the reasonable charge for the cars, and that such payments were accordingly acts of bribery. The three cases relied on under this head are those of John M'Ivor, Henry Perry, and William Carlin, all of whom voted for Mr. Dowse. [His Lordship considered those cases, and found that they did not support the allegation.] The remaining cases of alleged bribery are those in which various sums of money were paid to voters for loss of time at the revision in September, and also to voters who were employed either for purposes connected with the election, or with the revision, for which they were employed for the registration society, and all which sums, it is alleged, exceeds in amount what was a fair, reasonable remuneration for their services, and were in fact paid for the purpose of inducing those voters to support Mr. Dowse. All those payments appear to have been made by Peacock, or by other persons by his directions, and it was admitted by counsel on both sides that the revision commenced on the 25th Sept., and lasted for five or six days, till early in October. The payments for loss of time at the revision were 10*s.* to George Paris, which I have already mentioned, 1*l.* to Patrick Conmen, and 10*s.* to John Devine, making altogether 2*l.*; and the payments for employments which were made to the voters as to whom bribery is charged were 4*l.* 15*s.* to Mr. Bernadotte Little, 4*l.* to John Quirk, 12*l.* 5*s.* to John Devlin, 2*l.* 7*s.* to Richard Griffiths, of which 7*s.* were for loss of time, 1*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* to John Brown, 3*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* to Andrew McLoghlen, and 5*l.*, already mentioned, to Deery; all said sums, together with the 2*l.* for loss of time, make together 35*l.* 13*s.* Mr. Hamilton has charged these payments to be the result of an organised and extensive system of corruption on the part of Peacock; well, and I refer to the amount of these sums not merely as showing that so far as the amount is concerned it affords no foundation for the charge of any extensive corruption, but also for the purpose of observing that although in Peacock's book, which has been so much relied on, and which I have carefully examined, there are about 250 entries of payments by Peacock, and although petitioners had access to all Peacock's books and papers which would show any further payments, yet the payments I have mentioned are the only payments relied on as the foundation of the charge of bribery or of any corrupt practice. I have to observe, with respect to the payments made to voters employed for Mr. Dowse for election purposes, as clerks, messengers, &c., and who voted for Mr. Dowse, that, under the 8th section of the Representation Act of last session (31 & 32 Vict. c. 49), such voters were guilty of a misdemeanor, and that upon a scrutiny their votes would have been struck off. That section, however, is not, and could not be, relied on in this case as of itself rendering the election void; but it is contended that those payments, and also the payments for loss of time at the revision court, were corruptly made: that they were excessive in amount, having regard to the services performed; and that they were made with the corrupt intention of inducing these men to vote for Mr. Dowse. With respect to payments for loss of time at the revision, the first I shall refer to is that of 10*s.* to George Paris. He swore that he lost four days at the revision, for which he only got that sum, which he complained of as too little, and it appears, both by his evidence and that of Mr. Dowse, that he had before the revision promised Mr. Dowse to vote for him. The next case is that of Patrick Cannen, who got 1*l.* for loss of time for four days at the revision; he swore that he voted for Mr. Dowse on principle, that he would have given him fifty votes if he had them, and that he would have voted for him without any compensation; that he was a carter and often got more than 5*s.* a day with his horse and car; Mr. Dowse stated also that Patrick Cannen had promised him his vote long before the revision. The next case is that of John Devine, who got 10*s.* for loss of time at the revision; he swore that his principles were those of Mr. Dowse; that he promised to vote for him on that account alone; that his promise had nothing to do with the payment of that money, and that he would have voted for Mr. Dowse if he had got nothing for his loss of time; and Mr. Dowse states that Devine had promised him upon the occasion of his second visit to the Waterside, which was on the 5th Sept., some weeks before the revision. As regards the payments of 5*l.* to Mr. Deery, I do not think that sum exceeded a fair remuneration for his services, or that he was employed in order to influence his vote. Mr. Dowse states that after July last, and some months before the employment, Deery had positively promised to vote for him. The next case is that of Bernadotte Little, who acted as a clerk at a salary of 30*s.* a week at the Liberal registration rooms from the 1st Nov. till after the election. For that he got a sum of 4*l.* 15*s.*, which, considering his position and the nature of his employment, cannot be regarded as excessive. Mr. Dowse states that Little promised him his vote in July, and Little swore that he never changed his intention of voting for him, and that his employment had nothing to do with his vote. The next case is that of John Quirk, who was paid 4*l.* for being in charge of the registration society's rooms in Foyle-street for one week, and at their rooms at the Waterside for three weeks. He was employed in the end of October and in November, and it appeared from Mr. Dowse's evidence that Quirk had promised to vote for him so far back as the 5th Sept. Quirk stated on his examination that he was formerly on the staff of the Derry Militia, and was discharged from it last August, and that in November, when he was in charge of the registration rooms, he was asked by Capt. Butler, the adjutant of the militia, whom he would vote for, and that he replied that he did not know yet, and that he was not then decided whom he would vote for. He also stated that he did not tell Capt. Butler he would vote for whoever gave him employment. He further stated that long previously to that interview and to his employment, he had made up his mind to vote for Mr. Dowse, and that his voting was altogether irrespective of his employment. Capt. Butler was then examined, and he stated that about a week before the election he asked Quirk whom he would vote for, and that Quirk replied he would vote for whoever gave him employment. There is, therefore, a contradiction between Capt. Butler and Quirk as to what passed at that conversation; but it is clear that whatever Quirk may have then told Capt. Butler, who had been his adjutant, he had previously promised to vote for Mr. Dowse. The next case is that of John Devlin, who was employed by Peacock as a clerk, as Mr. Little was, and at the same salary of 30*s.* a week, at the Liberal Association rooms, from before the revision till after the election. He was paid altogether the sum of 12*l.* 5*s.*; but it appears that for some weeks he was paid for each week only broken sums, viz., 25*s.* in one, 10*s.* in another, and 20*s.* for another week, showing he was only paid as he worked. These payments were certainly not excessive, and Devlin swore that he voted according to his principles; and that his employment had nothing to do with his vote; that he had promised Mr. Dowse long before he thought of being employed. Mr. Dowse also states that Devlin first promised him his vote in July, and afterwards again in September. Devlin also stated that, shortly before he was so employed as clerk, he had been in the employment of Messrs. Chrystal, who paid him 1*l.* per week, and a percentage on his collections, which together exceeded what he got from Peacock. The next case is that of Richard Griffith, who promised Mr. Dowse about the 6th Sept. to vote for him; he got 7*s.* from Peacock soon after the revision for his loss of time there for some days, and he afterwards got two payments of 1*l.* each for having been employed for two weeks before the election in watching and looking after voters. He swore that his employment or payment had nothing to do with his vote, that he voted according to his principles, and was determined to vote for Mr. Dowse long previous to his employment; and Mr. Dowse states that in July Griffith told him he would not be against him; and that afterwards, about the 6th Sept., Griffith told him he would vote for him. The next case is that of John Brown, who was employed by Peacock as a messenger for several days immediately preceding the election, at the rate of 3*s.* 6*d.* a day (which I do not think excessive), and got 1*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* He states that he was determined, long previously thereto, to vote for Mr. Dowse; that money had nothing to do with his vote, and that he would not on any account have voted for Lord Claud Hamilton. Mr. Dowse states that Brown promised his vote first in July, and afterwards early in September, on the occasion of his second visit to Waterside. The last case I have to consider is, that of Andrew M'Laughlin, who was paid altogether 3*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, being at the rate of 1*l.* per week. He had been employed to watch voters for about three weeks before the election, and had lost some time at the revision court. It appears that in July, when he was first canvassed by Mr. Dowse, he only promised uot to vote against him, but that about six weeks before the election, when Mr. Dowse canvassed him again, he positively promised to vote for him; and McLaughlin also swore that he had intended from the very first to vote for Mr. Dowse, and that his principles agreed with those of Mr. Dowse. This is the last case of these payments which are alleged to have been made corruptly, as being only nominally for work, but as exceeding in amount the value of the work, and as made with a corrupt purpose. In considering these several cases, I cannot lose sight of the fact, that all of these men had originally in positive terms, and long previous to their respective employments, expressed their intention to vote for Mr. Dowse; that their political opinions agreed with his, and that there can be no doubt but that their natural feelings and inclinations, without any influence whatever, would have induced them to give him their support. In the course of the last week, upon the trial, before Martin, B., of the second Bradford petition (as reported in the Times newspaper of the 3rd inst.), some cases of giving refreshments to voters were proved and relied on as acts of treating under the 4th section of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854. It appeared that some of the refreshments given were partaken of by electors who voted for Mr. Forster, the sitting member, and for Mr. Miall, and who had previously promised them their votes; and Martin, B., in stating why he did not think that the giving of refreshments to those voters came within the 4th section, is reported to have said, "They were not given in this case in order to be elected, because it was already known which way the men who had votes would vote; they were voters who had declared their intention to support Messrs. Forster and Miall." I think that these observations of Martin, B. bear upon the cases I am now considering. In order that a gift or promise of any money or employment to a voter should be held to be bribery within the meaning of the 2nd section of the Corrupt Practices Act 1854, the statute requires that such gift or promise should be given in order to induce such voter to "vote," or "refrain from voting," or "on account of any voter having voted, or refrained from voting." The men alleged to be bribed by the foregoing employments and payments had long previously promised to vote for Mr. Dowse; their political opinions and feelings agreed with his; and (as I have already stated) I see no reason to doubt that they would have voted for him whether or not they had been so employed or paid; considering, then, that the charge of bribery is one which requires to be satisfactorily proved, I cannot, sitting here as a juror, come to the conclusion that any of those promises, or employments, or payments to which I have referred, were made or given for any of the objects or purposes which are prohibited by that 2nd section, or which would render them acts of bribery. There is, however, a matter to which I have to refer, not connected with the report that I shall make to the Speaker as to the election being valid, but with what I shall have to decide on the question of costs. As a general rule, except there are special circumstances in the case, the costs of these petition proceedings would follow the result of the petition; but in this case, though the election was not avoided or vitiated by the fact that several electors, who were employed for Mr. Dowse's election, and were paid for such employment, voted for him, it is clear that their doing so was a violation of the provision of the statute to which I have already referred. And it may be that the fact of those payments appearing in Peacock's book might so far have called for inquiry, and induced to some extent the presenting of this petition. That consideration, however, would not, according to my present opinion, affect the entire of the costs of these proceedings. I have for these several reasons (which I have given at some length) come to the conclusion that none of these charges of bribery have been sustained, and I shall accordingly certify and report to the speaker, that the sitting member, Richard Dowse, Esq., whose return is complained of by the petition in this matter, was duly elected and returned to serve in Parliament for the borough of Londonderry; that no corrupt practice has been proved to be committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at said election; that upon the evidence before me it does not appear that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at said election, and that there is in such evidence no reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at said election.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Feb. 16.—O'Brien, J.—When giving judgment in this case at the close of the trial, I reserved the question of costs. According to the general rule, the costs of these election petition proceedings should follow the result, but the 41st section of the statute shows that, under certain circumstances, such rule may properly be departed from, and it appeared to me that the fact of some of the persons who voted for Mr. Dowse having been employed on his behalf in various services for the election, and having been paid for such services, was a circumstance which might be considered as affecting, to some extent, the question of his right to costs. Under the 8th section of the Irish Representation Act of last session (31 & 32 Vict. c. 49), such persons were not entitled to vote, and were guilty of a misdemeanour for having done so, and it is clear that, on a scrutiny, their votes would have been struck off. In this case, however, it was not, and could not be, contended that the election should be declared void on the mere ground that the votes of those persons were illegal under the said 8th section; but petitioners contended at the trial, that having regard to the amount of such payments, the circumstances under which they were made, and to the nature and value of the services rendered by those voters, the payments to them should be considered as having been colourably and corruptly made for the purpose of securing their support, and as being acts of bribery. I was unable to concur in that conclusion, and (for the reasons I mentioned in my judgment at the trial) I did not think that the payments in any of those cases constituted an act of bribery; but I thought it requisite to consider how far the fact of such illegal votes having been given by persons paid for their services should affect my decision as to the costs of any portion of them. I have, since the close of the trial, carefully considered this question. The entries showing the payments to those voters are contained in Peacock's books; Peacock died on the 10th Dec.: the petition was presented on the 15th, and it appears from Mr. Neilson's evidence as to his letter to Mr. Dowse of the 12th Dec., and his interview with him on that day, that the petition had previously to that day been in actual course of preparation; and it further appears from Neilson's evidence that those acting for petitioners had not any access to Peacock's books till some time after the petition was presented. Under these circumstances, and considering the various other charges of bribery relied on by the bill of particulars, several of which were sought at the trial to be sustained by evidence that lasted a considerable time, it does not appear to me that, with respect to the general costs of the petition and proceedings, there is ground for holding that the respondent's right to them should be affected by any supposition that the petitioners, in presenting their petition, were influenced by the fact of these payments having been made, or for holding that the employment and payment of the voters in question should affect more than a portion of the costs of the trial, but, in my opinion, it does affect a portion of such costs. The voting of such persons was, as I have already said, an illegal act, which is expressly and for obvious purposes of public policy forbidden by the Legislature. At the trial some time was consumed, and the length of the trial was to some extent protracted by the evidence given as to the employment and payment of the voters in question; and I think that the petitioners should not pay to the respondent the additional costs which were caused by the time necessarily occupied in such evidence, and which would not have been incurred but for the fact of those persons having illegally voted. I have referred to the evidence for the purpose of ascertaining the portion of the costs of the trial which, in my opinion, should not (on the ground I have stated) be allowed to the respondent. The evidence relating to the employment and payment of the voters in question was given on different days, but occupied only a portion of each day; and the far greater part of each of those days was occupied in evidence as to other charges which were not sustained. I may observe that Deery was one of those persons, but the great portion of the time occupied by his examination related to the charge of Peacock having promised him 20*l.* for his vote, a charge which I considered to be altogether unfounded. The conclusion, then, at which I have arrived upon a review of the evidence is, that the time occupied by the evidence as to the employment and payment of those voters may properly be estimated at two days, but certainly did not exceed that period. Having thus, from what took place at the trial, the means of determining myself the length of time by which the trial was protracted by such evidence, I think it better that I should regulate the abatement of the respondent's costs by reference to that time than by a reference to the master on the subject. Such reference would necessarily, from the nature of the case, involve questions difficult for the master to determine, and would probably be attended with considerable delay and expense to the parties. I shall therefore declare that the respondent is not entitled to the costs of the day for either of two days of the trial, viz., the fifth and sixth days, on which the principal part of such evidence as to the employment and payment of those voters was given; and I shall declare that, with that exception, the petitioner shall pay to the respondent the costs of the petition, the trial, and the other proceedings therein.

Digitized by Google

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs; Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, Jan. 14.

REG. THE MAYOR, &c. OF WIGAN.

Gaol—A borough having a quarter sessions sending its prisoners to a county gaol—Liability for its proportion of costs of enlarging the gaol.

Where a borough having a quarter sessions sends its prisoners to the county gaol, but not under any special contract, the council of the borough is liable to pay to the treasurer of such prison a proportion of the costs of any necessary enlargement of, or addition, to such gaol.

This was a rule calling upon the Town Council of Wigan to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to pay the governor of the gaol at Kirkdale the sum of 1242*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.* for the conveyance, transport, maintenance, safe custody, and care of Wigan prisoners in the said gaol from the 1st Dec. 1867, to the 30th Nov. 1868, and if necessary, to make and levy a rate for that purpose.

By sect. 18 of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98 (An Act to amend the Laws concerning Prisons), it is enacted—

That in every borough to which a separate court of sessions of the peace hath been, or shall hereafter, be granted, or purported to be granted, and where the persons committed for offences arising within such borough, have been or shall hereafter be sent to any prison of the county in which such borough is situated, and that no special contract shall be subsisting between such borough and county relative to the said prisoners, the council of such borough shall pay or cause to be paid to the treasurer of such prison, or any other person appointed by the justices of the peace in general or quarter sessions assembled, for the county in which such prison is situated, the actual expense heretofore incurred, or hereafter to be incurred, in the conveyance, transport, maintenance, safe custody, and care of every such prisoner, according to the time for which each such prisoner shall have been or shall remain in custody there, at the average daily cost of each prisoner, according to the whole number of prisoners confined in the said prison, such average to be taken yearly, half-yearly, quarterly, or at such other intervals as the visiting justices of the prison shall from time to time determine, including in such expenses all salaries of officers, all expenses of repairs, alterations, additions, and improvements in or to the said prison, all sums paid to prisoners under any Act of Parliament, on their discharge or otherwise, and any other charge whatsoever on account of the prisoners confined in such prison; subject, nevertheless, to a proportional share of all deductions on account of the earnings of prisoners in the said prison, and of all sums of money received in aid of the rates levied for the maintenance of the said prison. Provided always that the payment by the council of any such borough of any such expenses incurred before the passing of this Act may be made by five yearly instalments, the first of such instalments to be payable within three calendar months after the passing of this Act, with interest at the yearly rate of four pounds in the hundred, to be calculated from the passing of this Act, upon so much of the said expenses incurred before the passing of this Act as shall remain unpaid until the whole shall be discharged.

It appeared that the borough of Wigan having a court of quarter sessions committed its prisoners to the Kirkdale gaol, which was the county prison for Lancashire, but not under any special contract. In consequence of the increase of prisoners the justices resolved upon making some additions to the gaol, which they did, providing thereby 132 new cells, a cook-house, bakery, wash-house, &c., and they charged the borough of Wigan with a proportion of the cost, which amounted to a certain sum, included in the amount mentioned in the rule.

Giffard, Q. C. and Baylis showed cause. The cost of enlarging the gaol ought not to be thrown upon Wigan, which has no control over it; the words of sect. 18 of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98, "expenses of repairs, alterations, additions, and improvements" should have a limited construction put upon them. [BLACKBURN, J.—It is naturally to be expected that when a gaol is altered for the general convenience of the boroughs that send their prisoners there, they should all contribute. COCKBURN, C. J.—It may be that the necessity for enlargement arises wholly in consequence of the increase of borough prisoners, and it would in such a case be exceedingly hard to make the county bear the entire cost.] There is no permanent expense incurred by the Wigan prisoners; the meaning of the section must be such expenses as are incurred by the maintenance of the prisoners. [LUSH, J.—You are entitled to share in the earnings of all the prisoners.] The section must be taken to mean only current expenses. The word "additions" may be fairly assumed to mean things such as new doors or windows, and could hardly have been intended to extend to a large and permanent addition to the gaol.

COCKBURN, C. J.—It would be indeed a strange thing that if, owing to a number of borough prisoners being sent to the county gaol, the prison is not large enough, the various boroughs which supply the prisoners should not contribute to the expense of the enlargement. The section of the Act of Parliament is certainly wide enough to include this liability, and I think the rule must be made absolute.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion, and quite agree that it would be exceedingly hard that if it becomes necessary, in consequence of an increase of borough prisoners, to enlarge the gaol, the borough should not bear a portion of the expense, and that the rural population should be compelled to sustain the whole. It is certainly for the justices to consider how they will raise the money, but it is clear that this borough is bound to contribute.

MELLOR and LUSH, JJ. concurred.

Attorneys for the Crown, Sharpe and Co., 41, Bedford-row.

Attorneys for the defendants, M. W. Peace, Wigan.

Wednesday, Jan. 19.

THOMAS (app.), v. ALSOP (resp.).

Poor law—Order upon a husband to contribute to the support of his wife who had become chargeable— 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, s. 33.

The jurisdiction of justices to make an order under sect. 33 of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, upon a man for the relief of his wife, who is living apart from him, is not ousted by his offer to receive her back and provide for her, it being for the justices to consider, under all the circumstances, whether or not the refusal of the wife to return to her husband's home is reasonable.

Digitized by Google

Where, therefore, the wife of the appellant some years ago left him in consequence of his ill-usage of her, and became chargeable to the union, and an application was made under sect. 33 of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, for an order upon the appellant to maintain her, and upon the hearing he offered to receive her back and provide for her, but the wife declined to go back on account of the ill-usage she had previously received, and the justices thereupon made an order upon him:

Held, that they had jurisdiction to make it.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon an order of justices made upon the appellant to pay a weekly sum for the maintenance of his wife pursuant to the provisions of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, s. 33. The order itself directed the appellant James Thomas to pay to the relieving officer of Newton Abbott weekly 3*s.* for and towards the maintenance of the said Thirza Thomas for and during so long a time as the said Thirza Thomas required relief, or until the said order should be revoked.

The case stated that it was proved that the said Thirza Thomas lived with the said appellant from the date of their marriage—the 7th Aug. 1835—until the 17th March 1853, when, in consequence of the ill-usage she received from the appellant, she left his home and lived separate from him, and that she was then suffering from the said injury; that the said appellant had not contributed to the support of his said wife during the separation, but he applied to her to return to cohabitation; that she was then wholly unable to support herself, and required relief; that the said appellant, at the hearing of the case, through his attorney, offered to receive back the said Thirza Thomas at his house, and to provide for her; that the said Thirza Thomas declined to return to the said appellant from the brutality she had previously received from him, and medical evidence was called, and it was proved to our satisfaction that it would be injurious to the health of the said Thirza Thomas to return to cohabitation with the said appellant; that it was contended that as she refused to return, the justices had no jurisdiction to make an order. The question of law arising on the above statements for the opinion of the court is whether we had jurisdiction to make such order after the appellant had offered to receive and provide for his said wife in manner aforesaid.

By sect. 33 of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, it is enacted that

When a married woman requires relief without her husband, the guardians of the union or parish, or the overseers of the parish, as the case may be, to which she becomes chargeable, may apply to the justices having jurisdiction in such union or parish, in petty sessions assembled, and thereupon such justices may summon such husband to appear before them, to show cause why an order should not be made upon him to maintain his wife; and upon his appearance, or in the event of his not appearing upon proof of due service of such summons upon him, such justices may, after hearing such wife upon oath, or receiving such other evidence as they may deem sufficient, make an order upon him to pay such sum weekly, or otherwise towards the cost of the relief of the wife, as after consideration of all the circumstances of the case shall appear to them to be proper, and shall determine how and to whom the payments shall from time to time be made, which order shall, if the payments required by it to be made be in arrears be enforced in the manner prescribed by the Act of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, for the enforcing of orders of justices requiring the payment of a sum of money. Provided that such order may be at any future time revoked by the justices in petty sessions assembled, if they see sufficient cause for so doing.

McKellar appeared for the appellant.—The justices had no jurisdiction to make the order, as the appellant offered to take home and provide for his wife. She cannot be said to be deserted when he offers to take her back, nor can she require relief so long as the husband is willing to maintain her. To uphold this order would be in effect to give justices a power to decree a divorce. The words of the 33rd section are, "when a married woman requires relief." She can only require relief when she is deserted. [MELLOR, J.—The words are very general, and are not restricted to a case of abandonment by the husband. COCKBURN, C. J.—Is she not justified in such a case as this in staying away from her husband?] There must be desertion to render a wife justified in staying away from her husband: (Cargill v. Cavill, 27 L. J. 69, Prob.) The cases under the Vagrant Act are applicable. [LUSH, J.—The words of that Act are much more restricted, and there it has been held that the desertion must be wilful. MELLOR, J.—There is nothing in the present Act which speaks of the desertion being wilful.] The case says she required relief, not that she required it without her husband. The alleged cruelty, moreover, took place sixteen years ago. She cannot be said to be chargeable so long as she has a husband willing to support her. In Rex v. Flintan, 1 B. & Ad. 227, it was held that a husband was not guilty of desertion under the Vagrant Act (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), s. 3, where the wife left him. [LUSH, J.—There the wife had forfeited all right to support by her conduct.] In Sweeny v. Spooner, 32 L. J. 82, M. C.; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 623, it was held that to make a party liable as a rogue and vagabond for running away and leaving his wife chargeable to the parish, he must leave her wilfully, and reasonably believe at the time that she would become chargeable. Here he has not left her, but she has left him; and it is no excuse for her not returning that many years ago he ill-used her. It is not to be presumed he will again ill-use her, and should he do so she will have her remedy. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Can it be said that if a woman has been under a course of ill treatment all her life, and is in fear of being murdered, she is bound to go back because merely he offers to take her in?] It is the duty of the wife to live with her husband; and, if a divorce be desirable, the Legislature has provided for that.

Bere, Q. C. for the respondent, was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C. J. — Our judgment must be in favour of the justices. This Act of Parliament which we are called upon to construe, differs most essentially from the Vagrant Act under which the case of Rex v. Flintan was decided. By the 33rd section of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, it is enacted that when a married woman requires relief without her husband, the parish authorities where she becomes chargeable may summon the husband to appear before justices to show cause why an order should not be made upon him to support his wife; and the justices after hearing the wife, or receiving such other evidence as they may deem sufficient, may make an order upon him to pay such sum weekly or otherwise towards the cost of the relief of the wife as, after the consideration of all the circumstances of the case, shall appear to them to be proper. Now the only difficulty which can arise in the application of the Act is, with reference to the particular facts. It appears that some years ago the wife left her husband's house in consequence of his violence. Now, no one doubts that a wife is justified in leaving her husband for such a cause, and moreover that she is justified in not returning so long as she has a reasonable belief of its continuance. Here, being in such a condition, she requires relief, and the parish officers come forward and seek for an order against the husband. Upon his appearing he gives as a reason against making the order, that he is willing to take back his wife, and that he is able to maintain her. Now the justices do not ask us to decide whether or not she was justified in leaving her husband, but whether or not the offer of the husband to take her back ousts them of jurisdiction? I think that it does not. It is for them to decide whether or not the wife is bound to return. If it is shown that she left his home under circumstances which justified her, they would have come to a right conclusion. All that the husband says is, if she will return, he will maintain her, but if she was warranted in believing a continuance of ill-usage, she would not be bound to return, and she would be justified in pledging his credit for her own support. Under these circumstances the justices were warranted in considering whether she could properly go back. I do not say how I should have decided upon the facts, but it is enough to say that the justices had jurisdiction to consider them. The words of the section are, in my opinion, sufficiently large to justify the justices in exercising their powers as they have done.

Digitized by Google

MELLOR, J.—I am also of opinion that the justices had jurisdiction to make the order in this case. They seem to have thought that the woman whose case they were considering was reasonably living apart from her husband, and that he was liable under the statute in question. Under the Vagrant Act, it is the wilfulness of the husband which constitutes the offence. That is a different state of things from that under the present Act which contemplates a case where a woman is chargeable by reason simply of not being supported by her husband; and upon the consideration of such a case it is a question of whether or not she is justified in living apart from him. The justices have decided this, and we ought not to interfere.

LUSH, J.—I entirely agree with the rest of the court in holding that the justices had jurisdiction notwithstanding the husband made an offer to take back his wife. I understand the justices to have found as a fact that the woman having been some years ago driven from his house, refused to return upon a well-grounded apprehension of further violence. Then, not having the means of living, she went to the parish. That being so, I think the justices were quite right in supposing that that was a state of facts which came within the operation of the statute.

Judgment for the respondent.

Attorneys for the appellant, Vizard, Crowder, and Co., agents for Square, Plymouth.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by M. W. MCKELLAR, and H. H. HOCKING, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, Jan. 28.

LEVY v. RICE.

Change of venue—Preponderance of convenience—Forum rei of defendant.

In the exercise of a judge's discretion upon an application to change the venue in an action of contract, the advantage of holding the trial at the forum rei of the defendant, as well as the preponderance of convenience, should be considered.

F. M. White moved to set aside an order of Willes, J., rescinding a decision of Master Kaye, who, upon the defendant's summons, had refused to change the venue in this action from London to Liverpool.

It appeared from the defendant's affidavit in support of the summons that the action was brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract for the sale and delivery by him to the plaintiffs of 200,000 Calcutta sound seed bags at 6*d.* each, cash for delivery in 160 days, from the 8th July last, and for money alleged to be payable by him to the plaintiffs, and for interest and for money alleged to be due to the plaintiffs on accounts stated.

The plaintiffs declared on the 1st Jan. of this year, laying the venue in London, and claiming 5000*l.* as damages.

The defendant pleaded general issue and traverses of allegations, and before this application was made issue was joined.

The defendant stated that the cause of action, if any, arose at Liverpool, where the contract was entered into and was to be performed, and where the alleged breaches, and all the circumstances connected therewith, took place, and not in London. That he himself was a sack dealer at Liverpool, and that his thirteen witnesses, all of whom it would be necessary for him to call at the trial, lived at or near Liverpool.

The bags in question had been resold by public auction in Liverpool, and the defendant in this action was plaintiff against the present plaintiff in a cross action for not accepting the said bags, damages laid 6000*l.*, and venue Liverpool, to which the present plaintiffs had not yet pleaded.

The defendant's affidavit concluded with allegations that it would be more convenient and less expensive to have this action as well as the cross action tried at Liverpool; that the application was not made for the purpose of delay; that this was a pure Liverpool cause, and there was no reason whatever why it should be tried in London instead of Liverpool.

In answer, one of the plaintiffs who were a firm of bag and sack manufacturers in the City of London, made an affidavit, from which it appeared that the action was brought upon a written contract containing words, "at 6*d.* each, cash for delivery in 160 days from this date;" the contract being dated 8th July 1869. Since this date numerous letters were written and sent by the plaintiffs from their place of business in London to the defendant on the subject of the said sale. The plaintiffs and twenty-eight witnesses all being in London would have to be present at the trial; they alleged it would be more convenient and less expensive if this action were tried in London, and they believed it could be tried there earlier than at Liverpool.

White.—Upon the application at chambers, the learned judge said that although the preponderance of convenience might be in favour of the venue fixed by the plaintiff, and although there was a prima facie right on the plaintiff's part to choose the place of trial, yet he thought the defendant's place of business, according to sound jurisprudence, was that in which every action should be tried, if either party desired it, although contrary to the rule laid down in books of practice. He had not referred this summons to the court, but he said he wished some one would bring the matter before one of the Superior Courts. It has been frequently held that a plaintiff has a right to make his election where to lay the venue:

Lush's Practice, p. 414;
Jenkins v. Hutton, 7 Moo. 520;
Durie v. Hopwood, 7 C. B., N. S. 835.

BOVILL, C. J.—There is clearly a discretion in the judge to order a change of venue; and if in this case he entertained any doubt about the principles upon which he should exercise it, he might have referred the matter directly to us; as however he has not done so, we do not consider it right to interfere. If my brother Willes wished the course of practice to be discussed, we should grant a rule, but it seems he considered the matter carefully upon the affidavits, and acted contrary to the judgment of the master.

Digitized by Google

White.—Will your Lordship allow this motion to stand over in order that I may apply to Willes, J. to refer this case to the court?

BOVILL, C. J.—We will not do that; for it appears that the question of comparative convenience was entered upon at chambers: and we cannot say that the learned judge exercised his discretion wrongly. Of course he can now, if he chooses, vary his order, but at present we refuse a rule nisi.

M. SMITH, J.—I also think the rule should be refused. Some discretion was in this case exercised by the judge, and I am by no means clear that there was a preponderance of convenience in favour of the trial being held in London; but even if there were, it would be a matter of discretion with the judge whether or not the advantage of trying the case at the defendant's place of business be greater than the inconvenience of bringing witnesses a long distance. The rule that actions should, if possible, be tried at the forum rei is one well worth consideration, and ought not to be forgotten when a question is raised as to where an action can be most properly tried. In the case referred to, Duris v. Hopwood, Erle, C. J. merely remarked that it was not a case in which he felt justified in interfering to prevent the plaintiff from trying his cause in the county in which he had elected to lay the venue; and Willes, J., in referring to a previous case, in which it was held that the court would not deprive the plaintiff of his right to lay his venue where he pleases, unless there is a manifest preponderance of convenience in a trial at the place to which it is sought to change the venue, is reported to have said, "When the question arises again, perhaps that case may require some consideration."

BRETT, J. concurred.

Rule refused.

Attorney for plaintiff, W. A. Crump

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, Jan. 21.

STUCLEY v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.

*Stamp duty—Marriage settlement—*13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, Sched., title "Settlement."—"Definite and certain principal sum or sums of money"—Land purchased with trust funds and subject to a trust for conversion into personalty—Consols subject to a trust for conversion into land.

In assessing the stamp duty payable upon a marriage settlement under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, land purchased with trust moneys under a previous settlement, though subject under such settlement to a trust for conversion into money, cannot be made the subject of assessment, not being a "definite and certain principal sum" within the meaning of the Act.

Secus, with respect to certain Consols and New Threes included in the settlement, though subject under a previous settlement to a trust for conversion into land.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, at the request of William Lewis Stucley, in order that he might appeal to the Exchequer against the determination of the commissioners as to the stamp duty chargeable upon the indenture hereinafter mentioned. The following is an abstract of such indenture which bore date 13th April 1869. By proposals agreed to on this date between Sir George Stucley Stucley, Bart., and William Lewis Stucley, Esq., his son, of the one part, and Head Pottinger Best, Esq., and Rosamond Head Best, spinster, his daughter, of the other part. After stating that the fortune of the said Rosamond Head Best to be put in settlement consisted of the particulars and was circumstanced as follows, viz.:

1. Under settlement dated the 6th June 1839, made previous to the marriage of her parents, the said Head Pottinger Best and Maria, his wife, of the fortune of the said Maria and a deed-poll endorsed thereon, all the property subject to the trusts of such settlement was then vested in the trustees thereof upon trust, to pay the income to the said Head Pottinger Best so long during his life as he shall not charge or alienate the same, and afterwards as to the capital as well as the income, upon trust for the said Rosamond Head Best absolutely, but so as to remain her separate property and at her disposal, for the purpose of settlement on marriage, either before or after marriage; and such trust funds and premises then consisted of certain freehold hereditaments and estates in the counties of Wilts and Berks, purchased under a power in the settlement out of the trust moneys to the amount of 52,000*l.* sterling and upwards, and which was held by the said trustees, in trust to be resold, and in the mean time to be considered in equity as money, and to be subject, as well as the proceeds of the sale thereof, to the same trusts as the moneys laid out therein. The sum of 16,000*l.* sterling secured, with interest at 4*l.* per cent., by mortgage of estates of the said Head Pottinger Best, made by indenture dated the 30th March 1860, and the sum of 4876*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.* Consols, and 11,196*l.* 4*s.* New Threes.

2. Under another indenture of settlement, also dated the 6th June 1839, made upon the same marriage by the said Head Pottinger Best, certain freehold hereditaments in the county of Berks then stood limited to the use of the said Head Pottinger Best for his life, with remainder to the use of the said Rosamond Head Best, as the only child of his said marriage, in tail general, with remainder to the use of the said Head Pottinger Best in fee simple, and the sums of 15,073*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* New Threes, and 769*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* Consols were then standing in the names of the trustees of the last-mentioned settlement, upon trust to invest the same in the purchase of hereditaments to be settled to the like uses, and in the mean time to pay the annual income thereof to the several persons who would be entitled to the rents of such hereditaments if purchased.

It was agreed, first, that the estate or interest to which the said Rosamond Head Best was entitled in reversion expectant on such less or other interest of her father therein as aforesaid of and in all the trust moneys, stocks, and property subject to the first above-mentioned settlement of the 6th June 1839, should, within three calendar months after the solemnisation of the marriage, be effectually assigned by all necessary parties to trustees. Upon the trusts, &c. thereinafter specified, which should attach upon and bind the same in equity upon the solemnisation of the marriage, such settlement to take effect without prejudice to such prior interest of the said Head Pottinger Best as aforesaid, and also in respect to the hereditaments purchased as aforesaid, without prejudice to the said trust for the resale thereof, and also to the powers of exchange and leasing contained in the said settlement. Then followed a declaration of the trusts upon which the property in the last preceding clauses was to be held, and various provisions relative thereto, including a proviso that if at the time when the funds and premises comprised in that settlement should become subject in possession to the trusts thereof, the said hereditaments, purchased or otherwise acquired under the powers of the said settlement of the 6th June 1839 first above mentioned should not have been resold, the trustees or trustee of the present settlement might, with the consent in writing of the said William Lewis Stucley and Rosamond Head Best or the survivor of them, and afterwards of their own discretion, accept in lieu of the sale moneys a conveyance of such hereditaments to them or him, and their or his heirs or assigns, upon the like trusts for sale, and with the like powers of exchanging and demising in the mean time (mutatis mutandis) as were expressed in the said settlement of the 6th June 1839. Also a declaration that the moneys to arise by sale or exchange under the present settlement, and also the hereditaments subject to sale, and the rents and profits thereof in the mean time, should respectively be held upon the same trusts as were above agreed to be declared by the present settlement in regard to proceeds of sale of the hereditaments originally purchased, and the annual proceeds thereof respectively.

Digitized by Google

Secondly, provision for the execution by the said Head Pottinger Best, and Rosamond Head Best of a disentailing deed of all the freehold property, subject to the subsisting terms of the settlement of the 6th June 1839, and the sums of 15,073*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* New Threes, and 769*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* Consols, so as to enable these said hereditaments to be conveyed to certain uses, and the said sums to be transferred upon certain trusts therein specified.

The said indenture concluded with a covenant by all the parties that settlements, conformable to the proposals therein contained, should be prepared and executed.

The commissioners charged and assessed the said indenture (under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, Sched., title "Settlement") with an ad valorem settlement duty, at the rate of 5*s.* for every 100*l.* on an aggregate sum of 97,345*l.*, in which was included a sum of 52,000*l.*, and 15,072*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* New Threes, and 769*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* Consols. The former sum being, in respect of the freehold hereditaments in Berks and Wilts, which were above mentioned as having been purchased at the price of 52,000*l.*, and which were held on trust to be resold, and the latter, being the sums above mentioned as held in trust to be invested in the purchase of real estate.

Against this assessment the said William Lewis Stucley appealed.

By the schedule to 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, certain stamp duties are imposed under the head "Settlement." And it is defined to be:

Any deed or instrument, whether voluntary or gratuitous, or upon any good or valuable consideration, other than a bona fide pecuniary consideration, whereby any definite and certain principal sum or sums of money (whether charged or chargeable on lands or other hereditaments or heritable subjects or not, or to be laid out in the purchase of lands or other hereditaments or heritable subjects or not), or any definite and certain share or shares in any of the Government or Parliamentary stocks or funds, or in the stock and funds of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, or of the Bank of Ireland, or of the East India Company, or of the South Sea Company, or of any other company or corporation, shall be settled or agreed to be settled upon or for the benefit of any person or persons, either in possession or reversion, either absolutely or for life, or other partial interest, or in any other manner whatsoever.

Digby, for the appellant, argued that the assessment in respect of 52,000*l.* could not be maintained, inasmuch as the property upon which it was made could not be considered as a "definite and certain principal sum of money" within the Act.

The Attorney-General (with him Crompton Hutton) argued that this property, being subject to a trust for conversion into money, would be regarded in equity as already converted. It was the case of a mere temporary investment of a trust-fund amounting to 52,000*l.* in land. That sum it was that really formed the subject of the present settlement, and was, therefore, subject to the settlement duty.

KELLY, C. B.—It appears to me impossible to support the claim of the Crown in this case. By the language of the statute the duty is imposed on the deed in respect of any definite and certain principal sum or sums of money settled or agreed to be settled. No doubt here the subject-matter alleged to be taxable is agreed to be settled, but is it a definite and certain sum of money? We are here met by the insuperable difficulty that there is no definite and certain sum of money until the land in question is sold. There is no definite principle upon which it may be estimated for the purpose of the duty; the amount upon which the tax is to be imposed is quite uncertain. The land might sell for double the sum laid out in it; it might sell for only half, so the amount of the original purchase-money is no sufficient criterion. If the Act had intended that the duty should be imposed upon property the subject matter of a settlement of this description, it would have provided some machinery for estimating its value. It was argued by the Attorney-General that there was a time when this property was represented by a sum of 52,000*l.*, and that it must still, under the provisions of the settlement, be looked upon as such sum of money. No doubt there was a time when the sum so invested was a specific sum of 52,000*l.*, and if that were the subject of the settlement it might be liable to the duty claimed. But that is not so. When the land was purchased the money was gone. Although a distinction was sought to be made between investing money in land and converting it into land, it is impossible to say that, for this purpose, the sum of money remains. There is no longer any certain definite sum; there is not for this purpose any longer any sum of money at all, for we cannot extend the terms of this Stamp Act or any other act of taxation. The result might be most mischievous and unjust if we were to say that this land is money because the land was purchased with a certain sum of trust money an indefinite period before, and still remained personalty in equity. For certain purposes it is to be considered as money no doubt. In case of an intestacy the next of kin would be entitled, and not the heir-at-law, and so for other purposes, as a disposition by will. But, for the purposes of the Stamp Act, there must be more than that; there must be a definite and certain principal sum of money. Here the sum is utterly indefinite and uncertain. For these reasons I think the case is not within the statute.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. When we once have come to see what the question really is, I confess it seems to me scarcely arguable. The commissioners have assessed stamp duty upon a sum of 52,000*l.* under a provision which only entitles them to tax a deed settling, or agreeing to settle, a definite and certain sum of money. Now let us look at the deed in question; it recites the fact that, under a former settlement, certain property was subject to the trusts of that settlement, and that a sum of 52,000*l.* constituting such property, had been invested in land. And it then proceeds to specify certain articles of agreement for a settlement. What the property in question consisted of is nowhere stated; the only approach to a statement of a definite sum of money, is the statement that certain estates, subject to the trusts of the former settlement, were purchased for 52,000*l.* Then the deed goes on to state that these estates are to be treated in equity as personalty. But that is not all; to make the matter still clearer it should be observed that there is a subsequent provision by which, by the consent of the parties interested, it shall be lawful for the trustees to treat the property in question as land, and not money. It is as clear as can be, that what was the subject of this settlement was these estates, and not any definite or certain sum of money.

Digitized by Google

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me a perfect fallacy to say that there was here a settlement of a definite or certain sum of money. The commissioners would not have known anything about the value of the property unless the amount of the purchase-money had been mentioned as 52,000*l.* But the mere fact of the property having originally cost that sum, does not make this a settlement of that particular sum.

Digby requested the judgment of the court as to the Consols and New Threes, subject to the trust for investment in land. He argued that this must be considered as land, being subject to a trust for conversion into land. He cited

Crabtree v. Bramble, 3 Atk. 679;
Guidot v. Guidot, 3 Atk. 254.

KELLY, C.B.—You have defeated the claim of the Crown with respect to the property already invested in the land, on the ground that, with reference to the assessment of duty under the Stamp Act, the actual existing fact alone can be looked at, and that therefore such property cannot, though regarded in equity as personalty, be looked at for this purpose as a definite sum of money. The same reasoning appears fatal to your present claim. The only way in which it might be argued is that the words "to be laid out in the purchase of land or other hereditaments, or not," are not inserted in the schedule to the Act after the words, "definite and certain share or shares, &c.," as they are after the words "definite and certain principal sum or sums of money." Still I think this property comes within the plain words of the Act, and is, therefore, subject to the duty.

Judgment for the appellants that the duty be reduced by the amount charged in respect of the sum of 52,000l.

Attorneys for appellants, Law, Hussey, and Hulbert.

Attorney for Commissioners, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

BOULTON v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.

Stamp duty—Building lease—17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, s. 16—"Further or other consideration"—Lease not otherwise charged.

The 16th section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83 enacts that "in any case where any deed or instrument which shall be chargeable with any ad valorem stamp duty in respect of any sum of money yearly or in gross, or any stock or security therein mentioned, shall be made also for any further or other valuable consideration, such deed or instrument shall be chargeable (except where express provision to the contrary is or shall be made in any Act of Parliament), with such further stamp duty as any separate deed or instrument made for such last-mentioned consideration alone would be chargeable with, except progressive duty:

Held, that a lease for ninety-nine years, granted in consideration of a certain rent, and of certain covenants, among which was a covenant by the lessee to complete certain houses which had been commenced to be built upon the demised premises, was within the above enactment, and was therefore chargeable in addition to the ad valorem duty assessed upon the amount of the rent with a duty as a lease not otherwise charged.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, pursuant to the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, at the request of the appellant, in order that he might appeal to the Court of Exchequer against the determination of the commissioners as to the stamp duty chargeable on a certain indenture of lease. The indenture in question was dated 1869, and made between George Boulton, the "lessor," and Edward Boulton, the "lessee," and witnessed that in consideration of the yearly rent, covenants, and agreements thereinafter reserved and contained, and in the exercise of a power given him by an indenture, dated the 20th Feb. 1868, the said lessor did appoint, demise, and lease unto the lessee all those four several pieces or parcels of ground, situate, &c., together with the four several messuages or tenements thereon erected and built, numbered, &c. and all ways, easements, and appurtenances to the said premises belonging. To hold the same with the appurtenances unto the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, from the 25th March 1868, for the term of ninety-nine years, yielding and paying, therefor, yearly, during the said term, the clear rent of 8*l.* 8*s.* for each of the said pieces of ground, and the messuages erected thereon, by equal quarterly payments, on the 25th March, the 24th June, the 29th Sept., and the 25th Dec. in every year, without deduction.

The lease, amongst other covenants, contained a covenant by the lessee, that he should, within six calendar months from the date thereof, complete and make fit for use, in every respect, each of the said messuages on the land thereby demised, with all necessary fixtures and fastenings to the same, and do all such works to the satisfaction of the surveyor for the time being, of the person or persons who for the time being should be in the receipt of the said sums thereinbefore reserved by way of rent, and also should, when required, make, form, and complete the footpath fronting and abutting on the said premises, and provide and lay down proper kerbing thereto, and pave the footpaths to the satisfaction of the same person or persons, and keep the sewers, drains, roads, and footpaths in repair, or, upon demand, pay a fair proportion of the expenses already incurred, and from time to time to be incurred in forming, making, completing, and keeping the same sewers, drains, roads, and footpaths in proper repair and condition until taken by the parish; and also that the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, should at all times during the said term hereby granted, at his and their own expense, keep the said messuages and all other buildings which might be thereinafter erected on the premises thereby demised in good and substantial repair and condition.

The commissioners assessed and charged this lease, under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, Sched. title "Lease," and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, Sched. title "Lease," with stamp duty as follows:—

Ad valorem lease duty, in respect of the yearly rent of 33*l.* 12*s.*, for a term of ninety-nine years, such sum being the aggregate yearly rent reserved by the said lease	£1	10	0
As for a separate lease made for a further or other valuable consideration, that is to say, a lease not otherwise charged	1	15	0
Progressive duty		10	0

Against this assessment the lessee appealed.

The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, s. 16, enacts as follows:—

And where any conveyance, charter, disposition, or contract, described in the schedule to this Act, shall be made partly in consideration of such annual sum as in the said schedule is mentioned, and partly in consideration of a sum of money or stock as mentioned under the head or title of "Conveyance" in the schedule to the said Act of the 13 & 14 Vict., such conveyance, charter, disposition, or contract, shall be chargeable with the ad valorem stamp duties granted by the said Acts respectively in respect of each of the said considerations; and in any case where any deed or instrument which shall be chargeable with any ad valorem stamp duty in respect of any sum of money, yearly or in gross, or any stock or security therein mentioned, shall be made also for any further or other valuable consideration, such deed or instrument shall be chargeable (except where express provision to the contrary is or shall be made in any Act of Parliament) with such further stamp duty as any separate deed or instrument made for such last-mentioned consideration alone would be chargeable with, except progressive duty.

Manisty, Q. C., for the appellant. It is contended that the covenant to complete the houses erected upon the demised land is a further or other valuable consideration within the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, s. 16. I submit that it was never intended to apply to such a case as the present. If a building lease such as the present be within the Act, every lease which contains a covenant by the lessee to repair is likewise within it, for the money to be laid out in repairs certainly goes in reduction of the rent that would otherwise be paid. The Legislature can never have intended to produce such a sweeping effect by such ambiguous words as "further or other consideration." The Act of 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, provided for the case of a lease granted in consideration of a fine or premium only without yearly rent, for a lease at a yearly rent without fine or premium, for a lease granted in consideration of a fine or premium and also of a yearly rent, and also for a lease not otherwise charged; but a case which frequently occurs in practice was not sufficiently provided for. It often happened that a lessor agreed to grant a lease at a certain rent, and then the intended lessee assigned his interest for a certain sum, and procured the making of a lease direct to his assignee for the rent originally agreed upon. To prevent this kind of transaction escaping taxation, the provision was introduced to make the one instrument taxable as amounting to two, i.e., a lease and an assignment. The 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97 Sched., title "Lease," provides expressly for the case, and also for fines or rents, payable wholly or in part of corn, grain, or other victual. All that was meant by the expression "further or other consideration" was to sum up compendiously the various provisions of this sort contained in 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97. It was intended to refer to every species of consideration not incident to the management, completion, or mode of dealing with the property demised. But there is seldom a lease in which there is not a provision that something shall be done to the property by the lessee, and it never could be intended that all those leases, in addition to the ad valorem duty on the rent, be also charged as a lease not otherwise charged.

The Attorney-General (with him C. Hutton), for the respondent, was not called upon.

KELLY, C. B.—When we look to the words of the Act in question it seems that there can be no reasonable doubt on this matter, and that this case is clearly subject to the two duties which have been imposed first to the ad valorem duty charged on the amount of rent, and secondly as a lease not otherwise charged. The Act imposes the latter duty when the lease is granted for some "further or other consideration" besides the rent. The only question, therefore, is whether there is in the case of this lease any such "further or other consideration." When we look at the deed, we find that the leases contain a covenant on the part of the lessee to complete the four messuages on the demised premises. Be the expense of this great or small, it amounts to a consideration, and clearly brings the case within the language of the Act. It is plain, therefore, that this lease in addition to the stamp duty assessed in relation to the rent is liable to the duty with which it would have been chargeable if made in consideration of the completion of the houses alone, that is to say, the duty upon a lease not otherwise charged.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think as a matter of surmise that it is probable that the language of the Act was framed with a view to meeting this very case, which was omitted from previous Acts probably from its not having been present to the minds of the framers of such Acts. Whether this be so or not, it is quite obvious that where money is contracted to be expended by a tenant in erecting a house on the landlord's freehold, it is just as much a valuable consideration, as when it is contracted to be paid to the landlord.

PIGOTT, B. concurred.

Judgment for the Crown.

Attorney for appellant, Boulton and Son.

Attorney for Commissioners, Solicitor af Inland Revenue.

THE TRUSTEES OF THE ROYAL LIVER FRIENDLY SOCIETY v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.

Stamp duty—Friendly society—Exemption—Transfer of mortgage.

The rules of a society registered as a friendly society, under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, authorised the investment of surplus funds upon real security. The trustees of the society invested certain funds on a transfer of a mortgage, which was carried out by an indenture of transfer, in which the mortgagors joined. The 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, s. 37, enacts "That no copy of rules . . . nor any bond to be given to or on account of any such society, or by the treasurer or any other officer thereof . . . nor any other document whatever required or authorised by or in pursuance of this Act or the rules of any society, shall be liable to stamp duty:"

Held, that the deed of transfer of the mortgage was not exempt from stamp duty.

Walker v. Giles commented upon.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, pursuant to the Act 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, at the request of the trustees of the Royal Liver Friendly Society, in order that they might appeal against the determination of the commissioners as to the liability of a certain indenture to stamp duty. The society is registered as a friendly society under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63. The indenture in question was a transfer of a mortgage, and was made between John Walker and William Walker, of Birkenhead, thereinafter called the mortgagors, of the first part, Timothy Ryan and Lawrence Daniel Kirby, of the second part, and the said trustees, thereinafter called the mortgagees, of the third part. It recited an indenture of mortgage from the said mortgagors to J. B. Aspinall and Timothy Ryan, a transfer of the said mortgage from Aspinall and Ryan to Ryan and Kirby, and witnessed that, in consideration of 1100*l.* to the said Ryan and Kirby, paid by the said mortgagees at the request of the said mortgagors, they, the said T. Ryan and L. D. Kirby, did assign unto the said mortgagees, their executors, administrators, and assigns, the mortgage-debt, and did grant and release, and the said mortgagors did also grant and confirm to the said mortgagees, their heirs and assigns, the hereditaments described in the schedules, to hold the same unto and to the use of the said mortgagees, their heirs and assigns. The said indenture likewise contained a proviso for redemption, power of sale, the usual mortgage covenants, and a declaration that the said sum so lent as aforesaid, was lent by the said mortgagees out of the funds of the Royal Liver Friendly Society, and as trustees thereof. The rules of the society empowered the trustees to invest the surplus funds (inter alia) upon real securities.

The commissioners charged this indenture with duty as follows:—Ad valorem transfer of mortgage duty on 1100*l.*, 5*s.* 6*d.* (under 28 & 29 Vict. c. 96, s. 17); progressive duty, 5*s.* 6*d.*

Against this decision the trustees of the society appealed on the ground that by the 37th section of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63 the indenture in question was exempt from stamp duty.

By that section it is enacted that

No copy of rules, nor power, warrant, or letter of attorney granted by any person as trustee of any society established under this Act, or any of the Acts hereby repealed, for the transfer of any share in the public funds standing in the name of such trustee, nor any order or receipts for money contributed to or received from the funds of any such society by any person liable or entitled to pay or receive the same by virtue of the rules thereof or of this Act, nor any bond to be given to or on account of any such society, or by the treasurer or any officer thereof, nor any draft or order, nor any form of policy, nor any appointment of any agent, nor any certificate or other instrument for the revocation of any such appointment, nor any other document whatever required or authorised by or in pursuance of this Act, or the rules of any society, shall be liable to stamp duty, provided that no exemption from any of the duties granted by any Act or Acts relating to stamp duties, shall be deemed to extend to any society, which shall assure the payment of money exceeding 200*l.*, or which shall assure the payment of any money on the death of a member to any person except executor, administrator, or assigns of such member, or the husband, wife, father, mother, child, brother, sister, nephew, or niece of such member.

By the 37th section of the old Friendly Societies Act (10 Geo. 4, c. 56), since repealed, it was enacted,

That no copy of rules, power, warrant, or letter of attorney, granted or to be granted by any person as trustee of any established under this Act for the transfer of any share in the public funds standing in the name of such trustee, nor any receipts given for any dividend in the public stock or fund, or interest of Exchequer Bills, nor any receipt nor any entry in any book of receipts for money deposited in the funds of any such society, nor for any money received by any member, his or her executors, administrators, assigns, or attorneys from the funds of such society, nor any bond or other security to be given to or on account of any such society, or by the treasurer, or trustee, or any officer thereof, nor any draft or order, nor any form of assurance, nor any appointment of any agent, nor any certificate or other instrument for the revocation of any such appointment, nor any other instrument or document whatever required or authorised to be given, issued, signed, made, or produced in pursuance of this Act shall be subject or liable to, or charged with any stamp duty or duties whatsoever.

C. Russell, for the appellants.—The question is whether this deed, being a transfer of a mortgage to the trustees of the society, is not exempt from stamp duty under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, s. 37. It was decided that mortgages and other securities given to trustees of building societies established under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, which incorporates the exemption given to friendly societies by the former Act, 10 Geo. 4, c 56, s. 37, were exempt from stamp duty, by Walker v. Giles, 6 C. B. 662. That case really concludes the present, for the language of the two sections is substantially identical. The omission of the words "or other security" really makes no difference. The words were probably omitted as useless and tautological, the concluding expression "any document" being sufficient. It is impossible, on looking at the two sections, to come to any other conclusion than that the intention of the framers of the present Act was simply to repeat the exemption contained in the former Act. It is quite clear that this instrument comes within the description of "a document authorised by this Act or the rules of any society," for the rules of this society expressly authorise investments on real security. [PIGOTT, B.—According to your argument any document arising out of the rules would be exempt. KELLY, C.B.—In the case of a mortgage, the mortgagor honestly pays for the stamp. Your argument must extend to original mortgages as well as transfers; and the practical result would be to exempt the borrowers from payment of duty on borrowing sums of money on mortgage of, it may be, very large amounts.] I contend that it is impossible to give any signification to the words of the section if this case is excluded. He also cited

Barnard v. Pillworth;
See notes to Walker v. Giles, 6 C. B. 698.

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that the Crown is entitled to judgment in this case. It appears by the rules that this society is empowered to invest its funds on real securities, and therefore on a mortgage, as in the present case. Now the question is whether, looking to the 37th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, the meaning is that not merely are certain acts done by the society itself directly in pursuance of authority conferred by the Act or by their rules exempted from becoming the subject of the duty, but that every instrument which has come into existence in the course of carrying out any act or transaction indirectly authorised is to be exempt. I cannot help thinking that if an exemption of so very extensive a character as the latter had been intended, the Legislature would have employed more explicit language. When we look at the terms of the section, and remember that the concluding words, on which stress was laid, "any document whatsoever, &c.," must be construed according to the well settled rule with respect to general words, as only referring to matters ejusdem generis with what has been specifically mentioned before, the case seems perfectly clear. The subjects of exemption which come first in order, copies of rules, powers of attorney for transfer of stock, orders, or receipts, are all very small matters which it is very reasonable that the Legislature should exempt. Then we come to the exemption of bonds given to or on account of any such society, or by the treasurer or any officer thereof, and a matter for consideration arises with reference to the difference between the wording of this Act and the former Act, 10 Geo. 4, c. 56. The words in that Act were, "any bond or other security to be given to or on account of any such society, or by the treasurer or trustee, or any officer thereof." The question is what the effect is of this alteration. The case of Giles v. Walker, which has been cited, was decided on the words of the former Act, and it was there held that the words used were not confined to bonds or other securities given by officers or others as security for the funds passing through their hands, or other such instruments relating to the internal dealings of the society, but were intended to have a general effect. Now it is very possible, as a matter of conjecture, that the alteration of the expressions used in the present Act may have been the result of this decision. The persons drawing the later Act may have seen that if the words used included any bond or other security for a loan of money or other investment, these exemptions might amount to a very large sum of money, and though it may have been intended to exempt a number of comparatively small matters, constantly occurring in the usual course of such a society's business it may not have been contemplated that these instruments should be exempted by which the society might carry into effect the investments of large sums of money. For this very reason it may have been that the words "or other security" have been left out in the present Act. Be that as it may, the question arises on the words of this Act, whether it was intended to exempt instruments by which investments such as that now in question of the property of these societies are carried into effect. Now by the general usage under contracts for the transfer of mortgages, the stamp duty is paid for by the mortgagor; and if the transfer of a mortgage is exempt under the words of the Act, it is impossible to say that an original mortgage will not also be exempt. If merely because the rules authorise the investment of money in real securities the instruments carrying out such investments are exempted, then this exemption will apply both to cases in which by usage the duty is payable by the mortgagor, as well as those in which the duty is payable by the society investing. It is quite impossible that the Legislature can have intended this. The exemption must have been intended to apply to cases only in which the society would have to pay the duty. The specific expressions used before the general concluding words show clearly that this was so. This is not the case of a document authorised by the rules within the meaning of the Act, for although the investment is authorised by the rules, it does not follow that every instrument which comes into existence as connected with such investment is exempted. There are no words to that effect. If the words had been "no document rendered necessary for any purpose by the rules," the effect might have been different. Under these circumstances I think our judgment must clearly be against the claim for exemption.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. It is obvious upon a comparison of the Act of Geo. 4, and the present Act that the intention of the latter was to exempt only instruments immediately connected with the business of the society. It was never intended to relieve persons borrowing money from these societies. And the effect of such an exemption as contended for would be for the relief, not of the society, but really and in effect for the relief of the borrowers, for they are the persons who substantially have to pay the stamp duty. So far as regards the society itself, it was reasonable enough that the Legislature wishing to encourage such societies should exempt them from the payment of duty in respect of documents directly authorised by the Act or their rules, but I agree with my Lord that a mortgage or transfer of mortgage is not such a document. I am strongly disposed to think, though this is after all mere surmise, that the words "or other security" which occur in the former Act were omitted from the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63 probably on purpose by the framers of the Act to prevent this very question arising. The words of the former Act were certainly ambiguous, and might be construed to include a mortgage, and that was probably deemed by the framers of this Act not to be the intention of the Legislature. All the words of the old Act, as of the new, seem to point to direct transactions between the members of the society and the society, except the expressions "Any bond or other security, &c." It is quite clear that the Court of Common Pleas gave judgment with respect to the effect of those words, as my Lord stated, but my impression is that in reality the bond or security thereby meant was not a bond or security for repayment of a loan, but a bond or security given by the treasurers, clerks, or agents of a society for duly accounting; and that, in order to confine the meaning to this, the framers of the present Act omitted the words "or other security," which tended to make the meaning ambiguous. It is said that the present instrument is included by the words at the latter part of the clause, but those words must clearly be read as including only matters ejusdem generis with what has gone before.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think, with reference to the construction of the words, "bond or other security," in the old Act, I should have agreed with the Court of Common Pleas; but it seems to me impossible to give the same meaning to the words of the present Act, after the omission of the words "other security." Then there is only one other expression which seems to make the case doubtful; that is, the expression, "any document whatever," &c. These words, however, I think must be read as confined to things ejusdem generis with what has been previously specified.

Judgment for the Crown.

Attorneys for appellant, Makinson and Carpenter.

Attorney for Commissioners, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

BAIL COURT.

Reported by G. F. R. JERVIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, Jan. 29.

(Before HANNEN, J.)

FRAZER v. DANIEL.

County Courts Commitment—Debtors' Act 1869.

An order of commitment by a County Court judge previous to 1st Jan. 1870, if not executed before that date, is abrogated by the effect of the Debtors' Act 1869, and the County Court judge is justified in suspending it:

Semble, that the judgment-creditor may apply to the County Court judge for a new order, and if the facts warrant a commitment in the form prescribed by the Debtors' Act, the County Court judge may make the same.

The defendant had been committed on a judgment-summons by Sir Eardley Wilmot, the judge of the County Court of Marylebone, in the month of December last, but no arrest had taken place up to 1st Jan. 1870, when the Act for the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt came into force. Sir Eardley Wilmot subsequently in open court ordered the high bailiff not to make the arrest, expressing a doubt whether the order of commitment made prior to the commencement of the Act for Abolishing Imprisonment for Debt could be efficacious to arrest upon afterwards, and accordingly suspended his order of commitment. Upon these facts, Torr moved for a prohibition to issue to the County Court judge of Marylebone, to prevent him from suspending the order. The County Court Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95) gives judges of County Courts power to commit on default of payment of money recovered in the County Courts. The Debtors' Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), abolishes imprisonment for debt except in certain cases. It does not take away the power of the County Court judge to commit, but renders it necessary for him to state on the face of the order the very grounds of the commitment. Here this was not set forth, but the order was made previous to the commencement of the Debtors' Act, but was not executed through inability to find the defendant. This order must be in force now, or justice will miscarry, for a commitment being out against the defendant, another commitment cannot be made. [HANNEN, J.—If the facts warrant it, the County Court judge has still the power.] He has already made the order. He cannot make another order whilst this is unsatisfied. The 20th section of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 83, the Act for winding-up the Bankruptcy Court, which must be read with the Debtors' Act, expressly saves the operation of that Act as regarded past cases. The words are, "This repeal shall not interfere with the prosecution or affect the course of any legal proceeding pending in bankruptcy or otherwise." "Otherwise" alludes to such cases as the present. The words of sect. 5 of the Debtors' Act, "subject to the provisions of the Debtors' Act," only apply to cases in progress, and there is a distinction between pending matters and those like the present, where the commitment took place before the end of last year. The commitment here is complete, and cannot be affected by a subsequent Act.

Digitized by Google

Macrae Moir showed cause in the first instance on behalf of the County Court judge. By the Debtors' Act, imprisonment for debt was abolished, and any imprisonment now must be made in conformity with the provisions of that Act. Sect. 5 of the Debtors' Act, paragraph 2, is express to the effect that this Act shall be substituted for those previously in force. The new Act contains provisions as to the form of the order, and an order to be enforced now must be in conformity with those provisions.

Hannen, J.—I am of opinion that the application must be refused. The 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62 is an Act for abolishing imprisonment for debt; not merely for abolishing imprisonment for debt following upon judgments of the Superior Courts, but for the abolition of imprisonment for debt under those circumstances in which it could take place in the County Courts; and it provides a series of other safeguards for that which is deemed to be a right that should be safely hedged round—viz., the power of incarcerating a debtor for the non-payment of his debt. There are now, under this Act more stringent conditions to be fulfilled before a person can be sent to prison. I have to consider what is the meaning of the words of sect. 4 of this Act. Those words are, "With the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, no person shall, after the commencement of this Act, be arrested or imprisoned for making default in the payment of money." The exceptions are set forth, under none of which does the present case fall. This is an application to imprison the defendant for default in the payment of a sum of money, and I do not think the circumstances of the case bring it under the conditions under which only imprisonment for debt can be had according to this Act. Previously the judge of a County Court had only to make inquiries, and, if he thought the defendant was evading payment, to commit him; now a number of other conditions are required. The intention of the Legislature was to make a clean sweep of it, and that no one should be arrested unless those conditions were fulfilled. I think it follows that the judgment-creditor is entitled to proceed, but it must be by substantive application before the County Court Judge, who will then see if the new conditions are complied with, and he can then make an order.

Application refused.

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Reported by John Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, Jan. 22.

(Before Cockburn, C. J., Byles, and Keating, JJ., Pigott, and Cleasby, BB.)

Reg. v. Wm. Parker.

Depositions—Magistrate's signature—Pleading—Surplusage.

It is sufficient if the signature of a committing magistrate be attached at the conclusion of the depositions of the several witnesses in the form in schedule M of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, and his signature need not be subscribed to the deposition of each witness respectively.

An indictment for making a false declaration before a justice of the peace as to the loss of a pawnbroker's ticket concluded, "Whereas, in truth, the defendant had not lost the said ticket, but had sold, lent, or deposited it as a security to one J. C.:"

Held, that the allegation, "that the defendant had sold, lent, or deposited it as a security to J. C." might be rejected as mere surplusage, and did not vitiate for uncertainty.

Case reserved by Lush, J., for the opinion of this court.

The indictment was in the following form:

Northumberland to wit—The jurors for our lady the Queen on their oath, present that William Parker did, on the 6th April 1869, at the parish of Tynemouth, in the borough of Tynemouth, in the county of Northumberland, wilfully and corruptly make a false declaration before John Byrom Bramwell, Esq., one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said borough of Tynemouth, that he, the said William Parker, had lost a certain note or memorandum, being a pawnbroker's ticket. (a) Whereas in truth and in Witnesses, James Carter, James Mitchell, Sarah Frame, and John Hewitt, P.C.

Misdemeanor in making a false declaration (Mr. Steavenson).

The deposition of a deceased witness was tendered and objected to on the ground that it did not purport to be signed by the justices before whom it purported to have been taken as required by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 17. (b)

The deposition in question was the second of four depositions made at the same hearing, all of which were pinned together. Each occupied more than one sheet of paper.

The justices did not sign either of the sheets on (a) 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 99, s. 16; 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 62, s. 12.

(b) The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 17, enacts, that in all cases where any person shall appear or be brought before any justice or justices of the peace charged with any indictable offence whether committed in England or Wales, or upon the high seas, or on land beyond the sea, or whether such person appear voluntarily after summons, or have been apprehended with or without warrant, or be in custody for the same or any other offence, such justice or justices, before he or they shall commit such accused person to prison for trial, or before he or they shall admit him to bail, shall, in the presence of such accused person, who shall be at liberty to put questions to any witness, produced against him, take the statement (M) on oath or affirmation of those who shall know the facts and circumstances of the case, and shall put the same into writing, and such depositions shall be read over to and signed respectively by the witnesses who shall have been so examined, and shall be signed also by the justice or justices taking the same, and the justice or justices before whom any such witnesses shall appear to be examined as aforesaid shall, before such witness is examined, administer to such witness the usual oath or affirmation, which such justice or justices shall have full power and authority to do; and if, upon the trial of the person so accused as first aforesaid, it shall be proved by the oath or affirmation of any credible witness that any person whose deposition shall have been taken as aforesaid is dead, or so ill as not to be able to travel, and if also it be proved that such deposition was taken in the presence of the person so accused, and that he or his counsel or attorney had a full opportunity of cross-examining the witness, then, if such deposition purport to be signed by the justice by or before whom the same purports to have been taken, it shall be lawful to read such deposition as evidence in such prosecution without further proof thereof, unless it shall be proved that such deposition was not in fact signed by the justices purporting to sign the same.

Schedule M.

—— to wit.—The examination of C. D., of , farmer, and E. F., of , labourer, taken on [oath] this day of , in the year of our Lord , at , in the county aforesaid, before the undersigned [one] of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said [county], in the presence and hearing of A. B., who is charged this day before [me], for that he, the said A. B., on , at [&c., describing the offence as in a warrant of commitment].

This deponent, C. D., on his [oath] saith as follows, &c. [stating the deposition of the witness as nearly as possible in his own words. When his deposition is complete, let him sign it.]

And this deponent E. F. upon his oath saith as follows [&c.]

The above depositions of C. D. and E. F. were taken [sworn] before me, at , on the day and year first above mentioned. J. S.

Digitized by Google

which the depositions were written except the last (that sheet not containing any part of the depositions in question), and the signature was appended at the end of the last deposition to a statement in the following form copied from schedule M of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42. "The above depositions of" (naming the several witnesses, and amongst them the deceased) "was taken and sworn before us at, &c., according to the form in the schedule."

I allowed the deposition to be read subject to the opinion of this court on its admissibility.

It was objected, after the jury were sworn and charged that the indictment was bad for uncertainty, as it alleged in the alternative that the prisoner "had sold, lent, or deposited it."

I overruled the objection, but as I meant to reserve the other point, I also reserved this for the opinion of the court: (see 1 C. & K. 243.)

The prisoner was convicted, but not sentenced. I admitted him to bail, but I am not aware whether he has been able to find it or not.

If the deposition ought not to have been received, or if the indictment is bad, the conviction is to be quashed. Robt. Lush.

Greenhow for the prisoner.—The conviction was wrong on two grounds. The deposition was not admissible in evidence because it was not signed by the magistrate before whom it was taken, as required by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42 s. 17. It is contended that under that enactment the several depositions of the witnesses should be respectively signed by the committing magistrate, and that the magistrate's signature once only at the end of the examination is not sufficient. This point has not been decided in this court as yet. In Reg. v. Osborne, 8 Car. & P. 118, where three witnesses were examined before the magistrate, and the examinations of all three were on the same sheet of paper, the prosecutor being first, and the only signature of the magistrate was at the end of the last examination, after the words "Sworn before me," it was held that the depostion of the prosecutor, who had died before the trial, was admissible. Coleridge, J., said, "There may be a doubt whether each deposition should not be signed by the justice." His lordship then conferred with Lord Abinger, C. B., and afterwards said, "My own impression was that this was sufficient; if this had been the case of an affidavit it would have been bad; but that is on account of an arbitrary rule. In this case, however, there is no such rule, and Lord Abinger agrees with me in thinking, after the proof given by the justice's clerk (that the deposition was regularly taken and read over in the presence of the prisoner, and that he had an opportunity of cross-examining the prosecutor), that the deposition is admissible." That case was upon the statute of 7 Geo. 4. In Reg. v. Lee, 4 Fos. & Fin. 63, where the depositions of several witnesses were taken before the magistrate on separate sheets of paper, and signed by the magistrate once at the end, and then the sheets of paper were attached together, Pollock, C. B., held that the depositions were properly signed, so as to render the deposition of one who died before the trial admissible in evidence. There is, however, the case of Reg. v. Richards, 4 Fos. & Fin. 860, which is opposed to the above cases. There Cockburn, C. J., said that each deposition must be signed by the witness and the magistrate, and that it was not in compliance with the statute for the magistrate merely to sign at the end. [Cockburn, C.J.—At the time I so expressed myself my attention had not been called to schedule M; when I saw that I thought my previous view was erroneous.] It is submitted that the form in schedule M will not control the positive language of sect. 17, "and shall be signed also by the magistrate taking the same." In Reg. v. France, 2 M. & Rob. 207, where a witness W., who had been examined and cross-examined before the magistrates, died before the trial, and his deposition was duly signed by the magistrates, but the cross-examination which had taken place on a subsequent day was not signed by the magistrates, but the depositions of two other witnesses on the prisoner's behalf, which had been taken at the same time with the cross-examination of W., were pinned up along with it, and the last sheet of the whole was signed by the magistrates, Alderson, B., after consulting Parke, B., said if the magistrates' clerk could state that the sheets were all pinned together at the time the magistrates signed the last sheet, he thought he must receive the whole in evidence; but neither the magistrates' clerk nor one of the magistrates being able so to state, the deposition as well as the cross-examination was rejected, although the magistrate stated that all the sheets were lying on the table when he signed them. The following cases were also cited:

Reg. v. Johnson, 2 Car. & Kir. 354;
Reg. v. Young, 3 Car. & Kir. 106.

As to the second point, the indictment is bad for uncertainty in averring that the defendant "sold, lent, or deposited it as a security." The rule is that averments must be certain and not in the alternative:

Reg. v. Jones, 1 Car. & Kir. 243;
1 East, P. C. 245;
1 Rus. on Crimes, 466.

Although this averment need not have been inserted, yet having been so it should have been alleged with certainty.

No counsel appeared for the prosecution.

Cockburn, C. J.—I am of opinion that the conviction must stand, and that both objections fail. Upon the first point as to the admissibility of the deposition, we have the authority of two cases for their reception, the case of Reg. v. Young, a case before Mr. Greaves, sitting as a commissioner, and in which he took the opinion of Williams, J. as to the admissility of the evidence, and the case of Reg. v. Lee, where Pollock, C. B., held that depositions signed in the same way as those now in question were admissible in evidence. In the case at the Central Criminal Court before me, the same point arose, but my attention was called to the 17th section of the Act without any reference to the schedule. On reading the 17th section I was of opinion that that section strictly construed required that the deposition of each witness should be signed by the committing magistrate. After my decision the clerk to the magistrates called my attention to the decided cases and the schedule. On looking at the two together, and seeing that the language of sect. 17 is not conclusive, and that the section says that such depositions shall be read over to and signed respectively by the witnesses, and the word "respectively" is omitted when it speaks of the signature by the magistrate, and reading the section by the light of the schedule—which, after giving the form of the caption and the introductory part of the deposition of each witness, concludes, "The above depositions of C. D. and E. F. were taken before me," and the magistrate is then to affix his signature, I thought that the section did not exact from the magistrate that he should affix his signature to the deposition of each witness, but that it was enough if he attached it to the entire set of depositions as a body. Accordingly I informed Mr. Oke, the magistrates' clerk, that I had too hastily decided the point, and authorised him to state that I did not intend on any future occasion to abide by it. I think, therefore, looking at the section and schedule together, it is enough if the depositions are signed according to the form given in the schedule. These depositions were signed in that way, and I think that was sufficient to make them admissible. As to the second point, I have no wish to infringe on any general rule of criminal law, and think that where the indictment sets forth anything which it alleges as constituting the subject matter of the offence we are bound by it; but where what is unnecessarily put in the indictment is plainly suplusage, it may be rejected. In the present case the offence consists in the having made a false declaration as to the loss of the pawn-ticket; but the indictment goes on to say, whereas in truth he had not lost the said ticket. If the indictment had stopped there it would have been sufficient, but it goes on further to state that the defendant had sold, lent, or deposited it as a security to one J. C. Now what is this but only stating the evidence by which the falsity of the declaration was to be proved? If that had been the essence of the offence, and necessary to be stated, there would have been ground for the argument of the prisoner's counsel, but, as it is not, it may be treated as mere surplusage, and not vitiating the indictment.

Byles, J.—I am of the same opinion. The statute intended plainly that the committing magistrate's signature should be affixed to the whole depositions when attached together. If all the depositions had been written on one sheet of paper, the signature of the magistrate at the end would clearly have been sufficient, and it does not, in my opinion, make any difference that the several depositions have been sewn or attached together by some other means. As to the second objection, if the indictment had stopped at the averment, "Whereas, in truth he had not lost the said ticket," it would have been sufficient; but it goes on to exhaust all suppositions for the defendant's believing that he had lost it. This is clearly surplusage, and may be rejected.

The other judges were of the same opinion.

Conviction affirmed.

Reg. v. French.

Forgery—Acquittance—Receipt—24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 23.

A document issued to members of the Ancient Order of Foresters Friendly Society, called a "clearance," certified that the member had paid all his dues and demands, and authorised any court of the order to accept the bearer as a clearance member:

Held, that this was not the subject of forgery within the 24 & 25 Vict. c, 98, s. 23 (a) as an acquittance or receipt.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by Lush, J. at the last summer assizes for the West Riding of Yorkshire, held at Leeds.

Indictment on the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 23 for forging an acquittance or receipt for money.

The prisoner was secretary of a friendly society called the Ancient Order of Foresters, which had branches in various towns. A member removing from one place to another, who had paid all dues, was entitled to a document in the form hereafter set out, called a "clearance," which admitted him to all the privileges of membership at any place where a branch of the society existed.

The qualifications for membership were the payment of an entrance fee, a certain time of probation, and certain general payments made at meetings of the society called "courts." At these courts, constituted by the presence of the chief ranger, the sub-chief ranger, the treasurer, the secretary, and two members at the least, the payments were made to the secretary, and by him handed over there and then to the treasurer. Neither the chief ranger, nor the sub-chief ranger received or was responsible for any of these payments, nor were their signatures to a "clearance" understood as importing that any money had been received by them or either of them; but a "clearance" without their signatures would not have been accepted.

Edward Cragg, a member of the society, was entitled to a "clearance," but the money he had paid had not been accounted for by the prisoner to the treasurer.

The prisoner sent to Cragg a "clearance," of which the following is a copy, and to which he forged the names of the chief and the sub-chief rangers.

Ancient Order of Foresters Friendly Society.
Members' Clearance.
Authorised form pursuant to General Law.

Samuel Shawcross, Permt. Sec.

Court "Painters," No. 4076 of the Leeds District, held at the Harewood Arms, Harewood-street, in Leeds, in the county of York.

To all whom it may concern. These are to certify that the bearer hereof, brother Edward Cragg, a [state whether single or married] married man, now aged twenty-six years, by trade a painter, was admitted a member of the above court on the 25th day of June 1864, and has paid all dues and demands up to the 29th day of August 1868.

We therefore hereby authorise any court of the order to accept the said brother as a clearance member, subject to the conditions expressed in the general laws, to which, so far as they may apply to the above court, we undertake to conform.

In witness whereof we have, by order of the court and on its behalf, subscribed our hands, and affixed the seal of the court.

Thomas Maw, Chief Ranger.
(Seal.) John Doyle, Sub-Chief Ranger.
George French, Secretary.

Caution.—The member to whom this clearance is granted, must throw it into some legal court within two calendar months from the time of drawing the same, and should it be refused by any court, it must be returned to the court which granted it, within one calendar month, or the member will become suspended: (See General Laws, 92, 93, 94, 95.)

We, the undersigned, declare that this is the document presented to this court, No. 1567, by brother Cragg, on Oct. 26, 1868.

William Tranter, C.R.
(Seal.) Nathaniel Powell, S.C.R.
Thomas Bates, Secretary, Court 1567.

May 24, 1864.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the above document is an acquittance or receipt for money within the meaning of the statute? The prisoner was convicted, but admitted to bail.

Robert Lush.

No counsel were instructed on either side.

Cockburn, C. J.—In this case it appears that there was a doubt whether the document the prisoner was indicted for forging was an acquittance or receipt for money within the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 23, upon which the indictment was framed. We are of opinion that it was not an acquittance or receipt for money within that enactment, and that it is nothing more than what it purports to be, viz., a certificate certifying that the bearer was admitted a member of the court which issued it, and had paid up all dues, and authorising any other court of the Ancient Order of Foresters to accept the bearer as a clearance member. We think that it is simply a certificate, and not in any sense of the term an acquittance or receipt for money, and therefore that the conviction cannot be upheld.

Conviction quashed.

(a) The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 23, enacts "Whosoever shall forge or alter, offer, &c., any undertaking, warrant, order, authority, or request for the payment of money, or for the delivery or transfer of any goods or chattels, or of any note, bill, or other security for the payment of money, or for procuring or giving credit or any indorsement on or assignment of any such undertaking, warrant, order, authority, or request, or any accountable receipt, acquittance, or receipt for money or for goods, or for any note, bill, or other security for the payment of money, or any indorsement or assignment of any such accountable receipt, with intent in any of the cases aforesaid to defraud, shall be guilty of felony, &c.

Digitized by Google

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by HENRY F. PURCELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, Nov. 17, 1869.

THE BENGAL.

County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71)—Order to institute proceedings in the High Court of Admiralty.

This court, in pursuance of the provisions of sect. 9, will, should it think fit, grant an order for instituting proceedings before it, which might have been taken without agreement in the County Court.

Clarkson moved in this case for an order to institute a suit under the above section, on the part of the owners of two steam tugs, who claimed to have rendered salvage service to the Bengal (1300 tons burthen). An agreement had been made between the masters of the tugs and the master of the Bengal, to tow her into port for a specified sum, but it was alleged that subsequently the difficulty of the enterprise had increased, and a question of law was likely to arise, whether the services rendered did not amount to salvage.

The COURT granted the application.

Proctors for plaintiff, Lowless and Nelson.

Tuesday, Nov. 23, 1869.

THE MEMPHIS.

Costs—Practice—Inspection of documents—Unnecessary motion.

This court, in all cases where a motion is made for leave to inspect documents without a previous application to the person in possession, will condemn the party moving in costs of the motion.

This was a cause of salvage, in which

Phillimore, on the part of defendants, moved for leave to inspect certain policies of insurance and bills of lading.

Clarkson for the plaintiffs, offered no opposition to the order, so far as documents in possession of the plaintiff were concerned, but asked that the defendants be condemned in the costs of the motion which was unnecessary, they having made no previous application to the plaintiffs for leave to inspect.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The defendants must have their order; but I shall condemn them in the cost of the motion. The court will follow this rule in all cases where a motion for inspection is made without previous application to the other side.

Proctors for plaintiff, Clarkson, Son, and Greenwell.

Proctors for defendants, Pritchard and Sons.

THE HEART OF OAK.

Mortgage—Fraudulent Preference.

The Admiralty Court, being a court of law and equity, will follow the decisions of the courts of law and equity in deciding questions under the bankruptcy law.

Where a debtor mortgaged to one creditor all his effects, with a colourable exception in view of bankruptcy, and without any present equivalent:

Held, that the mortgages were not valid,

Semble, a debtor must not assign all or nearly all his effects to one creditor, so as to put it out of his power to carry on his trade; but such an assignment is not necessarily fraudulent where it does not include his trade effects, or where he gets a present equivalent, and The assignment of a security to a particular creditor, even when bankrupty is inevitable, if the assignment be not made voluntarily, but at the demand of a creditor, is not necessarily a fraudulent preference.

This was a cause of mortgage instituted under the Admiralty Court Act (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 11, by W. F. Watts, the mortgagee of the sloop Heart of Oak, her tackle, &c., against W. P. V. Wallis, the assignee in bankruptcy of Julius Vandenbergh, her registered owner intervening.

The material facts of the case were these: There was a shipping firm at Portsmouth, of Vandenbergh and Son, and to this firm Watts, the plaintiff, before the year 1866 (the exact date did not appear) became a clerk for a twelvemonth without any salary, and afterwards at a salary of 10*s.* a week, but with no obligation to a fixed or a regular attendance, and with liberty to carry on a sort of business of his own with masters of ships, for the sale, exchange, and transfer of their private adventures. His chief duty to the firm was to enter ships at the Custom House and clear them out. In June 1866, he entered into an engagement with Mr Julius Vandenbergh, the mortgagor, who appears not to have been a member of the firm, but who carried on business in another room of the same house in which the firm carried on their business. Julius Vandenbergh was a shipowner and a commission agent, and Watts was engaged, according to his own statement, "to do his work generally," for which he was to receive 30*l.* per annum, but of that he never did receive a farthing. Almost his first act appears to have been to assist his new master in endeavouring to obtain the assent of creditors to a deed of composition at 5*s.* in the pound. This attempt failed, and Julius Vandenbergh was obliged in the year 1866 to do what is technically called "keep his house," which it is admitted constituted an act of bankruptcy, but no creditor chose to make him a bankrupt; and he appears to have remained unmolested until the year 1869, and was therefore, under the 88th sect. of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, not liable at that time for an act of bankruptcy committed more than twelve months before. The Heart of Oak, which belonged to Julius Vandenbergh, sailed upon what is called the principle of thirds. The master paid the crew their wages and food, deducted two-thirds for himself from the earnings of the ship, and paid the other third to the owners. Watts received this one-third, and paid it over to Julius Vandenbergh. Watts kept a sort of diary with an account of moneys which he had paid for Julius Vandenbergh from June 1866, but he never kept any account of moneys received from Julius Vandenbergh, and took no receipt and made no entry of moneys which he paid over to him; he received from 90*l.* to 100*l.*; he kept no account, but tied the vouchers together. He kept no books at all for himself, and Julius Vandenbergh had no banking account.

It appeared that receiving no salary or repayments of any kind for his disbursements, Watts pressed Vandenbergh for a security and obtained the equity of redemption of some houses; but in January 1869, there being some considerable sum (about 100*l.*) due to him he pressed for further security, and Vandenbergh being satisfied with his accounts, which he says he went through with him, gave to Watts the security of the first mortgage dated the 4th Jan. 1869 (which was registered on the 26th March 1869), for 110*l.*; Watts prepared this mortgage, as he did the subsequent one, himself. In the early part of the same month—between the 5th and 10th—the Heart of Oak got upon the rocks at Lyme Cobb and suffered severe damage. Watts called upon Vandenbergh to repair this damage, but Vandenbergh declined on the ground that he had no money. Watts undertook to make the repairs and asked for a further mortgage as a security, and he gave some evidence that he expended upwards of 60*l.* for this purpose.

The second mortgage was pleaded, and sworn to have been executed on the 8th Jan. 1869; it purported to secure the repayment of the sum of 60*l.* It was admitted, however, upon the evidence, that it certainly was not executed until after the 29th March. This admission was inevitable, because, purporting to be executed on the 8th Jan., it recited the registration of the former mortgage on the 29th March following. This was sought to be explained by reference to an agreement which bore date the 8th Jan. 1869, and it was said that the second mortgage was merely an amplification of the agreement which it was urged was contemporaneous with the repair of the vessel. This agreement was not put in evidence till after the cross examination of Watts. The bankruptcy took place on the 10th May, and the second mortgage was not registered till the August following. It further appeared that in Dec. 1868, or thereabouts, another attempt at composition with his creditors was made by Vandenbergh, in which Watts took an active part, and which it was said failed on account of the refusal of a single creditor. In Jan. 1869, the debts were between 1400*l.* and 1500*l.*, and it was admitted by Vandenbergh, that there remained no available assets for creditors.

Giffard, Q. C. and Cohen for defendant.—The second mortgage is inoperative, as an act of bankruptcy had been committed within twelve months of the actual bankruptcy, and the ship at the time of the execution was within the order and disposition of the bankrupt:

12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 125;
17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 37, 43, 55, 66, 70.

There is no proof that the second mortgage was executed before the bankruptcy, it was antedated, it was not registered, and there can be no doubt on consideration of the evidence that it was executed after the bankruptcy. In reference to the first mortgage, apart from any other consideration, it is a fraudulent preference; the facts disclose a secret trust in favour of the bankrupt, therefore the mortgage is per se fraudulent:

13 Eliz. c. 5;
Twine's Case, 1 Sm. L. C. 1.

There is a fraudulent preference, for by the mortgage the mortgagor conveyed all his available assets:

Ex parte Foxley, re Nurse, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 515; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 862;
Woodhouse v. Murray, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 633; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 570;
Graham v. Chapman, 12 C. B. 85.

Butt, Q.C., and Pritchard, for the mortgagor.—The ship was out of the control of the bankrupt once the first mortgage was made, and at the time of the second mortgage he was not the owner:

Griffith's Bankruptcy, p. 450;
Joy v. Campbell, 1 Sch. & Lef., 328.

Moreover the objection that the ship was in the bankrupt's order and disposition at the time of the bankruptcy should have been specifically pleaded. The mortgage was registered in the usual way, and, not pending any proceedings in bankruptcy, the mortgagor did not remain in possession, and the gift was only of part of the mortgagor's property, and not general; therefore Twine's case does not hold good in the present case:

Van Castel v. Booker, 2 Ex. 691;
Brown v. Kempton, 19 L. J., N. S. 169, C. P.

The mortgagor was not really bankrupt till after execution of the second mortgage. Even if the upt assigned all his property this would not arily constitute a fraudulent preference, the court must decide this question on an examination of all the facts of the case.

Smith v. Timms, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 827; 1 H. & C. 849;
Johnson v. Feseymeyer, 3 De G. & J. 13;
Balme v. Hutton, 2 C. & J. 19.

It is clear that the first mortgage did not convey all the mortgagor's interest, for after that had been given it was still worth plaintiff's while to advance money on a second mortgage, and the mortgagor's good faith is shown by his spending the money raised by the second mortgage in repairs.

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE—This court is required, and I believe for the first time, to administer the law of bankruptcy as between an assignee and a creditor mortgagee. The present Lord Chancellor observed in the case of Ex parte Roseley, speaking of the assignment of property by a bankrupt, "there cannot be any difference in the mode of judging of such an assignment in the courts of common law and equity," neither can there be, I may add, any difference in the mode of judging of such a case in the High Court of Admiralty, which is both a court of law and equity, and I must endeavour to decide the matter now before me upon the same principles as those which have governed the decisions in those courts. The industry of counsel has furnished me with reference to all the principal cases, and to some of them I will presently refer. [His Lordship then proceeded to summarise the facts as above, and having done so continued.] I think it unnecessary to go into further detail. I am satisfied upon the whole evidence as to two material points: First, that after the assignment of the equity of redemption in the houses and the mortgage of the Heart of Oak, there remains scarcely any, and if any, the most inconsiderable, assets in the hands of Vandenbergh; secondly, that at the time when these assignments were made, both Vandenbergh and Watts were aware that the former was practically bankrupt. It was said that I had no evidence that the ship was not of greater value than both the mortgages, and that perhaps the property not assigned was therefore considerable; but Watts, in answer to this question put to him by the counsel for the assignee, "How was the composition" (that is the proposed composition of 5s. in the pound) "with the creditors to be paid? you had the equity of redemption of the houses and the mortgage of the Heart of Oak," answered, after a considerable pause, "I don't know." Nor did he or Vandenbergh, in his examination before me, ever pretend or suggest that there was any margin of property to be derived from the ship after the mortgages had been satisfied. And here I may observe that some furniture said to have been possessed by Vandenbergh, but apparently of the most trifling value, was the only property which could be suggested as not being covered by the assignment. Having arrived at these conclusions of fact, I forbear to dwell upon the various circumstances of suspicion which surround the case of the plaintiff; but I will add, that with respect to the demeanour of the witnesses, while there was obviously much in the broken health and spirits of the bankrupt (who was most humanely cross-examined) to excite compassion, there was apparently no want of candour in his evidence, or in the manner in which he gave it—a remark I regret to say is in my judgment inapplicable to the testimony of the plaintiff. It remains for me to state briefly the law which is applicable to this state of facts. Before I consider the general law, I will deal with an argument founded upon the Merchant Shipping and Bankruptcy Acts. The 125th section of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, enacts "that if any bankrupt at the time he becomes bankrupt, shall by the consent and permission of the true owner thereof, have in his possession, order, or disposition, any goods or chattels whereof he was reputed owner," &c., such goods or chattels shall be deemed to be the property of the bankrupt, and it was contended that the effect of the sects. 37, 43, 55, 66, and 70 of the Merchant and Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), showed that this vessel, the second mortgage of which was not registered till after the bankruptcy, was still in the "order and disposition" of the bankrupt, and therefore passed to his assignees. To this, I incline to think, though a decision upon this point is not necessary to the view which I take of the case, that it was effectually replied that the words in the 125th section of the first statute "true owner," applied to third persons, and that the fact of the registration of the first mortgage before the date of the bankruptcy was sufficient to show that the vessel could not have been sold by the bankrupt, a position which was further supported by a reference to the 70th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104). It was also contended that, apart from the bankruptcy laws, these mortgages were, under the authority of Twine's case, Sm. L. C. vol. 1, p. 1, fraudulent and invalid, inasmuch as the circumstances showed that there was a secret trust between the parties, and only a colourable disposition of the property. While I am not prepared to say that this argument is not sound, I shall not decide the case upon this ground, but upon the bankruptcy laws and the judgments which expound them. I was referred, during the course of the argument, to a great many cases. Those which I have principally consulted are—I state them in the chronological order—Graham v. Chapman, 12 C. B. 85; Smith v. Carman, E. & B. 35; Smith v. Timms, 1 H. & C. 849; Johnson v. Fesenmeyer, 3 De G. & J. 13; Woodhouse v. Murray (sup.); and Ex parte Foxley, re Morse (sup.) From these and other cases, I extract the following principles as applicable to the present case, that fraud in the bankruptcy law is not necessarily an intentional fraud; that the cardinal principle of the bankrupt law is that there shall be equal distribution of the bankrupt's effects among his creditors; that among the corollary principles are these: that a debtor may not assign all or nearly all his effects to one creditor, so as to put it out of his power to carry on his trade. Such an assignment is not necessarily fraudulent where it does not include his trade effects; for the test is whether the necessary effect of the deed is to defeat and delay the creditors of the trader, and not whether it stops his trade. An assignment of the whole and such an assignment, with a colourable exception of a part only, is in effect an assignment of the whole, and such an assignment is fraudulent in the eye of the law. The sale of the whole of a trader's effects to a bonâ fide purchaser is not necessarily fraudulent if the trader gets a present equivalent for his goods; but where the payment of an old debt is taken as part of the price, the trader gets no such equivalent, but his transfer has the effect of defeating and delaying his creditors. The assignment of a security to a particular creditor, even when bankruptcy is inevitable, if the assignment be not made voluntarily, but at the demand of the creditor, is not necessarily a fraudulent preference. Applying these principles to the circumstances of the case before me, I am of opinion that these mortgages fall under the category of a fraudulent preference to a particular creditor, inasmuch as by means of these an assignment was made by the trader of all his effects with only a colourable exception, in contemplation of bankruptcy; and because such an assignment was made without any present equivalent, and the effect of the assignment was to delay and defeat the equal distribution of his effects among all his creditors, I must pronounce against the validity of these mortgages, and dismiss the petition of the mortgagee with costs.

Proctors for the plaintiff, Pritchard and Sons.

Solicitors for the defendant, Whites, Renard, and Floyd.

Jan. 11th and 18th.

THE ELIZABETH.

County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1870 (31 & 32 Vict. 71)—General Order 37—Cross causes—Appeal—Consolidation.

Where in cross causes of damage the amount of damage sustained by the innocent vessel was under 50l., and the wrongdoer sought to appeal in both causes, and prayed that they might be consolidated:

Held, that the court will not order the consolidation of cross causes tried together under General Order 37, for the purposes of appeal, and that on proper evidence being afforded that the amount of damage had been ascertained to be under 50l., the appeal should be dismissed in the cause in which the appellant had been defendant.

This was a motion to dismiss an appeal from a decision of the Judge of the City of London Court on the ground that the decision being for a sum of less than 50*l.* no appeal lay under the 31st section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act.

The suit arose out of a collision in the river Thames between the schooner Elizabeth and the steam ship Adalia, in which both vessels sustained damage. The schooner brought a suit against the Adalia placing her damage at 100*l.*, and the Adalia brought a cross suit in the above cause, the Elizabeth placing her damage also at 100*l.* At the hearing it was agreed that both suits should be heard and decided upon the same evidence, and that the question of damages should be referred to the nautical assessors who sat with the County Court judge. The judge decided that the Elizabeth was solely to blame and dismissed the suit against the Adalia, and in the cross suit gave judgment for the Adalia. The damages have not yet been assessed. The owners of the schooner appealed against both decisions.

Webster, for the appellants, contended that no appeal lay in the case of the Elizabeth, as the cause came within the 31st section of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act. Affidavits were read to prove that the damage sustained by the Adalia did not amount to 50*l.*, and that the award of the assessors when made would be for a sum under that amount. It was contended that the words of the section applied, and that the circumstances of the case having been heard on the same evidence, did not disentitle the plaintiff to the benefit of the section.

Edwyn Jones, contra.—The section does not apply, the decree not being for any specific sum. In case it be considered as applying to cross causes, as in this case, if the plaintiff should succeed in this motion, and the defendant (the plaintiff in the other suit) should succeed on the appeal, there would be this absurdity: On the same evidence and between the same parties the judgment would be diametrically opposite. He also contended that the plaintiff, having entered his suit for 100*l.*, could not amend his claim by putting his damages at a smaller sum, for the purpose of taking away the defendant's right of appeal. He cited North v. Holroyd, L. Rep. 3 Ex. 69; 17 L. T. Rep., N. S. 575.

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—This is a cause of appeal from the City of London Court, instituted by the owners of the Elizabeth against the owners of the Adalia in the sum of 300*l.* There were cross suits in the court below which, under the 37th order of the General Orders issued under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, were heard "at the same time and upon the same evidence." Under the 31st section of the Act referred to (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), "no appeal shall be allowed unless the amount decreed or ordered to be due exceeds the sum of 50*l.*" In the suit in which the Elizabeth was plaintiff the cause was dismissed, and in the suit in which the Elizabeth was defendant, she was pronounced solely to blame; and the amount was referred, by consent, to the nautical assessors. The report of the assessors I have not before me; but I have two affidavits, one from the proctor for the Adalia, stating that he verily believes the damage sustained by the Adalia to be the sum of 29*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.*, and no more; and another affidavit, by the managing clerk of the owners of the Adalia, to the effect that the damage sustained by her does not exceed 50*l.* It appears from the affidavit of the solicitor for the Elizabeth, that both the suits were instituted for the sum of 100*l.* in the court below. The Elizabeth has appealed in both causes. The Adalia prays that the appeal in the case in which she was the plaintiff in the court below may be dismissed, with costs, on account of the damage received by her being under the sum of 50*l.* The Elizabeth, on the other hand, prays that the two suits may be consolidated, and that an order may be made as to the amount of security for costs, and all further proceedings in the court below stayed. Upon this statement of facts two questions have been mooted before me—first, whether the two suits, having been heard together in the court below, should not be considered as one suit, in which case, as the Elizabeth claims upwards of 50*l.*, and has received nothing, the section of the statute would not apply, according to my ruling in a former case? Secondly, whether I have proper evidence before me that in the case in which the Elizabeth is defendant the amount decreed or ordered to be due does not exceed 50*l.*? As to the first question, I am of opinion that the two suits cannot be considered as one, any more than if they had been respectively instituted in different county courts. This position is further confirmed by the practice on appeals from the High Court of Admiralty, in which cross-suits which have been heard together are treated as separate with respect to the institution of the appeal. I must therefore dismiss this appeal when I have proper evidence before me that the amount decreed or ordered to be due does not exceed 50*l.* The second question is, whether I have or not the requisite evidence on this point, and I am of opinion that I have not. I have considered the case cited of Worth v. Holroyd (sup.) The finding of the assessors as to the amount will, I presume, be made part of the decree nunc pro tunc, and on an affidavit being filed that that finding places the amount under 50*l.*, I shall direct that the appeal in the suit in which the Adalia is plaintiff be dismissed. The motion will stand over for the filing of the affidavit.

Attorneys for appellant, Lowless and Nelson.

Attorney for respondent, Stokes.

COURT OF PROBATE.

Reported by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Jan. 11.

In the Goods of J. JAMES.

Administration — Estate not wholly administered — Sureties allowed to justify for unadministered portion only.

A wife took out administration to her husband's estate, and became insane before completely administering it. The court in granting administration to the son allowed the sureties to justify for the present instead of the original value of the estate.

The estate of John James was administered to by his wife. It was of the value of 3000*l.*, and after administering it all, except about 160*l.*, she became insane.

M'Connel now moved that administration be granted to her son—both her and her husband's sole next of kin; and that the securities should be required to justify only for the unadministered residue of the estate, and not for its full original value.

Lord PENZANCE.—The thing has been done before I believe, and is not unreasonable. You may take the grant with permission to the sureties to justify for the smallest amount.

In the Goods of G. PEABODY.

Will of domiciled American—Two sets of executors—Trust-deed to be discharged in America—Incorporation dispensed with.

A domiciled American subject made a will in the United States, by which he directed his property in this country to be paid over, after the discharge of certain specified legacies, to his executors in America, and to be by them distributed according to the provisions of a trust-deed also executed in the United States. The deed did not affect the devolution of property in this country, and the court therefore allowed probate to go without incorporating, an affidavit being filed in the registry identifying it by date and name of trustees.

George Peabody, late of Danvers, Massachussets, U.S., a domiciled American, died in London, Nov. 4, 1869, leaving a will duly executed in the United States bearing date Sept. 9, 1869. By this will he appointed two sets of executors, one set whom he described in the will as his London executors, the other as his American executors. His London executors were directed by the will to realise his estate in this country, and after the payment of certain legacies to transmit the residue to the American executors. The American executors, to whom were committed the control and management of the testator's American property, were directed at the end of a certain term to distribute the whole realised, &c., estate, English and American, according to the provision of a family deed executed in the United States, and appointing an entirely different set of trustees. A question arose in the registry whether this deed ought to be incorporated with the probate, and

Dr. Deane, Q.C., on behalf of the English executors, now moved that the grant of probate might go without setting out the deed. There are no trusts in it to be discharged in this country, and the English executors have no knowledge of it whatever. All that they have to do is to pay certain specific legacies, and then hand the residue over to the American executors. He cited

Sheldon v. Sheldon, 1 Rob. 221; and
In the Goods of Lord Lansdowne, 3 S. & T. 195; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 22.

Google

Lord PENZANCE.—The reason for the rule which gave rise to the objection in the registry is that it is desirable to have on record there the names of the residuary legatees, so that if, in the course of time, it becomes necessary to have another grant, the court may have the power of ascertaining the persons entitled to it. But in this case it appears to me unnecessary to take that precaution, as nothing will happen in this country under the deed, and no devolution of property in this country will be affected by it. I think you ought to be allowed to take probate without incorporating the deed; but you must file affidavits identifying the deed by its date, and the names of the trustees for the purposes of reference. You must also file an affidavit that the will is valid according to the law of the United States.

Solicitors: Freshfields.

Tuesday, Jan. 18.

In the Goods of GRINSTEAD.

Administration—Simultaneous death of husband and wife—Survivorship uncertainty—Form of oath.

T. G., with his wife and three children, perished in a shipwreck. There being no evidence as to survivorship, and no will,

The court granted administration of the estate of T. G., as having died a widower, to the maternal grandfather of the surviving children, and directed that the administrator's oath, instead of being in the usual form, should state that there was no reason for believing that the wife had survived her husband.

T. S. Grinstead, late of New Shoreham, Sussex, a master mariner, sailed in the brig Diamond, of Sunderland, from the port of Shields, with a cargo of coals, bound to Portsmouth. His wife, Emma Susannah Grinstead, and three of his children, Thomas, aged thirteen, Harry Bertram, aged eleven, and Ellen, aged two, were on board with him. The ship never reached Porsmouth, and the last time she was seen was by the captain of a foreign vessel, when she was off Beachy Head, labouring heavily under the heavy gales of the 11th, 12th, and 13th Sept. 1869, and in such a position that it was impossible she could escape. Shortly afterwards, the long boat and different portions of a wreck, identified as being part of the brig Diamond, came ashore near Newhaven, but nothing more was seen of her. The underwriters at Lloyds paid the insurance effected on her as for a total loss. Mr. Grinstead left three children surviving, Albert, aged eight, Emma, aged six, and Alice, four. He owned one half of the brig Diamond. Diligent search had been made for a will, but none had been found. Albert Grinstead, the eldest of the three surviving children, had, by a proxy dated Jan. 12, 1870 elected Daniel Young, his maternal grandfather, his guardian, for the purpose of applying for letters of administration.

Inderwick, on behalf of Daniel Young, the maternal grandfather, now moved the court to decree letters of administration of the estate of Thomas Grinstead to him as the lawful maternal grandfather and sole next of kin of the said minor and infants, duly elected their guardian for that purpose, for their use and benefit until one of them shall attain the age of twenty-one. In the form of oath, instead of stating that the deceased had died a widower, it would be necessary to state that there was no reason to believe that the wife had survived her husband. In all probability they either perished together, or, the husband being the more robust, might have struggled the longest. He cited

In the Goods of Wainwright; and
In the Goods of Ewart, 1 S. & T. 257, 258.

Lord PENZANCE.—The administration may go, and the form of oath may be as suggested.

Solicitors, Longden and Procter.

LIMB v. HOLDEN AND WHITE.

Testamentary suit—Separate defences—Consolidation

Two executors had commenced separate defences, and two records had been made up. The court, on motion, ordered the records to be consolidated, but gave the defendants leave to be represented by counsel separately.

Ann White died May 11,1864, leaving a will duly executed, bearing date March 15 in the same year, of which the defendants were the executors. The plaintiff as the next of kin of deceased, pleaded that the will was not duly executed; that the deceased did not know and approve of the contents; that the deceased was not of sound mind, memory, and understanding at the time of execution, and that the execution of the will was procured by the undue influence of the defendants. The defendants had pleaded separately, and there were two separate records. On the cause being ordered to be tried by a common jury.

G. Browne, for the defendant White, who had been subpœnased to bring in the will, moved that the records be consolidated.

Lord PENZANCE.—By all means let the proceedings be consolidated; but the parties must have leave to appear by separate counsel, if they think fit.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, White, Rickards and Walker.

In the Goods OF BENSON.

Probate—Attestation clause defective—Affidavit dispensed with.

The attestation clause to a seaman's will was defective, in that it did not state that the witnesses had signed in each other's presence. One of the witnesses was in India, the whereabouts of the other was unknown. The court, under the circumstances, on the consent of the widow being filed, dispensed with the usual affidavit from an attesting witness.

G. Benson, late of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, a seaman in the employ of the British Indian Steam Company, died Jan. 6, 1869, at Manilla. He left a will bearing date Aug. 27, 1864, executed on board the ship Cashmere, at Greenock. It was witnessed by two fellow seamen, but the attestation clause was deficient, in that it did not state that the witnesses signed in each other's presence.

Searle now moved for probate, and applied that the court would dispense with the usual affidavit from one of the attesting witnesses. One of them was in India, and the other had gone nobody knew where. The widow had consented.

Lord PENZANCE.—I think you have done all that is reasonable, and you may take the grant.

Solicitors: Fawcett, Horne, and Hunter.

Digitized by Google

COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

Reported by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, Nov. 17, 1869.

(Before Lord PENZANCE, J. O.)

PARKINSON v. PARKINSON.

Desertion—Separation-deed.

A husband deserted his wife, but before the two years expired a deed of separation was executed between the parties, by which the husband covenanted to pay her a certain sum yearly. No part of it had ever been paid.

The court held that the deed disentitled the wife to petition for divorce on the ground of desertion without cause for two years.

Nott v. Nott distinguished.

This was a wife's petition for a divorce on the ground of adultery coupled with desertion. The parties were married in 1861 and cohabited until 1865, when the husband deserted his wife and went to live with another woman. In April 1866 a deed of separation was executed between the husband and a trustee on behalf of the wife, by which she covenanted to live apart from him on consideration of his paying her an annuity which he charged on a sum of 5000*l.* in which he had a reversionary interest. He had never paid any of the allowance, nor had he contributed in any way to her maintenance. At the trial the adultery was proved, and

Dr. Swabey, for the petitioner, submitted that the object of the deed was simply to secure a maintenance for the wife, and not a consent to live apart. She had never received any benefit from it. He cited

Nott v. Nott, L. Rep. 1 P. & M. 251; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 299.

Lord PENZANCE, J. O.—The court is satisfied as to the adultery, but the question is whether it is justified in holding that there has been desertion without cause for two years. No doubt the husband left the wife in 1865 under such circumstances that if he had never seen her again, and no communication had passed between them for two years the desertion would have been complete. But in 1866 Mr. Paine, a trustee under certain family deeds, and a friend both of the husband and of the wife went to the husband and remonstrated with him for having left his wife, and discussed with him the question of making some provision for her. The result of his negotiations was that the husband and wife entered into a deed by which he covenanted to pay her 150*l.* a year. That deed was fully and completely executed, and was signed by the husband and wife and the trustee. The husband had not the means of paying the money, but he had a reversionary interest in 5000*l.*, and it was covenanted that the allowance should be made a charge on that reversion. The wife, therefore, obtained a distinct benefit under the deed, having a charge upon the reversion for the allowance upon which she might raise money. She on her part agreed that she would live separate from her husband. It is now suggested that the court should inquire into what was intended by her when she executed the deed. It is clear that such evidence cannot be admissible. The question then is whether the woman who voluntarily enters into an agreement that her husband should live apart from her, can be said to have been deserted without just cause. I repeat the opinion I formed in Crabb v. Crabb, L. Rep. 1 P. & M. 601, that she cannot. There is a material difference between such a case as this and Nott v. Nott (sup.) The ratio decidendi in Nott v. Nott was that the wife never agreed to live separate and apart from the husband. The making of a deed was contemplated, and some of the parties executed it, but the party whose execution was to make it an efficient and binding act, was the trustee who covenanted for the wife, and he never signed it, so that the deed was never completed. In this case the court is reluctantly compelled to hold that the wife has bargained away her right to relief on the ground of desertion, and that the charge of desertion without cause for two years is not established. She is entitled to a judicial separation on the ground of adultery, if she applies for it.

The case was adjourned in order that the plaintiff might be consulted.

Saturday, Dec. 18, 1869.

HEBBLETHWAITE v. HEBBLETHWAITE (Queen's Proctor intervening).

Evidence of adultery—Witness not bound to answer, nor liable to be asked questions—Evidence Act—Further amendment Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 68), s. 3.

A witness who is called to prove adultery with one of the parties to a suit may claim the protection of the proviso in the 3rd section of the Evidence Amendment Act; but if he or she do not claim it, the evidence is admissible. The judge may refuse to allow the question to be put if the witness claims the protection of the proviso, but the counsel cannot exclude it.

This was originally a petition by a wife for a dissolution of her marriage, on the ground of her husband's adultery. The husband denied the adultery, and charged his wife with adultery, and prayed for a dissolution of his marriage. At the trial no evidence was given on behalf of the petitioner, and the respondent having proved his wife's adultery, a decree nisi was pronounced. Subsequently the Queen's Proctor intervened, and among other things charged the husband with adultery with one Clara Phillips.

The case was tried on Dec 18th before the court and a special jury.

The Attorney-General (J. F. Collier with him), for the Queen's Proctor, called Clara Phillips.

Dr. Spinks (Inderwick with him), on behalf of the husband, objected to any question being put to the witness tending to show that she had committed adultery with Mr. Hebblethwaite. The words of the statute are clear; she is not only not bound to answer the question, but she is not liable to be asked it. (a)

The Attorney-General.—It is for the witness to take the objection, not the other side. The witness may, if she pleases, claim the protection of the proviso; but the intention of the statute is that a witness, not being a party to the suit, may give evidence as to the adultery if he or she pleases, but that the witness shall not be bound to answer any question as to the adultery if unwilling to do so.

Dr. Spinks in reply.—The words of the statute admit of no doubt. If the proviso were only in-

(a) The words of the section (3) are: "The parties to any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery, and the husbands and wives of such parties shall be competent to give evidence in such proceedings, provided that no witness in any proceeding, whether a party to the suit or not, shall be liable to be asked, or bound to answer, any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery, unless such witness shall have already given evidence in the same proceeding in disproof of his or her alleged adultery."

tended to protect the witness from the inference of guilt which would be drawn from a refusal to answer, the words, "no witness shall be liable to be asked," would be mere surplusage.

Lord PENZANCE, J. O.—I am very clear as to the intentions of the Legislature, though I cannot say that the words they have used are not capable of the interpretation Dr. Spinks has put on them. The general intention was to protect witnesses whose evidence was rendered admissible by the statute. The proviso was not intended to apply to evidence by which a case on either side was supported independently of the evidence of the parties. It was not intended to narrow the sources of evidence for or against a petitioner or respondent, but to protect the witnesses, and I doubt whether it is competent for counsel in any case to take advantage of it. It is the duty of the judge to see that the witnesses have the protection given to them by the statute. What is the meaning of the words, no witness "shall be bound to answer or liable to be asked?" The meaning is this, that when any person is called into the witness box and it is proposed to question him or her for the purpose of extorting a statement that he or she has been guilty of adultery, the witness may claim the protection of the statute, if he or she is not desirous of answering. I think the words "no witness shall be liable to be asked," are not surplusage, because without those words a string of questions might be put one after the other to a witness, who would have to refuse to answer them one by one; whereas with those words in, it becomes the duty of the judge to refuse to allow any of those question to be put if the witness claims the protection of the statute.

Lord PENZANCE, J. O. then told the witness that she was not bound to answer any question relating to her alleged adultery with Mr. Hebblethwaite, unless she pleased.

The witness, however, said she had no objection to answer the question, and denied that any such adultery had taken place.

The jury found that Mr. Hebblethwaite was not guilty of the adultery charged; and on a subsequent day the decree nisi for the dissolution of his marriage was made absolute.

Tuesday, Jan. 11.

ROWLAND v. ROWLAND AND MILES.

Dissolution suit—Co-respondent allowed to come in and traverse the petition two years after it was filed.

A petition for dissolution had been filed so far back as 1867, and the co-respondent had not answered. He had been living abroad, and was entirely without means.

In order that he might be heard as to costs, the court now allowed him to come in and file an answer, on the condition that it should simply traverse the petition.

The petition in this suit, which prayed for a dissolution of the petitioner's marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent, was filed in 1867. The respondent and co-respondent had not appeared. Damages were prayed, and the cause had been set down for hearing before a common jury. The co-respondent had been living abroad, and was entirely dependent on his friends.

Inderwick now moved that the co-respondent have leave to appear and file an answer, in order that he might be heard on the question of costs.

Dr. Spinks, contra.

Lord PENZANCE, J. O.—You may have leave to come in on paying the costs of this motion, but on the understanding that the petition is only to be traversed.

Dr. Spinks asked that the co-respondent might be put under the condition of giving security for the costs of the cause.

Lord PENZANCE, J.O.—I cannot cast that additional burden on the co-respondent.

Solicitor for the petitioner, Withall.

Solicitor for the respondent, Harrison.

Solicitor for the co-respondent, Gregory.

Tuesday, Jan. 18.

YEATMAN v. YEATMAN AND RUMMELL.

Dissolution—Prior decree of judicial separation pleaded.

A wife, in answer to the husband's petition for dissolution on the ground of adultery, pleaded that in a former suit she had been judicially separated from him. The court refused to hold the prior decree as a bar to the husband's suit.

This was a husband's suit for dissolution on the ground of the wife's adultery. The wife, in her answer, alleged (inter alia) that in a former suit at her instance a decree had been pronounced judicially separating her from her husband on the ground of her husband's cruelty.

Searle, on behalf of the repondent, asked that before going into the inquiry into the wife's adultery, it should be argued and decided whether the decree of judicial separation did not operate as an estoppel against any further proceedings on the part of the husband. [Lord PENZANCE, J. O.—The cruelty would only be a discretionary bar.] Here there was something more than cruelty; there was a judicial separation standing against the husband.

Lord PENZANCE, J. O.—The section which gives the court discretion to refuse or grant a divorce under such circumstances says nothing about a decree. A decree cannot go further than this, that the court was satisfied that the petitioner had been guilty of adultery. It is a mere discretionary bar. The case must take the usual course.

Petitioner in person.

Solicitor for respondent, Edwards.

Tuesday, Jan. 18.

EATON v. EATON AND CAMPBELL.

Dissolution suit—Alimony pendente lite—Allowance to the wife from her father.

A husband, in answer to his wife's petition for alimony pendente lite, pleaded that her father at the time of marriage promised to allow her an annuity of 100*l. It being shown that this annuity had been regularly paid, and that the father had not expressed any intention of withdrawing it; and the husband's means being small, the court refused to make any order on him for alimony.*

This was a husband's suit for dissolution on the ground of his wife's adultery. The wife now petitioned for alimony pendente lite, and the husband, in his answer, alleged that the wife's father had promised at the time of the marriage to make her an allowance of 100*l.* a year, and that he had in fact paid her that sum annually in advance.

Dr. Tristram, for the petitioner, now submitted that no order should be made. The father had never repudiated the equitable contract which he had made at the time of marriage, and there was no reason to believe that he would not go on paying the wife her separate allowance.

M'Intyre.—The wife could not enforce this contract; she was dependent entirely on her husband, and if no order were made she might be left destitute.

Lord PENZANCE, J.O.—The wife's father has never yet omitted to pay the allowance which he promised to pay, and there is no reason suggested for believing that when the proper time comes he will repudiate it. I look upon the wife, therefore, practically, as a person in the receipt of a separate income of 100*l.* a year, and as the petitioner's means are very small, I do not feel disposed to make an order. If anything occurs to show that the father intends to hold his hand, the respondent may apply again.

SILVER v. SILVER.

Dissolution—Wife's suit—Bigamy pleaded by husband—Answer on oath—Pleading.

A husband, in answer to his wife's petition for divorce, pleaded that she was not his lawful wife as he had contracted a previous marriage. On motion for particulars of the previous marriage the court ordered them to be set out in the pleas, and not by way of particulars, but dispensed with their averment on oath on the ground that it might form the basis of a prosecution for bigamy.

This was the wife's suit for dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery, cruelty, and desertion. The husband traversed the charges, and pleaded that the petitioner was not his lawful wife, inasmuch as at the time of the ceremony he was married to another person then living.

Searle, on behalf the petitioner, applied that the circumstances of the alleged previous marriage should be more fully set out in the respondent's pleas. It is quite unusual to plead a marriage in so vague a form.

Bayford, for the petitioner, urged that the circumstances should be set out in particulars, and not in the pleas, on the ground that if the respondent swore to the fact of his previous marriage it might be the foundation of a prosecution for bigamy.

Lord PENZANCE, J. O.—I think the circumstances of the previous marriage must be set out in the pleas, and not by way of particulars; but the court will relieve the respondent from the necessity of affirming them on oath.

Solicitor for the petitioner, Vyner.

Solicitors for the respondent, Phelps and Bennett.

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, Dec. 11, 1869.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re THE HOLLYFORD COPPER MINING COMPANY (LIMITED).

Winding-up—Order of an Irish court—Making that order an order of the Court of Chancery in England—The Companies Act 1862, ss. 81, 122—The Bankruptcy Act 1861, s. 219.

The Court of Bankruptcy in England has no jurisdic- to make an order of the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland, made in the winding-up of a company under the Companies Act 1862, an order of the Court of Bankruptcy in England.

But, under sect. 122 of the Companies Act 1862, such an order of the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland can be made an order of the High Court of Chancery in England:

A company formed under the Companies Act 1862, and having its registered office in Ireland, was ordered to be wound-up by the Court of Chancery in Ireland. The proceedings in the winding-up were afterwards, under sect. 81 of the Companies Act 1862, transferred to the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland. An order was made by that court for a call upon the contributories mentioned in a schedule to the order. Some of those contributories were resident in England, and, as they did not pay the call, it was desired to enforce the order against them through the medium of an English court.

The official liquidators applied to Mr. Commissioner Bacon to make an order of the Irish court an order of the Court of Bankruptcy in England. His Honour was of opinion that he had no jurisdiction to do this, and consequently refused the application. Upon appeal by the official liquidators:

Held, that the commissioner was right in deciding that he had no jurisdiction. But, held, that the order of the Irish court could, under sect. 122 of the Companies Act 1862, be made an order of the Court of Chancery in England, and this was directed to be done accordingly.

The Hollyford Copper Mining Company (Limited) was incorporated by registration under the Companies Act 1862. It was an Irish company and its registered office was in that country. In 1867, an order for the winding-up of the company was made by the Court of Chancery in Ireland. It is provided by sect. 81 of the Companies Act 1862, that where the Court of Chancery in Ireland makes an order for the winding-up of a company under the Act, it may, if it thinks fit, direct all subsequent proceedings for winding-up the same to be had in the Court of Bankruptcy having jurisdiction in the place in which the registered office of the company is situate; and thereupon such last-mentioned Court of Bankrtptcy shall, for the purpose of winding-up the company, be deemed to be "the court" within the meaning of the Act, and shall have for the purposes of the winding-up all the powers of the Court of Chancery in Ireland. Under this section, the winding-up of this company was transferred to the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland. On the 13th July 1869, an order was made by the court for a call of 4s. 6d. per share upon the contributories of the company. whose names were inserted in a schedule to the order. Some of these persons resided in England, and they failed to pay the call. The official liquidators desired to enforce the call order against these persons by means of the order of an English court, and they therefore applied to Mr Commissioner Bacon to have the order of the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland made an order of the Court of Bankruptcy in England. It was alleged that there was jurisdiction to do this under sect. 219 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861. That section provides that any order made by the court in the course of the prosecution of any matter under the court, shall be enforced in Scotland and Ireland in the courts that would respectively have jurisdiction in respect of such matter if the residence or place of business of the debtor had been situated in Scotland or Ireland, and in the same manner in all respects as if such order had been made by the courts that are thereby required to enforce the same; and in like manner, orders made by the Court in Ireland for or in the course of any such proceedings, shall be enforced in England and Scotland by the courts of bankruptcy which would really have had jurisdiction in any such matter, and in the same manner in all respects as if such order had been made by the court required to enforce the same in the case of a matter within its own jurisdiction.

His Honour held that he had no jurisdiction, and refused the application, which was now renewed by the liquidators by way of appeal.

Lindley, on behalf of the appellants, contended that the Court of Bankruptcy had jurisdiction to make the order. But, if not, he then asked that an order might be made in Chancery, making the order of the Irish Court of Bankruptcy an order of the Court of Chancery in England. This, he submitted, could be done under sect. 122 of the Companies Act 1862, which provides that orders made by the court in Ireland for or in the course of winding-up a company shall be enforced in England and Scotland by the courts which would respectively have had jurisdiction in the matter of such company if the registered office of the company were situate in the division of the United Kingdom where the order is required to be enforced; and in the same manner in all respects as if such order had been made by the court required to enforce the same in the case of a company within its own jurisdiction.

No one appeared for the contributories.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that he thought the commissioner was right, and that there was no jurisdiction given to the Court of Bankruptcy under sect. 219 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and for this simple reason that if the company had had its registered office in England, the Court of Bankruptcy would have had no jurisdiction in the winding-up unless the Court of Chancery here had remitted the proceedings to it. The Court of Chancery would certainly never remit the proceedings to the Court of Bankruptcy simply for the purpose of enabling it to make the order of the Irish Court an order of its own. But under sect. 122 of the Act of 1862, his Lordship thought that there was no difficulty. This court would have been the proper court to wind-up the company if its registered office had been in England, and therefore the call order might be made an order of this court. The same form should be followed which had been already adopted under this Act, in making orders of the Irish Court of Chancery orders of this court. The liquidators must apply to the court in Ireland as to the costs.

Solicitors for the official liquidators Tatham and Son.

July 14, 15, and Aug. 6.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley) and Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re THE CORK AND YOUGHAL RAILWAY COMPANY; Ex parte OVEREND, GURNEY, AND CO. (LIMITED); Ex parte THE LONDON, HAMBURG, AND CONTINENTAL EXCHANGE BANK (LIMITED) AND OTHERS.

Company—Limited borrowing powers—Bonds for sums in excess of—Lloyds' bonds—Equities of actual holders.

The railway company had exhausted their capital and borrowing powers; but their undertaking was yet incomplete. At a general meeting of the company, a balance-sheet showing the then amount of excess, was laid before the company, and a resolution mas adopted authorising the board to issue to L., their financial agent, bonds to be settled by counsel. Lloyds' bonds to a large amount were accordingly given to L., upon which he raised money, some part of which, it was not disputed, was applied in payment of the company's debts, and completing their works, and the bonds passed from L. into the hands of the present respondents, who carried in claims against the proceeds of sale of the railway under a special Act of Parliament for its dissolution, ond claimed to be entitled to a surplus of such proceeds in priority to the shareholders. On appeal by the shareholders, it was Held that, although it was not law that no creditor who trusted the company after its capital and borrowing powers were exhausted could recover what was due to him, yet any debenture, loan notes, or the like, for the mere borrowing of money in excess of the company's powers, were void; but as the moneys raised in this case had been applied in paying debts of the company, and otherwise for the purposes of its undertaking, with the sanction and acquiescence of the shareholders, these latter could not be entitled to the surplus of the company's property without repaying all moneys so raised and expended.

Inquiries were accordingly directed to ascertain whether the company had had the benefit of any, and what, expenditure in payment of any sums recoverable from the company, or of any and what advances on the bonds, and whether any of the moneys so expended still remained unpaid by the company.

Per Giffard, L.J.: There is no ground whatever for asserting that a contract or instrument which fails at law for illegality, can be enforced in equity, even although money has been paid and received in respect of it. Where a plaintiff seeks to set aside an illegal contract, equitable terms are imposed on him by this court, as the price of the relief; but as to any claim sought to be actively enforced, the defence of illegality is as available in equity as at law.

This was an appeal by Mr. H. G. Pick, as representing the preference shareholders of the Cork and Youghal Railway Company, against a decision of Malins, V.C. that certain large sums of money supplied by a Mr. David Leopold Lewis, and expended for the benefit of the company, although in excess of the share capital, and the sums raisable under the borrowing powers of the company, constituted a debt due to the company, and that the bonds issued by the company to secure those moneys, which had passed from the hands of Mr Lewis to various other persons who were respondents on this occasion, must be satisfied out of a fund in court, arising from the sale of the railway, after satisfaction thereout of certain charges to which, by the Act for the dissolution and winding-up of the company, the proceeds of sale were made liable.

The circumstances were briefly these:

The company had in the year 1862 expended upon its undertaking a sum considerably in excess of its subscribed capital and the sums it was authorised to raise by loans, and had been assisted in raising money by Mr Lewis, their financial agent. On the 28th August 1862 the general meeting of the company was held, at which a balance-sheet was submitted, and a resolution was adopted that, inasmuch as the directors on behalf of the company had from time to time obtained moneys to pay for the purposes of the undertaking, which moneys had been so applied, the board be authorised to issue bonds according to forms to be settled by counsel to be given to Lewis as a security for the debt due from the company to him.

The material passages of these bonds, which were issued under the common seal of the company, were as follows:

Whereas, the above bounden company is well and truly indebted to the above-named David Leopold Lewis in the sum of , for work done and goods and materials supplied to the company for the purpose of their undertaking, by the means and procurement and at the cost of the said D. L. Lewis, and at the request of the company, as they do hereby acknowledge; and whereas the said D. L. Lewis hath applied to the said company for payment of the said sum of money, but hath, at the request of the said company, agreed to forbear payment of the same until the day of on the said company being bound by this application for securing payment of the said principal sum on the day last aforesaid and interest thereon. Now, the condition of the above-written bond is such that if the said company, their successors or assigns, pay to the said D. L. Lewis, his executors, administrators, or assigns pounds, on or before the said day of , with interest in the mean time for the same at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, then the above-written bond shall be void; but otherwise the same shall remain in full force and effect."

Of such bonds 165,000*l.* worth were issued to Mr Lewis, who from time to time, as occasion required, parted with them, or some of them, to the present respondents for valuable consideration, whilst some of the debts of the company were paid with parts of the proceeds.

By the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 124, "An Act for the winding-up of the affairs, and the dissolution of the Cork and Youghal Railway Company, and for other purposes," after reciting that the company had not acquired some of the lands necessary for their railway, and that they might have incurred debts considerably beyond their mortgage debt, which they had not the means of paying; and that it would be of advantage to the public that the railway should be sold to the Great Southern and Western Railway Company, who were willing to purchase it for 310,000*l.* of their ordinary stock, which should be appropriated as a fund for satisfying the liabilities of the Cork and Youghal Company, and that claims had been made by alleged creditors which were denied by the company, and that it was expedient that provision should be made for ascertaining whether and how far the claims against the company were valid or not, it was, amongst other things, enacted that the railway should be vested in the purchasing company free from the debts of the Cork and Youghal Company except for land; that the stock to be created by the purchasing company should be registered in the name of the official liquidator to be appointed by the Cork and Youghal Company, who should sell the same as he should think fit, and that the net proceeds of such sale should (under sect. 12) be applied with the sanction of the Court of Chancery, first, in payment of the costs of the Act; secondly, in payment of compensation and expenses of completing the purchases of lands; thirdly, in payment of principal and interest due on mortgages; fourthly, in payment of the costs, charges, and expenses of legal proceedings subsequently to a certain day, and of office expenses, salaries, and wages; and fifthly, the surplus shall be subject to all the rights, equities, priorities, claims, and demands, whether of preference or ordinary shareholders, bondholders, or others, to which the vested property would, in case this Act had not been passed, have been subject, and shall be applied accordingly.

Under this Act the sale of the property of the company was completed, and after satisfaction o the objects mentioned in the first four clauses, there remained the surplus contemplated by the fifth of these clauses, which was in court. The present respondents carried in against this surplus their claims in respect of the bonds they held, and the learned Vice-Chancellor, as already stated, decided that they were entitled to be paid in priority to the share or stock holders of the company, from which decision these latter now appealed.

Jessel Q.C. and Higgins supported the appeal.

Roxburgh Q.C. and Lindley, Cotton Q.C. and Hastings, Pearson Q.C., and Waller and H. M. Jackson, supported his Honour's order.

The arguments fully appear in the judgments, and the authorities cited were:

White v. The Carmarthen, &c., Railway Company, 1 H. & M. 786; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 439;
Chambers v. The Manchester and Milford Railway Company, 5 B. & S. 588, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715;
Re The German Mining Company, 4 De G. M. & G. 19;
Re The Worcester Corn Exchange Company, 3 De G. M. & G. 180;
Bateman v. The Mid-Wales Railway Company, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 499;
Bryan v. The Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Company (Limited), 3 De G. & J. 123.

Jessel Q.C. having replied,

The LORD CHANCELLOR said: It appears to the Lord Justice and myself that the order in the precise form in which it now stands is not exactly the order which the exigencies of the case require; but that, on the other hand, it is quite clear that it would be most improper to hold, that under and by virtue of the 12th section of the Act by which this company has been put an end to, and has been in effect bought by another company, the money should be distributed to the shareholders without making any provision whatever in respect of the payments that have been made by moneys procured by Mr Lewis in the manner described in the affidavits. Now the transaction was no doubt one of an irregular character in its substance, because the company, having expended the whole of its capital apparently, and reached the extent also of its borrowing powers, found itself heavily embarrassed with debt, and many of these debts appear to have been debts which certainly in themselves would be legally payable. Certainly many of these debts were debts to contractors, as stated in the affidavit, and debts to other persons; some of them were debts for rolling stock, which would undoubtedly be payable by the company, as it appears to me the debts to the contractors were also, which the company had not the means in the ordinary course of procedure of paying. The contention raised by Mr. Jessel it may not be necessary distinctly to decide on the present occasion; but it is still one which I conceive would not be sustainable, viz., that when a railway company is formed with a certain amount of capital, and is authorised to execute certain works, unless the works are executed within exactly the prescribed amount of capital, no further work can be done at all; in other words, that no contractor who has entered into an engagement to make the two or three miles of line required for the purpose of completing the work, would be able to recover in respect of the money, labour, and work expended on the company's behalf. That, I apprehend, would not be law. The very point did arise in the case of White v. The Carmarthenshire Railway Company, which, as far as I recollect, was not appealed, where a contractor was willing to give his services and to take his chance of being paid, with such remedy as he could insist upon by bringing an action against the company, and recovering judgment. In that case I held that the contractor having neglected so to act, and having proceeded to take some steps towards so acting, the company were authorised in giving him a debenture acknowledging the amount of the debt. On the other hand it was equally clear, or it has been made clear if it was not clear before by the case of Chambers v. The Manchester and Milford Railway

Digitized by Google

Company, and the very able and lucid judgment there given, especially that of Mr. Justice Blackburn, that any scheme by which a company is authorised only to raise a given amount of capital by shares, and then a certain other quantity, usually one-third, of the share capital is prescribed by the Act of Parliament under which it acts, in the shape of debentures or mortgages, they cannot issue any debenture, or loan note, or any security of that description, for the mere purpose of borrowing money; and I apprehend any such instrument so issued would be just as void in equity as at law, being contrary altogether to statute, and being absolutely forbidden by statute: for I entirely adopt the view which was taken by the learned judges, that that thing, in respect of which a penalty is inflicted by statute, must be taken to be a thing forbidden, and absolutely void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

Accordingly they held that these bonds, called Lloyds' bonds, were not in effect, for any purpose whatsoever, a payment of debts actually due; but were simply instruments issued for the purpose of raising and borrowing money; instruments to which no legal validity could be attributed, and I apprehend, for the reasons there assigned, no validity could be given to them in this court, any more than in a court of law. They proceeded upon this ground: that the Act of 7 & 8 Vict. contained an enactment by which it recited that many railway companies had borrowed money in a manner unauthorised by their Act of incorporation, or other Acts of Parliament relating to the companies, upon the security of loan notes or other instruments, purporting to give a security for the repayment of the principal sums borrowed at certain dates, and for the payment of interest thereon in the mean time; that they were issued contrary to Act of Parliament; that they had been issued in many respects in good faith, as between the borrower and the lender, for the lawful purposes of the undertaking, and in ignorance on the part of those who had taken them of their legal invalidity. So that it preserved the rights of those who at that time were placed in those circumstances, but proceeded to enact that, from and after the passing of the Act, any railway company issuing any loan note or other negotiable or assignable instrument purporting to bind the company, as a legal security for money advanced to the railway company, otherwise than under the provisions of some Act or Acts of Parliament authorising the Railway Company to raise such money, and to issue such security, should, for the offence, forfeit a given sum. The judges held that that penalty indicated plainly that the course of procedure in respect of which the penalty was inflicted was a course forbidden by law, and that, therefore, no recovery could be had upon any such instrument in a court of law. Of course, I need hardly say that, if the reasoning be just (and I think the reasoning is just), if it be forbidden expressly by Act of Parliament, this court can no more contravene that Act of Parliament than any other court of judicature in the kingdom.

That being so, this distinction is drawn by Mr Justice Blackburn, which appears to me to be very plain and clear; he says, in p. 611 of 5th Best and Smith's Reports: "They" (that means these instruments) "are on their face the acknowledgment of a debt to some particular person, with a covenant to pay it. Such instrument may be useful in this way: when a company are indebted it may be convenient to make a bond pointing to a particular portion of the debt actually due; it would facilitate the assignment in equity of the debt thus acknowledged to be due, and possibly throw upon the company the onus of showing the non-existence of the debt. But if there be no debt existing, such an instrument cannot create one, nor put any assignee in a better position than the original obligee or covenantee; and the person holding it could not recover upon it, if it was shown that it was given gratuitously, or was not authorised by statute."

That being so, one has to consider then the circumstances of this particular case, and they appear to be these: it is shown, I think, that, as regards some of the moneys which have been raised through the medium of Mr. Lewis, some small portions were paid direct. Mr. Jessel admitted that there were two small items so dealt with. There was a contest upon that; but some portions, larger or smaller as the case may be, seem to have been advanced by Mr. Lewis direct towards payment of persons who were actual creditors of the company, and so far, I apprehend, there could be little or no dispute as to the position of Mr. Lewis, and a person claiming through Mr. Lewis to stand in his place in respect of this debt so paid; or rather, more correctly to word it, to stand in the place of the original debtor, whose debt, being a valid debt, had been so paid.

But, with regard to the other debts, they seem to stand in this position. As far as one can see, there were debts for which the company were liable (for that seems to be beyond dispute), which had to be paid somehow or other. These debts having to be paid, it appears that the company circulated bills which were sent to every shareholder in the company, indicating the amount of debt to be somewhere about 100,000*l.*, or more, beyond the amount which they had power to raise by shares or by borrowing. That being so, and the company in truth having full and distinct notice that there was this debt, and that there was a large sum somehow or other to be provided for, proceedings were taken by the directors, with more or less the sanction of the company. I do not think the direct and special sanction of the company, such as there would be at meetings, would have much to do with the matter; because the question would rather depend upon the acquiescence of the company in the steps taken, and the benefit which they derived from the money raised, than upon any direct sanction which they could give to that which was otherwise beyond the powers of the directors. The directors took upon themselves to issue bonds to Mr. Lewis, which recite that the company is indebted to Lewis (that is the recital contained in the condition of the bond) for work and labour done, and, I think, "materials furnished by, or by the procurement of, Lewis." That is the expression. We are told in the affidavit which narrates all these proceedings—the affidavit of two officers of the company—that in effect, Lewis found the money from time to time for the company, first of all by means of bills; and he afterwards told them that he should find greater facilities in raising moneys by way of bonds; and no doubt with good reason, because there would be no longer any question about the company's bills of exchange at all, to say nothing about the difficulty and expense of renewing them from time to time. He suggested to them their giving him these bonds for the very express reason of their being more available, and for the express purpose of his being able to go into the market, and say, "Here I am with these debts due and owing to me from the company, as they have by these bonds acknowledged, on a perfectly legitimate ground, for work and labour done by me for the company, or by my procurement, and that being so, I can by those means replace in your coffers funds which you may apply for the benefit of the company." He, being furnished with these instruments expressly for this purpose, procures the money. The money, it is said, was applied first of all in paying off bills, and not per directum in paying off the particular debts; but the bills which had been given paid off the debts, or some of them. It does not appear upon the evidence before us to have paid all of them, but some of them. Then other bonds appear to have been given for those bills in the exact shape those bonds are now in, to pay off first the bills, and afterwards other bonds, to pay off those bonds which have been so applied in paying off the bills, until ultimately we get to a set of bonds which are in the hands of the present holders.

Digitized by Google

Then the question is, whether the present holders can be said to be entitled under any circumstances to claim upon the present bonds. Now, first it was said by Mr Jessel in reply, and he opened it very much in the same way, that taking these bonds at the best as a chose in action, even taking them to be that which they really are, a mere acknowledgment (for they cannot be put beyond that) of a debt due apparently on a legitimate ground, those who took them must be in the same condition exactly as Mr Lewis, the original holder, was; and therefore, if Mr Lewis, the original holder, could not recover in respect of the position in which he was placed with a full knowledge of all the circumstances, and how the company had proceeded for the purpose of raising money, then no more could the holders of this chose in action take simply through him, or be entitled to place themselves in a better position. That would be so if, as between Mr Lewis and the directors, there was really no debt at all, or if this was all a mere sham, and the company had been in no way parties to the transaction.

But if the money thus raised on a representation which Mr Lewis is directed by the directors to make for the express purpose of getting the money, is applied, when raised, for the benefit, and the legitimate benefit, of the company, can it be possible that the company can hold that surplus which is directed to be paid to them under the 12th section, and treat this as being no debt whatever by which they are to be in any way affected? That would, I apprehend, be contrary to all principles of justice.

Therefore what strikes me as the proper course to take is this—to say that as far as the company have adopted the proceedings of their directors by allowing these moneys to be raised on the issue of these debentures, and as far as the money so raised by the issue of the debentures has been applied in paying off debts which would not otherwise have been paid off, those who have advanced the moneys ought to stand in the place of those whose debts have been so paid off. It is not simply that they stand as assignees of the debt which, no doubt, they are not, in this sense that the contractor has not assigned his debt over to the person who paid him. That has not been done. On the other hand it has been represented by the directors, that the man who lent his money on that I.O.U., or whatever it may be called, was lending his money for the purpose of clearing off that debt. Therefore the directors were representing to him that he was to be put in the position of the assignee of the debt. They say We owe this man who has this I.O.U. this money, in respect of work which is legitimately a debt owing by our company for work done; we owe him that, he will hand it over to you, and, therefore, you will stand in exactly the same position as if you had paid off the debt yourself." That is the effect of the representation.

Therefore, what we propose to do is to make this order. "Let the order of the Vice-Chancellor be varied, and let the order so varied be as follows: Declare that the receipt and the expenditure by the directors of the company in payment of any sums recoverable from the company of moneys advanced on, and procured by means of the deposits of, the alleged bonds, was pro tanto an adoption by the company of the transactions referred to in the affidavits of Charles Banks and Henry Green; and, having regard to the representations contained in the alleged bonds, that the money so expended constituted debts owing from the company, inquire whether the company had the benefit of any, and what expenditure in payment of any sums recoverable from the company, of any and what sums advanced on, or procured by means of, any and which of the deposits of the alleged bonds, and whether any, and which, of the sums so expended still remain unpaid by the company. The costs to be as in the original order; no costs of this application, except that the official liquidator will take his costs out of the estate."

Lord Justice GIFFARD said: I think it of importance to state clearly in this case that it is not intended by the court to throw the slightest doubt on the decision come to in the case of Chambers v. The Manchester and Milford Railway Company, and, from the course which the matter took in the court below. I think it is also important to say that there is no ground whatever for the argument that a contract or instrument which fails in a court of law by reason of its illegality can, nevertheless, be enforced in equity, because money has been paid and received in respect of it. Equitable terms can be imposed on a plaintiff seeking to set aside an illegal contract as the price of the relief he asks; but as to any claim sought to be actively enforced, the defence of illegality is as available in a court of equity as it is in a court of law; and it is for that reason, among others, that the declaration made by the court below has been varied. That, of course, is no answer to the present case.

Now, as regards the present case, I am of opinion that the proof was quite sufficient. There are two affidavits alleging that money was lent on these bonds, which contain the representations which have been referred to; and there was also the affidavit of Mr. Banks and Mr. Green; and if it had been sought to affect either of the parties who prove, with anything like fraud, that was quite enough to throw on the company the onus of proof that there was fraud. However, there has been no evidence of that description.

That being so, what the case amounts to is this: Documents were given under the seal of the company; those documents represented that the company was indebted to Mr. David Leopold Lewis in the amount there stated; they were given for the purpose of being deposited by Lewis as security for advances to be made, and, if the representations in them had been true, those who advanced their money on the deposit would have been assignees of debts actually owing from the company to Lewis, and the transaction would have been perfectly legal.

Now in this case the representations in the alleged bonds are either true or false, or partly true and partly false. In so far as they are true, the transactions are legitimate, for Mr. Lewis could assign his debt or debts. On the other hand, in so far as they are false, there is fraud—fraud on the part of the directors of the company. The representations on the face of the alleged bonds purported to be representations by the company, and induced the loans, and were made in order that the loans might be obtained. In so far, therefore, as the company has had the benefit of those loans for its legitimate purposes, it must be taken to have adopted the transactions. It cannot be heard to say the contrary, and to that extent it must be held liable. For these reasons I concur in the order which the Lord Chancellor has read.

Solicitors for the appellant, Stevens, Williamson, and Harris.

Solicitors for the respondents, Young, Jones, and Co.; Deane and Chubb; Alfred Jones.

Digitized by Google

Saturday, Dec. 11, 1869.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re CUMING.

Practice—The Trustee Act 1850, ss. 3, 20—Covenant to surrender copyholds—Death of covenantor before surrender—Lunatic heir—Distinction between an executed and an unexecuted contract—Appointment of person to convey—Where a suit to declare the heir a trustee is unnecessary.

S. contracted to purchase certain copyholds of C., and C. executed a deed by which he covenanted to surrender the copyholds to the use of S., his heirs, and assigns. Before any surrender was made C. died, leaving as his customary heir a person of unsound mind, not so found by inquisition:

Held, that, inasmuch as there was an executed contract, it was not necessary that there should be a suit to have the heir declared a trustee for the purchaser, but that the court could, on a petition in lunacy, and under the Trustee Act 1850, appoint a person to surrender the copyhold to the purchaser.

In the year 1867, Frederick Slade entered into a contract with Henry Cuming for the purchase from him of certain copyhold estates which were held of the manor of Millbrook. An indenture, dated the 9th Nov. 1867, was made and executed between, and by Henry Cuming of the first part, Robert Driver of the second part, and Frederick Slade of the third part, which contained a covenant by Henry Cuming for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, with Frederick Slade, his heirs and assigns, that Henry Cuming, or his heirs, would forthwith surrender the copyholds to the use of Frederick Slade, his heirs, and assigns, according to the custon of the manor.

Before any surrender was made, Henry Cuming died intestate, leaving Alexander Cuming, his heir according to the custom of the manor. He was of unsound mind, but not so found by inquisition. A petition was then presented by Frederick Slade stating these facts, and praying that a proper person might be appointed by the court to surrender the copyhold to him, his heirs, and assigns, in the place of the lunatic.

The petition was thus entitled: "In the matter of Alexander Cuming, a person of unsound mind, not so found by inquisition; In the matter of the Trustee Acts 1850 and 1852; and In the matter of Frederick Slade's trust."

Ford North, on behalf of the petitioner, argued that there being an executed contract, it was unnecessary that there should be a suit instituted to have the heir declared a trustee for the purchaser, but the court could act at once under the Trustee Acts. He referred to Re Collingwood's Trusts, 6 W. R. 536, in which case there being a covenant to stand seised of copyholds until surrender to a purchaser, in trust for the purchaser, a vesting order was made on a petition under the Act without a suit, and argued that the principle of that case would apply to the present, the covenant being an executed one. He referred also to

The Trustee Act 1850, ss. 3, 20.

Lord Justice GIFFARD was of opinion that the distinction between the cases of an executed and an unexecuted contract was a sound one. In the latter case, no doubt, a suit to have the heir declared a trustee for the purchaser would be necessary, before a vesting order or an order appointing a person to convey could be made under the Trustee Act, but in the former case the order could be made without the necessity of a suit. The order asked for by this petition might therefore be made.

Solicitors: Westall and Roberts.

Thursday, Dec. 2, 1869.

Re TRICK'S TRUSTS; Ex parte WILLOBY.

The Trustee Relief Act—Particular legacy paid into court—Residue in hands of trustee—Costs.

A trustee of a will paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act a sum which was given by the testator in certain trusts. The trustee had also in his hands the general residue of the testator's estate in which he was beneficially interested. A petition was presented for payment out of court of the fund which had been paid in:

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to order the trustee to pay the costs of the petition out of the general residue of the estate.

This was an appeal from a decision of Stuart, V.C., with reference to the construction of a will so far as it related to the trusts of a particular fund bequeathed by the testator. This fund had been paid into court by the trustee of the will under the Trustee Relief Act, and the Vice-Chancellor, on a petition being presented to determine the construction, and for payment to the persons entitled, ordered the trustee to pay the respondent's costs of the petition out of the general residue of the estate which was in the hands of the trustee, and in which he was beneficially interested.

Dickinson, Q.C. and Freeling, on behalf of the appellants, argued the question of construction, and also contended that under the Act the court could not order costs to be paid out of any fund other than that which was paid into court. It might make an order on a trustee who had acted improperly to pay costs personally, but there was no jurisdiction to deal with a fund not in court.

Karslake, Q.C. and Charles Hall for the respondent

Lord Justice GIFFARD was of opinion that there was jurisdiction to order these costs to be paid out of the general residue, which was a fund applicable to the general costs of administration of the estate.

Solicitors: Hunter, Gwatkin, and Co.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PEAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 15, 16, 17, and 18, 1869, and Jan. 14, 1870.

SMITH v. EARL BROWNLOW.

Rights of common—Freehold and copyhold tenants—Suit by one on behalf of all the tenants of the manor—Approvement—Survey—Evidence—Pleading.

The lord of a manor having attempted to inclose a portion of the waste, a bill was filed against him by one of the tenants (who was both a freeholder and a copyholder of the manor), on behalf of himself and all the other freehold and copyhold tenants of the manor, to obtain a declaration of their rights to common over the waste, and to restrain the lord from inclosing any portion of the common:

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to sue on behalf of all the freeholders and copyholders of the manor:

Held also, that the burden of proof that after making the proposed inclosure, a sufficiency of the waste would be left to satisfy the commonnable rights of the tenants, lay upon the lord, the tenants having in the first instance established their right to common.

A survey made by the direction of the Crown in 1607, when the manor belonged to the Duchy of Cornwall, held to be admissible in evidence, though the commission on which it was founded had not been produced, and could not be found.

Digitized by Google

This was a suit instituted by Mr. Augustus Smith, of Tresco Abbey, in the Isles of Scilly, on behalf of himself and all other the freehold and copyhold tenants of the manor of Berkhampstead against the late Earl Brownlow, the lord of the manor, praying for a declaration that the plaintiff, and the other freehold and copyhold tenants of the manor of Berkhampstead. are entitled as to the right of pasture for commonable cattle as appendant, and as to all other rights of pasture and all other commonable rights as appurtenant to their said freehold and copyhold tenements, to the following common rights, viz., a right of common of pasture upon the said common, and so much of four pieces of waste in the bill mentioned as now remains uninclosed, for all sorts of cattle levant and couchant, as well commonable as others, and a right of estovers and haybote and woodbote, and to cut so much furze, gorse, fern, and underwood upon the said common, and so much of the said four pieces of waste as now remains uninclosed, as may be required for the purpose of fodder and litter for cattle, as well commonable as others. levant and couchant, on the said tenements, and for fuel and other purposes of agriculture and husbandry necessary for the beneficial and profitable enjoyment and use of the said tenements, and a right to use the whole of the said common for walking, driving, and riding on horseback, and for the enjoyment of air and exercise, and for amusement and recreation, and other rights, privileges, and customs.

And the plaintiff prayed in the second paragraph of the prayer of his bill, that the defendant, his servants, agents, and workmen, might be restrained by injunction from inclosing any part of the common or frith, or of so much of the four pieces of waste as now remains uninclosed, and from in any manner disturbing or interfering with any of the said rights of the plaintiff and other freehold and copyhold tenants of the manor over the common, and in particular from erecting or commencing to erect, and from entering into any agreement as to the erection of any houses, buildings, or fences, upon any part of the common, &c., and from digging gravel, &c., or in any manner interfering with any of the ancient roads and paths over the common.

The manor of Berkhampstead, which is situate in the counties of Hertford, Buckingham, and Northampton, formerly belonged to the Duchy of Cornwall, and was purchased by the late Earl Brownlow in 1862. The common in question consists of a large open tract of ground, situate partly in the parish of Berkhampstead St. Peter, and partly in that of Northchurch, and is usually called Berkhampstead Common or Frith.

The plaintiff was both a freeholder and a copyholder of the manor.

In Feb. 1866 the late earl inclosed about 400 acres of the common by the erection of iron fences, which the plaintiff afterwards caused to be removed. Thereupon the late earl commenced an action of trespass against the plaintiff in the present suit; the action never came to a hearing, and the plaintiff in July 1866 filed the present bill for the purpose of establishing his rights over the common, and preventing the earl from inclosing any part of the common and from carrying out an intention which he entertained of building on the portion of the common which he had fenced off.

The late earl died in Feb. 1867, having by his will devised the Berkhampstead manor to the present earl, against whom the suit was revived.

The defence set up by the answer was that the rights of the freeholders and copyholders were distinct, and that even assuming that one copyholder might sue on behalf of all, still every freeholder must sue for himself; that Berkhampstead St. Peter and Northchurch were two distinct manors, and that the tenants of the former manor alone had any rights of common over Berkhampstead-common; and further that after the inclosure of the 400 acres a sufficiency of the waste would be left to satisfy the commonable rights of the tenants, even assuming the tenants of both manors to have rights of common over Berkhampstead common.

The plaintiff contended that the two alleged manors really constituted only one manor, and that the commonable rights of the tenants extended over the whole waste. The plaintiff supported his case by a vast mass of evidence, oral and documentary, which is fully discussed in his Lordship's judgment. A document known as Doddridge's survey, which had been made by the direction of the Crown, was mainly relied upon by the plaintiff, but its admissibility in evidence was contested by the defendant, on the ground that the commission on which it was founded had not been produced, and could not be found.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., Joshua Williams, Q.C., and A. P. Whately for the plaintiff.—Although the commission cannot be found, Dodderidge's survey is admissible in evidence; similar documents have been constantly received as evidence. They cited,

Rowe v. Brenton, 8 B. & C. 747;
Denn d. Goodwin v. Spray, 1 T. R. 466;
Chapman v. Cowlan, 13 East, 10;
Freeman v. Read. 4 Best & Sm. 174.

The onus probandi that there is sufficient waste left to satisfy the commonable rights of the tenants lies on the lord:

5 Vin. Abr., tit. "Common," A a;
Filewood v. Palmer, Mos. 169;
Arlett v. Ellis, 7 B. & C. 346;
Mellor v. Spateman, 1 Saund. 346, note g.

The custom to use commons for purposes of recreation is a good one, and has been recognised in many cases, e.g.,

Fitch v. Rawlings, 1 Hy. Bl. 393;
Abbot v. Weekly, 1 Lev. 176.

On the question whether the plaintiff's prescription was injured by his prescribing for less than he was entitled to claim, they cited,

Bushwood v. Bond, Cro. Eliz. 722;
Bruges v. Searle, Carth. 219;
Bailiffs, &c. of Tewkesbury v. Bricknell, 1 Taunt. 142;
Phillips on Evidence, 8th edit., p. 857.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., Charles Hall, and Darby, for the defendant, contended that the frame of the bill was improper, as one tenant could not sue on behalf of all the freehold and copyhold tenants of the manor, the tenants having distinct rights in respect of the two manors, for they contended that there were two distinct manors. They submitted that there was no evidence of right of estovers and recreation, and that issues ought to be directed as to those rights and as to the sufficiency of common. They cited

Weeks v. Staker, 2 Vern. 300;
Lord Dunraven v. Llewellyn, 15 Q. B., N. S., 791;
Evans v. Taylor, 7 Ad. & Ell. 617.

Sir Roundell Palmer, in reply, contended that the frame of the suit was proper. He cited

Powell v. Lord Powis, 1 Y. & J. 159;
Evelme Hospital v. Andover, 1 Vern. 265;
Mayor of York v. Pilkington, 1 Atk. 282.

He also cited:

Fawcett v. Strickland, Com. 578;
Hanson v. Gardiner, 7 Ves. 305.

The following authorities were also referred to:

Earl of Chichester v. Hall, 17 L. T. Rep. 121;
Duke of Beaufort v. Smith, 4 Ex. 474;
Daniel v. Wilkin, 7 Ex. 434;
Price's Case, 8 Co. Rep. 80;
Wakefield v. Duke of Buccleugh, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 475; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 613;

Digitized by Google

Grant v. Gunner, 1 Taunt. 435;
Evans v. Taylor, 7 Ad. & Ell. 617;
How v. Tenants of Bromsgrove, 1 Vern. 22;
Artlington v. Fawkes, 2 Vern. 356;
Statute of Merton, 20 Hen. 3, c. 4; 13 Edw. 1, c. 46.

Jan. 13.—Lord ROMILLY, after stating the object of the suit, continued: In determining this question an important point to be considered is the extent of the manor of Berkhampstead. A map, which purports to be a map of the extent of the manor, as alleged by the plaintiff, is appended to the bill. The defendant contends that this plan comprises the whole or the greater portion of two manors, viz., the manor of the borough of Berkhampstead, and the manor of the hallimote of Northchurch. The property originally and previously to the year 1600 belonged to the Duke of Cornwall, and seems to have originated by a grant by Edward III. to Edward Prince of Wales of the honour of Berkhampstead, which honour included the manor of Swanborne, in Bucks, the manor of Blaxley, in Northamptonshire, and the manor of Aldbury; and it also included, according to the old grant, the borough of Berkhampstead, and also the manor of the hallimote of Northchurch; and the defendant contends that these were separate and distinct manors. The plaintiff contends that these two, viz., the borough of Berkhampstead and the hallimote of Northchurch, together constituted the manor of Berkhampstead, and that the commonable rights of the tenants of both divisions extended indiscriminately over the whole waste, and that the waste was never separated or defined as belonging partly to one and partly to the other district. [His Lordship examined the evidence afforded by the court rolls, and continued:] In 1607, a survey was made, by the direction of the Crown, of the court and manor of Berkhampstead, under the care and presidency of Serjeant Dodderidge, afterwards judge of the Court of King's Bench, and the reputed author of Sheppard's Touchstone. This survey lays down the boundaries of the manor very clearly and distinctly, and they include the whole of what is called the hallimote of Northchurch. It states that 34a. 37p. are held by freehold tenants of the manor, and 650 acres are held by copyhold tenants of the manor. The survey states the whole circumference, which is about eleven miles, and it distinctly points out the exact boundaries, including the four pieces of waste in question in this cause. The accuracy of this survey, and of these boundaries of the manor does not seem ever to have been called in question. The admissibility of it in evidence is contested, and the commission on which it was founded is not produced or proved, still I am of opinion that it is strictly evidence, and also that the character of it is such that the court is bound to attribute great weight to it. In Oct. 1616, another survey was made by the Duke of Cornwall. The court for the borough of Berkhampstead was held in the town itself; the court for the hallimote of Northchurch was held in the castle of Berkhampstead. If the accuracy of the defendant's contention is admitted, it involves this dilemma, that either the court for the manor of the hallimote of Northchurch was held in a place not within the manor, or else that the castle of Berkhampstead did not lie within the manor of Berkhampstead—in either case a strange and anomalous circumstance, which the fact of the five manors belonging to the honour of Berkhampstead does not remove, because they are not all held in the same place. Not only are all the entries made in the same book of rolls, but the tenants of each division are continually cited to both courts; this appears by a series of documents. When I come to consider the rights of the tenants of the manor, whether united or severed, the evidence is strong to show that the commonable rights of the tenants were never severed or considered as capable of being treated apart from each other; on this subject the constant discussions and disputes relating to the inclosing and approving by the lord of parts of the waste afford valuable and unquestionable evidence. The first of them, a transaction of great importance, occurred in the year 1618. This was an arrangement made between the Prince (the Duke of Cornwall) on one side, and the tenants of the manor on the other, to settle what portions of the waste might be enclosed for the benefit of the lord, leaving sufficient for the tenants of the manor, who had rights of common over the waste. In the discussion and settlement of this question no distinction is made between the tenants of the borough of Berkhampstead and the tenants of the hallimote of Northchurch; they are treated alike, as having equal rights and claims as tenants of one manor; and, finally, it is settled between them that 300 acres may be approved by the lord, and that this will leave sufficient for the commonable rights of the tenants over the remainder of the waste, without any separation of the waste, or any other attribution of any part of it to the borough or to the hallimote. I think it unnecessary to go through all the documents relating to this transaction, but throughout the tenants of Northchurch make common cause with the tenants of the borough, and seem alike to be treated as tenants of the manor of Berkhampstead. In the year 1634 an attempt was made on the part of the Duke of Cornwall, which was continued, with more or less assiduity, until April 1642, to approve 400 acres more of the waste, not as the waste belonging to two manors, but as one waste belonging to one manors. This was resisted by the tenants of both, without distinction. The resistance was successful, and the plan was ultimately abandoned, as I shall presently state somewhat more in detail. The same appears in the Parliamentary surveys of 1650 and 1653, in which no distinct manor of the borough and of the hallimote of Northchurch is to be discovered. In 1649 to 1654 the attempt was renewed to obtain 400 additional acres, part of the waste, from the common, and this again was successfully resisted It is impossible too carefully to examine the documents which relate to the circumstances connected with the arrangement by which the 300 acres were approved, and those which portray the successful resistance to the approvement of 400 acres. They are fully and minutely set forth in the documents proved in this case. The various Acts of Council from the 19th May 1618 to the 29th Jan. 1619, the commission and articles of the 14th Aug. 1618, and the warrant of the 20th Feb. 1619, clearly establish how complete and careful was the arrangement and compromise which was entered into when the first 300 acres were inclosed from the waste. Here it might have been supposed that the attempts of the lord on the waste would have ceased; but twenty years afterwards the attempt is renewed which, if successful, would have left little or no waste for the tenants of the manor. The manner in which this attempt was conducted and how it was attempted to be enforced are described in the warrant of the 13th Nov. 1638, to F. Wytherhed, and the summons in the same month to the commons to attend. This is followed by a copy of the minutes of proceedings in Feb. 1637, and May 1639, by the articles of instruction of the 3rd July 1639, and the report of the 22nd Oct. 1639, respecting the 400 acres and the returns of the commissioners concerning them, and is completed by a lease of these 400 acres granted to Jane Murray. This, however, did not prevent or abate the strenuous efforts of the commoners to prevent the 400 more acres being taken from them. How the contest continued down to April 1654, how in April 1653 the interest of the duchy was sold to Messrs. Ellis and Thride, and how on the 27th April 1654 this claim was dismissed, and the right of the commoners permanently established, in spite of a series of proceedings in the House of Lords, is very minutely detailed in the documents, and with much interest shows the success of the tenants of the manor. In fact, these identical 400 acres now in question, or very nearly the same, are those the inclosure of which was so strongly and so successfully resisted in the reign of Charles. and during the subsequent protectorate of Cromwell, and these the late earl has attempted to enclose. This was forcibly resisted by the present plaintiffs. Unquestionably, in such a state of things, and seeing how carefully the matter has hitherto been investigated, and having regard to the circumstance that the rights of the lord and of the tenants of the manor have remained unaltered, it is manifest that the burden of proof lies most expressly on the defendant, the present earl, who seeks to support this encroachment, to show that the late earl was entitled to make this approvement, and that he is entitled to support it. Upon the whole, a full consideration of the document convinces me that, though these two manors were for some purposes distinct, that for the purpose of commonable rights, and so far as regards the waste, they together formed one manor of Berkhampstead, and that the rights of the tenants of the manor over the waste were common to the tenants of the borough of Berkhampstead and to the tenants of the hallimote of Northchurch, and that no waste has ever been or can now be properly defined or set out as belonging separately to either manor, but that both enjoyed indiscriminately and in common the whole waste. As to what these commonable rights were, the evidence to be drawn from the documents as to the nature and extent of them shows that they include almost every commonable right except the right to estovers and to recreation or pastime on the waste; as to these no evidence is given in favour of the plaintiffs. The viva voce evidence confirmatory of the documentary evidence is also all one way, and is conclusive as to the manner in which these rights have been enjoyed during the memory of anyone now alive. It is unnecessary to advert to it in detail; it is, in my opinion, comprehensive, conclusive, and uncontradicted. Besides the matters above mentioned which are adduced by the defendant, besides disputing the admissibility in evidence of the survey of Mr. Serjeant Dodderidge in 1607, he also brings forward several technical objections to the frame of the plaintiff's bill. He contends that the plaintiff cannot properly sue on behalf of himself and the freeholders and copyholders of the manor, and that this constitutes a misjoinder; but I am of opinion that this objection fails, and that though their rights of common might not be exactly co-extensive, yet, as the plaintiff is proved, and indeed admitted to be a copyholder as well as a freeholder of the manor, and, indeed, of both divisions of it, he is entitled to sue on behalf of all. This also appears to me to be established both by authority and by the constant practice of this court shown in tithe cases and also in cases where a right of fishing comes in question, as in the case of the Mayor of York v. Pilkington (sup.) The evidence of user relates to twenty-nine different properties, and in eighteen of these cases it is admitted that the property constitutes either a freehold or copyhold tenement of the manor, assuming that I am right in coming to the conclusion that the tenants of either manor (if there be two manors), have indiscriminately commonable rights over the whole waste. I think, therefore, that the frame of the suit is correct, and that as regards the common right of herbage, pannage, and the cutting of furze and gorse the right is established. It remains, then, for the lord to show that he is entitled to approve, and that sufficient is left for the commonable rights of the tenants. This he has entirely failed in doing, indeed he has not attempted it, and in fact the attempt made by the late earl is only a renewal of the attempts made in 1638 and 1642, and which did not end till 1654, to inclose exactly the same land or nearly so, which was then resisted, and for which encroachment there appears to me as little justification now as there was in the seventeenth century. I consider the case of the plaintiff to be proved, and that no sufficient ground for doubt is laid to induce me, as I am asked, to send this case for further investigation, as I considered myself bound to do in the case of the Hampstead common I think, therefore, that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree in the terms of the first paragraph of the prayer of the bill, omitting the word "estovers," and omitting the right to use the common for recreation, and that a perpetual injunction must be granted in the terms of the second paragraph of the prayer of the bill. I think also that the costs must follow the event. It is true that the present defendant did not erect the fence nor did he seem to desire by any active steps to support the encroachment, and if he had abandoned the case when he succeeded the late Earl, his estate would alone have been liable for costs. But the present defendant has thought proper to stand exactly in the place of the late Earl against whom the first proceedings were instituted. I do not think that it was necessary to proceed with the action at law, and I think that the case was better fitted for a court of equity, and that the pendency of the action of trespass ought not to affect the question of costs.

Digitized by Google

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Fawcett, Hofne, and Hunter.

Solicitors for the defendant, Nicholl, Burnett, and Newman.

Saturday, Jan. 15.

Re THE LONDON AND SCOTTISH BANK; LOGAN'S CASE.

Company — Manager — Termination of engagement — Winding-up — Salary — Compensation.

By a clause in the articles of association of a company, a person was appointed manager, and it was provided that in the event of his being at any time deprived of his office for any other cause than gross misconduct he should be paid, as compensation for loss of office, a sum equal to three years' salary.

The manager's engagement came to an end in consequence of the winding-up of the company:

Held, that he was entitled to prove in the winding-up for the difference between the amount of the three years salary, and the amount remaining unpaid on certain shares which he held in the company.

Yelland's case, L. Rep. 4 Eq. 350, followed.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by Mr. William Hugh Logan for leave to prove in the winding-up for the sum of 1800*l.* odd under the following circumstances.

By one of the clauses of the articles of association of the London and Scottish Bank, which was registered as a limited company in Oct. 1864, it was provided that Mr. Logan, banker, of Berwick-upon-Tweed, should be, and he was thereby appointed, the managing director of the company's affairs in Scotland, &c., at a salary of not less than 800*l.* per annum, for a period of five years from the date of the registration of the company. And it was provided that his salary should be raised to 900*l.* per annum when a dividend of 5 per cent. should be declared out of the net profits of the company, and that he should receive an additional 100*l.* for every additional 1 per cent. per annum. And the clause concluded with the following words: "And in the event of the said William Hugh Logan being at any time deprived of or removed from his office for any other cause than gross misconduct, the directors shall pay to him, as compensation for loss of office, a sum equal to three years' salary at the rate of salary which, on the quarter-day last preceding such termidation of his engagement, shall be payable to him, such sum to be paid within one month from the time of his removal."

Digitized by Google

The company was ordered to be wound-up in May 1865, and Logan's engagement was consequently at an end.

He also held shares in the company, and the amount for which he now asked for leave to prove was the difference between the amount of three years' salary at 800*l.* per annum, and the amount of the calls for which he would be liable on his shares, as to which latter amount he claimed a right of set-off.

Roxburgh, Q.C. and Locock Webb, in support of the summons, submitted that the manager's engagement having terminated without any misconduct on his part, he was clearly entitled to the compensation specified in the articles; that he was also entitled to set-off his liabilities as a shareholder against the compensation money; and that he should, therefore, have leave to prove for the difference between the two amounts. They cited

Re English Joint-Stock Bank; Yelland's case, L. Rep. 4 Eq. 350;

Re The London and Colonial Company; Clark's case, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 774; L. Rep. 7 Eq. 550.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Lawson, for the official liquidator, contended that Logan was at most entitled to an inquiry what damage he had sustained, as the cessation of his engagement by the winding-up of the company was not contemplated by the parties; the clause in the articles clearly contemplated the company as a going concern, as was proved by the provision that the compensation-money should be paid within one month from the time of his removal.

Lord ROMILLY.—I think I cannot in principle distinguish this from Yelland's case, and that the applicant is entitled to put in a claim for the three years' salary. The termination of the manager's engagement by the winding-up of the company was clearly not in the contemplation of the parties at the time they entered into the arrangement, but the clause in the articles must be construed most strongly against the company, and as it is thereby provided that the manager shall be paid a sum equal to three years' salary upon the termination of his engagement for any other cause than misconduct, and the cause in this instance is not misconduct, he must have leave to prove for the difference between the amount of three years' salary and the amount remaining unpaid on his shares.

Solicitors for the applicant, Lawrance, Plews, and Boyer.

Solicitors for the official liquidator, Redpath and Holdsworth.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dec. 14 and 15, 1869.

NASH v. HOWELL.

Solicitor and client—Trustee and cestui que trust—Bill for an account—Decree—Costs.

Where on bill, against a firm of solicitors who were the trustees of a settlement, for an account, but in which there was no charge of wilful neglect or default, and no relief prayed as against it, the plaintiff succeeded in establishing his case:

The court, in ordering an account, directed an inquiry as to the defendants' dealings with the trust fund, and if on taking the accounts it should appear that they had been guilty of wilful neglect or default in the discharge of their duty, they should be charged, in taking the accounts, with such wilful neglect or default.

This suit was instituted by Charles Nash, a carpenter, living at Chelsea, against Abraham Howell and Edward Jones, members of a firm of solicitors at Welshpool, who were the trustees of a settlement executed upon his marriage of certain property in which he took a life interest, to compel them to account for the trust moneys and to pay the costs of the suit. A sum of 800*l.* having been paid into court as the balance of the trust moneys by Messrs. Howell and Jones, the only question substantially before the court was as to the form of the decree and the costs of the proceedings. The facts were as follows:—

In 1857 the plaintiff married Mrs. Richards, a widow, who was entitled under the will of her father to one-third of certain farms, upon the security of which she had previously to her marriage received certain advances from the defendants, who acted as her solicitors—advances which were secured to them by certain deeds.

By the settlement, which was dated the 7th Jan. 1857, the property, subject to these advances, was made subject to a general power of appointment to be exercised by Mrs. Nash only with the consent in writing of the defendants, who were appointed the trustees, and subject thereto the property was settled upon Mrs. Nash for her life for her separate use, and after her death was charged with 50*l.* a year to her husband, and subject thereto for Mrs. Nash's children in equal shares.

On the 1st May 1858, on the occasion of an advance of 10*l.*, another instrument was prepared, by which, in pursuance of her power, Mrs. Nash charged the premises with the payment of 599*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.*, already advanced, and provided for future advances, not exceeding 500*l.*, being secured upon the property, which, subject to these trusts and to a power of sale, was limited upon the trusts previously declared by the marriage settlement. Further costs were incurred and further advances made, the ultimate result being that in 1861, when the property was sold and the accounts settled, the defendants brought the plaintiff in 200*l.* in their debt, which by another deed they were empowered to retain out of the purchase-money. They were then authorised to invest the balance in certain stocks, specifying, among others, the preference shares or capital of the Oswestry and Newtown Railway, and subject thereto upon the original trusts of the marriage settlement.

By these advances and the consequent costs the trust-funds were reduced by the 14th Oct. 1853, when Mrs. Nash died and Mr. Nash became entitled to his annuity, about 900*l.* The defendants paid the annuity of 50*l.* up to the 15th Nov. 1867, when they sent a letter inclosing a post-office order for 2*l.*, and stating that the reason of their not having sent lately was that "Mr. Howell said he wished to see the account before making any more payments, but that he went from home immediately after, and that he consequently had not been able to look over the account." The plaintiff, not receiving any further remittance, on the 9th April 1868 put the matter into the hands of another solicitor, who wrote to request a copy of the accounts. To this and to several other letters Messrs. Howell returned no answer until the 6th May, when they wrote to say that they had been in hopes that "Mr. Howell would be able to look at the papers and accounts to which they referred. He had an impression that we are not warranted in making any further advances at present, but the facts and documents are so much out of his head that he cannot call them up without perusing them again, and his time has been so much taken up of late as to put it out of his power to do so."

Digitized by Google

Further correspondence ensued; no accounts were sent, the principal reason alleged by Mr. Howell being that his time had been fully occupied and engrossed with Parliamentary work. On the 9th July 1868 the plaintiff's solicitor wrote and inquired specifically who were the present trustees of the property, warning Mr. Howell that he would be made a party to a suit in Chancery, and that his refusal to give the names of the trustees would have its weight with the court. On the 13th July (the correspondence having been opened on the 9th April) Mr. Kynaston, the solicitor, repeated his inquiry as to the names of the trustees, and his warning that he should make Mr. Howell a party to the suit, and concluded by urging that he considered that in the position Mr. Howell occupied in this matter to poor and inexperienced persons, he had acted, to say the least, with the greatest indifference, and in a way which the Court of Chancery would certainly not approve.

On the 23rd July the bill was filed. On the 27th July Mr. Howell wrote to express his surprise at the filing of the bill, and after stating that he had been engaged in carrying a Bill relating to the Cambrian railways through Parliament, he said that he had since looked at the papers in the matter, and found that the trust fund amounted to about 800*l.*; that he had been told by the cashier, when the weekly payments were stopped, that the capital was being eaten into by the advances made, and that he had requested a suspension of those payments until he had the opportunity of refreshing his memory as to the trusts. This letter was answered on the 28th by the plaintiff's solicitor. On the 29th Mr. Howell wrote direct to the plaintiff, enclosing a copy of that letter, and stating, "I can only advise you again not to expend the property in litigation," a letter which the plaintiff placed in his solicitor's hands, who wrote to beg that any future communication should be sent through him.

Karslake, Q. C. and Townsend, for the plaintiff, contended that the course taken by the defendants had, from the commencement, been most oppressive, considering the circumstances of the parties. They had driven the plaintiff into court by their stoppage of weekly payments, and by their refusal to render any account, and they ought to pay the whole of the costs of the suit.

Cutler, for the children, supported the plaintiff's argument.

Eddis, Q. C. and Humphreys, for the defendants, submitted that the costs ought to follow the result of the accounts, from which it would appear, as was the fact, that the plaintiff had received far more than his annuity, and, that at the time Mr. Howell was applied to, the plaintiff had actually received 50*l.* beyond its amount. They admitted that it was Mr. Howell's duty to render the accounts; but they contended that, in consideration of the circumstance that his time had been so fully occupied, and that he had paid the trust-fund into court, he ought to be treated with consideration. The bill did not charge the defendants with wilful neglect or default, and as there was no imputation against them they ought not to be visited with the costs of the suit. They referred to

Hale v. Hallett, 1 Cox 134;
Sleight v. Lawson, 3 K. & J. 292;
Seton on Decrees, 764.

Karslake, Q. C. in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, who had intimated an opinion that the present was an exceptional case, in which the defendants ought to be made to pay, not the ordinary costs between party and party, but the full costs incurred by the plaintiff as between solicitor and client, said that this was a case in which the amount of the property in dispute was very small, but the principles involved were of the very highest importance. The plaintiff was the beneficiary for his life under an ante-nuptial settlement of certain property to which his wife had been entitled under her father's will. The property consisted of one-third of certain farms. It appeared that the defendants Howell and Jones, who were the only material defendants to the suit, were solicitors. It appeared that they were engaged as Mrs. Nash's solicitors in the preparation of the marriage settlement. It appeared that the property was settled, not as was usual in such cases, upon trusts exclusively for the benefit of the husband, wife and issue of the marriage, but that the first trust was to secure certain sums advanced by the solicitors to her; and according to the frame of the settlement the property was only settled on her, her husband, and children, subject to a power of appointment, which could only be exercised with the consent of the trustees of the settlement. The effect was that they, being the solicitors who prepared the settlement, gave the wife a power of appointment which could not be exercised without their consent. The effect was plain—it was to keep this lady and her husband under the control of the defendants. The Vice-Chancellor, after reviewing the facts and referring to the duty of the defendants as trustees to have their accounts ready, to keep the trust funds properly invested, and to afford the fullest information to their cestui que trusts, expressed his opinion that the answers of the defendants were mere trifling with the plaintiff. After remarking on the impropriety of their writing directly to the plaintiff, an illiterate person, after the commencement of the litigation, and endeavouring to terrify him by threats of the heavy expenses attending a Chancery suit, the Vice-Chancellor said that the question now to be decided was by whom these expenses were to be borne. Messrs. Howell and Jones had had the advantage of having their case elaborately argued, but he considered that their conduct had been unjustifiable in every respect—that their conduct would have been unjustifiable in any case as trustees; but, considering that they had held the higher and more confidential position of solicitors towards their clients, their conduct deserved the reprobation which he expressed. The first part of the order would be that they should pay the costs of the litigation. But for the rule as to costs, he would have given the plaintiff costs as between solicitor and client, and have made the defendants bear the whole of his expenses; for, as he had already pointed out, the consequences to the plaintiff of his success would be that he would have to bear such further costs beyond those allowed him that he had better not have come into court. He could not depart from the ordinary practice as to the costs being as between party and party, but he wished to call attention to the position of litigants who came before the court in cases of this kind. When the client came to complain in this court of the conduct of a solicitor, the court, looking upon the solicitor as one of its officers, who had duties to perform of the greatest importance, gave him, in his position as solicitor, a right to his proper charges as between solicitor and client. But where there was litigation between the solicitor and the client a different course was adopted, and a plaintiff could only recover from his solicitor costs as between party and party. He had never known a case in which costs had been given as between solicitor and client. But it was his duty to let it be known that, in his opinion, if the solicitor was allowed to charge such costs, and could not be made to pay them, he did not fight with his client on equal terms. In this case there would be a decree for an account of all sums received by Messrs. Howell and Jones, an inquiry as to all their dealings with the trust funds; and if, on taking the accounts, it should appear that they had been guilty of wilful neglect or default in the discharge of their duty, they should be charged in taking the accounts with such wilful neglect or default.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Kynaston.

Solicitor for the defendants, Milne.

Saturday, Jan. 29.

WILLIAMS v. SMITH.

County Court—Will—Annuity charged on house—Sale of house without notice—Liability of vendor to pay annuity.

A testator bequeathed to "C. W., the daughter of C. W., 10l. per annum during her natural life, and if she should die before her mother, C. W., the same sum during her natural life, to be paid from the house, No. 1, Park-lane, St. Marylebone parish, to commence at my death." The daughter died before the mother; and the owner of the house subject to the annuity, paid the annuity to the mother for several years after the daughter's death, and then sold the house without notice of the charge to the purchaser. Thereupon the mother filed a plaint in the County Court against the owner, seeking to obtain a provision for the annuity out of the purchase-money.

Held (affirming the decision of the court below), that upon the construction of the will the plaintiff was entitled to the annuity.

Held, further, that she had a right to confirm the sale of the house, and was entitled to be indemnified out of the purchase-money.

This was an appeal from the County Court of Marylebone. The facts were these.

George Armroyd, by his will, dated 25th March, 1811, gave the whole of his property to his widow, and by a codicil, dated 9th Nov. 1811, gave "to Charlotte Williams, the daughter of Charlotte Williams, born at Hoxton, in the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, 10l. per annum during her natural life, and if she should die before her mother, Charlotte Williams, the same sum during her natural life, to be paid from the house No. 1, Park-lane, St. Marylebone parish, to commence at my death."

The testator died in 1813. After his death his widow entered into possession of the property. She died in 1819, and by her will she bequeathed the house No. 1, Park-lane, subject to the above annuity, to her son. The son died in 1836, after appointing his wife and daughter his executrixes. They both died intestate, without having fully administered the estate, and letters of administration de bonis non were thereupon granted to the defendant, T. J. Smith.

In 1868 the defendant T. J. Smith entered into possession of the house in Park-lane, and sold it without giving any notice of the existence of the charge upon it to the purchaser.

The annuity was regularly paid to Charlotte Williams, the daughter, until her death in Oct. 1843, and afterwards, until the date of the sale, to Charlotte Williams the mother.

The plaint was filed by Charlotte Williams the mother, against Smith for the purpose of obtaining a provision for her annuity out of the purchase-money.

The County Court judge decided in plaintiff's favour, and from that decision the defendant now appealed.

Hemming, for the appellant, contended that, upon the construction of the words of the will, the annuity dropped on the death of Charlotte Williams, the daughter; but assuming that it had not, the plaintiff's remedy was against the purchaser, not the defendant. Although the purchaser had received no notice from the vendor, he was not relieved from liability. It was his duty to have examined the title before completing the purchase, and if he had done so he would have ascertained the existence of the will and the charge on the property. He cited, Peto v. Hammond, 30 Beav. 495.

Bagshawe, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—As to the question of construction, I think it is quite plain. Although the will is very unartistically framed, there is enough to show that the testator intended the annuity to go over to the plaintiff Charlotte Williams in the event of her surviving her daughter. She did survive her daughter, and the defendant paid her the annuity for several years—up to 1867, when he sold the house on which it was charged, without giving notice of the existence of the charge to the purchaser. The plaintiff now comes before the court for the purpose of being indemnified out of the purchase-money. It is quite true that the sale does not alter the plaintiff's lien on the house, and that the fact of the defendant's selling it free from incumbrances does not relieve it from the charge in the hands of the purchaser. But as the sale has been effected without the plaintiff's consent, she has a right to confirm the transaction, and to claim her indemnity out of the purchase-money. That is the view taken by the learned judge of the County Court, and it seems a very proper one. The appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, A. E. Briant.

Solicitor for the defendant, J Scaife.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET, Esq., and Hon. ROBERT BUTLER Barristers-at-Law

Jan. 17 and 18.

TURNER v. RINGWOOD HIGHWAY BOARD.

Highway Act 1862—District Board of Ringwood—Freeholder—Trees on land of by side of road—Right of board to cut—Injunction.

This court has no jurisdiction to restrain a trespass unaccompanied by waste. The plaintiff was seised of lands on each side of a public road through L. common, in the parish of R., and such lands were covered with valuable fir trees. The district board of R. proceeded, under the above Act, to cut down, and did cut down, some of the trees, on the ground that they were an obstruction to the public highway.

Digitized by Google

Held, that primâ facie the board were justified in their acts, and upon the case made against them an injunction to restrain them was refused.

The bill in this suit stated that John Turner the plaintiff was seised of lands on each side of the public road through Leybrook Common, in the parish of Ringwood, in the county of Southampton. The land adjoining the road on each side contained or was covered or planted with valuable fir trees, many of them of the age of forty years and upwards. The highway board for the district of Ringwood, issued, under the powers of the Highway Act 1862, on the 16th May 1868 a notice of sale in the following words:—

Sale of fir trees.—To be sold by tender in one lot, upwards of six hundred fir trees, suitable for pit wood or fencing poles, now growing on the side of the road through Leybrook Common, in the parish of Ringwood, together with the heath and furze also growing thereon. The trees are marked, and may be viewed at any time. The person whose tender is accepted will be required to pay down the amount thereof forthwith, and to cut and remove the lot purchased within a reasonable time. Further particulars may be known on application at my office or to me on or before Monday, the 1st June next.—By order of the Ringwood Highway Board. RICHARD BROWN, Clerk.

Ringwood, May 16, 1868.

Mr. Henry Johns, the plaintiff's solicitor, on the 19th May 1868, wrote to Richard Brown the following letter:—

My attention has been called to a printed handbill announcing an intended sale by tender of fir trees growing on the sides of the road through Leybrook Common. I beg to give you notice that wherever the lands of Mr. Turner adjoin this road he claims the trees growing thereon as his property, and any interference with them will be considered, after this notice, a wilful trespass, and treated accordingly. I would add that if your surveyor thinks that any obstruction to the highway within the meaning of the general Highway Act, is caused by any trees claimed by Mr. Turner as above-mentioned, Mr. Turner is quite ready to do anything that may be reasonably required under the provisions of the said Act.

On the 3rd June 1868 the defendant, Richard Brown, wrote to Mr. Johns the following letter:—

Your letters of the 19th and 22nd inst., claiming the fir trees growing on the sides of the road through Leybrook Common as belonging in part to Mr. Turner and in part to Lord Malmesbury, were laid before the highway board for the district of Ringwood, at their meeting yesterday, and I am to inform you that the board consider that neither Mr. Turner nor Lord Malmesbury have a legal claim to them.

No tender was accepted by the defendants at their meeting on the 2nd June 1868, and neither the plaintiff nor Mr. Johns believed or suspected that the defendants intended to sell or cut the fir trees without notice to them or one of them. Mr. Johns understood that no steps would be taken by the defendants towards the sale without such notice, and in consequence thereof no further proceedings were then taken in the matter; and, in fact, no steps were taken by the defendants until on the 13th July 1868, when, without further notice or intimation to the plaintiff, or anyone on his behalf, the defendant sent workmen and labourers on the plaintiff's lands adjoining the road for the purpose of cutting the trees, and they cut down about 200 of the trees. Mr. Johns, on the following day, having heard of the circumstance, went to the office of Richard Brown the defendant, but was informed that he was at Jersey. Mr. Johns then went to the land where the trees were being cut, and endeavoured to prevail upon the workmen to desist cutting until they obtained further orders from the defendant Richard Brown. The workmen agreed to suspend working for the day as it was growing late in the afternoon, but said they should act next day according to such orders as they might receive from the defendant Richard Brown. The bill alleged that the fir trees were of great value, and that their loss would be irreparable to the plaintiff unless the cutting and felling of the same were restrained.

The plaintiff stated that the property in the fir trees was vested in him as the freeholder of the land through which the road passed, and that he and his predecessor in title had always exercised rights of ownership over the same without molestation, and that the defendants had no power or authority under the Highway Acts or otherwise to cut or interfere with the fir trees or other trees or furze on the plaintiff's land.

The bill, therefore, prayed that the defendants, their workmen, and agents, might be restrained by injunction from cutting or felling any fir or other trees, or any furze on the plaintiff's lands through which the said road passed, or committing any other acts of waste thereon. And that the defendants might be decreed to make due compensation to the plaintiff for the trees so cut by them or by their order, and for all damage thereby occasioned.

Osborne Morgan, Q. C. and R. H. Sandys, for the plaintiff, contended that there was no right in the highway board to cut or remove the trees in question, and cited the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 64, which enacted, "That no tree, bush, or shrub, shall hereafter be planted on any carriage-way or cartway, or within the distance of fifteen feet from the centre thereof; but the same shall respectively be cut down, grubbed up, and carried away by the owner or occupier of the land or soil within twenty-one days after notice to him or his agent by the surveyor, on pain of forfeiting, for every neglect, the sum of 10s." The case of Jenny v. Brook, 13 L. J. 376, Q. B. was referred to. It was also contended that by nonuser the public had waived their right to the road, as originally laid out, and were now only entitled to the twenty-five feet, which had become the via trita.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and C. B. Freeling, for the defendants, cited

Sheppard's Touchstone, 97;
41 Geo. 3, c. 109;
Rex v. Wright, 3 B. & Ad. 681;
Vooght v. Winch, 2 B. & Ald. 662;
Rex v. Inhabitants of Hatfield, 4 A. & E. 156;
Rex v. Inhabitants of St. James's, Taunton, Selw. N. P. (1869), 1264;
Reg. v. United Telegraph Company, 31 L. J. 166, M. C.; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338;
Reg. v. Train, 31 L. J. 169, M. C.; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 390.

And contended that the defendants had a right to cut and remove the trees, and also that the right of the public to the whole fifty feet of the road remained undisturbed.

O. Morgan, Q. C. replied.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said:—In this case the defendants are a highway board, and as such have the custody of the highway through Leybrook Common, which was set out by the Enclosure Commissioners in 1811 to be of a width of 50ft. About 25ft. have become by usage the via trita, but the whole 50ft. have been assigned by the commissioners, in pursuance of their authority, as the public highway. During the last twenty-five or twenty-six years trees have been allowed to grow within the limit of 50ft., and have attained a considerable size. The defendants cut down some of these trees, and this bill was filed to restrain them from cutting what remained uncut. Primâ facie the guardians of the highway have a right to cut down any trees which are a permanent obstruction to the use by the public of any part of the highway. The right of the public was not limited to that part only which was used as the via trita; the whole 50ft. had been dedicated to the public, and they had a right to have the whole width of the road preserved from obstruction. The plaintiff's case was that he had purchased in 1866 the land on each side of and intersected by the road. That would mean the road as allotted by the commissioners. But then he went on to say that the road was limited to the 25ft. actually used by the public, and mentioned certain acts of ownership, such as cutting and trimming the trees performed by himself and his predecessors in title, to show that the right of the public to anything beyond the 25ft. must be considered as abandoned and extinguished. Assuming that the plaintiff had whatever rights Lord Malmesbury had, either as lord of the manor or as owner of the adjoining property, many of the acts of ownership which were relied upon by the plaintiff, were those to which owners of land adjoining a highway were entitled under the Enclosure Act. By merely allowing these trees, which only made their appearance 25 or 26 years ago, to grow undisturbed until 1868, it could not be held that the rights of the public over the whole 50ft. originally set out as the width of the road had become extinguished. The same rights which belonged to the public over this ground in 1811, belonged to them in 1868, when the acts complained of were done. The plaintiff therefore had no right to file this bill to restrain the cutting and removing of these trees, which were an obstruction to the highway. The plaintiff had not even made out in a satisfactory manner to the court that he had a good title to the soil on which the trees in question were growing, he merely asserts his right to the land on each side of and intersected by the highway. If the bill had included the property in the trees so as to entitle the plaintiff to his action of trover for the trees after they were cut, I might have had to give more consideration to this part of the case, but being clearly of opinion that the plaintiff has failed upon the case alleged by his bill, and that the rights of the public to the whole fifty feet of the road remains unaffected, the bill must be dismissed with costs, but without prejudice to the right of action (if any) which the plaintiff may have in respect to the sale or removal, for the purpose of sale, of the trees in question. This court has no jurisdiction to restrain a mere trespass unaccompanied by waste.

Digitized by Google

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Sandys and Knott.

Solicitors for the defendants, Vizard, Crowder, Anstie, and Young.

Thursday, Jan. 20.

FINNEY v. GODFREY.

Practice—11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 36, s. 3—Absconding defendant—Notice to appear—Extra-parochial place—Publication.

A defendant absconded to avoid process, but was known to have last resided at Barnard's-inn. That place was extra-parochial, but it had a chapel of its own.

The above enactment was Held to have been complied with by affixing the notice to the Royal Exchange as well as the chapel door.

This was an application to the court with respect to an order directing the defendant to enter an appearance to the bill, but which order he had not obeyed. By the 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 36, s. 3, it is enacted as follows:—

And whereas sometimes persons have withdrawn themselves beyond the seas, or otherwise absconded, to avoid appearing in courts of equity, or being served with process for that purpose, or being brought into court by habeas corpus have refused to appear, for remedy of the inconvenience thence ensuing: Be it further enacted, that if in any suit which hath been or hereafter shall be commenced in any court of equity, any defendant against whom any subpœna or other process shall issue, shall not cause his appearance to be entered upon such process within such time and in such manner as according to the rules of the court the same ought to have been entered in case such process had been duly served, and an affidavit or affidavits shall be made to the satisfaction of such court that such defendant is beyond the seas, or that upon inquiry at his usual place of abode he could not be found so as to be served with such process, and that there is just ground to believe that such defendant is gone out of the realm, or otherwise absconded, to avoid being served with the process of such court, then and in such case the court out of which such process issued may make an order directing and appointing such defendant to appear at a certain day therein to be named, and a copy of such order shall, within fourteen days after such order made, be inserted in the London Gazette, and published on some Lord's Day immediately after Divine service in the parish church of the parish where such defendant made his usual abode within thirty days next before such his absenting; and also a copy of such order shall, within the time aforesaid, be posted up as after mentioned (that is to say), a copy of every such order made in his Majesty's High Court of Chancery, Court of Exchequer, or the Court of the Duchy Chamber of Lancaster at Westminster, shall be posted up in some public place at the Royal Exchange, in London; and a copy of every such order made in any of the courts of equity of the Counties Palatine of Chester, Lancaster, and Durham, or of the great sessions in Wales, shall be posted up at some public place in some market town within the jurisdiction of the court by which such order was made, and nearest to the place where such defendant made his usual abode as aforesaid, such place of abode being also within the jurisdiction of the said court; and if the defendant do not appear within the time limited by such order, or within such further time as the court shall appoint, then on proof made of such publication of such order as aforesaid, the court being satisfied of the truth thereof, may order the plaintiff's bill to be taken pro confesso, and make such decree thereupon as shall be thought just, and may thereupon issue process to compel the performance of such decree, either by an immediate sequestration of the real and personal estate and effects of the party so absenting (if any such can be found), or such part thereof as may be sufficient to satisfy the demands of the plaintiff in the said suit, or by causing possession of the estate or effects demanded by the bill to be delivered to the plaintiff, or otherwise, as the nature of the case shall require; and the said court may likewise order such plaintiff to be paid and satisfied his demands out of the estate or effects so sequestered according to the true intent and meaning of such decree, such plaintiff first giving sufficient security in such sum as the court shall think proper, to abide such order touching the restitution of such estate or effects as the court shall think proper to make concerning the same, upon the defendant's appearance to defend such suit, and paying such costs to the plaintiff as the court shall order; but in case such plaintiff shall refuse or neglect to give such security as aforesaid, then the said court shall order the estate or effects so sequestered, or whereof the possession shall be decreed to be delivered, to remain under the direction of the court, either by appointing a receiver thereof, or otherwise as to such court shall seem meet, until the appearance of the defendant to defend such suit, and his paying such costs to the plaintiff as the said court shall think reasonable, or until such order shall be made therein as the court shall think just.

The place at which the defendant was known to have last resided was Barnard's-inn. That inn had a chapel of its own, but was extra-parochial.

Graham Hastings in support of the application, said that under the above stated circumstances the question was whether the affixing of the notice to the chapel door was a sufficient compliance with the requisition of the statute.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that it would be sufficient to post the notice in some public place at the Royal Exchange, and on the door of the chapel at Barnard's-inn.

Solicitors, Deane and Chubb.

Digitized by Google

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, Nov. 23, 1869.

Ex parte MARKHAM.

Magistrate—Stating a case—Ground of appeal not distinctly raised before him—20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

A magistrate cannot refuse to state a case on the ground that an objection has not been formally brought to his notice, where the objection is of such a kind as goes to the root of the whole matters before him for adjudication, and one, therefore, which he must be presumed to have known.

In making absolute a rule to compel a magistrate to state a case under such circumstances, the court refused to allow the appellant the costs of the rule, because he had not raised the objection distinctly before the magistrate.

In this case Tayler had obtained a rule calling on Mr. Dayman, a police magistrate, to show cause why he should not state a case, pursuant to 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The applicant was a broker employed on the 22nd April 1869, by a company incorporated under the Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), to make a distress on the goods of one Howard Augustus Hanrott, who was a tenant of the company, for one quarter's rent. He headed the inventory of the goods so distrained with a notice in the following terms: "Mr. Howard Augustus Hanrott. Take notice that by the authority and on behalf of your landlord, Wm. Nash, secretary to the Fulham Building Society, I have this 22nd day of April, in the year of our Lord 1869, distrained, &c."

Sect. 41 of the Companies Act 1862 provides that—"Every limited company under this Act, whether limited by shares or guarantee, shall have its name mentioned in legible characters in all notices, advertisements, and other official publications of such company."

Sect. 42 enacts that—"If any director, manager, or officer of such company, or any person on its behalf, issues or authorises the issue of any notice, advertisement, or official publication of such company, wherein its name is not mentioned in manner aforesaid, he shall be liable to a penalty of 50*l.*"

The magistrate was of opinion that the defendant was a person acting on behalf of the society in the exercise of an important privilege, viz., the right of distraining, and that he was bound to disclose the true name of his principal in the notice of distress which the law required him to deliver to the plaintiff, and convicted the defendant in the mitigated penalty of 15*l.* On being afterwards applied to to state a case for the opinion of a Superior Court, the learned magistrate refused.

H. Wildey Wright now showed cause against the rule.—According to the affidavit of Mr. Hanrott the point whether a broker serving a notice of distress is such an officer or person as is alluded to in sect. 42 of the Companies' Act 1862, was never taken before the magistrate. If the point were taken it must have been raised in the most incidental manner. [BLACKBURN, J.—It seems to lie at the bottom of the whole matter.] It was held in Parkis v. Huxtable, 28 L. J. 221, M. C., that upon the argument of a case stated by justices under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 42, the appellant will not be allowed to take objections which were not raised before the justices; and therefore, where the appellant was charged with knowingly permitting persons of bad character to meet in his house, and the only defence suggested before the justices was that the persons were there only for the purpose of obtaining refreshment, and therefore that the appellant could not be convicted, the court refused to hear an objection that the appellant knew that the persons in his house were bad characters. Crompton, J. said to the counsel for the appellant, "We are asked to decide upon the facts with reference to the objection stated before the justices. The point you now raise was not mentioned before them." [BLACKBURN, J.—The point in that case was one to be determined by evidence of facts, and so differs from that involved in the present case, where all the facts are admitted.] It is submitted that whether the point be one of law or fact, if it is not raised before the magistrate, it cannot afterwards be raised. [BLACKBURN, J.—There is a great difference between an objection which can be met and cured at the time, and one which could not be cured by any evidence taken at the time. LUSH, J.—Suppose the case of a ruling at Nisi Prius, and counsel took no legal objection at the time, would that prevent him from afterwards objecting to the ruling of the judge in point of law?]

Tayler, in support of the rule, was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C. J.—The magistrate, like the judge, is bound to know the law, and if he sees the existence of any fatal objection, even though that objection is not taken by either of the parties, it is the duty of the magistrate to act on what he knows to be the law. I think, however, that there should not be any costs allowed in this case, because, though the point must inevitably have been mentioned before the magistrate, it was not brought before him in the manner in which it ought to have been, and properly discussed. If it had, the magistrate might have come to a different conclusion.

BLACKBURN, MELLOR, and LUSH, JJ., concurred.

Rule absolute.

Attorneys for the appellant, Norris, Allens, and Carter.

Thursday, Jan. 27.

REG. v. THE MAYOR AND ASSESSORS OF MONMOUTH;

REG v. THE MAYOR AND ASSESSORS OF BOLTON.

Municipal corporation — Burgess list — Objections to burgesses—Sufficiency of notice of objection.

The notice of objection to a voter being retained upon the burgess list need not state the parish in which the objector resides.

Where, therefore, the objector described himself as "of Glendower-street, in the borough of Monmouth, on the burgess list of the said borough for a house described to be situate in Almshouse-street, in the said borough:"

Held, a good description.

In such a notice it is not necessary to describe the qualifying property of the burgess objected to.

Where, therefore, the notice was as follows: "I hereby give you notice that I object to the name of Robert Gooden, Bridge-street, in the township of Great Bolton," &c., not naming the nature of the qualifying property:

Held, sufficient.

In the first of these cases, a rule had been obtained calling upon the mayor and assessors of the borough of Monmouth to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them, commanding them to hold a court and hear the objections of one Henry Evans, to the name of James Beach and twenty-one other persons as not being entitled to have their names retained on the list of burgesses for the said borough, and proceed to revise such list accordingly.

It appeared that one Henry Evans, a burgess of the borough of Monmouth, in due time prior to the last revision of the burgess list for the said borough, gave notice of objection to one James Beach and twenty-one other persons as not being entitled to have their names retained on the burgess list of the said borough.

At the revision before the mayor and assessors, upon the first name objected to being called an objection was taken that the notice of objection was bad, inasmuch as it did not state the parish in which the objector was rated for his qualifying premises; and the court having held the objection to be good, the objection against this burgess, and the whole of the burgesses objected to by the notice (which were similar in form) were retained upon the burgess list. It further appeared that the borough of Monmouth is not divided into wards—that it consists of the parish of Monmouth and a part of another parish, and that the burgess list contains 611 names.

By sect. 17 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76 (The Municipal Corporation Act) it is enacted that—

Any person whose name shall have been inserted in any burgess list for any borough may object to any other person as not being entitled to have his name retained in the burgess list for the same borough, and every person so objecting shall, on or before the 15th Sept. in every year, give to the town clerk of such borough, and also give to the person objected to, or leave at the premises for which he shall appear to be rated in the burgess list, notice thereof in writing according to the form No. 3 in the said schedule D, or to the like effect, &c.

Sect. 18 enacts:

That the mayor and the two assessors hereinafter mentioned to be chosen in every year by the burgesses of every borough shall hold an open court within such borough for the purpose of revising the said burgess lists. . . . And where the name of any person inserted in any one of the said lists shall have been duly objected to, and the person objecting shall appear by himself or by some one on his behalf in support of such objection, the court shall require proof of the qualification of the person so objected to. . . . Provided always that no person's name shall be inserted by the mayor in any such list or shall be expunged therefrom, except in the case of death, unless notice shall have been given as is hereinbefore required in each of the said cases.

The 19th section gives the mayor and assessors power upon the hearing to "determine upon the validity of such claims and objections." The form No. 3 in section D sets out the particulars of the signature of the objector thus—(Signed) JOHN ASHTON of [here state the place of abode and property for which he is said to be rated in the burgess list].

The objector in the present case had described himself under his signature as, "of Glendower-street in the borough of Monmouth, in the burgess-list of the said borough for a house described to be situate in Almshouse-street, in the said borough."

Macnamara showed cause.—The notice of objection was bad in not describing the house he occupied as of any parish. This was altogether a question for the mayor and assessors, and they having decided this court will not interfere. The 24th section of the 1 Vict. c. 78, which gives a claimant a power to come to this court for a mandamus to have his name inserted or restored where it has been rejected by the mayor and assessors, does not contemplate or provide for a case like the present, and in the Hythe case, 5 Ad. & Ell., 832, which was decided before the 1 Vict. c. 78 came into operation, it was held that this court had no power to grant a mandamus in such a case. [LUSH, J.—He describes his qualification as it appears in the burgess list. COCKBURN, C. J.—Is this not a declining of jurisdiction. LUSH, J.—If this were merely a question of fact, this court could not interfere; but here it is a question of law.] The case of Reg. v. The Mayor of Harwich, 1 Ell. & Bl. 617, is in point. He also referred to and endeavoured to distinguish Reg. v. The Mayor of Rochester, 27 L. J. 45, Q.B.

Quain, Q. C. and E. Williams, in support of the rule, were not called upon.

The court, before pronouncing judgment, proceeded to hear the case of

REG. v. THE MAYOR AND ASSESSORS OF BOLTON.

This was a rule calling upon the Mayor and assessors of the borough of Bolton to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them commanding them to hold a court and hear the objections of William Ellison, to certain other persons as not being entitled to have their names retained on the lists of burgesses for the said borough, and proceed to revise such lists accordingly.

In this case one William Ellison, a burgess of the borough of Bolton, had given notices of objection in respect of 1696 persons, and the question was whether his notices of objection as applicable to nearly 700 of these were valid? The following was one of the forms:

Exchange Ward.

Notice of Objection.

To the town clerk of the borough of Bolton, in the county of Lancaster.

I hereby give you notice that I object to the name of Robert Gooden, Bridge-street, in the township of Great Bolton, in the borough of Bolton, being retained on the burgess list of the borough of Bolton.

Dated 14th Sept. 1869.

Signed, William Ellison, of 4, Knight-street, Little Bolton (late of 140 and 142, Higher Bridge-street, Little Bolton), in the borough of Bolton. Rated for house 4, Knight-street, Little Bolton, in the borough of Bolton in the county of Lancaster.

At the revision it was objected that the notice was bad inasmuch as it did not state the nature of the property rated as described in the burgess list, which was "warehouse." The mayor and assessors being of opinion that this objection was valid and the notice of objection bad, retained the name of the party objected to, as also the names of the other parties with reference to whom there were similar notices.

The form No. 3 in Schedule D of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, is as follows:

No. 3.—Notice of Objection.

To the town clerk of the borough of [or to the person objected to, as the case may be].

I hereby give you notice that I object to the name of Thomas Bates, of Brook's Farm, in the parish of [describe the person objected to, as described in the burgess list] being retained on the burgess list of the borough of .

Dated, &c.

By sect. 15 the overseers are to make out a burgess list according to the form No. 1 D, and to deliver the same to the town clerk, which he is to have printed and published—and according to such form there are three columns: 1. For the name of the burgess; 2. The nature of the property rated; 3. The street, lane, or other place in the parish, where the property is situated, for which the burgess is rated. The town clerk also is to make out and publish a list of all persons objected to, according to No. 5 in Schedule D, which form has four columns; 1. Name of the person objected to; 2. Nature of the property for which he is now rated; 3. Situation of the property for which he is said to be now rated in the overseers' list; 4. Parish in which is the property for which he is now said to be rated in the overseers' list.

Holkar, Q.C. and J. Edwards showed cause.—The objection is that the voters in these cases were not duly described. The description of the qualifying property ought to be inserted in the notice of objection. [Cockburn, C. J.—The property is not required to be described, but only the person. Mellor, J.—It is only necessary to identify the burgess.] The form in schedule D says, "describe the person objected to as described in the burgess list." [Mellor, J.—The statute makes the most signal difference in the two parties. As regards the objector, he must describe the property for which he is rated; but as regards the party objected to he must merely be described as in the burgess list.] The mayor and assessors have decided the question which was properly for their consideration, and they have not declined jurisdiction. [Blackburn, J.—If you think that is an answer, you can make it upon a return to the writ. Cockburn, C. J.—The mayor and assessors have required a condition precedent to be observed which the Legislature does not require. Lush, J.—It is their duty to decide upon the facts; but if this court finds that a valid notice has been given, to which the mayor and assessors will give no effect, it is a case for its interference.] This court, however, will exercise its discretion, and will not grant the writ where manifest inconvenience, as in this case, will result. All difficulty will be cured at the next revision in November.

Manisty, Q. C., and Watkin Williams, were not called on.

Cockburn, C. J.—I am of opinion that the mayor and assessors in each case were clearly wrong. The notice of objection required by the statute only need contain the description of the burgess objected to, and not a description of the property, whilst as regards the objector it is necessary that his qualifying property should be described. The Legislature requires a description of the property in the one case, and not in the other. Each notice of objection, therefore, was good according to the provisions of the statute. The question then arises, whether or not the decision of the mayor and assessors is final? I think that it is not. I am of opinion that they imposed a condition upon the objectors not warranted by law, and that in refusing to act upon the objections they in fact declined to exercise jurisdiction. I do not at all mean to say that if a question of fact had arisen, and they had decided upon it, their jugdment would not have been final, but where as in these cases the whole question turns upon a view of the notice itself, I think their conduct amounts to a declining of jurisdiction. The only other question then is as to our discretion in awarding the mandamus. It is said that as it will be inconvenient to hold another revision, we ought not to grant the writ; and I admit that if the question only went to the dealing with a very few voters, it might not be worth while to disturb the present state of things. But that is not so here, for we find that a very large number of burgesses have been objected to, and the result may very seriously affect the burgess roll, so much so probably as upon an election actually to turn the scale. The writ therefore ought to go.

Blackburn, J.—I am of the same opinion. Both cases stand upon the same footing. The 17th section requires a burgess objecting to another to give a certain notice, and then by a subsequent section the mayor and assessors are to entertain the objection. They had, therefore, a duty to see that the notice was a proper one. But what they have done is this—the notice being in the precise form directed by the statute, they have taken it into their heads to require something more, and, therefore, refused to act upon it. Now, was that a declining of jurisdiction? I think that it was. If an inferior jurisdiction refuses to hear when it should hear, this court interferes to compel it to do so. Then as to our discretion not to grant this suit. If, indeed, this were a matter of very little consequence it might, perhaps, be better not to disturb the boroughs, but considering the number of persons to be affected, I think that the writ should go.

Mellor, J.—I am also of the same opinion. What the mayor and assessors have really done is to impose a condition which the statute does not require, and so they have prevented an inquiry upon which they ought to have entered. They have, in fact, declined jurisdiction.

Lush, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

Rules absolute.

Reg. v. Mayor of Monmouth—Attorney for the Crown, John S. Williams, Monmouth.

Reg. v. The Mayor of Bolton—Attorney for the defendants, Hinnell, town clerk, Bolton.

Monday, Jan. 31.

Ex parte Isabella Cole.

Imprisonment—Costs of an appeal at quarter sessions—32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 4.

By the Debtors' Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62) it is by sect. 4 enacted that "with the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, no person shall after the commencement of this Act be arrested or imprisoned for making default in payment of a sum of money," and then follow certain exceptions, one of which is, "Default in payment of any sum recoverable summarily before a justice or justices of the peace:"

Held, that costs of an appeal ordered by the quarter sessions are within this exception.

Where, therefore, upon an appeal against an order of affiliation the quarter sessions quashed the order with costs, and the respondent was afterwards committed to prison for two months in default of payment of such costs:

Held, that she was lawfully committed.

This was a rule calling upon the Rev. George Henry Pratt to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue to bring up one Isabella Cole, now a prisoner, and why, in the event of the rule being made absolute, she should not be discharged from custody without being actually brought up.

It appeared that the applicant, Isabella Cole, had obtained an order of affiliation against the Rev. George Henry Pratt, against which he appealed to the quarter sessions, and that upon the hearing the order was quashed with costs, and that subsequently in due form she was apprehended under a warrant of a justice and committed to prison for the period of two months in default of payment of such costs.

By the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, sect. 4, a power of appeal is given against an order of affiliation, "and the justices in such quarter sessions assembled . . . shall thereupon hear and determine such appeal, and shall order such costs to be paid by either party as to them or him may seem fit."

By the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 5 (commonly called Bains's Act) it is enacted—

That upon any appeal to any court of general or quarter sessions of the peace, the court before whom the same shall be brought, may, if it think fit, order and direct the party or parties against whom the same shall be directed, to pay to the other party or parties such costs and charges as may to such court appear just and reasonable, such costs to be recoverable in the manner provided for the recovery of costs upon an appeal against an order or conviction by an Act passed in the twelfth year of Her Majesty's reign, intituled, "An Act to facilitate the performance of the duties of justices of the peace out of sessions within England and Wales with respect to summary convictions and orders."

By the statute last referred to (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 27), it is enacted that—

If upon any such appeal the court of quarter sessions shall order either party to pay costs, such order shall direct such costs to be paid to the clerk of the peace of such court, to be by him paid over to the party entitled to the same, and shall state within what time such costs shall be paid; and if the same shall not be paid within the time so limited, and the party ordered to pay the same shall not be bound by any recognisance conditioned to pay such costs, such clerk of the peace, or his deputy, upon application of the party entitled to such costs, or of any person on his behalf, and on payment of a fee of 1s. shall grant to the party so applying a certificate that such costs have not been paid; and upon production of such certificate to any justice or justices of the peace for the same county, riding, division, liberty, city, borough, or place, it shall be lawful for him or them to enforce the payment of such costs by warrant of distress in manner aforesaid, and in default of distress he or they may commit the party against whom such warrant shall have issued in manner hereinbefore mentioned for any time not exceeding three calendar months, unless the amount of such costs and all costs and charges of distress, and also the costs of the commitment and conveying of the said party to prison, if such justice or justices shall think fit so to order (the amount thereof being ascertained and stated in such commitment) shall be sooner paid.

By the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62 (The Debtors' Act, 1869) it is (sect. 4) enacted, that—

With the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, no person shall, after the commencement of this Act, be arrested or imprisoned for making default in payment of a sum of money. There shall be excepted from the operation of the above enactment:—(1) Default in payment of a penalty, or sum of money in the nature of a penalty other than a penalty, in respect of any contract. (2) Default in payment of any sum recoverable summarily before a justice or justices of the peace, &c., &c.

The proceedings taken against the applicant were in conformity with the foregoing enactments.

Seymour, Q. C., and Hopwood showed cause.—The question is whether an order of quarter sessions for the costs of an appeal comes within the operation of the second exception in sect. 4 of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62? Can it be said that a person who is so ordered to pay costs is a debtor in any sense? The Act was passed to relieve debtors from imprisonment, and not those who are not in that relation. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Can it be said that the issuing of a warrant upon a judgment of the quarter sessions is a recovering of the amount?] It would seem to be so; both the words recoverable and recovery are mentioned in the 5th section of Bains's Act, and that section points out the mode of recovery, namely, by the course enacted by the 27th section of Jervis's Act. So that the issuing of the warrant by the justice would seem to be intended by the Legislature, as the process by which the costs are recovered. The recent Act has reference to debts in the popular understanding of the term. This is not a debt in any sense. The Legislature was certainly not legislating for the quarter sessions, nor would it be reasonable that they should have been, for there was no grievance, since, under Jervis's Act, the justice could imprison for any time not exceeding three months, so that he may have given the imprisonment for only a single day if he had chosen. The committing to prison is in the nature of a penalty, and certainly the amount is recovered summarily. The meaning of recovering a thing is the obtaining of it.

J. W. Mellor and Lumley contra.—It has been assumed on the other side that this is a criminal proceeding, which it is not. The 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, being an Act in favour of the liberty of the subject should be construed liberally. The words "recoverable summarily" must be taken to refer to that numerous class of cases in which justices have a summary jurisdiction to hear and determine, and where the party is summoned to show cause. The costs in the present case were not recovered before a justice, but were leviable by his warrant; they had already been recovered by the judgment of the quarter sessions, just as costs in an action in a Superior Court are recovered by the judgment. There is no doubt some difficulty in giving to the word "recoverable" a perfectly satisfactory interpretation, but, as used in connection with proceedings before justices, it should be taken to mean those summary proceedings so well known in which a party is summoned to show cause why he should not be convicted, or why some order should not be made upon him. The words "summary recovery" are terms of art, and mean an adjudication by justices.

COCKBURN, C. J.—Everything has been advanced that well could be, but it fails to remove the view that I have adopted that this case does fall within the second sub-division of the section. It must be admitted, certainly, that costs are within the terms of the first section, otherwise costs of a defendant, who has obtained a judgment in a Superior Court, would not be within the statute. The question therefore, is, whether or not these costs are within the exception? I think they are; and I must say I should have been surprised if, in an Act of Parliament for abolishing imprisonment for debt, where there are numerous exceptions, this particular case should not have been mentioned in express terms if so intended. We should therefore look to see what has been the language of the Legislature in other Acts of Parliament. Now, in both the former Acts—Bains's Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45), and Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43)—where costs are given by the quarter sessions, they are spoken of in the terms as being "recoverable," as in the present case. Mr. Lumley argues that "summary manner" does not refer to such a case as this, but to that kind of procedure before justices in which they act judicially, as where an information is laid, and a summons issues; but I think that the statute was intended to include all cases where the matter was to be done before a justice, whether or not in the first instance, judicially or ministerially. I think, therefore, that these costs were intended to be exempted from the general enactment, and that the rule must be discharged.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case the party was committed to prison under perfectly regular process, unless the recent Act renders it otherwise. The 4th section says, "with the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, no person shall, after the commencement of this Act, be arrested or imprisoned for making default in payment of a sum of money." Then there are certain exceptions, and the question is, whether this case falls within the second exception? Now Mr. Lumley argues that the language of this exception applies only to ordinary summary convictions, but it often occurs that sums of money are recoverable summarily before justices when there has been no hearing of an information, such as granting a warrant for the recovery of a poor rate, or other rates, or as in the present case where costs are given by the sessions. We must certainly take it that the Legislature was aware that the justices had power to imprison in such cases. Now bearing this in remembrance, the Legislature may have intended not to include in the exceptions those cases where the imprisonment is upon the process of a justice of the peace, and that it might be well to leave that matter for the present as it is. It would, indeed, be remarkable that if upon a summary conviction a party could be committed for the costs, the exception would not apply where there is an appeal against the conviction to the quarter sessions. But when we see how costs at quarter sessions are recovered, and then refer to the two former Acts, we find the very words "recovered" and "recoverable," and the mode indicated by those Acts of obtaining the costs is the mode adopted in the present case. We may, therefore, fairly say that the Legislature, when making an exception as to the power of imprisonment, by using similar words intend them to be understood in the same sense.

LUSH, J.—I am also of the same opinion. I think this case is taken out of the Act by the second branch of the exceptions in the 4th section. The enactment is in these terms: "With the exceptions hereinafter mentioned no person shall, after the commencement of this Act, be arrested or imprisoned for making default in payment of a sum of money." These words were obviously advisedly used instead of the word "debt," to meet cases which could not be properly considered as "debts," such as the costs of a defendant or of a nonsuit. The words, indeed, embrace all cases in which a ca. sa. might be issued. Well, then, the words apply to all cases of costs with the exceptions pointed out in the 4th section. Now, the second exception excepts "default in payment of any sum recoverable summarily before a justice or justices of the peace." Then, were the costs in the present case recoverable before a justice of the peace? They were ordered by the court of quarter sessions, and the authority of the justice to grant his warrant is based on the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 5, which gives the quarter sessions power to give costs upon all appeals to be recoverable in the manner provided for the recovery of costs upon an appeal against an order or conviction as pointed out by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 27. Now Bains's Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45) s. 5, uses the very same word "recoverable," as we find in the second exception. Is there then any reason why we should give a more limited meaning? It is said that the words in the second exception apply only to cases where there is a summary hearing. But if so, this anomaly would arise, that if there were no appeal the party might be committed for the costs; but that if he appealed and costs were awarded against him, he could not be committed for them. I think there is no ground whatever for such a distinction. Indeed, this is not a matter within the mischief intended to be remedied by the Act, which was intended to apply to imprisonments which might operate for a lengthened period. The words in the second exception are large enough to embrace the construction contended for, and I think they apply.

Rule discharged.

Attorneys for appellant, Brooksbank and Galland, for Sharpley, Louth.

Attorneys for respondent, Woodrooffe and Plaskitt, for Tweed, Lincoln.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by M. W. MCKELLAR, and H. H. HOCKING, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, Jan. 26.

SINCLAIR v. GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Costs—Arbitration—Fees to counsel—Fees to arbitrator.

There is no inflexible rule in this court by which an arbitrator is bound in taxation of costs to refuse to allow for two counsel on a reference. Hawkins v. Rigby, 8 C. B., N. S., 271, commented on.

There is no particular scale of fees payable to Queen's counsel when acting as arbitrators.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of 40,000*l.*, alleged to be due from the defendants to the plaintiff, on account of several distinct causes of action. The case came on for trial before Bovill, C. J., when it was, by consent of the parties, referred. The arbitrator agreed on by the parties was one of Her Majesty's counsel. The reference before him lasted twenty-four days. It was conducted by two counsel (a Queen's counsel and a junior) on either side, the defendants having, moreover, the assistance of a shorthand writer. In the end the arbitrator made an award in favour of the plaintiff, awarding him the sum of 28,000*l.*, with costs. On taxation of the plaintiff's costs, the master refused to allow costs for two counsel, and allowed only for a junior counsel. For the arbitrator, he allowed at the rate of ten guineas a day, adding an extra 100 guineas on account of the alleged difficulty and intricacy of the case.

Sir Geo. Honyman, Q. C. obtained a rule nisi calling on the defendants to show cause why the master should not review his taxation in respect of the number of counsel engaged on the reference, the fees paid to the Queen's counsel engaged, and the fees paid to the Queen's counsel engaged as arbitrator.

Keane, Q. C. showed cause.—It is the rule that only one counsel should be allowed for on a reference. An inflexible rule was laid down to that effect in Hawkins v. Rigby, 8 C. B., N. S., 271, where, although it was conceded that, if ever there was a case requiring two counsel, that was one, only one counsel was allowed for. As for the arbitrator's fee, there is no recognised scale of fee to be paid to a Queen's counsel. The fee is in the discretion of the master. The master has in this case exercised his discretion in allowing the extra sum of 100 guineas.

Sir George Honyman, Q. C. (Watkin Williams with him).—From the nature of this case two counsel were absolutely necessary. It was a case of much more than usual intricacy and difficulty, and the defendants charged fraud against the plaintiff. Hawkins v. Rigby (ubi sup.) does not lay it down as an inflexible rule that only one counsel is to be allowed for. [M. SMITH, J.—Keating, J., who was then at the Bar, and who was arbitrator in that case, reported that if ever two counsel were needed they were there. It does seem as though the court laid down an inflexible rule.] There is no such rule in the Queen's Bench. The master in this case seems to have thought himself precluded by the decision in that case from entering into the question and from exercising his discretion. He cited

Marshall on Costs, p. 434;
Sharp v. Ashby, 12 M, & W. 732;
Lockstone v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, 12 C. B., N. S., 243; Croomes v. Gore, 1 H. & N. 14.

in the latter case the master had refused to allow for a shorthand writer, and the court, in refusing a rule to review his taxation on this point, asked why a second counsel had not been employed instead of a shorthand writer. As to the arbitrator's fee, the master has refused to recognise that the arbitrator was a Queen's counsel. He has allowed him only the same fee as he would have allowed to a junior counsel. He has allowed, it is true, an extra 100 guineas, but that is only for the extraordinary difficulty and intricacy of the case. If the master exercised his discretion in this matter, there is an end of it; but if he thought himself precluded from considering the fact, that the arbitrator was a Queen's counsel, then he was wrong, and the case ought to be sent back to him. As to the third point, if the master is to allow for two counsel, he must exercise his discretion in allowing costs for one of them as for a Queen's counsel.

Digitized by Google

BOVILL, C. J.—As to the arbitrator's fee, I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. The fee given to the arbitrator was 553*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* The master taxed off 213*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*, leaving the sum of 340*l.* as the fee to be allowed. The charge was made in one sum. The master has inquired into the matter, and has been guided by the general scale of costs acted on by the taxing masters of the Superior Courts. That scale is not an immutable one. It is competent for the master, if he see fit, to increase it in any individual case, and here the master has allowed an additional 100 guineas. He has made this addition after a consideration of all the circumstances; he has used his discretion, and under such circumstances the court will not interfere, unless satisfied that the master has acted under a wrong impression, or has been manifestly incorrect in his estimate. It is said, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the master, in allowing the arbitrator's fees, has allowed as for a junior counsel only, whereas, as both parties concurred in the appointment of an eminent Queen's counsel as arbitrator, the master ought to have allowed as for a Queen's counsel. The plain answer to that is, that the scale of fees to be allowed to arbitrators does not vary according to the rank of the arbitrator at the bar. The fee to be allowed is in the discretion of the master. There is no inflexible scale of fees. The ordinary scale is shown to be capable of being raised in a special instance, by the fact of an addition being made in this case. The gentleman applied to to act as arbitrator may decline to accept the ordinary fee, or he may consent to act on such higher remuneration as the parties may agree to. In this case, however, the master has exercised his discretion; and as it is not made manifest that he has improperly exercised it, the court will not interfere. As to the other question, as to whether the master was right in refusing to allow for a second counsel, it is plain that the master has so refused on the assumption that the case of Hawkins v. Rigby (ubi sup.) laid it down as an inflexible rule that in no arbitration would a second counsel be allowed for. But in that case, although the court refused to interfere, it laid down no inflexible rule upon the subject. It is clear that there is no rule forbidding an allowance for a Queen's counsel. It has been so laid down in two cases in the Exchequer; in Lockstone v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company (ubi sup.) and in Hawkins v. Rigby (ubi sup.) in this court. In Croomes v. Gore, 1 H. & N. 14, the question was whether, in an arbitration, the costs of a shorthand writer might be allowed. The necessity of notes was insisted on, when the court distinctly said that if notes were needed a second counsel should have been employed. After those cases and the decision in Hawkins v. Rigby (ubi sup.) that there was no inflexible rule upon the subject, it is clear that there are some cases in which the allowance may be made. This case came before me at Nisi Prius, and I should say that the employment of two counsel was quite proper under the circumstances, and I am not surprised to hear that the company employed two counsel beside a shorthand writer. It was reasonable to have two counsel in such a case, and the costs of two ought to be allowed. The number of years over which the transactions between the parties extended, the nature of the investigation, the questions of fact, and the points of law to be considered, all show that two counsel were necessary, and if the master has acted on the assumption that he had no power to allow costs for more than one, the question must go back to him. In actions at Nisi Prius for goods sold and delivered, or of assault, and in motions in court, two counsel are allowed, and as matters progress, everything is done upon a larger scale. Our decision does not interfere with the ordinary rule, that, in most cases of arbitration, only one counsel is to be allowed. But in cases of extraordinary difficulty and complexity, where two counsel are engaged on each side, the court ought not to refuse an allowance for two counsel. The question must be left to the discretion of the master. After what I have said, I do not think it necessary to enter upon the other point as to the employment of a Queen's counsel.

BYLES, J.—I entirely agree with the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice. Having been a party to the decision of the court in the case of Hawkins v. Rigby (ubi. sup.), I think that it ought to be understood that that case laid down no inflexible rule upon this subject. My brother Smith who was counsel in that case, began his argument by saying that there was no inflexible rule, and none of the judges dissented from that proposition. That no inflexible rule was laid down in that case appears even from the marginal note to the report. The refusal of the master to allow for more than one counsel in the present case proceeded on the assumption that Hawkins v. Rigby did lay down an inflexible rule on the subject. That assumption, however, was wrong. Such a rule might be productive of great inconvenience. I think that this case must be sent back to the master for him to reconsider his decision on this question.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the case must be sent back to the master as to the disallowance of the costs of a Queen's counsel. It is agreed on all hands that there is no inflexible rule on this subject. If there had been such a rule, I should have said it was high time that it was repealed. The master has put a construction on the decision of this court in Hawkins v. Rigby, which I must say I think it may possibly bear, as the court there refused to interfere with the discretion of the master, although the case was said to be one in which two counsel were required, if ever they were. After that decision, then, I think the master might very well suppose that the court had laid down something like a rule upon the subject. In these large cases, the parties might very well like to engage the services of a man, who from his eminence might in the course of a long inquiry, be raised to the bench. If, however, they were only to have one counsel, it might be dangerous for them to engage such a man. I entirely agree that, in ordinary cases of arbitration, one counsel is sufficient. But in cases of great length and perplexity, two may be absolutely necessary. These cases have very much increased, both in number and importance, since the decision in Hawkins v. Rigby (ubi sup.). Many cases are compulsorily referred. A trial before an arbitrator is one of great importance often involving not only very complicated questions of fact, but very important questions of law and equity. I think, then, that it is right that the arbitrator should have every assistance that he can have from counsel. It seems to me, then, that there is every reason for the employment of two counsel. At the same time, however, I think that, in ordinary cases of no particular difficulty or perplexity, two counsel ought not to be allowed, though the inquiry may be a long one. The master must in each case exercise his discretion; and when he has done that the court will be loth to interfere. As to the question about the arbitrator's fee, I quite agree with what has fallen from the Lord Chief Justice. The master has used his discretion. He has allowed what is usual for an arbitrator, and he has, in the exercise of his discretion, allowed an extra 100*l.* In the scale of fees to be allowed to arbitrators, there is no distinction between Queen's counsel and junior counsel. The arbitrator knows the usual scale, and if there appears to have been extraordinary difficulty he allows something extra. If there are any reasons for submitting a question to an arbitrator, who from his eminence may be entitled to more than the usual fee, an arrangement should be made between the parties beforehand. With regard to the question as to the allowance for one of the two counsel as for a Queen's counsel, I quite agree with the Lord Chief Justice.

Digitized by Google

BRETT, J.—As to the fee to be allowed for the arbitrator, I quite agree with the rest of the court that this rule must be discharged, on the ground that the master has exercised his discretion in the matter, and if he has refused to draw any distinction between the fee to be allowed to a Queen's counsel and that to be allowed to a junior counsel, when sitting as arbitrator, I think he has only followed the usual practice of the court, and that he has acted rightly. As to the question whether the master was right in refusing to allow for a second counsel, I think that this rule must be made absolute. The master has acted on the assumption that Hawkins v. Rigby (ubi sup.) laid down as an inflexible rule, that in all arbitration cases the cost of one counsel only is to be allowed. He has accordingly allowed for one, and has allowed for that one as for a junior counsel only. It is contended on behalf of the defendants, that the rule as to one counsel is really inflexible; secondly, that as one of the counsel did not attend all day every day, only one was necessary; and, thirdly, that this was a case of only ordinary difficulty. As to the first point, I am of opinion that Hawkins v. Rigby (ubi sup.) did not lay down any inflexible rule upon the subject. If it had done so, I should have thought that, as the practice of referring questions to arbitration was so much increased, the time had arrived for altering the rule. As to the second point, I think that no such allegation ought to have been made, and that the court ought not to listen to any such assertion. As to the last point, I think, having regard to the sum claimed, to the nature of the inquiry, and to the fact that the company charged fraud against the plaintiff, it would have been a want of ordinary prudence on the part of the plaintiff if he had not availed himself of the services of two counsel. If, under such circumstances, he is not allowed the costs of two counsel, I think great injustice will be done. As to the further question, as to allowing for one counsel as for a Queen's counsel, I agree with the rest of the court.

Rule accordingly.

Attorneys for the plaintiffs, Thomas and Hollams.

Attorney for the defendant, W. H. Shaw.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Jan. 21 and 22.

NICKLING v. HEAPS AND OTHERS.

Goods obtained by false pretences—Subsequent sale of—Seizure of by original owners in hands of vendee—Trover—Conviction of felon—Effect of on property in goods—Relation back to original fraud—7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 57—Damages.

Goods were obtained from the defendants by A. by false pretences, and were afterwards sold by him to the plaintiff, from whose possession they were subsequently retaken and removed by the defendants; and in trover against the defendants, for such seizure and conversion, the plaintiff recovered a verdict for 145l., the value of the goods. At the time the action was brought and tried, the plaintiff was aware that A. was in custody awaiting his trial for the above offence, and A. was, in fact, tried and convicted thereof on the day after the plaintiff had recovered the aforesaid verdict. Upon a rule for a new trial, on the ground that the jury should have been directed to take into consideration the probability of A.'s conviction for false pretences, and that the damages were excessive, it was Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B. and Martin, B.), that, by the effect and operation of sect. 57 of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, upon the conviction of A. there was relation back to the time of the fraud committed by him upon the defendants, and that the goods remained the property of the defendants from the first, the property therein never having been out of them, and that what they did was simply to retake possession of their own property; and the court made the rule for a new trial absolute, subject to the plaintiff's assenting to a stay of proceedings upon payment of the costs of the action and of the rule, with 40s. damages.

Scattergood v. Sylvester, 15 Q. B. 506; 19 L. J. 447, Q. B., considered and approved.

This was an action of trover. The first count of the declaration was for certain goods, that is to say, household furniture of the plaintiff, seized and taken by the defendants, and carried away by them and converted and disposed of to their own use. The second count charged that the plaintiff was the owner of certain goods let to hire to one T. J. Wood, who had the possession thereof under such letting to hire, the reversionary property and interest in the said goods then belonging to the plaintiff, and the defendants injured the plaintiff's reversionary property and interest in the said goods by wrongfully carrying away and converting the same to their own use, whereby the same goods became and were dispersed and wholly lost to the plaintiff.

Pleas. 1. To the first and second counts not guilty. 2. Denial of property of the goods in the plaintiff. 3. That the said reversionarry interest in the said goods did not belong to the plaintiff. Upon these pleas, issue was taken and joined.

At the trial before Hannen, J. and a special jury, at the last summer assizes for Manchester, it appeared that the following were the facts of the case. The plaintiff was and for some years had been in business in Manchester as a furniture broker and auctioneer, and two of the defendants, Messrs. Heaps and Harrison, were general house furnishers, also in business at Manchester, and the other defendant, Sutcliffe, was an officer of the Manchester detective police force. It appeared that the goods or furniture in question had been bought by the plaintiff of a person of the name of Ford, who was then living at a house in Clarendon-road, Manchester, and who applied to the plaintiff as a furniture broker to purchase the furniture, which was then in the house at Clarendon-road, occupied by Ford.

The plaintiff, on the 8th April 1869 saw the furniture at the house in Clarendon-road, and upon a rough estimate of it offered 100*l.* as the price for its purchase. Ford declined to accept that sum, and asked 160*l.* for it. In the course of the conversation between the plaintiff and Ford on the subject of the sale of the furniture, Ford stated to the plaintiff that he (Ford) was a sufferer in the Abergele accident on the London and North-Western Railway, and had brought an action against the company for 4000*l.* damages, and that the company had offered him 1500*l.*, but that he would not take less than 4000*l.* The reason for his parting with the furniture was alleged to be that he was going to move into the south of England, as change of air was necessary for his health. The plaintiff declined to purchase the furniture at Ford's valuation, and left, but on the following day, the 9th April, received from Ford a letter requesting him to reconsider the matter, and accordingly he went again on Friday, the 9th April, to Ford's house, and after further negotiations offered Ford 110*l.* for the furniture, which Ford refused, stating that the furniture, when new, had cost him nearly 250*l.* Subsequently to this a person named Wood, whom the plaintiff knew, and with whom he had had dealings, applied to the plaintiff to take and furnish a house on hire for him, which he (Wood) had seen at Blackpool, as he (Wood) wished to go there and keep a lodging house. The matter was discussed, and the plaintiff mentioned and described to Wood the furniture he had seen at Ford's house, which Wood said would just suit. Accordingly the plaintiff thereupon again went to Ford's house, and saw the furniture there with Wood, and after some further bargaining and negotiation, a sale of the furniture by Ford to the plaintiff at 120*l.*, except certain articles which Ford stipulated to keep back for himself, was agreed upon on Saturday the 10th April. A subagreement between the plaintiff and Wood for the sale or hire of the furniture by the plaintiff to Wood being at the same time entered into. 30*l.* was then paid by the plaintiff to Ford, and on the following Monday, the 12th, the balance of 90*l.* was paid, and the goods were taken away away by the plaintiff and removed by him in a lorry or van from Manchester to Blackpool, where they arrived on Tuesday afternoon the 13th April, and were placed in the house there which Wood had desired to take as a lodging-house. On the 15th April they were seized and taken away by the defendants under the following circumstances:—It appeared that the goods in question had originally been purchased or obtained by Ford of the defendants Heaps and Harrison, who were furniture dealers at Manchester, under representations by him as to his being a sufferer in the Abergele accident, and claiming a large sum as compensation from the railway, and their having offered him 1500*l.*, very similar to those which were made by him to the plaintiff on the resale of the furniture as aforesaid. The invoice price of the furniture to Ford was 220*l.*

The defendants Heaps and Harrison, having subsequently ascertained that there was good ground for believing that the representation made to them by Ford, of his having been a sufferer in the Abergele accident, and having had the offer of a sum of 1500*l.* made to him in settlement of his claim upon the railway company of 4000*l.* was entirely false, instituted a prosecution against him for obtaining the goods in question from them under false pretences. They also followed the goods to Blackpool, to the house to which the plaintiff had removed them, and with the aid and assistance of the third defendant, Sutcliffe, a detective police-officer, of Manchester, recovered and removed them from the plaintiff's custody as before mentioned, on the 15th April, which was the conversion complained of in the declaration. The trial of the action took place at the last Manchester Summer Assizes, on the 6th Aug., before Hannen, J., and a special jury, when, upon the above facts being proved, a verdict was found for the plaintiff for 145*l.* damages.

At the time of the trial of the action on the 6th Aug. Ford was in the gaol at Manchester awaiting his trial on the charge of obtaining the goods in question from the defendants on false pretences; and he was, on the subsequent day, the 7th Aug., tried and convicted on that charge and sentenced to a term of imprisonment. In Michaelmas Term last a rule was obtained on affidavits by Pope, Q. C., on the part of the defendants, for a rule calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict found for him should not be set aside and a new trial had on the grounds, first that the learned judge misdirected the jury in not directing them, in assessing the damages, to consider the probability of conviction for false pretences of Ford; secondly, that the verdict was against the weight of evidence; thirdly, that the damages were excessive; fourthly, on the ground of fresh evidence as disclosed in the affidavits.

The 57th section of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29 (the Act for consolidating and amending the laws in England relative to larceny and other offences connected therewith), which is the section on the construction of which the question decided in the case depended, enacts that, to encourage the prosecution of offenders, if any person guilty of any such felony or misdemeanor as aforesaid, in stealing, taking, obtaining, or converting, or in knowingly receiving any chattel, money, valuable security, or other property whatsoever, shall be indicted for any such offence, by or on behalf of the owner of the property, or his executor or administrator, and convicted thereof, in such case the property shall be restored to the owner or his representative; and the court before whom any such person shall be so convicted shall have power to award from time to time writs of restitution for the said property, or to order the restitution thereof in a summary manner.

Holker, Q. C., and R. C. Fisher, for the plaintiff, now showed cause against the above rule. At the time the action was brought and tried the plaintiff had an absolute property in the chattels in question. It is said, on the other side, that the subsequent conviction of Ford revested the property in the defendants. The question is, whether that is so to the extent of rendering the plaintiff disentitled to retain his verdict, or entitled to nominal damages only. [Pope, Q. C., contra, referred to the case of Scattergood v. Sylvester, 15 Q. B. 506, 19 L. J., N.S., 447, Q. B.] [MARTIN, B.—The Court of Queen's Bench there held that by the operation of the 57th section of the Act of Geo. 4, the property in the stolen chattel revested in the owner on conviction of the thief, and that the owner might maintain trover for it, although no order of restitution had been made.] If the defendants had waited until after Ford's conviction they would have gotten their goods again all the same, and the plaintiffs might have in the mean time sold them to Wood or any one else, and not have suffered. It is a question which of two innocent persons is to suffer, and the defendants having done a wrongful act, and taken the law into their own hands in seizing the goods before the conviction, the court will not go out of its way to cast the lot on the plaintiff rather than on the defendants. There is here no warranty of title. [MARTIN, B.—Had Ford been convicted the day before, it is clear the plaintiff would only have been entitled to nominal damages.] That is not admitted. Suppose a mortgagor in possession of goods under a covenant for quiet enjoyment until default, and a stranger and wrongdoer takes them, the measure of damages is not the mortgagor's interest in the goods, but the value. So it is in the case of carriers. Defendants here were wrongdoers. The damages should be more than nominal, as the plaintiff bought the goods fairly for the purposes of resale, and was in negotiation with Wood, and might have sold them and received the money. [MARTIN, B.—The question is, was the property ever out of the defendants?] The case of Horwood v. Smith, 2 Term Rep. 150, is an authority to show that the defendant's property vests only from conviction, and that there is no relation back. In that case, Buller, J., says, "When did the plaintiff's property begin in this case? Not till after the conviction of the felon." The question of "market overt" there referred to has nothing to do with the present case. It would be unjust to enable the defendants to anticipate the operation of the statute, on which the whole question rests, whether, at the time of the conversion, the plaintiff had a property in the goods. It is contended that he had, and that the action is maintainable. [KELLY, C.B.—You had notice of the coming trial and probable conviction of Ford, and had you sold before it took place your vendee would have had an action against you.] In Horwood v. Smith there was notice, but it was held, nevertheless, that the defendant there (the same as the plaintiff here) might keep the proceeds of the sale. Barnett v. The London and South Western Railway Company, 5 H. & N. 604; 29 L. J. 334, Ex., was also referred to.

Pope, Q.C., for the defendants, contra, was not called on to support his rule.

KELLY, C. B.—It is clear, I think, that in this case there must in any event be a new trial. The question then is, should the damages in any case be more than nominal? Looking to the equity of the case, I think there can be no doubt that we ought to give the value of the goods to the person entitled to them. Who then is that? Now, having regard to the authorities and to the statute, I am clearly of opinion that, upon the conviction of Ford for obtaining these goods by false pretences, there was a relation back to the time of the original fraud committed on the defendants, namely, the time at which Ford obtained these goods from them. These goods, therefore, were the property of the defendants from the first, and the property was in law never out of them. They, therefore, are the persons entitled, and it is to them that we ought to give the goods in question. The plaintiff, moreover, had notice at the time of the action brought, or, at all events, before the trial of it, of the coming trial of Ford for false pretences with respect to his purchase of this very furniture, and of the probability of his conviction; and so, had he sold or disposed of these goods before such trial and conviction, with such notice, his vendee would have had a good action against him. I think the rule for a new trial must be made absolute; but, treating this as an application to the equity of the court, it may be made absolute, subject to the plaintiff's consenting to a stay of proceedings on payment of the costs of the action and of this rule, and of 40*s.* damages.

MARTIN, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. What the defendants did was really in fact no more than to take their own goods. The case may be argued for ever, but that is what it comes to after all. On a more mature consideration of the section of the Act of Parliament, and the case of Scattergood v. Sylvester, in the Queen's Bench Reports, to which Mr. Pope referred us, the effect and operation of the statute, in my judgment (though I was at first inclined to take a different view of it), is that the property in these goods was never out of the defendants at all, and that therefore they only, in fact, possessed themselves of their own property.

Rule absolute for a new trial, unless the plaintiff consents to a stay of proceedings on payment of costs of the action and of this rule, with 40s. damages.

The court refused leave to the plaintiff to appeal.

Attorneys for the plaintiffs, Edwards, Layton, and Jaques, 8, Ely-place, Holborn, E.C., agents for Eltoft and Hampson, Manchester.

Attorneys for the defendants, Gregory and Rowcliffes, 1, Bedford-row, W.C., agents for A. and W. Fox, Manchester.

Friday, Jan. 28.

ANDERSON v. THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Carriers' Act—Picture—Frame—Accessory.

Framed pictures were delivered to a railway company as carriers, but no declaration was made of them under the Carriers' Act; damage was done to the pictures and also to the frames in the course of carriage:

Held, that the Carriers' Act protected the defendants from liability in respect of the damage done to the frames, as well as that done to the pictures, on the ground that the frames were merely accessory to the pictures, and so included in the term "picture" used in the Act.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the railway company for damage done to certain pictures and their frames, which had been delivered to the company for carriage upon their railway. The defendants pleaded the Carriers' Act, by which it is provided that with respect to various articles, among which are pictures, the carrier shall not be liable unless a declaration of their value has been made, and an increased charge or an engagement to pay the same be accepted. The trial took place in the Passage Court, at Liverpool, and the plaintiff's counsel then contended that though the damages to the pictures might not be recoverable, the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for the damage to the frames, picture frames not being among the articles specified in the Act. The verdict was entered for the plaintiff in respect of such damage, leave being reserved to defendants to move to enter a nonsuit.

A rule had been accordingly obtained, against which

L. Temple now showed cause.—The question is, whether a frame is necessarily so mere an accessory to a picture as to be included in the protection afforded by the Act. The point really comes to this: is a frame a part of the picture? A picture is none the less a picture because it has no frame. Many cases have been frequently referred to of mere accessories, such as hooks and eyes to a silk dress; but in those cases the principal article could not be made use of and was not complete without the accessories, but a picture is a complete picture, and may, though not so conveniently, be used without a frame. The frame by itself would clearly not be within the Act. Then what difference can it make that it has been joined to an article which is perfectly complete without it? It is contended that a frame is not so far an accessory to a picture as to come within the expression "picture" in the Act. In Tredwin v. Great Eastern Railway Company, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 308; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 701, a lace corporal, in a gilt frame covered with glass, being intended for an exhibition, was inclosed in a packing case, and sent without any declaration under the Carriers' Act by the defendants' railway and lost; it was held that as a matter of fact the gilt case was distinct from and not accessory to the lace and the packing case accessory to both or to the frame only, and that the carrier was therefore not protected from liability as respected either the gilt frame or the packing case. He also cited

Wyld v. Pickford, 8 M. & W. 443;
Bernstein v. Baxendale, 6 C. B., N. S., 251.

Quain, Q.C. and Russell, in support of the rule, were not called upon.

KELLY, C. B.—I am of opinion that in this case the defendants are within the protection of the Act, and this rule must be made absolute. The case cited from the Common Pleas Reports is altogether different. The corporal there mentioned is merely a piece of lace, which might have been packed up and sent without a frame, and the frame was quite unnecessary to its usefulness for the purpose for which it is used. Whereas a picture is generally set in a frame, and the whole is then considered as one article of merchandise. It is necessary for the protection of the picture when to be used, and I should expect when being sent about that it should be in a frame in order to prevent injury to the surface. It seems to have been the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas that if the case had contained nothing but the corporal, it would have been accessory to that alone; so here if as I suppose the frame is necessary for the protection of the picture from injury during carriage, it is a mere accessory to it as a outward case would be.

MARTIN, B.—The question appears to me to be what is the meaning which the general understanding of mankind gives to the word "picture." A picture may be said to consist of the canvas on which it is painted, the painting which really gives the value, and the frame. But all these constitute an entirety which is ordinarily meant by the word "picture." Jewellery is included in the Act; it is the constant practice to put up jewels in little cases. Of course the jewellery might be sent without them; but still I do not think in such a case the plaintiff could recover a shilling for the case without the jewel.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. A picture may be framed or unframed, but if it is sent framed you cannot treat the frame as a separate thing. The state of being framed is that in which it is most generally used.

Rule absolute.

FROST v. THE LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY COMPANY.

Costs—Taxation—Review of—Writ of inquiry—Fees to counsel.

In an action for damages caused by a railway accident, the company allowed judgment to go by default, and a writ of enquiry to assess the damages was executed in the Sheriff's Court. Upon taxation of costs, the master allowed the plaintiff fees, &c., for two counsel. Upon motion to review the taxation in this respect:

Held, that there was no inflexible rule with respect to the number of counsel to be allowed for on an inquiry to assess damages; but that it was a matter for the discretion of the master, upon consideration of the nature and circumstances of each particular case, and that the court would not interfere with the exercise of such discretion, except in cases of a very extreme and exceptional character.

This was an action against the company for damages in respect of injuries caused by a railway accident. The company allowed judgment to go by default, and an inquiry to assess the damages was held in the Sheriffs' Court before the Secondary.

Upon taxation of the costs the master allowed the plaintiff fees, &c., for two counsel at the inquiry. A rule had been obtained by the defendants for a review of taxation on the ground that only one counsel ought to have been allowed.

C. Russell now showed cause.—There is no inflexible rule that only one counsel should be allowed on an inquiry before the sheriff. It is a matter in general for the discretion of the master, and the court will not interfere with the exercise of that discretion except in extreme cases. He cited

Hawkins v. Rigby, 8 C. B., N. S., 271; 2 L. T. Rep N. S. 243.

Lopes supported the rule.—It must be admitted that there is no rigid rule that one counsel only is to be allowed, but still it is a guiding rule only to be departed from in cases of an exceptional character. There was nothing in the character of the present case to warrant a departure from it. He cited

Dax on Costs, 160.

KELLY, C. B.—It was certainly at first suggested that there is an absolute rule against the allowance of two counsel on the execution of a writ of inquiry. No direct authority was cited for this proposition; all that was put forward to support it was a sentence or two in a book, no doubt of utility, but not in any way of authority. I observed that it was surely impossible, in modern times, that any of the courts should hold that in no case, of whatever importance or magnitude, could more than one counsel be allowed, and the proposition was virtually abandoned. It was, however, contended that the general rule was that one counsel only was allowed for, except in cases of exceptional importance. The answer made to this objection was, that there was a most extensive discretion vested in the master as to questions of amount, and that the court ought not to enter into the question whether that discretion had been properly exercised in the particular case. I am clearly of opinion that we ought not to interfere with the exercise of that discretion unless we are perfectly satisfied that the master has committed some great and substantial error of principle, which it is our duty to rectify. I hold, therefore, that it is open to us to review the master's taxation with reference to such questions, but such a course ought only to be pursued in very extraordinary and glaring cases. Let us look then at this case: It arose out of a railway accident, and the claim was for damages arising out of such accident. Is there anything necessarily improper in the allowance of two counsel in such a case? On looking at the questions which may arise on the inquiry in such a case the contrary will appear. The plaintiff has to show injuries received actually resulting from the accident, and the amount of damage resulting therefrom. It is obvious that the question may, and often does, arise, whether the case submitted is a real and bona fide claim, or whether the extent of injury and suffering alleged is or is not a pretence and fictitious. That involves a question of character. Again, it is often necessary to call medical witnesses and discuss questions of medical science of a doubtful and difficult nature. In such cases, the advantage and even necessity of two counsel is obvious. It is essential that notes should be taken of the evidence, it is often highly material that the exact words of the witness should be taken down. In many such cases no attorney would do justice to his client who only instructed one counsel. In addition to those considerations, I cannot help making a further observation. It is a matter of constant experience that in such cases railway companies retain at least two counsel. If they think that they would not be doing duty to their shareholders without employing two or more counsel, it hardly lies, I think, in their mouths under these circumstances, to say that it is unnecessary for their opponents to do so. It is obviously a great advantage to employ two counsel, for it enables the company to retain counsel of eminence who probably would not accept a retainer if not provided with a junior. I do not think the company can complain if the plaintiff shows a desire that both sides should be equally matched in this respect. Of course I do not mean to say that all cases are alike in this respect, or that there is never extravagance in the matter of fees paid to counsel. The masters ought to exercise their discretion in preventing unnecessary expenses of this sort, but we ought not to interfere with their discretion, except in extreme cases, and without much stronger grounds than are shown here.

Digitized by Google

Martin and Pigott, BB. concurred.

Rule discharged.

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Reported by John Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Jan. 22 and 29.

(Before Cockburn, C. J., Byles and Keating, JJ., and Pigott and Cleasby, BB.)

Reg. v. Stainer.

Trades union—Embezzlement of funds by its officers—32 & 33 Vict. c. 61, s. 44.

An unregistered friendly society or trades union may prosecute its servants for embezzlement of its property, though some of its rules may be void as being in restraint of trade, and contrary to public policy.

Rules in a trades society or union imposing fines upon members for working beyond certain hours, or for applying for work at a firm where there is no vacancy, or for taking a person into a shop to learn weaving where no vacant loom exists, though void as being in restraint of trade, do not render the society criminally responsible.

Case reserved by the Chairman of the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions for the opinion of this Court:—

At the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions, held on the 3rd Jan. 1870, a prisoner named James Stainer was tried before me on a charge of embezzling certain moneys received by him on account of the society known as "The Power Loom Carpet Weavers' Mutual Defence and Provident Association of Kidderminster and Stourport."

This society was established many years ago under rules, of which a copy accompanies and is to be taken as a part of this case.

In March 1868 these rules were revised, and such revised rules, of which a copy also accompanies and is to be taken as part of this case, have ever since been, and are now, in force and define the object and the constitution of the society, and the duties of its several officers.

Neither the original nor the revised rules were enrolled or certified under the Friendly Societies' Acts.

Some time before the revision of the rules the prisoner became a member of the society, and was duly appointed what was called a local secretary, to keep the accounts and collect the contributions of members of the society employed at the works of Messrs. Dixon and Co. of Kidderminster, and after such revision he continued to be a member of the society and to act under the 18th of the revised rules, as such local secretary, until the embezzlement charged against him was discovered towards the end of Oct. 1869, and it was in respect of moneys received by him, as such local secretary, in September and the early part of Oct. 1869, that the charge of embezzlement arose.

It was proved by Robert Gillam, the general secretary of the society, who was called on the part of the prosecution, that the 34th and 35th of the revised rules had never been acted upon, that the 37th of the revised rules had been acted upon with respect to the clearance card therein mentioned, but not otherwise, and that the 36th of the revised rules had never been acted upon, except that two members, named respectively Thomas Painter and John Brasford, who worked at the said Messrs. Dixon's, and who had each, at different times, taken a son into their working shed to learn weaving contrary to the provisions of the said 36th rule, were told that they would have to pay the fine mentioned in the rule, and both left the society to avoid such payment.

It was also proved by the said Robert Gillam, that, prior to the revision of the rules, the society had occasionally contributed towards the support of men out on strike, and that the last of such occasions was at Christmas 1866, when a sum of 90*l.* was given to men out on strike at Stourport, and that on one occasion, since the revision of the rules, viz., on the 13th May 1868, a sum of 5*l.* per week was voted to some ironmakers and chainmakers who were out on strike. The following entry relating to the last-mentioned vote appears in the minute book of the society.

At a delegate meeting held at the Vine Inn, on Wednesday, May 13, 1868, the following resolution was unanimously passed—"Proposed by Joseph Arnold, seconded by James Inston, that the ironmakers and chainmakers have the sum of 5*l.* per week granted to them from the funds so long as they are out, to be equally divided between them."

Except as above mentioned no evidence was given at the trial of any application of the funds of the society towards the support of men on strike, or for any illegal purpose.

There are between 500 and 600 members of the society, and their funds at the present time exceed 2000*l.*, invested in the savings bank in the names of several sets of trustees appointed for that purpose.

At the close of the case for the prosecution, Mr. Streeten and Mr. Jelf, on behalf of the prisoner, objected that the society was proved to have been established, in part at least, for an illegal object, and that I ought on that ground to direct the prisoner to be acquitted. Nos. 30, 35, 36, and 37 of the revised rules (a) were principally relied upon as showing the illegality alleged, and the following cases were cited in support of the objection: R. v. Hunt, 8 C. & P. 642; Hornby v. Close, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 153; Farrer v. Close, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 602.

I overruled the objection and refused to withdraw the case from the consideration of the jury, but I consented to reserve the point if necessary.

The trial accordingly proceeded and the jury returned a verdict of guilty, whereupon the prisoner was sentenced to one year's imprisonment with hard labour, and he is now detained in Worcester Prison in pursuance of that sentence.

The question on which I respectfully desire the opinion of the Court for the consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, is, whether I was right in overruling the objection so taken on behalf of the prisoner, or whether such objection was valid in (a.) Rule 30. The hours of work allowed by the Factory Acts shall be the recognised work hours for members of this society, and any member infringing on such hours by working overtime—that is, by working before six o'clock in the morning, after six in the evening, after two o'clock on Saturdays, or meal hours, shall be fined 2s. 6d., and shall likewise be suspended from all the privileges of membership for twelve months.

Rule 35. Any member of this association making an application for work at firms where there is no vacancy, and thereby creating that spirit crushing influence which all good men deplore, shall upon proof of the offence be fined 2s. 6d. in each and every case, such fines to be placed to the offender's arrears.

Rule 36. Any member of this society taking a person into a shop to learn the weaving where no vacant loom exists, and against the expressed wishes of his shopmates, shall be fined 2s. 6d., and shall likewise be suspended from all the privileges of membership for twelve months.

Rule 37. Should any member leave one firm to work at another, he shall get a clearance card to certify his position with respect to this society, and if he is in arrears of his contributions, levies, fines, &c., he shall pay in the same to the secretary acting for the shop wherein he has obtained employment. And any member producing a false certificate shall be fined 1s., and any secretary wilfully drawing up a false certificate shall be expelled from his office.

Digitized by Google

point of law and entitled the prisoner to be acquitted.

(Signed) R. Paul Amphlett,
Chairman of the above Court of Quarter Sessions.

Streeten (Jelf with him) for the prisoner.—The conviction was wrong. The relation of master and servant must exist to support a conviction for embezzlement. In this case the society was an illegal one, and the service in which the prisoner was engaged was consequently illegal, and the law does not therefore recognise the relation of master and servant in such a case. That such a society is illegal is shown by Hornby v. Close, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 563, and Farrer v. Close, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 801. Rule 36 of this society is much stronger and more illegal than the rules relied upon in those cases. [Cockburn, C. J.—Those cases decided that the societies there in question were only so far illegal that they could not enforce civil contracts.] It is submitted that such a society cannot have property which can be embezzled. The prisoner was a servant only under the rules of the society. Such a service is not a lawful one because the rules are not lawful. Service implies some duty which can be legally enforced, and the money received and embezzled must be money which can be recovered in a court of law. This is a society which is indictable at common law, its rules are illegal, as being against public policy, and they are also criminal in the sense of the society being a conspiracy to effect an unlawful object by illegal rules. Hornby v. Close followed the decision in Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 Ell. & Bl. 47, 66, where the court refused to enforce a bond by which a number of masters bound themselves to act according to the resolution of a majority in the employment of their workmen. In delivering the judgment of the court Crompton, J. said: "I am of opinion that the bond is void, as being against public policy. I think that combinations like that disclosed in the pleadings in this case were illegal and indictable at common law, as tending directly to impede and interfere with the free course of trade and manufacture. The precedents of indictments for combinations of two or more persons to raise wages and for other offences of this nature, which were all framed on the common law, and not under any of the statutes on the subject, sufficiently show what the common law was in this respect. In Rex v. Mawbey, 6 T. R. 619, Grose, J. assumed the illegality of such combinations as well-known law. Combinations of this nature, whether on the part of the workmen to increase, or of the masters to lower wages, were equally illegal." [Cockburn, C. J.—What authority is there for saying that where half a dozen men or more agree not to work at a factory where machinery is used, or where more than a certain number of apprentices are taken, that such a combination, although it may be in restraint of trade, is a criminal offence?] Such an agreement is contrary to public policy. In 2 Russell on Crimes, p. 442, it is laid down that a person cannot be convicted for embezzlement as a clerk or servant to a society which is illegal, as of a society where the members on admission took an unlawful oath: (Rex v. Hunt, 8 C. & P. 642.) In this case the defendant received the moneys which were to be applied in an illegal way. "The objection," says Lord Mansfield in Montefiori v. Montefiori, that a contract is immoral or illegal as between plaintiff and defendant, sounds at all times very ill in the mouth of the defendant. It is not for his sake, however, that the objection is ever allowed, but it is founded in general principles of policy, which the defendant has the advantage of, contrary to the real justice as between him and the plaintiff; by accident if I may so say. The principle of public policy is this, Ex dolo malo non oritur actio. No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or an illegal act. If, from the plaintiff's own stating or otherwise, the cause of action appears to arise ex turpi causâ, or the transgression of a positive law of this country, there the court says he has no right to be assisted. It is upon that ground the court goes, not for the sake of the defendant, but because they will not lend their aid to such a plaintiff. So, if the plaintiff and defendant were to change sides, and the defendant were to bring his action against the plaintiff, the latter would then have the advantage of it, for where both are equally in fault, potior est conditio defendentis." It is submitted the same reason applies to the offence of embezzlement, and the court will not lend its aid in the protection of funds to be applied to an illegal purpose. Any combination to do that which is an infraction of a civil right is indictable. A conspiracy for raising the prices of victuals or goods by forestalling or regrating, or to carry out a monopoly, is indictable at common law. So also is a conspiracy to force workmen to work at a particular rate of wages or for certain hours, 4 Broom & Hadley's Comm. 189, 190. Notwithstanding the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 61, these are still indictable offences.

J. O. Griffits for the prosecution.—The conviction was right. It may be that a partnership for an illegal object, such as in rule 22, cannot enforce its rights in the civil courts, but it is submitted that the society is not criminally illegal. In Rex v. Hunt every one of the members of the society was clearly indictable for the felony of taking and administering illegal oaths. The present is a case of a legal partnership having among its rules some very laudable and two or three in restraint of trade (rules 35, 36), which are therefore void. The rules which regulate the partnership are divisible, and those which are not illegal may be enforced in courts of law: (Price v. Green, 16 M. & W. 346.) Friendly societies which are not registered are nothing more than ordinary partnerships, and the secretaries and officers are the servants of the members:

Reg. v. Tongue, Bell's C. C. 289;
Reg. v. Meller, 2 Moo. C. C. 249;
Reg. v. Redford. 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 508.

In the civil courts the agent of a party to an illegal contract cannot set up the illegality to an action by the principal against him:

Tennent v. Elliott, 1 Bos. & Pul. 3;
Sharp v. Taylor, 2 Phil.

That this society is not criminal is shown by the stats. 6 Geo. 4, c. 129; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 61; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, which were passed to regulate similar societies, and are, in fact, a recognition of them. It may be that the funds of the society will never be applied to the purposes in rules 35 and 36. (He was then stopped by the court.)

Streeten in reply.—The 32 & 33 Vict. c. 61, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, have no application, because this society was not registered under the Friendly Societies Act. The rules relied on render this society criminally indictable for a conspiracy. There is a precedent of an indictment (4 Went. 100) against journeymen leather dressers for a conspiracy not to work at any shop where apprentices were taken for a less period than seven years. In the cases cited on the other side the rules were rather irregularities and not illegal in substance affecting the constitution of the society.

Cockburn, C. J.—I am of opinion that there is nothing in the circumstances of this case that affects the validity of the conviction, and that the conviction must stand. It is unnecessary to determine whether if a society be established for criminal purposes that would affect its legal title to the protection of its property, because in this society there are no rules that can be said to be of a criminal character. The principal purposes for which this society was established are lawful, but there may be one or two having reference to the employment of its members and wages which might come within the objects of a trades union according as they were carried out. According to the cases of Farrer v. Close and Hilton v. Eckersley, such rules would be illegal and void, and any contract arising on these rules would also be void as being in restraint of trade, and contrary to public policy, but the court, in those cases, carefully abstained from saying that there was any criminal illegality. And I do not think that such rules must be considered as criminal, and as affecting the society's title to its property. The late Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 61) has said that trades union societies are to have the privileges and advantages of the Friendly Societies Acts, which give a right to proceed against their officers for embezzlement of funds in a summary way before magistrates to conviction and punishment. It was urged that this statute only applies to societies registered under the Friendly Societies Act, but whether that be so or not, the statute may be regarded as an intimation of the Legislature that such societies should not be prevented from having the protection of the law against those persons who may embezzle their property. That enactment, therefore, shows that there is nothing of a criminal nature in such rules. It would be a great absurdity to say that, although such societies, when registered, could go before a magistrate and prosecute in a summary way to conviction, that they were prevented from preferring an indictment for the same offence at the assizes, yet that is what the argument for the defence comes to. I therefore think the conviction was right.

Digitized by Google

Byles, J.—I also think that the conviction was right. The objects of the rules pointed out may be unlawful in the sense of being void, as in restraint of trade and contrary to public policy, but they are not unlawful as being within the criminal law.

Keating, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only illegality relied on is to be found in two rules, which are said to be illegal and void as in restraint of trade, and which could not be enforced in a court of law. Now, is that a criminal illegality that would deprive the society of the right to have the protection of the law to prevent its funds being plundered? It seems to me that it is not. The late Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 61), if confined to registered friendly societies, contains a clear indication of the intention of the Legislature that the mere fact of societies having rules that are void as being in restraint of trade, shall not cause such societies to be deemed illegal so as to deprive them of the protection of the law in respect of their property. In the argument it was said that the society was indictable at common law, but in the absence of any authority for that position, it seems to me that it is not. There is no instance of any such indictment.

Pigott, B.—I am of the same opinion. It is said that this society cannot hold property because its rules are illegal. Now they are only illegal as being in restraint of trade, and not affecting their right to property. By the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 61, the Legislature has recognised their right to property, and provides that they may go before a magistrate and proceed summarily to conviction and punishment against persons who may have embezzled their funds.

Cleasby, B.—I am of the same opinion.

Conviction affirmed.

NISI PRIUS.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(Before Cockburn, C. J.)

Tuesday, Feb. 1.

Anderson v. The Carlisle Horse Clothing Company, Limited (a.)

Goods sold and delivered—Agreed terms of payment.

If the agreed terms of payment for goods sold be by a three months' bill, the buyer to have the option of paying cash at 2½ discount, the buyer is not bound to accept a bill for a larger amount than his debt, and even if he refuse to accept a bill correctly drawn the seller cannot sue for goods sold and delivered before the end of three months from the date of the bill drawn by him.

If, however, the agreed terms be cash, with buyer's option of a bill, the seller can sue immediately upon the buyer's refusal to accept.

This was an action for goods sold and delivered, and on accounts stated. The action was commenced on the 23rd Dec. 1869.

The plaintiffs, a firm of indiarubber manufacturers at Limehouse, had for a long time carried on business with the defendants, and up to the beginning of last September all accounts were settled between them. The balance alleged by the plaintiffs to be due to them on the 20th of that month was 46*l.*, but the defendants maintained that the plaintiffs had agreed to take back two riding-coats which had been supplied them about a year before, and paid for by the defendants. The value of these coats was 3*l.* It was admitted by both parties that they agreed the balance between their accounts on the 20th of each month should be paid either by acceptances due three months from the 1st of the following month, or by cash at 2½ per cent. discount; it was disputed, however, as to whether the regular course was to pay cash or accept bills, and of which alternative the debtor had his option. Upon this turned the question whether the defendants were bound to accept the bill for 46*l.* which the plaintiffs drew, the amount due being, as they alleged, only 43*l.* This action, which was for 46*l.*, was commenced before a three months' bill would have been due if the defendants had accepted it when the the plaintiffs sent it to them. At the time that bill would have been due, the defendants tendered 43*l.*

James, Q. C. and Murphy for the plaintiffs.

Quain, Q. C. and L. Kelly for the defendants.

It was contended for the defendants that upon the evidence the terms between the parties were, that on the first of each month the balance due on the 20th of the previous month should be paid by three months' bill, or, if the party from whom the balance was due preferred, by cash 2½ discount; that the defendants were willing to accept a bill on the 1st Oct. for the amount which they owed on the 20th of the previous month; that the bill of that date drawn by the plaintiffs was for a sum 3*l.* beyond that which the defendants owed, and the defendants therefore were not bound to accept it; and that they could not be liable to the plaintiffs before a bill properly drawn and accepted would been payable. They relied upon Mussen v. Price, 4 East. 147, in which it was held that where goods were sold upon a contract, that the vendee was to pay for them in three months by a bill of two months, the contract was for a credit of five months, and therefore that assumpsit for goods sold and delivered could not be brought at the end of three months upon the neglect of the vendee to give his bill at two months. It was further contended that the fact of the plaintiff's having claimed the full amount without deducting discount, went to show that they believed the agreement for payment to have been by bill in the first place and not by cash.

(a.) Reported by M. W. McKellar, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

For the plaintiffs it was urged that no agreement to take back the coats had been proved, that as the defendants refused to accept the bill drawn by the plaintiffs for the amount due, they were bound to pay cash on the 1st Oct.; and that the terms of settlement were cash, unless the party from whom the balance was due accepted a bill for the amount. The case of Rugg v. Weir, 16 C. B., N. S., 471, was relied upon; these goods were sold upon the terms "2½ per cent. or three months' bill," which was explained to mean cash at the expiration of the month succeeding the current month, deducting a discount of 2½ per cent.; or, at the buyer's option, a bill at three months from the same period. The buyer having refused to accept a bill at the end of the second month, it was held that the seller might at once sue him for goods sold and delivered, and was not bound to wait the additional three months.

COCKBURN, C.J., in summing up, said the first question for the jury was what arrangement had been entered into for the settlement of the balances. It was clear that the party from whom the balance was due, the buyer of the goods, might pay by cash or bill; but the question was which plan he was bound to adopt if he did not take steps to show his intention of acting upon the other. If the agreement was for a bill with the option of cash if the buyer preferred it, then the defendants were not bound to accept a bill for a larger amount than they owed; and even if the bill was drawn for the correct amount of their debt, the plaintiffs could not sue until three months had elapsed from the date of the bill which the defendants refused to accept. This is the effect of the decision in Mussen v. Price. On the other hand it was held in Rugg v. Weir—a decision, the wisdom and policy of which he fully admitted—that if the terms for payment are the other way, viz., cash with option of a bill, the buyer, if he does not accept a bill, is liable to be sued for the cash. It was entirely for the jury to say what they thought of the evidence concerning the alleged agreement to take back the coats.

The jury found the full amount claimed for the plaintiffs, and, in answer to a question put to them, said they considered the payment arranged between the parties was cash, with the option of a bill. They thought there had been no agreement to take back the two coats. Leave was reserved to the defendants to move the court to enter a verdict for them upon the ruling of the judge, and execution was stayed.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by HENRY F. PURCELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, July 7, 1869.

THE ORIENT.

Damage—Pleading—Special defence—Costs.

The plaintiffs alleged in a cause of damage that the damage was imputable solely to the defendants and their servants; this allegation was simply traversed in the answer. At the hearing it appeared that a person, acting out of the scope of his authority, was solely to blame for the damage:

Held, that this defence should have been pleaded specifically; and, while admitting the evidence and dismissing the suit, the Court refused costs to defendants.

This was a cause of damage. The plaintiffs were the owners of the brigantine Georgiana, which had suffered injuries while beached at Appledore, near Bideford, from the brig Orient, which had been moored outside her, and from which chains and hawsers were passed, from bow and stern, to the shore; thereby producing the effect that, when the tide rose, the Orient was jammed against the Georgiana, causing the latter to strain heavily, and to chafe and grind against the quay on one side and the Orient on the other, causing damage. The plaintiffs alleged in the fourth article of the petition that "the damage was imputable solely to the acts of the owners of the Orient and their servants." The defendants, in their answer, traversed the facts, and, secondly, pleaded as follows: "The cause of action in the said petition mentioned, and also the damage sought to be recovered for in this cause by the plaintiffs, are respectively the same cause of action and the same damage in respect of which the plaintiffs commenced an action in Her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas, and afterwards and before the institution of this suit obtained judgment therein, in which said judgment the said cause of action became and was merged, and which said judgment was satisfied before the commencement of this suit."

Plaintiffs in their reply admitted the action and judgment therein, but alleged that "the said action was brought for trespass and for wrongful detention of their ship, whereas the present suit is instituted for the recovery of damage inflicted upon the plaintiff's vessel Georgiana by the defendant's vessel Orient," and secondly, that "the said action instituted by the plaintiffs was not a suit in rem, and was of a different nature to, and not between the same parties as this suit."

In the course of the trial it appeared from the evidence given for defendants that the Orient, which had no master or crew on board, had been placed in the position in which she did the injury by a person who had no authority from her owners except to act as agent for the sale of the ship. On this fact appearing,

Deane, Q. C. and Cottingham, contended that on the above pleadings the defendants could not set up this defence: it should have appeared in a specific plea. The objection was, in fact, a protest, and should have been pleaded as such, and referred to

The Ida, 1 Lush. 6;
The Thetis, 38 L. J., N. S., Adm. 42.

Cohen and Bullen, for the defendants, contended that inasmuch as the averment in the petition that "the damage was imputable solely to the owners of the Orient or their servants" was traversed in the answer, that the pleadings were sufficient to raise this defence.

An amendment of the pleadings was also suggested by Cohen, but subsequently retracted as likely to affect the question of costs. The court reserved judgment until all the evidence had been concluded.

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case in which the court has no doubt whatever as to the law which is applicable to it; but it raises a point of some importance with respect to the pleadings in this court, which will induce me to make some remarks which otherwise would have been unnecessary. His Lordship then stated the pleadings, and said—In the course of the trial Mr. Yeo was called for the defendants, when it appeared that he was agent for the owners of the Orient for the purpose only of the sale and completion of the vessel—that is, the vessel had been sent from Prince Edward's Island in an incomplete state, and he was to sell it if he could unfinished, and if not, when it was finished; and he said he put the Orient into the position in which she did the damage to the Georgiana for the purpose of asserting his right to the foreshore. The counsel for the defendant also put into court a bill of sale, which showed that Mr. Yeo was an agent to sell the ship for a sum not less than 2400*l.* That was the limit and the scope of his agency. The question then arose whether this case could proceed any further, inasmuch as the act of damage really had been done by a person who, in putting the Orient in a position to cause the damage, had acted without the scope and beyond the limit of his authority altogether? and two things apppeared to me, first, that I could not refuse either to consider the evidence so taken before me, or the conclusion of law to which that evidence must lead; and, secondly, that the pleadings had not sufficiently raised the first defence intended to be relied upon at the hearing. I then suggested, or I think Mr. Cohen himself suggested, that the answer might be amended, and proposed the following amendment:—"The aforesaid damage was imputable wholly to persons who were not servants of the defendants acting at the time in the service of the defendants, and was not occasioned by any person acting in the service of the defendants." Nothing was said at that time about amending the plea upon condition that the costs were paid; nothing was said about it. When the Admiralty advocate replied, he said that he could not sustain the suit which his clients had instituted after the evidence which had been given before the court, and which shewed that the wrongdoer in this case was not the servant of the owners; and he alleged that if this had been brought to his notice in the regular and proper manner, and at an earlier period, he should have advised his clients to discontinue the suit, and the expense of hearing would not have been incurred. Mr. Cohen thereupon retracted his amendment, and contended that by the general denial he had sufficiently raised this speccific issue, the onus probandi of which was upon the plaintiffs. There can be no doubt that under the old rules it would have been necessary, not only to state this part of the case, but any other questions which were likely to arise. Those rules were, I think, very properly altered under the authority of the Privy Council. The 65th rule says: "The modes of pleading hitherto used, as well in causes by act on petition as by plea and proof, are hereby abolished," and then the 67th is: "Every pleading shall be divided into short paragraphs numbered consecutively, which shall be called the articles of the pleadings, and shall contain brief statements of the facts material to the issue." And the 76th provides: "Any petition or other pleading may be altered or amended by consent of proctors, or by permission of the judge." In the case of the Why Not, 38 L. J., N. S., Adm. 27. I laid down to a certain extent my opinion with regard to pleadings in these cases, and I said, "the rules of pleading ought to be adapted to the nature of the case which it is their object to bring before the court. They are not to be considered as constituting a game of skill between the advocates, but ought to be so framed as to assist not only the party in the statement of his case, but the court in its investigation of the truth between the litigants. And the pleadings should be such as to apprise the court, and the opponent, of the principal points upon which the party intends to rely, that neither should be taken by surprise. Of course, I cannot put myself in this case into the position of the advocate for the plaintiff; but I can say truly, that, as far as the court is concerned, it was entirely taken by surprise when it received the evidence to which I have adverted. In such a state of things, the court must not reject the evidence, but should apply it to the general averments of denial, and, if necessary, give the other party leave to answer that which is raised so generally in the petition and so specifically by the evidence, and under the special circumstances of this case, I think that defendant was not the agent of the owner for the wrong-doing which caused the collision in question, and I must therefore dismiss the defendants from further observance of justice in this case. It only remains to be considered what it is the duty of the court to do with respect to the costs. I am aware that these proceedings have in substance been already instituted before another court, and that it was quite impossible that the plaintiff could have been ignorant that Mr. Yeo, the person whose evidence was taken, was only an agent for the owners of this vessel, the Orient, for the purpose of sale, or may be of completion and then of sale. Nevertheless, I am of opinion that they ought to have had notice of that fact by the pleadings in this cause, and I think I arrive at a fair conclusion when I determine not to reject this evidence, and to dismiss this case, and leave each party to pay his own costs.

Digitized by Google

In reply to an application of Cohen, the Court declined to decide the legal question raised on the record, as the preliminary objection was fatal to the suit, and there was no need of entering upon other questions, but granted leave to Cohen to appeal if such leave were necessary.

Dec. 7 and 21, 1869.

THE SAME.

Decree—Amendment.

Any application to amend an error in a decree must be made with the utmost expedition.

Motion to alter a decree five months after it was made dismissed.

This case came again before the court on a motion by Cohen to alter the decree, which was drawn up as follows:—

"July 7th, 1869. The judge, having heard counsel on both sides, gave leave to the defendants to amend their answer if they should think fit to do so.

"Counsel for the plaintiffs then consented to the cause being dismissed, and the judge having heard counsel on both sides on the question of costs, dismissed the defendants and their bail from this cause and all further observance of justice therein, but made no order as to the costs of this cause.

"Defendants' proctors, with permission of the judge, protested of a grievance and of appealing, and instantly appealed."

The defendants had appealed from this decree, but before the appeal was heard, and on the 7th day of December, counsel on behalf of the defendants moved the court to alter the decree as follows, namely: The judge, having heard counsel on both sides, ruled that the pleadings did not raise the defence that the collision was occasioned by persons who were not servants of the defendants, but gave leave to the defendants to amend their answer if they should think fit so to do. Counsel for the defendants declined so to do, whereupon counsel for the plaintiff consented to the cause being dismissed; but counsel for the defendants prayed the judge before pronouncing judgment to hear and determine the ground of defence raised by the second article of the answer. The judge, having heard counsel, &c., refused to hear and determine the said ground of defence, and dismissed the defendants and their bail.

Cohen contended that the decree was erroneous, as the defendants did not avail themselves of the permission to amend. On the second plea there was a good defence, and the amendment therefore was unnecessary. The decree also had failed to state the judgment as to the insufficiency of the first article of the answer to raise the defence which appeared on the evidence.

Digitized by Google

Dr. Deane, Q. C. for plaintiffs.

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—In this case an application has been made to the court to alter the minute of a decree. The decree was made on the 7th July last; the application to alter it was made on the 7th of this month, December. Before I give my judgment upon the application, I will say a few words upon the general practice of the court as to the entering of decrees, and as to the particular circumstances of this case. It has been the general practice of this court to draw up, with the aid of the proper officers, its own decrees and minutes. If any circumstances of difficulty or peculiarity occur, the registrar has generally shown to the proctors of both parties the minute of the decree which he proposes to enter. He has also, when it appeared to him necessary, consulted the judge. In any case, the decree is entered within a day or two of the delivery of the judgment, and can be seen by either party whom it affects, and if either party object to the wording of the minute, and the matter is not adjusted in the registry, it is competent to either party to make application to the court upon the subject, but it is important to observe that, according to the practice of this court, any such application must be made with the utmost expedition. To borrow the language of Dr. Lushington, in the case of the Monarch, Robin. 27, "It must be an error instantly noticed, and brought to the attention of the court with the utmost possible diligence." The practice of the court of Chancery with respect to minutes has been referred to. It has been recently much discussed before the Judicature Commission, of which I am a member, and I am not disposed to alter the practice of this court by adopting that of a court of equity upon this subject. Now I will say a very few words as to the circumstances of the case before me. During the course of the trial a witness was put into the box by the defendant for the purpose, as I understood, of proving the nature of the damage inflicted by the Orient upon the Georgiana, but he also proved incidentally that he was not the agent of the owner of the Orient for the purpose of placing her in the dock, from her improper position in which the damage to the Georgiana ensued. It was obvious therefore to the court, and to the counsel for the Georgiana, that if the evidence was admissible, the suit of the Georgiana against the owners of the Orient must fail. A question arose as to whether the pleadings of the defendant sufficiently raised the defence. Upon the whole, I was of opinion that, having regard to the practice of the court (as explained in the recent case of the Why Not, Law Rep. 2 Adm. 265) the defence was not properly raised. Though, as I have said, this is a question to be decided according to the practice of this court, I may observe that this practice does not seem to be at variance with the rules of pleading at common law, as laid down in the 16th of the Regulæ Generales of Trinity Term 1853, and the examples there given: (Day's C. P. Acts, p. 432.) I, however, also thought that I ought not to reject the evidence which had actually been given, and gave leave to the defendant to amend his plea. The plea was amended; but afterwards, when it appeared that this amendment would affect the question of costs, it was withdrawn on the ground that the defendant would not have consented to amend if he had understood that to do so would affect the question of costs, and also that he could succeed upon another defence which was properly raised by his plea. Much discussion ensued upon this matter, reported not altogether accurately, but I dare say with as much accuracy as the rapidity with which the conversation was carried on, and a certain amount of confusion which prevailed at the time, would permit, in the notes of the shorthand-writer which have been sent to me. The upshot was that I acted upon the evidence which had been tendered, and which disproved the agency on behalf of the owners of the Orient of the person who had placed her in dangerous proximity to the Georgiana, and who turned out to be the real wrong-doer. Having come to this conclusion, I thought the time of the court ought not to be occupied by considering the other points raised in the case. I dismissed the suit of the Georgiana, but inasmuch as the defence being within the knowledge of the defendant alone, had not been properly raised on the pleadings, and as, if it had been, the suit would, as the counsel for the plaintiff alleged, have been discontinued, I thought it right to make no order as to costs. The minute of the decree was taken down very soon after the judgment, and was, as the registrar informed me, and as appeared from his note, shewn to the proctors of both parties. Some objection to it was taken by the proctor for the defendant, and an alteration was made in it. The matter was not brought to the notice of the court until the 7th Dec. the minute having been entered very soon after the judgment, which was on the 7th July. I am now asked by the defendant's counsel to direct it to be further altered. But having regard not only to the interval of time which has elapsed, but also to the merits of the question, and inasmuch as it appears to me that this minute does, on the whole, accurately record the decree of the court, I must decline to make any order for the alterations of the minute.

Attorney for plaintiff, Peckham.

Attorneys for defendants, Fielder and Sunner.

Nov. 23 and Dec. 6, 1869.

THE EMPIRE OF PEACE.

Bottomry—Bond—Money advanced on personal security—Subsequent bond—Further advances.

Where an agreement was made by F. and Co. with A. and Co. that the latter should purchase for them a cargo of rice in British Burmah, and that all the advances should be secured by the hypothecation of the bills of lading and a fixed amount of 5s. per ton freight before the completion of the contract, and after A. and Co. had made considerable advances, F. and Co. failed; whereupon A. and Co. induced the master of one of F. and Co.'s vessels then loading to execute a bond for the part advances and a further trifling amount. F. and Co. having disputed the validity of the bond:

Held, that the bond was not valid; that the original advances having been made partly upon personal security and partly upon a margin of freight, could not subsequently be secured by a bond; and as to the further advances, they were too trivial to bring the case into the category of bonds partly good and partly bad.

This was a cause of bottomry, instituted by the holder of a bottomry bond against the ship Empire of Peace, and against the Merchants' Trading Company of Liverpool (Limited), the present owners of the ship. The bond was dated the 14th June 1866, and was given by the master of the ship to Auschitzky and Co., of Akyab, in British Burmah, for the sum of 540*l.* 1*s.* 7*d.* and 30 per cent. interest. On the same day, and at the same place, another bond was given by the master of the ship to Joseph Charriol, for the sum of 890*l.* and 30 per cent. interest. The latter bond has been discharged; the former bond is the one the validity of which was argued before the court. It appeared from the evidence that an agreement was made between Messrs. Fernie Brothers, of Liverpool, and Auschitzky and Co., with respect to the navigation of four vessels, one of which was the Empire of Peace, belonging to Fernie Brothers, and that that agreement was as follows:—

18, Hackin's Hey, Liverpool,
29th Aug. 1865.

Messrs. Fernie Brothers, Liverpool.

Gentlemen,—We hereby agree to load the ship Empire of Peace, of 1540 tons register, and the Edward Oliver, 1166 tons register, at the port of Akyab, with full cargoes of Necransie rice, of fair average quality, of the crop of 1866 (with the option to load about one-fourth with Larong rice), at 6s.—say 6s. per cwt. nett, free on board. The ships to commence loading as soon as ready after arrival, provided new rice is being shipped at that time.

In consideration of the above, you undertake to send the following ships to us to be loaded on commission: viz., the Prince of Wales, 924 tons register; the Green Jacket, 1055 tons register; and the Scottish Chief, 1052 tons register, or other vessels of about the same tonnage, all of which ships to be ready to load before the 15th April 1866, at the port of Akyab.

We are to reimburse ourselves for each separate cargo by drafts at six months' sight, drawing for two-thirds of the amount at the time of purchase, and for the remainder on completon of cargo.

Bills of lading to be signed with a freight of 5s. per ton, and are to be attached to the drafts; and should delivery of the rice purchased not be taken before the 15th April 1866, we are to be at liberty to draw for the balance of purchase money. Same to be placed in the Godowns, and specially held for the ship's arrival.

The ships to have the fair average despatch of other vessels loading at Akyab at the same time by other persons.

With respect to this contract Auschitzky said:—

I made a contract with Messrs. Fernie Brothers and Co. in August 1865, for the loading by my Akyab firm of their ship Empire of Peace during the season 1866.

To place me in funds for the purchase of these five cargoes, Messrs. Fernie Brothers and Co. offered to furnish me with credit from Barned's Bank, but I declined the proposal, and insisted on having the bills of lading of the cargoes, with a nominal rate of freight, 5s. per ton, hypothecated as security for the value of the cargoes.

I made this contract in person at Liverpool. No agreement whatever was made by me with Messrs. Fernie Brothers and Co. to furnish the ships with funds for ship's disbursements, as we had merely to supply the ships with cargo. The subject was not mentioned. Captain Clark of the Empire of Peace, whilst at Akyab, asked me for money for ship's disbursements. Though I was not bound to give any, understanding that he could not get the money elsewhere, and the margin of the freight appearing more than sufficient to fully secure both the contract price of the cargo and ordinary ship's disbursements, I let him have what he required, intending, as I had done with the other vessels, to include the amount in our draft, and thus secure it by the 5s. bill of lading; but later on, when my firm learnt the failure of Messrs. Fernie Brothers and Co., they refused to advance any more, and as they knew no bank would negotiate their drafts on Messrs. Fernie Brothers and Co.—more especially for money advanced without any authority—we called on him to refund what he had received (rs. 4,891-4-9) verbally and by letter on the 9th of June, '66. Captain Clark sent tenders for a loan on bottomry of 14,000 rs. On this we offered, as agents of Joseph Alexander Charriol, to lend that sum on the express condition that he repaid our firm therefrom the rs. 4,891-4-9 already advanced, but it was eventually thus arranged—we accepted a bottomry bond for the equivalent of the rs. 4,891-4-9 (540l. 1s. 7d.), and advanced him rs. 8,060-6 for a bottomry bond accepted by us for J. A. Charriol. The equivalent was 890l. No one else tendered to advance the money; so, unless he had acceded to our terms, he could not have raised it, and the ship could not have proceeded to sea.

The money was not against Captain Clark's or the owner's credit—I mean the first advance of rs. 4,891-4-9—but against the margin of the freight; it was never intended to be otherwise. When I made the contract with Fernie Brothers and Co., vessels were being chartered to load at Akyab and other free ports during the season of 1866 at 3l. 5s. to 3l. 10s.

When I made the contract, I considered that when the cargo should be hypothecated, the margin would cover the value of the cargo without any other credit. The cargo was hypothecated. The cargo cost 6l. 5s., including freight.

Auschitzky also said that Charriol had repaid him for this bond which is in suit, as well as for the other.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson, for the bondholders, contended that as the money was advanced upon the hypothecation of the cargo, the case did not come within the category of cases where money is advanced on the personal security of the owner. By the lex loci there existed for the plaintiffs a lien upon the ship already for advances, but if not on her, certainly on her anchors and surplus stores; there was no reason plaintiffs should waive their rights, and nothing inequitable in their exercising them, it was clear that there were no other means of raising the money except by executing a bond, and as the plaintiffs security had failed there was no breach of faith in requiring a bond.

The Karnak, L. Rep. 2 Adm. 289; 37 L. J., N.S., 41 Adm.;
The Hebe, 2 W. Rob. 146;
The North Star, 1 Lush. 45.

Milward, Q.C., and Cohen, contra, contended that when money is advanced on personal security which subsequently fails, unless the money be advanced on an implied contract that a bond will be given, a bond cannot be taken. The bills of lading were in plaintiff's possession when the bond was given; and though they might never get the money realised by them, yet the validity of the bond could not be affected by events taking place after its execution. If the money was advanced upon the margin of freight, then that security still existed unaffected by Fernies' failure, and the security had not failed when the bond was executed.

Dec. 6.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE (having summarised the facts as above).—I may as well dispose of one point made in favour of this bond, namely, that Auschitzky must be considered as the agent of Charriol, and therefore that whatever legal objections apply to the former as a bottomry bondholder do not apply to the latter. Charriol's name, however, does not appear in the bond; it is said that this was because the master insisted on the bond being in the name of Auschitzky; but however this may be, I am of opinion that I must consider Auschitzky as the principal with respect to this bond, and not as the agent to Charriol; it is therefore not necessary that I should consider the case of the Hebe (ubi sup.), to which I have been referred. It appears that in pursuance of the agreement that has been mentioned, the Empire of Peace had been loaded with a cargo of rice by Auschitzky and Co., that they obtained from the master the usual bills of lading at the nominal freight of 5s. per ton before mentioned, that they advanced money for the necessary disbursements of the ship, which disbursements were not included in the bills drawn by them on Messrs. Fernie. It appears also that these bills of exchange, with the bills of lading annexed, were subsequently negotiated by Auschitzky and Co. with a house at Calcutta. Auschitzky left Burmah on the 26th May 1866, and was absent from that place during the whole time when the business of the bottomry bond was transacted. The business was carried on in his absence by Mr. Archard; and his evidence shows that the bills of lading at the nominal freight were to be handed to Auschitzky and Co. as a security for the price of the rice and the disbursements and advances, although he says the amount of disbursements was not included in the bills of exchange drawn on Messrs. Fernie. During the absence of Auschitzky, Messrs. Fernie stopped payment, and the date of the time when this intelligence reached the firm at Akyab appears to have been the 1st June, and according to the evidence of Archard, "the greater part or the whole" of the advances which the bottomry bond was to cover were made before the 6th June, the date of the bond being, as I have said, the 14th. It is said that the evidence shows that some of the advances were made subsequently to the date of the bottomry bond; but if so, they were certainly of a very trifling character, and would not be sufficient to bring this bond within the category of those cases in which the bond has been pronounced for as being partly good and partly bad. This was also a point raised, or rather glanced at, in the argument before me. The evidence satisfies me that the advances made by Auschitzky and Co. on this occasion to the master of the Empire of Peace were made partly on the personal security of Messrs. Fernie, and partly on what Mr. Auschitzky calls "the margin of the freight" on this cargo; and, being satisfied of this, I am of opinion that, according to the law which regulates contracts of this description, it was not competent to Auschitzky and Co. to convert their security, partly personal and partly on the freight, into the security of a bottomry bond. It is not necessary to enter into any explanation of what that law is. It is well known to us, and has been very fully examined and discussed in my recent judgment in the Karnak (ubi sup.) It was further contended by the holder of the bottomry bond that, at all events, that instrument was legal, inasmuch as the vessel, or the principal parts of her apparel, were liable to arrest for the advances which had been made; and there were no other means of raising the money, except by bottomrying the ship. I am referred by counsel on either side to Lloyd v. Guibert, 2 Mar. Law Cas. 285; 33 L. J. 20, 741, in the Exchequer Chamber; to The Hamburg, 2 Moo. P. C., N. S., 289; and to Cammell v. Sewell, 5 H. & N. 728; 29 L. J. 350, Ex. There is certainly not adequate proof before me that by the law of Akyab this vessel could have been arrested. It is said that, in the absence of proof, I am to presume that the English law generally is in force, and that, under the recent Admiralty Court Act, a vessel may be arrested by material men; but I know no authority for carrying that presumption to the extent that not only the common law is in force, but that a particular power recently given by a particular statute to a particular court can be exercised in a country where I have no evidence that any such court exists. And, lastly, there is no authority that I am aware of for the position that a vessel could be arrested in the Court of Admiralty by those who have made advances upon a security other than that of the ship itself, as Auschitzky and Co. have done in this case. I must pronounce against this bond, with costs.

Digitized by Google

Proctor for plaintiffs, Rothery.

Proctors for defendants, Clarkson, Son, and Greenwell.

Tuesday, Feb. 1.

(Before Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.)

THE DART.

Salvage suit—Value—Jurisdiction—Estoppel.

In a salvage suit the defendants entered an absolute appearance. The vessel being arrested, was released on the 11*th Jan., on an undertaking by the proctors of the owners to file an affidavit of value within a week. On the* 15*th they filed an affidavit stating the value of the vessel, freight, and cargo, to be over* 1000*l. On the* 19*th a receiver of wreck made an affidavit that the value was under* 1000*l. On the* 1*st Feb. the defendants applied, upon this affidavit, to dismiss the suit with costs on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction, which in such a case lay with the justices under* 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 49:

Held that, under the circumstances, the defendants had estopped themselves from objecting to the jurisdiction, and the application dismissed with costs.

Semble, sect. 9 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, gives the High Court of Admiralty a similar discretion in the case of justices and of the County Court.

This was an application to dismiss a suit for salvage for want of jurisdiction. The facts were these. On the 5th Jan. a salvage suit was instituted against the Dart, her cargo, and freight, the amount claimed being 1000*l.* On the 7th the Dart was arrested, but released on the 11th, on the proctors for the owner undertaking to file an affidavit of value within a week. On the 15th the defendants filed an affidavit, in which it was stated that the value of ship, freight, and cargo, was 1090*l.* 6*s.* On the 19th Jan. a receiver of wreck made an affidavit that the value of ship, freight, and cargo, was under 1000*l.* by an amount of 50*l.* An application was now made upon this affidavit to dismiss the suit, as by sect. 49 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) summary jurisdiction in such cases was conferred upon justices.

Gibson, in support of the application, contended that the defendants were not estopped by their affidavit of the 15th Jan. from showing what was the actual value of the vessel. The valuation of the receiver of wreck was conclusive: (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 50.) [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—No; the section merely says that the valuation shall be received in evidence.] In the Eleanore, Br. & L. 185., the suit was dismissed, and the court gave costs and damages because the property was under 100*l.*, although an absolute appearance had been entered. He also cited

The Margaret and Jane, 3 Mar. Law Cas. 296.

Cohen, contra, contended that the effect of the 9th section of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, was to make the jurisdiction of the justices co-extensive with that of the County Court: (Beadnell v. Beeson, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 439; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 401.) The court being a court of record, the Admiralty Court Act 1861 remedies all objections to the jurisdiction unless they are taken at once and under protest. Here the appearance was not under protest. If a party to the suit files an affidavit which gives jurisdiction to the court he is estopped from denying the jurisdiction. The defendants ought to have appeared under protest.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I shall decide this point with reference to the particular circumstances of this case, and without considering the very important question whether the 9th section (a) of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) would not, in construction of law, be held so far to control the 49th and 50th sections of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63 as to make this question one for the consideration of this court. I think it unnecessary to consider that. It would be a very reasonable construction of the Act that it intended to say that the discretion which the court has to exercise with reference to the County Court would extend also to the jurisdiction of the magistrates.

(a) This section runs as follows:—If any person shall take in the High Court of Admiralty of England, or in any Superior Court, proceedings which he might, without agreement, have taken in a County Court, except by order of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, or of such Superior Court, or of a County Court having admiralty jurisdiction, and shall not recover a sum exceeding the amount to which the jurisdiction of the County Court in that admiralty cause is limited by this Act, and also if any person without agreement shall, except by order as aforesaid, take proceedings as to salvage in the High Court of Admiralty, or in any Superior Court, in respect of property saved, the value of which when saved does not exceed 1000*l.*, he shall not be entitled to costs, and shall be liable to be condemned in costs, unless the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, or of a Superior Court, before whom the cause is tried or heard, shall certify that it was a proper admiralty cause to be tried in the High Court of Admiralty in England or in a Superior Court.

Digitized by Google

[His Lordship referred to the dates of the proceedings, and continued.] On the 1st of this month an application is made to dismiss this suit, and an affidavit made on the 19th Jan. by the receiver of wreck is produced, and according to that affidavit the value of the ship cargo and freight would be under 1000*l.* by about 50*l.* I am of opinion that in this state of circumstances I ought not to accede to the application of the defendants. They have estopped themselves from making the application, and I shall dismiss it with costs.

Proctor for plaintiffs, Thomas Cooper.

Proctors for defendants, Clarkson, Son, and Greenwell.

ARCHES COURT.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.

Jan. 10 and Feb. 3.

(Before the Right Hon. SIR ROBERT J. PHILLIMORE, Dean of Arches.)

BISHOP SUMNER v. WIX.

Ritualism—Gospel lights—Lighted candles, beside the Communion Table, and on the retable—Incense—Interval between services—Injunctions of Edward VI.

In a proceeding against a clerk, charged with ecclesiastical offences in adding to the rites and ceremonies prescribed by law to be used in church, the following practices were pronounced illegal:—

(1.) Causing or permitting two lighted candles to be held, one on each side of the priest, when reading the Gospel, such candles not being required for light.

(2.) Using lighted candles, resting on the ground by the side of the Communion Table, or placed on the retable, a piece of furniture separate and distinct from, though above, the Communion Table, during the celebration of the Communion, such candles not being required for light.

(3) Using incense for censing persons and things, in an interval between two services, which would otherwise have immediately succeeded each other, the use of incense, under the circumstances, appearing intended as subsidiary and preparatory to the latter (the Communion) service.

The injunctions of Edward VI. refer only to candles on the "high altar," and, therefore, could have no application to the present case.

Those injunctions, though considered of weight in Liddell v. Westerton, Moo. Spec. Rep. 165, were entirely rejected in Martin v. Mackonochie, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 507, the principle of the two judgments on this point seeming inharmonious.

The facts of the case and the nature of the charges are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Dr. Deane, Q. C., and Dr. Tristram for the promoter.

Arthur Charles for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 3:—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case the office of the judge is promoted by the late Bishop of Winchester against the Rev. Richard Hooker Edward Wix, Vicar of St. Michael and All Angels, Swanmore, in the Isle of Wight. The case comes before this court by letters of request from the diocese of Winchester, and Bishop Sumner having ceased to be bishop of the see of Winchester continues to be the promoter of the suit (see p. 439, sup.). The defendant is charged with the ecclesiastical offences of adding to the ceremonies and rites prescribed by the law to be used in church, by the burning of lights and the use of incense. The charges with respect to the burning of lights are contained in the following articles:—"3rd. That the said Richard Hooker Edward Wix, in the church of the said perpetual curacy or vicarage of St. Michael and All Angels, Swanmore, on the following Sundays, to wit, on the 7th Feb., on the 28th March, on the 18th April, and on 23rd May, all in the year 1869, used lighted candles on the Communion Table in the said church, or on a ledge or shelf immediately above the said Communion Table—the said ledge or shelf having the appearance of being affixed to and of forming part of the said Communion Table—during the celebration of the Holy Communion at times when such lighted candles were not required for the purpose of giving light, and permitted and sanctioned such use of lighted candles. 5th. That the said Richard Hooker Edward Wix, in the said church on the following Sundays, to wit, on the 28th March, on the 18th April, and on the 23rd May, all in the year 1869, used lighted candles placed in candlesticks standing on each side of the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion, at times when such lighted candles were not required for the purpose of giving light, and permitted and sanctioned such use of lighted candles. 7th. That the said Richard Hooker Edward Wix, in the said church, on Sunday the 28th March 1869, caused or permitted two lighted candles to be held, one on each side of the priest when reading the Gospel, such lighted candles not being then required for the purpose of giving light." I will deal with the last article first, because it is admitted on behalf of the promoter that the practice therein complained of has been de facto discontinued by Mr. Wix since the service upon him of a monition by the bishop, dated the 3rd April in last year, and before the commencement of this suit; at the same time Mr. Wix contends that the practice is lawful, and the judgment of the court is prayed by the promoter thereupon. I am of opinion that the practice charged in this article is unlawful, as an addition to the rites and ceremonies prescribed by the law. I am glad, therefore, that Mr. Wix obeyed the monition of his ordinary, and must admonish him not to return to the use of this practice. With respect to the charge contained in the third article, Mr. Wix offers the following defence in his responsive plea (3rd article):—He says the charge against him, "Is in part untruly pleaded, for he alleges that on the said days in the said third article mentioned, the said lighted candles were not placed on the Communion Table, or on a shelf immediately above the same as therein alleged, but upon a certain other table called a retable, the said retable standing distinct and separate from and not forming or appearing to form part of, and not being affixed or appearing to be affixed to the said Communion Table." And he denies that the use of such lighted candles is an unlawful addition to or deviation from the forms prescribed by the law. With respect to the charge in the fifth article, the defendant admits the fact to be true as stated, but makes a similar denial with respect to the law. The charges with respect to the unlawful use of incense are contained in the following articles:—"9th. That the said Richard Hooker Edward Wix, in the said church on the following Sundays to wit, on the 7th Feb., on the 28th March, on the 18th April, and on the 23rd May, all in the year 1869, used incense for censing persons and things in and during the celebration of the Holy Communion, or as subsidiary thereto, and permitted and sanctioned such use of incense." The defendant in his responsive plea (Article 9) denies that he on the days in the article mentioned used incense for censing persons and things in and during the celebration of the Holy

Digitized by Google

Communion, or as subsidiary thereto, or permitted or sanctioned such use of incense as in the said article alléged. And the defendant further says that he used, and permitted, and sanctioned the use of incense on the days in the said article mentioned, not for censing persons or things nor in or during the celebration of the Holy Communion, nor as subsidiary thereto, but for other and lawful purposes. "11th. That the said Richard Hooker Edward Wix, in the said church on the following Sundays, to wit, on the 7th Feb., on the 28th March, on the 18th April, and on the 23rd May, all in the year 1869, used incense in and during the celebration of the Holy Communion, or as subsidiary thereto, and permitted and sanctioned such use of incense." As to this article, the defendant in his responsive plea (Article 11) denies that he on the days in the said 11th article mentioned used incense in and during the celebration of the Holy Communion, or as subsidiary thereto, or permitted and sanctioned such use of incense. "13th. That the said Richard Hooker Edward Wix, in the said church, on the following Sundays, to wit, on the 7th Feb., on the 28th March, on the 18th April, and on the 23rd May, all in the year 1869, used incense during Divine Service, or as subsidiary thereto, and permitted and sanctioned such use of incense." As to this article, the defendant in his responsive plea (Article 13) denies that he used or permitted or sanctioned the use of incense on the days in the said 13th article mentioned, during Divine Service, or as subsidiary thereto, but he admits that he used incense in a proper and lawful manner on the said days. 15th. That the said Richard Hooker Edward Wix, in the said church, on the following Sundays, to wit, on the 7th Feb., on the 28th March, on the 18th April, and on the 23rd May, all in the year 1869, ceremonially used incense, and permitted and sanctioned such ceremonial use of incense." As to this article, the defendant in his responsive plea (Article 15) denies that he on the days in the said article mentioned used incense ceremonially, or permitted or sanctioned such ceremonial use of incense. It appears from the evidence that what is called the retable is a separate and distinct piece of furniture from the Holy Table; that it is placed behind the Holy Table; and that the ledge or shelf of it, to use the words of the witness, "appears like a mantel-piece;" over the Holy Table; that on this retable stood two large candles and twelve branch candles, and that on each side of the Holy Table there stood a large candlestick which rested on the ground. All these candles were lighted at the time and in the manner which I will now state. And I may remark that the counsel for Mr. Wix admitted very properly that the evidence given by the witness Cooper was substantially correct, and did not cross-examine him. It appears from his evidence that after the third collect for grace had been said, then there was a sermon; after which the remaining prayers were said, concluding with the apostolic benediction. After this the candles were lighted by a chorister; there was a procession by the minister and choir then formed, and they went from the church to the vestry. After which another procession came from the vestry with censers and incense burning, went to the Holy Table, where the priest stirred up the incense, and censed all the things on the retable and Holy Table, while he himself was censed by a boy behind him. After which the censers and incense were carried by a boy into the vestry, accompanied it should seem by one of the priests, another priest remaining at the Holy Table. After the Communion Service was over the censers were again fetched from the vestry; another procession was formed, and the lights were extinguished. There were no lighted candles on the Holy Table itself; there was no incense burning during the time of the celebration of the Eucharist. Between the close of the morning prayers and the beginning of the Communion Service some of the congregation left the church, and other persons came in, and a bell was rung to denote that the Communion Service had begun. These four facts which are proved in the case are much relied upon by the counsel for Mr. Wix as materially differing the present case from that of Martin v. Mackonochie; so much so as to make this present case one primæ impressionis. It has been forcibly contended that the two judgments of Martin v. Mackonochie, and Liddell v. Westerton are irreconcilable in principle, and that I ought to follow the doctrine laid down in the former, and not in the latter case. If, indeed, the duty were cast on me of demonstrating that the two decisions were in every respect harmonious as to the principle on which they proceeded, I might, perhaps, though I do not say that I should, find the task a difficult one to execute, more especially with respect to the weight apparently given to the injunctions of Edward VI. in Liddell v. Westerton, Moore's Special Rep. 165, and their entire rejection in Martin v. Mackonochie, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 507; L. Rep. 2 Priv. Co. 389, when they were relied upon for the purpose of showing that the burning of two candles to represent the true light of the world was not illegal. But I am happy to think that no such duty is imposed upon me in the present case. The lights which were burnt in this case were not upon the Holy Table or "high altar," and therefore are unaffected by the injunctions; and the lighting and the burning of them in the manner and the circumstances proved appears to me to fall under the category of ceremonies. Nor are they, in the language of the Privy Council in Martin v. Mackonochie, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 506; L. Rep. 2 Priv. Co. 387, "inert and unused," but things actively employed as a part of a ceremony, and are therefore illegal according to my own decision in the same case. It is not necessary that I should pass any opinion upon the legality of these things, if they were decorations, and neither "ornamenta" nor ceremonies. It will be remembered that the candles were lit and burning during the whole of the Communion Service. Now, with respect to the use of incense, the principal defence is that it was employed during an interval between two services, and neither belonged to nor was subsidiary to either. I cannot take this view of the state of facts which is proved by the evidence. I think the fair result of that evidence is that incense which was used in the interval between the two services which would otherwise have immediately succeeded each other; almost the same congregation was present at both services and in the interval between them. It is true that after the incense had been removed a bell was rung to signify that the second service was about to begin; but, looking at all the circumstances, I think it would be unreasonable and unjudicial not to conclude that the burning of the incense was intended to be subsidiary and preparatory to the celebration of the Holy Communion. I am bound, therefore, to pronounce that the use of the incense, as well as the lighting and burning of the candles, according to the facts admitted to be proved in this case, were illegal acts, and that Mr. Wix ought to have obeyed altogether, as he did partially, the monitions of his Ordinary, which are set forth in the articles, and I must admonish him to abstain for such practices for the future, and I must condemn him in the costs of this suit.

Proctors for the promoter, Moore and Currey.

Proctor for the defendant, Brooks.

Digitized by Google

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Nov. 30.

(Present, the Right Hon. Lord CHELMSFORD, Sir JAMES W. COLVILE, and Sir JOSEPH NAPIER.)

THE OWNERS OF THE SHIP Calcutta (apps.) v. THE OWNERS OF THE BARQUE Emma (resps.)

THE CALCUTTA.

Collision—Inevitable accident—Vessel partly disabled.

Inevitable accident is where the collision could not possibly have been prevented by proper care and seamanship under the particular circumstances of the case. So that where the defence of inevitable accident is set up on behalf of a vessel primâ facie to blame for a collision, the defence, to succeed, must be supported by proof that everything was done which could and ought to have been done to avoid the collision; and this, though the vessel be in some degree disabled, and so less manageable than she would otherwise have been.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Court of Admiralty in a cause of damage, promoted and brought by Meyer Levy, of Memel, in the kingdom of Prussia, the owner of the barque or vessel Emma, and the owners of the cargo lately laden on board her, and the representatives of the master and such of the crew as are now deceased, and others of the said crew (the respondents), against the ship or vessel Calcutta, of which the appellants are owners, for the recovery of damages in respect of losses occasioned by a collision between the Calcutta and the Emma.

The collision occurred about half-past twelve a.m. on the 6th Feb. 1869, about 180 miles to the westward of Scilly.

The Emma was a Prussian barque of about 351 tons register, and manned by eleven hands, including her master, and was on a voyage from Cardiff to Barcelona with a cargo of coals.

The Calcutta, a ship of 2080 tons register, was manned by a crew of forty-eight hands, all told, and was on a voyage from London to Bombay with a cargo of telegraph wire, and a number of passengers.

The case on behalf of the Emma was that she was sailing close-hauled by the wind on the starboard tack, heading S. by E., with the wind S.W. by W., and that she had her proper side lights, namely, a green light on her starboard side and a red light on her port side, duly exhibited and burning brightly; that the wind having increased to a gale, the watch from below were called to shorten sail, and that whilst this was being done the green light of the Calcutta was seen on the port bow of the Emma, distant from one to two miles; that the Emma was kept by the wind on the starboard tack in the expectation that the Calcutta, which was on the port tack, would keep out of the way, but that the Calcutta, although loudly hailed from the Emma, came into collision with the Emma, striking her with her (the Calcutta's) stem such a violent blow on the port side as to cause her to sink almost immediately.

In the answer of the Calcutta it was admitted that the Emma was sailing close-hauled by the wind on the starboard tack, but it was alleged, first, that in consequence of the red light of the Emma being dim, the Calcutta did not receive sufficient warning of her proximity; secondly, that owing to the foretack having been carried away, the Calcutta was prevented from paying off and getting out of the way of the Emma; and thirdly, that the Emma improperly ported her helm.

The cause was heard on the 4th June 1869 before the judge of the court below, assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity Corporation.

The witnesses were examined orally in open court.

The learned judge of the court below and the Elder Brethren came to the conclusion—1st. That the Emma's red light was a proper light and burning brightly, and that it ought to have been seen in time by the Calcutta if she had been keeping a good look-out; 2ndly. That the Emma did not improperly port her helm; and 3rdly. That the Calcutta could, by taking proper measures, have got out of the way of the Emma.

The learned judge of the court below, by his decree, found the Calcutta to have been solely to blame for the said collision, and condemned the appellants in the damage proceeded for, and in costs.

Milward, Q. C. and Cohen for the appellants.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. (Admiralty Advocate) and Clarkson for the respondents.

Judgment was delivered by Lord CHELMSFORD.—The only question to be determined upon this appeal is whether the collision was the result of inevitable accident. The Calcutta is primâ facie to blame for the collision, because it was her duty to keep out of the way of the Emma; and not having done, there is primâ facie proof of negligence on her part. The onus, therefore of showing that she was not to blame is thrown upon the Calcutta, and she undertakes to prove that the collision is not imputable to her as blame, but that it was the result of inevitable accident. Inevitable accident is where the collision could not possibly have been prevented by proper care and seamanship under the particular circumstances of the case. The question, therefore, is whether everything was done which could and ought to have been done by the Calcutta to avoid the collision. It may probably be taken that the carrying away of the foretack of the Calcutta may have contributed remotely to the accident by rendering the Calcutta less manageable than she would otherwise have been. There is certainly no evidence whatever to show that the foretack was not in good condition, although the learned judge has said that in his opinion there could not have been so much wind as was represented, and that that fact rendered it improbable that it would have carried away a good foretack, implying therefore that the foretack was not good. No question of this kind was raised upon the pleadings or in the course of the evidence, and therefore it was rather hard upon the appellants to assume this as a fact, for which there was not the slightest proof, and to which their attention was not in any way called. If any evidence had been given of this assumed fact, the appellants might have disproved it, but at all events they would have been afforded an opportunity of doing so. But the question is whether, assuming the Calcutta to be in some degree disabled, did she, in the state in which she was, do everything in her power to avoid the collision? It is said that all that was required of her was that she should take reasonable and not extraordinary care. There is great difficulty in defining clearly the meaning of these general words "reasonable" and "extraordinary;" but, in plain language, did the Calcutta do all that she ought to have done under the circumstances? In the opinion of the Trinity Masters who assisted the learned judge in the Court of Admiralty, "the course adopted by those on board the Calcutta was quite right in porting at the time when it is stated she did, but they thought that her spanker ought to have been brailed up, and her afteryards squared, and this more especially having regard to the fact that her foresail was off, and to the immense length of the ship, which rendered it very difficult to get her off the wind; and they were further of opinion that if from the proximity of the two vessels these manœuvres were doubtful, it was clear that the Calcutta ought to have put her helm down, and hove in stays." A complaint was made by the counsel for the appellants that it was hard upon them to have these questions determined by the Trinity Masters and the learned judge, without having been suggested in the course of the trial. That it was never made a question whether, when the manœuvre of porting was resorted to, more might not have been done for the purpose of avoiding the collision. But in answer to this complaint, their Lordships feel that it is, after all, no additional fact which is introduced in the judgment of the learned judge, but a mere deduction from and judgment formed upon the facts as they were proved and established before them. Their Lordships also have the advantage of nautical advice and experience, and they are happy to say that in this case the opinion of the assessors very nearly, if not altogether, coincides with that which was given by the Trinity Masters in the court below. The Trinity Masters think that the proper course was for the Calcutta to have ported. Upon that subject their Lordships' nautical assessors differ from the Trinity Masters in a slight degree, because they say that it is a most difficult manœuvre to wear a ship of the length and size of the Calcutta; that she would have paid-off very slowly, and that the better course would have been for her to have starboarded, which would have brought her head up to the wind, and of course have lessened her way, and probably altogether have prevented the collision. It must be remembered that at this time the Emma was almost motionless upon the water, being in the act of reefing; but our assessors think that the Calcutta having ported her helm, although the better course would have been to have starboarded, agreeing in this respect with the Court of Admiralty that the spanker ought to have been brailed up and the afteryards squared, and other things done which would probably have rendered that manœuvre successful. Then also the Trinity Masters say that they "are further of opinion that if from the proximity of the two vessels these manœuvres were doubtful, it was clear that the Calcutta ought to have starboarded, put her helm down, and hove in stays." Therefore it being perfectly clear that the Calcutta having ported her helm, did not do anything in addition to aid that operation, or not having starboarded, as our assessors think would have been the better course, the collision could not have been the result of inevitable accident, which is the defence the Calcutta undertakes to establish against the proof of primâ facie negligence on her part, by not keeping out of the way of the Emma, as she was bound to do. Their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment of the court below is perfectly right. They will, therefore, recommend to Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the court below, and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Digitized by Google

Judgment affirmed.

Proctors for the appellants, Cotterill and Sons.

Proctor for the respondents, Thomas Cooper.

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Nov. 16 and 17.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley) and Lord Justice GIFFARD).

CATLING v. THE GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Contract—Arbitration—Relation of vendor and purchaser—Time for payment of purchase-money—Award long subsequent—Intermediate interest—Possession—Costs of arbitration — Lands Clauses Act 1845, ss. 16 et seq.

The plaintiff, being lessee of lands for building, opposed a Bill which the defendants were then promoting, and before the Bill passed an agreement was entered into that he should withdraw his opposition on the terms that, if the Bill passed, the defendants should purchase his interest in a portion of the lands, subject to an apportionment of the head rent, should pay to him compensation for damage to his adjoining property, for loss of profit resulting from the taking of the land, and for alteration of drainage; that the purchase should be completed, and the compensations paid with costs within six months of the passing of the Bill. Further, that the sums to be paid should, in case of difference, be referred to a surveyor to be agreed upon "in the usual manner," but that the purchase-money should be ascertained by taking the value of the improved rents which could be made by the plaintiff beyond the ground-rent, subject to deduction in respect of the time which would be occupied in making such improved rents, and the plaintiff was at once to cease from further building. The Bill received the Royal assent on the 28*th June* 1866. The parties could not agree as to the amount to be paid, and the whole matter was referred to a surveyor, whose award was to be final. He made his award on the 13*th March* 1868, and accompanied it by a statutory declaration that he did so under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act. The defendants at once tendered the amount awarded, but the plaintiff refused it on the ground that he was entitled (1) to the costs of the arbitration; (2) to interest from the 28*th Dec.* 1866 till the tender; and (3) to the ground-rent which he had paid antecedently to the date of the award, and he filed his bill for specific performance claiming also payment under these three heads.

Held (reversing the decision of Malins, V.C.), first, that, as the agreement was made before the special Act passed, the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act had no operation; and, as the arbitrator had not dealt with costs in any manner, the plaintiff was not entitled to them.

Secondly, that although the contract was in terms a contract to complete by a stated day, yet as the mode agreed to by both parties of fixing the purchase-money could, by no default of either party, not be acted upon before that day, and as the agreement was altogether silent on the subject of interest, none became payable by the company previously to the date of the award.

And, thirdly, that the position of vendor and purchaser continued till the award fixing the price was made, and therefore that until that date the ground-rent, and all other outgoings in respect of the land, must be borne by the vendor.

Where an agreement for sale provides for completion on a stated day, that circumstance alone does not in this court give the vendor interest from that time, when delay in completion is not attributable to the default of the purchaser.

This was an appeal by the railway company against a decision of Malins, V.C., reported in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 17, decreeing specific performance by the company of an agreement for purchase of lands of the plaintiff, with interest on the amount of the purchase-money from the 28th Dec. 1866, and with the costs of an arbitration under which the amount of that purchase-money was awarded.

Digitized by Google

The facts are fully stated in the report referred to, and the contentions of the parties sufficiently appear in the judgments of the Court of Appeal.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., Cotton, Q. C., and Stevens, supported the appeal.

Waley and Maidlow, (with whom was Glasse, Q. C.), supported his Honour's decree.

The authorities referred to were:

The Hammersmith Railway Company v Brand, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 238; 18 W. R. 12;
Milner v. Gery, 14 Ves. 400;
Esdaile v. Stephenson, 1 S. & St. 122;
Greenwood v. Churchill, 8 Beav. 413;
De Visme v. De Visme, 1 M. & G. 396;
Martin v. The Leicester Waterworks Company, 27 L. J. 433, Ex.;
Holdsworth v. Wilson, 32 L. J. 289, Q. B.; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 434
Morse v. Merest, 6 Madd. 26;
Emery v. Wase, 8 Ves. 505;
Lord St. Leonards' V. & P., 14th edit., 627;
Birch v. Joy, 3 Ho. L. Cas. 565;
The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, the 16th and following sections.

Without calling for a reply,

The LORD CHANCELLOR said: This case really stands, as it appears to us, plain upon the contract which has been entered into, including, of course, as I do in the word "contract," the reference to the arbitrator and the award of that arbitrator, which completes the contract. It appears to me plain what the rights of the parties must be on the three points brought before us.

Now the first point brought before us is with reference to the costs of the arbitration. With reference to the costs of the arbitrator, there is nothing specially provided in the agreement of 1866, but it has been ingeniously put and very ably argued by Mr. Waley on that ground that it must be taken in effect as if this was a reference under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; that the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act speaks of the course to be followed when land is to be taken otherwise than by agreement. But then, says Mr. Waley, if this agreement had been made after the passing of the Act, instead of being made as it was before the passing of the Act, it comes simply to the case of persons who have chosen one common arbitrator, which they are allowed to do, instead of appointing one on each side, and it would be taken as a case in which the parties had agreed to this extent—to settle it by arbitration, but had not agreed on the price; in other words, that a difference had arisen with reference to price, and that the difference arising as to price should be settled by arbitration, and that then all the consequences would follow, including the costs to be given under the 34th section of the Act.

Now there are several objections to acceding to that line of argument. In the first place, if it were acceded to, and if it were treated as an agreement under the Act, I am afraid it would hardly help him in the existing contest, because what ought to have been done then would have required the arbitrator to make his determination under the 34th clause, and to settle the costs under the 34th clause, and it would not be for this court to settle the costs which are expressly referred to him, and which he is the necessary and proper person to determine, inasmuch as he knows what has taken place before him, and has all the circumstances of the case within his purview.

In the next place, it appears impossible to hold that this question is in the position of an agreement under the Act, because all the clauses are of a totally different character from anything that exists in the circumstances at the date of this agreement as between the company and the persons with whom they agree. The very first clause (I think it is the 16th) is preceded by a sort of preface as to taking land otherwise than by agreement; and it expressly says that none of those powers shall be put in force until a certain amount of money is subscribed, whereas in the case of land taken by agreement the contrary course may prevail. The amount of money necessary to be subscribed before the compulsory powers of the Act are brought into execution is not a sum necessary to be subscribed before the parties enter into the agreement. Therefore, could it possibly be said here that the agreement could be proceeded on by the parties whether or not that limit of amount which is mentioned in the 16th clause had or had not been subscribed by the company?

However, there is another objection which is still more grave, and which goes to the very root of the matter, which is this: that the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act contemplates parties who are authorised by an Act to deal with the subject-matter—namely, the land. It contemplates a course of proceeding between the owners of the land on the one hand and the persons entitled to take the land compulsorily on the other. But these parties, when the agreement was entered into, had no such compulsory powers at all. The whole agreement was framed before the Act was passed and before the compulsory powers were granted. It seems to me, therefore, that in truth you cannot tie the two subjects together, and you cannot possibly treat this agreement, framed as it is, and framed at the period that it was (viz., before the Act passed), as an agreement under the Act.

That being so, the arbitrator, as it appears to me, had no control with reference to the costs, and certainly, if he had not, this court has not, and it could not therefore deal with the costs of the award.

The second point is with reference to allowing interest upon the sum awarded. Now the form of the agreement is this. The agreement is made in April, and it provides that the land should be taken at a valuation as after mentioned, and then follows a provision that there is to be compensation allowed for damage to the adjoining building property, then for the loss of profit consequent on the taking of the land by the railway company, the amount to be ascertained and settled as after mentioned, and then also for the costs of altering the existing mode of drainage. Then the purchase is to be completed. "And the said purchase and compensation moneys and costs shall be paid within six calendar months after the said Bill in any form shall have received the Royal assent." Those six months expired on the 28th Dec. 1866. Then the 3rd clause is: "The value of the property to be purchased as aforesaid by the said company, and the amount of compensation to be paid as aforesaid" ("as aforesaid" means in the same way as compensation for the damage done to the adjoining land, and for loss of profit); "and the cost of the said drainage shall, in case of difference, be referred to a surveyor to be agreed upon between the parties in the usual manner." There was an argument thrown out by Mr. Maidlow in support of the decree that these words, "between the parties in the usual manner," had some reference or other to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. How can that be, because the clause says that it is to be a surveyor to be agreed upon between the parties "in the usual manner?" "In the usual manner" means simply the usual manner when parties agree to submit to arbitration; and being a reference of the matter to arbitration, it cannot be thrown back to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, nor do I think anything done by that surveyor could be held to help the matter. Then it is agreed "that the amount to be paid for the said ground shall be ascertained by taking the value thereof at twenty-five years' purchase of the improved rents which could be made by the plaintiff beyond the aforesaid ground rent payable to him, subject, however, to deductions on account of, and for the time occupied in making, such improved rents." Then the 4th clause is merely as to paying certain expenses, which of course has no relation to the general costs of the award; certain expenses are to be paid within three weeks to Mr. Catling's solicitor with reference to the opposition to the Bill, and with reference to this agreement; and then the plaintiff is at once to cease any further buildings on the property. Now then, the question is—the sum not having been ascertained until long after the time that is here mentioned for completion of the agreement (completion being to take place on the 28th Dec. 1866, and the sum to be paid not having been ascertained until March 1868)—is whether or not interest is payable on that sum when it was ascertained in March 1868, it not having up to that time been ascertained in manner provided by the parties. It is proved upon the evidence that there certainly was no default, to put it at the lowest, on the part of the defendants with reference to the fixing of this sum of money. They appear to have called upon Mr. Catling early in the day to send in his claim. He did not send in his claim until somewhat late, I believe. I am not accusing him of any default; he might have had reasons for so doing, but at the same time there was clearly no default on the part of the company, and it was through no default of theirs that the amount had not been ascertained; nor can I take it to be the fault of the arbitrator, because of course the reference required a good deal of investigation, and, it having been made somewhat late in the day, one cannot say that his investigation occupied at all an unreasonable time before he arrived at the amount. Therefore, nobody being to blame, the question is simply reduced to this: regard being had to this agreement and to the reference which is made, and the award which is made, whether or not, now that you have ascertained the amount, there is any ground for this court to say that interest is payable from the 28th Dec. 1866, at a time, that is to say, when no one knew what the price was, and nothing had been ascertained with regard to the amount payable, not simply in respect of price, but with reference to compensation for loss on the one hand, and damage to adjoining property on the other, in addition to the actual price of the land. Now, for that purpose, just look at what the reference is to the arbitrator. There is no special reference made to him which pointed at all to this matter. It is simply a recital of the agreement, which no doubt is recited, although it is not recited in the arbitrator's award. We do not find here any special recital at all with reference to the time at which the agreement was to be completed, but the recital is in this form: it gives the various recitals in those agreements, and then recites that what the company had agreed to pay Mr. Catling for loss of profit was to be ascertained in the manner therein mentioned. It does not say one word about the time at which the matter was to be completed; but it recites "the value of the property to be purchased as aforesaid, and the cost of the said drainage should, in case of difference, be referred to a surveyor," and then it refers to the taking of the price of twenty-five years' purchase, "subject to deduction as aforesaid." And then it recites the passing of the Bill, and then it recites that a difference had arisen as to the matters aforesaid, and that they were agreed to be referred to a surveyor, and "it was witnessed and agreed by the said company and the plaintiff that all matters which, by the said agreement of the 19th April 1866, were, in case of difference, thereby referred to a surveyor, should be and the same were by the agreement now being recited referred to the sole arbitration of me the said John Clutton." Then he recites having made that declaration, which has no bearing at all on the construction, as I said before, of what the written agreement is between the parties, and then he awards and determines "that the sum of 13,490*l.* is the amount to be paid by the said Great Northern Railway Company for the purchase of the estate and interest of the plaintiff (subject to the apportioned ground rent of 100*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.*) of and in the ground referred to in the first recited agreement, and delineated on the plan" and so on. That is as to the price of the ground. He further awards that the sum of 2600*l.* is the amount to be paid by the said company to the plaintiff Catling for the damage to his adjoining building property, and for the loss of profit consequent on or resulting from the taking of the said land by the said company." And he further awards "that the sum of 675*l.* is the amount to be paid by the said company to the plaintiff as the cost of altering the mode of drainage." That is, in fact, the whole of the award. That being so, we do not find that there is any reference at all to the date at which it is said that the agreement is to be completed. We do not find he says that that was the sum which ought at the date of Dec. 1866, being six months after the date of the passing of the Act, to have been paid; but what we find is, that the different amounts which he mentions are all to be paid on a given day. He puts that statement in his award, which is dated, as I say, in March 1868. Now suppose, first of all, that the case arose at law. How is it possible that interest could be claimed under that agreement, completed as it was by that award? It is said that it could be done in this way. This is an agreement for payment on a given day of a certain sum, which is not ascertained at present, or that sum, having been ascertained, is now to be put in the agreement. How, then, could an action be framed for interest in respect of non-payment of that sum when the interest not being stipulated for expressly—and there being no contract about it in the agreement itself—it would have to be recovered in the nature of damages for breach of the agreement, and the breach of the agreement would be the non-payment on the given day of that sum? The answer would be quite plain—that there was no sum ascertained, and no interest could be paid on a given day because no amount had been fixed, and therefore there was no breach at the time when it is alleged that there was a breach of the agreement. There was nothing which these defendants could by any possibility have been called upon to pay; therefore, it seems to me that it would have been hopeless to have attempted to recover that money at law.

Digitized by Google

Then, is there any equitable ground on which the money could have been recovered? This court has a very fixed rule with reference to persons who are in possession of rents and profits—that they shall not retain both the rents and profits and interest. Therefore if we found that the company were in possession of the land, of course a very different question might have arisen; and feeling the difficulty of that point, it has been attempted to show that, in truth, possession was taken. It is put in this way, that by the fifth article Mr.

Digitized by Google

Catling is prohibited from building and therefore he is put out of possession. It is said that he is put out of all useful possession, and therefore it is to be argued that the company were in possession. The last argument which has been addressed to us was, that if Mr. Catling had been allowed to enter into possession he would have been able to raise the houses and to have acquired the improved rent, and therefore would have been in a position to say, now I am to be compensated at once for the difference between the improved rent and the head rent; because the thing is done, you are to make no deduction at all for the time when the thing was supposed to be done because the thing is already done. I confess that is an argnment I was trying to follow; but I cannot follow the argument because that price has nothing to do with the question whether he could or could not build. The price has to be settled upon such terms as the arbitrator will assume, and he will assume it just as well whether he does or does not erect the houses; and the arbitrator will allow twenty-five years' purchase of the improved rent as the difference between the head rent and the increased rent. He will allow twenty-five years' purchase, but he will say, it would take you, the builder, a year or two before you could arrive at a claim in respect of that improved rent, and therefore, if that is so, a deduction is to be made.

Then it is said, if that be the case, he ought not to have made any deduction in his award, inasmuch as that award was not made until 1868, and therefore, when the year 1868 had arrived, if Mr Catling had been in possession, and had been allowed to build, he would have said: the thing is done, and no deduction is to be made, for I will show you that I am entitled to the twenty-five years' purchase at once, inasmuch as the buildings are there, and you can see them. The existence or non-existence of the buildings has no effect upon the argument at all. The argument would be just as good if Mr Catling had been in a position in which he could say to the arbitrator, "Now you are making your award at this time, and if you specify this sum as a sum to be paid to me, and then speak of the deduction that ought to be made because the houses are not erected, you will remember that now two or three years have passed since the date of the agreement, I could have erected all the houses in this time, and I have a right to take the value of the twenty-five years at once." Then the argument is shifted into a different position, and it is said, "No, the arbitrator must be supposed to have done his duty, and it is his duty to value the houses as if the purchase was all going to be completed on that day long since passed; and, it being his duty to value those houses at that day long since passed, and having made the deduction, you must assume that is the thing which is represented in the money which he finds ought to be paid." He has found that 13,000*l.* odd ought to be paid, and we must assume that he took that 13,000*l.* as being the value on the 28th Dec. 1866, when the agreement was to be completed, minus the time which it would have taken to build the houses. The answer to that is, that there is nothing on the award to show that he has done anything of the kind, and I cannot see that it was his duty to do so. I cannot see that it was his duty to make the award in any other way than he has done. Certainly the company have had no profit from the land, and have not been in possession. Therefore those principles upon which the court acts, viz., saying that when the parties are in possession of rents and profits they are not to be allowed to claim the payment of interest taking the rents and profits on the one hand, and making no allowance for interest on the other hand, are not called in aid here. Then, if in an agreement for sale it is provided that the sale shall be completed on a given day, is it to be held in this court, from that circumstance alone (as is stated in the passage which has been cited from Lord St. Leonards' book, and relied upon by the plaintiff), that interest should become payable? This court has considered all the circumstances of the case, and has considered whether there has been any default whatever upon the part of the person who is called upon to pay interest, or whether in truth it is inequitable under all the circumstances of the case to direct that interest to be paid; and if there has been any default on the part of the vendor, or if, in absence of any default on either side, unavoidable circumstances have occasioned the non-completion of the contract, so that it would be impossible for the defendant to make that tender of the money which he would have made if he had known what money to tender, it is impossible to say that this court, any more than a court of law, could hold that the defendant was in default in not making that payment which he could not possibly tender, because no one knew the amount that ought to be tendered. I find, therefore, no possible ground on which that interest ought to be paid.

Then comes the last point, which is the payment of the head rent of 100*l.*, the rent during that interval between Dec. 1866 and March 1868, when the award was made. If one is right in the other conclusions, although it seems to be a hard case, I do not see how we can give the plaintiff that rent which is so claimed. The grounds I have proceeded upon hitherto are, that the defendants are in no default in what they did, and that they could not have made the tender, and that they were not in possession, and therefore, during the time they were so out of possession, and under the impossibility of completing the arrangement, because the terms had not been fixed, we must consider each party as remaining, from no fault either on one side or the other, in the position of persons who have not completed the contract, because the agency which they had employed to ascertain the price was an agency which could not ascertain the price within the time which was allowed, and, therefore, each party remaining in his own position during that intermediate time, I see no reason why those persons are to be treated as having made themselves liable to that head rent.

Under those circumstances, it appears to the learned Lord Justice and myself that we are obliged to differ with regret from the conclusions which the Vice-Chancellor has come to, and that all that can be done is to make the common form of decree for specific performance. We put to Mr Cotton the question whether or not the defendants would ask for the costs of the suit, and he, I think, very properly and very reasonably, on the part of the company, has shown forbearance in that respect, for they do not desire to be asked for costs to be paid to them of the contest to compel them to do that which they would have done without suit, and which it is said they offered to do before. They will now make the payment of the money, and the proper contract will be completed without any difficulty.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said.—There are three questions in this case, all of which appear to me, I must confess, to be perfectly clear. The first is as to the costs of the arbitration; the second is as to the interest; and the third is as to the ground-rent which was paid by the vendor antecedently to the date of the award.

Now, with respect to the costs of the arbitration, it is quite impossible that the fact that the arbitrator made a declaration supposing that this was an agreement under the Act, can in any way affect the rights of the parties. The question is, whether the contract either imports into it in terms the Lands

Digitized by Google

Clauses Consolidation Act, or whether it was a contract within the meaning of that Act of Parliament. There is not a syllable in the contract which imports into it the effect of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Then, was it a contract within the meaning of that Act of Parliament? The answer to that is this: first of all, that it does not comply with any one of the requisites pointed out in that Act; but secondly, what is quite conclusive is, that it was not a contract with a company which, in respect of these lands at the time of the contract, had any compulsory powers whatever.

Then, as regards interest, it is to be observed, first of all, that the land was producing nothing; and next, that there was neither possession on the part of the company, nor, in fact, right of possession, until after the award was made. And that being so, we have to look simply at what is the legal effect of the contract, and the legal effect of it only. No equitable principle can intervene whatever. The contract was this. True it is it was a contract to pay on a particular day; but then, in order to recover interest at law, you must prove a breach of the contract to pay on that particular day; and it is impossible to make out a breach, when the fact was that what you were to pay was a sum which was to be fixed by the award, and that award was not made until long subsequently to the day on which it was contracted that the payment should be made. There was no breach, and consequently there could be no interest payable, except from the date of the award.

Then, as regards the ground rent, that I think is equally plain. The truth is that the position of vendor and purchaser did not exist until after the amount of purchase-money was fixed. If it had so happened that the amount of the purchase-money had never been fixed, there never would have been the relative position of vendor and purchaser. The fixing of the price was an essential condition to making the plaintiff, on the one hand, the vendor, and to constituting the company, on the other hand, the purchaser; and, that being so, it necessarily follows that the vendor, up to the date when in point of fact the contract between him and the purchaser was a completed and perfect contract, was bound to pay all outgoings, unless he had taken care to put into his contract a distinct stipulation to the contrary, and in this contract there is no such stipulation whatever to the contrary.

Common decree for specific performance, without costs, and payment of the sum awarded, with interest from the date of the award. The deposit to be returned.

Solicitors for the company appealing, Johnson, Farquhar, and Leech.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, respondent, Terrell and Chamberlain.

Thursday, Nov. 4, 1869.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley) and Lord Justice GIFFARD).

LAING v. REED.

Benefit society—Rules—Power of borrowing—Certificate of barrister—Bill to restrain borrowing—Demurrer—6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32.

The trustees of a benefit building society were by its rules adopted at a meeting, and certified by the barrister appointed for that purpose, empowered to borrow money, which was, however, not to exceed two-thirds of the amount for the time being secured by the mortgages to the society; and they were to be indemnified by the society in the event of their giving their own personal security for such loans. Upon a bill charging that this rule was illegal, and praying an injunction:

Held (reversing the decision of Malins V.C.) that the rule sanctioning such borrowing was not contrary to the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, and a demurrer to the bill was allowed.

The certificate of the barrister in such a case is not conclusive upon the court, nor would it be in any case where it approved and certified a rule which was either contrary to the general law, or repugnant to the express provisions of the Act of Parliament.

This was an appeal by the defendants against an order of Malins V.C., overruling their demurrer to the plaintiff's bill. The hearing before his Honour is reported in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 83, and at that place all necessary statements will be found.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., Osborne, Q. C, and Chitty supported the appeal, and referred to Mullock v. Jenkins, 14 Beav. 628;
Armitage v. Walker, 2 K. & John 211;
Dewhirst v. Clarkson, 3 Ell. & Bl. 206;
Parker v. Butcher, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 762;
Kelsall v. Tayler, 11 Exch. 513;
6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 4;
4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 40, s. 4.

Glasse, Q. C. and Graham Hastings, for the plaintiff, cited
Pare v. Clegg, 29 Beav. 589; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 669;
Grimes v. Harrison, 26 Beav. 435;
Reg. v. Davis, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 629; Weekly Notes, Q. B., Jan. 1866, p. 24;
Re The Kent Benefit Building Society, 1 Dr. & Sm. 417; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610.

Without calling for a reply,

The LORD CHANCELLOR said: We think that the demurrer in this case ought to have been allowed, and we feel it a matter of satisfaction that the learned judge before whom the case originally came has not, in fact, pronounced any decided opinion upon the point which we are about to determine, viz., whether or not the rule in question, and of course the procedure under that rule, be in conformity with the Act of Parliament by which this society is constituted. The learned judge has rather reserved his opinion upon that point, expressing an intimation that, in his judgment, there was considerable doubt as to whether or not it was in excess of the powers conferred by the Act of Parliament; and, that doubt existing, he preferred the course of allowing the suit to proceed, so that an answer might be put in, and that he might be more acquainted with all the facts of the case. But this is a bill which has been filed for the express purpose of obtaining the judgment of the court on the point of law. It appears fairly and properly to have stated all the facts, to have exaggerated nothing, to have simply represented the exact state of the case as it stands, with a view to the decision of the court upon the subject.

What the bill complains of is this. It says, "You, being a building society, bound, of course, by the terms of the Act of Parliament which constitutes such societies, have made a rule that moneys may be borrowed during the continuance of the society by the trustees who undertake its management, and that those moneys may be dealt with as part of the funds of the society," that is, of course, that they may be applied in making advances to those who are desirous of obtaining advances, they giving security upon the buildings which they purchase with such advances. But there is a limit put upon that power, namely, this: you are never at any time to advance more than two-thirds of what is outstanding and actually secured upon the mortgages which have been entered into by the members of the society. Now, it is said "that power of borrowing is a power inconsistent with the scope and purview of the Act of Parliament; it is contrary, not to the express language of the Act, but to the inferences which are to be drawn from it, and, that being so, we further inform the court that that power has been acted upon to the extent of 66,000*l.*" That is a very large sum, no doubt, and it is said that there is an annual charge of 3000*l.* a year interest in respect of that sum. But the bill does not state that the moneys so borrowed exceed the limit laid down by the rule.

Digitized by Google

There is a further charge in the bill, which avers that the moneys have been lent improperly. It is said that the trustees are not authorised to make any such loans. After complaining of that, the bill says that the loans have, in the belief of the plaintiff, been repaid, so that there is nothing more to be said with reference to those loans, unless there should be found a threat to repeat a course which is complained of as illegal. That threat is not averred. It is averred that they intend to proceed under rule 18, and not in the method which is the second branch of the complaint; therefore, I think that that branch of the complaint is properly struck out of the bill. It is not that upon which the bill can be founded as the averments are here made, and all that we have to consider is simply whether or not the 18th rule can be maintained by which this benefit society is enabled to the extent of two-thirds, and no more, of the mortgages which have been given by the members of the society for securing the money as those mortgages may stand at the time of the loans being requested, to borrow from bankers or others a sum of money which is to form part of the funds of the society. I ought to mention also that the bill expressly avers that the moneys so borrowed have been applied to the purposes of the society. It is not averred that there has been any excess in the exercise of the power conferred, if the power is legitimate. That point, of course, is extremely simple. The whole question turns upon whether or not we can find in the Act of Parliament—express words there are not—any provision or any enactment with reference to the object and purview of the society, and of the mode in which they shall conduct their business, such as to render any agreement of the character I have described illegal and improper, as being inconsistent with the provisions of the Act.

The purview of the Act is stated to be this—that any number of persons may form themselves into societies for raising, by monthly or other subscriptions of members, shares not exceeding in value 100*l.* each share, and the subscriptions are not to exceed in the whole 20*s.* per month on each share. They are to raise by those means a stock or fund for the purpose of enabling each member to receive out of the funds of the society the amount or value of his or her share or shares therein, to erect or purchase one or more dwelling house or dwelling houses, &c., or household estate, to be secured by way of mortgage until the amount of the value of his or her estate shall be repaid, and until all fines shall have been paid. Then they have power to constitute rules and regulations for their government, provided they are not repugnant to the express provisions of the Act and the general laws of the realm. They are empowered also to impose fines, penalties, and forfeitures. Then these rules are to be certified in the manner provided with reference to friendly societies, and for that particular purpose we may refer to what has to be done in the case before us. The rule contained in 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 40 enables the barrister to certify the rules, and he is to certify whether or not they are contrary to the law, and his certificate is to be conclusive and binding.

With regard to the argument in this case, two points have been raised by those who contest the decision of the Vice-Chancellor; the one is, that the rule itself is not ultra vires, regard being had to the Act; and the other is, that if there be a doubt upon that subject (as I understand the argument, it can hardly be put higher), the certificate of the barrister, who is competent to determine the legal question, should be adopted by us as conclusive. We cannot adopt any possible view of the certificate of the barrister in the particular case before us which would render it conclusive. It could not be contended, and it hardly was contended, that, if the matter was plainly ultra vires, any certificate of the barrister could prevent the court from interfering so as to prevent an abuse of power on the part of persons who have certain privileges conferred upon them by Parliament. If there was such an abuse of power, the certificate of the barrister would have no effect whatever. The words which render him competent to decide upon the legality of the instrument submitted to him clearly must be confined to such grounds as are too narrow to allow the application of his judgment to such a case as that before us. They are confined probably to regulations affecting the interests of the members inter se. He has to decide whether there is anything contrary to the law, regard being had to the true construction of the Act of Parliament, in the members themselves entering into engagements which might seem to be such as the majority were not entitled to bind the minority by. Some minor particulars of that description possibly might come before him for his judgment. But it is not necessary to enter more into that part of the case than to say that it could not possibly apply to such a case as we have before us. For if the law prohibited the raising of these sums of money, I apprehend no certificate of the barrister could avail. Now, does the Act of Parliament, in anything that we have read, in fact contravene or forbid any such arrangement as is here made? If the rule had been a rule by which the company were authorised through the medium of its trustees to raise an unlimited sum of money wholly regardless of all these contributions which might be made by its members, that, no doubt, would be contrary to the intent and scope of the Act. The Act states that the members amongst themselves, by their contributions, by their fines, and by any other payments that they may make in furtherance of the objects to be attained under the Act of Parliament, shall form a fund out of which moneys shall be raised. They are raised, first, by weekly contributions of the members; secondly, by fines; and thirdly, by the payments of those who are desirous of acquiring land. If there is only a small amount of money in hand, and there are several persons desirous of having an advance, they may be disposed to pay a high rate of interest, or pay something down in the shape of bonus, and that of course would fall into and form part of the society's funds.

Then comes the question (the society having these funds), are they or are they not to be allowed to manage those funds in such a way as they may think best and most conducive to their own interests? The funds of the society are simply the aggregation of all the payments by the members of the sums of money in respect of their shares, payments of fines, and any other payments that they may be advised to make for the objects of the society, namely, to obtain advances for the purchase of land. Take first the question of investing, instead of borrowing. There is nothing in the Act of Parliament expressly relating to investing, but it is clear that they may invest, because there is a prohibition against investing in a particular mode, namely, in the savings banks. That is just one of the things, I apprehethat are left to them to frame rules about, and the barrister is to certify as to whether the rules that they may make with regard to investment are reasonable and proper. Then if they have power to invest their money, there may be several members desirous of purchasing land, and it might be inconvenient for the society at the moment to dispose of those investments. Their investments might be in the funds, and the funds might be very low; it might be inexpedient to sell out at that time, and the natural course would be to procure the money elsewhere. In the case I have put, the necessity for finding funds would arise at the time when several people were desirous of procuring an advance, and when probably a high rate of interest would be paid. They are at liberty to borrow at 5 per cent., whereas by their own Act of Parliament there is no limit with respect to the usury laws, and they may take any amount of interest—6 or 7 or 8 per cent., from those who may be desirous of procuring an advance to attain the object which the Act contemplates—viz., the purchase of land or the erection of a building, or otherwise as they may be disposed. It is a simple regulation by which they say "We are desirous of making available, in the best possible manner for us all, our contributions of 20*s*. a share, the fines and other payments for the objects of the Act;" and to say that it will injure one set or the other, when the company frames its own rules, is nothing to the purpose. They are the best judges of that. The whole body frames the rules, and each man judges for himself. They carry the rules by a majority, and submit them to the barrister. Each man considers for himself what is most advantageous in dealing with the funds with which they may be provided. The power of dealing with those funds may be regulated by investment on the one hand, and by borrowing on the other, provided always that the borrowing is only to be exercised to the extent originally contemplated in the formation of the company—viz., two-thirds of the amount that may be outstanding upon mortgage, which mortgage is granted under the provisions of the Act. They simply say, "This is a course of procedure in which we are following out the objects of the Act, a procedure by which land may be acquired, a procedure by which mortgages have been given, and to the extent of two-thirds of those mortgages we will avail ourselves of the opportunity of dealing with our own property which the Legislature intended to give us. We will ask nobody to advance a farthing more than the Legislature shall sanction, we will raise upon the security of two-thirds of what the Legislature has so sanctioned sums of money which may enable us, at convenient times, to advance, by means of cash advances procured from our bankers, or otherwise, the sum of money which is desired of us without having to dispose of our investments in a disadvantageous manner." It might, in truth, so happen, that an overdraught at the bankers might be the mode of doing it. There might be 300*l*. or 400*l*. wanted, and there might be only 200*l*. or 300*l* in hand (of course in such a society as this the figures would be larger), and the difference might be met by over-drawing the account at the bankers. Would anybody say that that would be an irregular course, provided always that the borrowing did not exceed the proper amount? It seems to me, therefore, that if the Vice-Chancellor had given his mind fully to the construction of the Act, which he expressly avoided doing, because he says he would rather have fuller information before coming to a conclusion strictly upon the Act of Parliament, he would in all probability have come to the same conclusion as ourselves, viz., that the rule complained of is not in itself in excess of the power; and therefore there is nothing in the bill before us which can raise any reasonable ground of relief against these defendants. Neither, as I conceive, was it intended that the case should go any further than the bill represents, for I think that the bill represents all the facts for the purpose of obtaining the decision of the court. Upon that point of law our decision is adverse to the plaintiff. The demurrer ought to be allowed, and the usual consequences follow. There will be no costs of appeal.

Digitized by Google

Lord Justice GIFFARD said.—I think this is a case which ought clearly to be decided on demurrer, and for this reason, that the whole case in the bill raises one simple question as to the effect of a particular rule. There is no allegation in the bill that the 66,000*l*. exceeds the amount which might be raised under the articles, nor is there an allegation that the amount has been raised otherwise than for the purposes of the society. I quite agree with the Vice-Chancellor that the certificate is not conclusive where the rule is either contrary to the general law, or repugnant to the express provisions of the Act, and I take it that the rule would have been repugnant to the express provisions of the Act if it had been a rule which had made the society a thing different from that which is specified in the Act, and meant by the Act; if, for instance, it had made the society an insurance society, or a discount society, or a bank, then I think it would have been repugnant to the Act, and the certificate would not be conclusive. But what we really have to inquire on the present occasion is this: first of all, is there any special provision in the Act forbidding this borrowing. The answer is, no, there is no such provision. Then, secondly, is or is not this provision a provision providing for a method of conducting business, or is it a provision for making the society a thing different from a benefit building society? In my opinion it is not a provision for making the society a thing different from a building society, but it is a rule laying down a mode of conducting the business of the society as the members may think fit. That being so, I think the demurrer should be allowed.

Solicitors for the defendants appealing, Shum and Crossman.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, John Tucker.

Dec. 20, 21, and 22, 1869, and Jan. 12, 1870.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR and Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re THE FAMILY ENDOWMENT, &c. SOCIETY.

Unregistered Company—Amalgamation before Companies Act 1862—Jurisdiction—Winding-up—Contract—Novation of debt.

The F. Society, formed in 1835, agreed in 1861 to transfer its business and assets to the A. Company, which undertook all its liabilities. From that time the F. Society had no place of business, and no directors or secretary, except in so far as the private Act of Parliament regulating its affairs provided that the persons last memorialised as filling such offices, should, until the memorialising of their successors, continue liable to all proceedings as if they had not ceased to be such officers. In pursuance of the amalgamation, and in conformity with other provisions of the Act, the society was duly dissolved and discontinued business, and it was never registered under the Companies' Act 1862:

Held (affirming the decision of James, V.C.), that, notwithstanding these circumstances, the society was within the purview of the Companies' Act 1862, the very object of which was to provide an efficacious mode of winding-up the affairs of joint-stock companies; and, therefore, although the amalgamation had taken place before that Act, a winding-up order was made on the petition of an unsatisfied creditor.

An unregistered company is to be deemed to have been registered at its principal place of business.

Such a company comes within the purview of the Act of 1862, so long as anything remains to be done for the winding-up of its affairs, either as regards the members inter se, or as regards the creditors.

The petitioner bought of the society two annuities, and had paid to them before the amalgamation the whole of the purchase-money by the instalments agreed on. He became aware of the amalgamation, and received for several years payments of the annuities from the A. Company, to whom he gave receipts:

Held, that nothing short of a new contract between him and the A. Company would amount to an extinguishment of his rights against the F. Society; and, as no such new contract had ever been made, the petitioner was entitled to a winding-up order against the latter, when, by reason of the insolvency of the former, the payments of his annuities had ceased.

This was an appeal by certain shareholders of the Family Endowment Life Assurance and Annuity Society against an order of James, V.C., the hearing before whom is reported in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485. There, and in the judgments which follow, all necessary facts are stated.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., Higgins, and Bethell, supported the appeal.

Fry, Q. C. and Westlake were for the petitioner; and Kekewich for some of the latest directors of the Endowment Society, upon whom, by leave of the court, the petition had been served.

In addition to the authorities mentioned in the previous report, the following were referred to:

Benson v. Hadfield, 4 Hare, 32;
Thompson v. Percival, 5 B. & Ad. 925;
Evans v. Coventry, 5 De G. M. & G. 911.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C. having replied,

Their Lordships reserved judgment until the 12th Jan., when

The LORD CHANCELLOR said: The petition of appeal in this case is presented by a contributory of the society against an order of James, V.C., made on the petition of General Pott, by which the Vice-Chancellor ordered the society to be wound-up, and gave certain directions as to costs. The appellant alleges that the order is erroneous on two grounds. First, that the society is not within the purview of the Companies' Act 1862; secondly, that if this be not so, yet General Pott is not entitled to apply for a winding-up order, on the ground that, although he was originally a creditor of the society, he has ceased to be so, and has accepted the Albert Life Assurance Company as his debtors in lieu of the society. The facts are as follows: The society was formed, pursuant to the provisions of a special Act of Parliament which received the Royal assent in May 1836, by which the society could sue and be sued in the name of any director, or of their chairman or secretary, and persons suing them were authorised to join any proprietor as a defendant. Judgments also obtained against a director, or the chairman or secretary, might be enforced by execution issued against any proprietor in manner therein provided. A memorial was to be enrolled in Chancery from time to time, containing the names of the officers and proprietors, and the persons whose names should have been last enrolled were to continue liable to actions and suits notwithstanding their having ceased to fill the office or position of director, chairman, secretary, or proprietor. A deed of settlement of the society was executed, dated Jan. 1837. The clauses of this deed which have a special bearing on the present controversy are the second, by which the proprietors inter se are to be liable only to the extent of their unpaid calls on shares; the third, which defines the objects of the society, one of which was to grant deferred annuities; the 38th, by which power is given to dissolve the society by a resolution of two successive meetings, to be passed as therein mentioned; the 75th, by which the directors are empowered to make and vary laws and regulations, but not so as to vary or limit the responsibility of the shareholders on their respective shares as between themselves; and the 122nd, which it is important to refer to more fully. [His Lordship here read the 122nd clause of the society's deed, the whole of which will be found at p. 486 of the earlier report.]

The society thus constituted entered into a contract with General Pott, dated 12th March 1849, by which, in consideration of monthly payments to be made by him for a term ending 22nd Jan. 1861, the society engaged to pay him an annuity of 1000 rupees, commencing on the 26th Aug., 1861, or the 26th Feb., 1862, according as he should then be in India or in England, with a proviso that the capital or other the stocks, funds, and securities of the company remaining (at the time of any claim or demand made) unapplied and undisposed of, in pursuance of the provisions of the deed of settlement, should alone be liable to make good the demand. On the 11th June, 1850, a similar contract was entered into between the society and the General, whereby, in consideration of payments to be made by him ceasing before the commencement of the annuity, another annuity of 1000 rupees was granted, commencing on the 1st Dec. 1857, or the 1st June 1858, and charged in like manner alone upon the capital and assets of the society. Early in 1861 arrangements seem to have been contemplated for closing the business of the society, and transferring its assets and liabilities to another company, then called the Albert and Medical Life Assurance Company, and articles of agreement were executed on the 5th Feb. 1861, by the directors of the society on the one part and the directors of the Albert Company on the other, whereby, subject to the approval of extraordinary general meetings of the proprietors of the society, it was agreed for the consideration therein mentioned, that, as from the 1st Jan. 1861, the business of the society should be deemed to have been transferred to and vested in the company. All the property, credits, securities, and effects of the society were, as from the same date, to become the property of the company, and to be transferred to them, and all the debts, engagements, and liabilities of the society, and all claims against them, were to be wholly paid and performed by the company, who were at all times to indemnify the society, its officers and shareholders, in respect thereof. The two parties further agreed to use their best endeavours to procure policy-holders of the society to exchange their policies for those of the company. The books of the society were to be handed over to the company, and the company were authorised to use the names of the directors of the society when necessary. The proprietors of the society held meetings in March 1861, pursuant to their deed, at which they agreed to dissolve their society, and to hand over their assets to the Albert Company for the consideration mentioned in the agreement of February, and upon the terms mentioned in that agreement. The proprietors of the company seem in like manner to have acquiesced in the arrangement, and from the time of the agreement the Albert Company transacted at the offices of their company all the business formerly carried on by the society, and intermingled the business transferred to them with their own business, at the same time changing their title of Albert and Medical Life Assurance Company to that of the Albert Medical and Family Endowment Life Assurance Company. The Endowment Society appears from the period of dissolution in 1861 not to have entered into any new business, nor to have retained any active staff, and the only memorial containing the names of directors, enrolled pursuant to their special Act, seems to have been enrolled on the 17th Aug. 1836. The place where the society carried on its business up to the dissolution is stated in the petition of General Pott to have been pulled down, and they seem to have had no place of business after the beginning of 1861.

Digitized by Google

This is the proper place at which to pause with reference to the first question, as to whether or not the society is within the purview of the Companies Act 1862. It is contended that the 8th part of the Act of 1862 is inapplicable to any company in such a position as that in which the Endowment Society was placed at the passing of the Act; and that the society had been dissolved in March 1861, more than one year before the passing of the Act; that it had ceased to carry on business, and that by the agreement with the Albert Company, which it is said that the directors of the Endowment Society were fully authorised to enter into, the society had parted with its assets, that the shareholders of the society had been paid all that they would be entitled to under the agreement, and that the payment of the creditors had also been provided for by the agreement. In support of this view it was further argued that the very terms of the 199th section of the Act point to companies still carrying on business, by defining the jurisdiction of the court with reference to the position of the place of business of the company within the United Kingdom, whereas the society had, at the passing of the Act, no place of business whatever. I think that these arguments cannot prevail. The society was originally a society or company of more than seven members, carrying on business in the United Kingdom at a definite place of business, and was not a registered company under the Act of 1862. Let us suppose that it had been properly dissolved a week or two before the passing of that Act of Parliament, but had still to wind-up its affairs in the usual manner. The obligations of such a company would necessarily from their very nature require time for their complete fulfilment. The object of the Act of 1862 was to give to joint-stock companies and to those dealing with them an efficacious mode of winding-up their affairs, and dissolution is the very condition of a company which is first set forth in section 199, as properly calling for the intervention of the court. The contract of partnership is no doubt put an end to as regards the future by dissolution, but the rights of the parties inter se, and the rights of third parties as against them, have after dissolution yet to be adjusted, and for that purpose all the provisions of the original contract must be applied. All well drawn deeds of settlement make provision for that purpose, and the present deed of the Endowment Society is not an exception. The 122nd section of that deed properly directs that all the powers of the directors shall continue for the complete winding-up of the concern. The creditors of the concern, in the case which I have put of dissolution immediately before the Act, could have proceeded against the society in bankruptcy, or could by action against the officers obtain judgment, to be enforced under the special Act of 1836, as regards the proprietors, to the extent of the unpaid calls. The shareholders would, but for the Act of 1862, have been compelled in case of dispute to seek relief in Chancery for the adjustment of their rights. Can it be said that this state of things was not one for which the statute of 1862 intended to provide a more adequate remedy without creating a new right? I think not. Ought the circumstance, then, of the assignment of the assets, and of the place of business, to the Albert Company, and the assumption by that company of the liabilities of the society, to make any difference in the construction of the Act as to its applicability to the society? The creditors are not parties to the agreement between the society and the company, and in the consideration of the question of the applicability of the Act I ought to assume that they have not acquiesced in the provisions of that agreement. The Act was intended, as I hold, if this agreement had not existed, for the benefit of such creditors, and a transaction behind their backs cannot deprive them of that benefit. With reference to the directions contained in the 199th section as to the jurisdiction of the court, which is to be ascertained by "the principal place of business of the company in the United Kingdom," it is obvious that in the case of companies which cease after the passing of the Act to carry on business (mentioned in the sub-section of sect. 199) the place where it was, before such cessor, carried on must be intended, and the same construction would be proper, therefore, in the case of a business which had ceased before the Act, but which had at that time not been wound-up. I cannot doubt, therefore, that the society in question was within the purview of the Act so long as there remained anything to be done with reference to winding-up its affairs, either as regards the parties inter se, or as regards the creditors of the society. Of course, if all the rights of the proprietors and creditors had been ascertained satisfactorily, the Act would have had no room for application in the case of such a company. But that is not the case here.

The second question on this appeal is whether Gen. Pott is in effect to be deemed to be a creditor of the Endowment Society. That he was originally such a creditor under the two contracts of 1849 and 1850 is not disputed, but it is said that he must be taken to have accepted the Albert Company as his debtors in substitution for the society, who, to the extent of their assets, including calls payable under their deed of settlement, were his original debtors. He admits in his evidence that he was aware of the society having made an arrangement with the Albert, by which, as he expresses it, he thought "they and the Albert were one;" and I think that is the strongest expression that is made use of by way of admission in his evidence. He does not recollect receiving the circular which is said, but not proved, to have been sent round to all the policy-holders; but I do not think it would have made any material difference if he had done so, for reasons not necessary to enter into more fully. He admits attending at the office of the Albert Company for payment of his annuity from Aug. 1862 down to June 1869, shortly before the stoppage of the Albert, and certain receipts and certificates are put in evidence which are of importance on this part of the case. The Albert Company in making payments to the grantees of annuities required a certificate of the grantee's existence and identity, and the certificates were in this or a similar form: "I hereby certify that Col. S. Pott, described in an annuity grant of the Albert Medical and Family Endowment Life Assurance Company as of Meltrose, and whose signature is affixed below, is now living at" (such and such a place). This is signed in each case by the General. The directions accompanying this certificate are as follows: "The annuity cannot be paid unless the following rules are strictly observed: 1. A certificate in the above form must be obtained from the officiating minister of the parish, a justice of the peace, or one of the company's agents, on the day or some day after the annuity becomes due; 2. All the blank spaces as in the above form must be filled up accurately, and the certificate must be free from any erasure or alteration, or otherwise it will not be accepted as sufficient authority for paying the annuity; 3. The annuity will be paid at the office on presentation of the certificate and receipt by some respectable party or through a banker." I read that to show that these forms, which were insisted on by the company, and which the General submitted to comply with, were the rules in the shape in which they are here put, but at the same time we must look at what the certificate itself purports to be. It is a certificate with respect to a person who is named in a certain instrument, and that certain instrument is the original istrument granted by the Family Endowment Society, and no other. The first receipt of Aug. 1862 runs thus: "Received of the Albert Medical and Family Endowment Company the sum of 500 rupees, being the amount of half-yearly payment of an annuity No. 2, due to me on the 26th Aug. 1862." In the certificate of Aug. 1864, the General is mentioned "as described in a grant of the Albert Life Assurance Company," and some, but not all, the subsequent receipts mention the money to be received of "The Albert Life Assurance Company," changing the name; omitting the word "Endowment." Now, the question is whether, under all these circumstances, the General accepted the total change of contract necessary to substitute the company for the society as his debtors. The question is one of fact, and, on that account, although I have carefully read the cases which were referred to in argument, it seems to me unnecessary to make more allusion to them—it being a case which must be determined upon the special facts which are before the court. It was justly, I think, observed by the learned Vice-Chancellor in his judgment, as it had previously been observed by other judges, that very slight evidence is sufficient in the course of dealing between a customer and a firm, subject to change by the retirement of old partners and the introduction of new, to show that the customer continuing his dealings accepts the new firm as his debtors in lieu of the old firm, though even then it is necessary that knowledge of the change in the firm should be brought home to the creditor. The cases which have occurred on the subject are usually cases of business of an ordinary character, where a new partner simply unites with others in carrying on a business in a settled course as it went on before, and either invoices or pass-books, as the case may be, passing between the customer and the continuing firm afford the usual evidence of the change of firm. But that which has here to be proved is that a creditor having an instrument upon which he can rely as creating a right of suit against all the assets of the society with which he deals, including all the unpaid calls for which the proprietors are liable, has abandoned that definite claim for a claim upon the assets of another company with which he has no direct contract, including the liability (if any) of the shareholders in that other company for calls. The general has never been asked to enter into any fresh contract, by which such substitution might have been effected beyond all doubt. He has paid nothing to the new company, for all the payments on his part had been made before the arrangement between the company and the society. He has given receipts for payments of his annuity, which are expressed in the first receipt to be for payments ie by the Albert Medical and Family Endowment Society on annuity No. 2, and in the first and following certificates signed by him he is referred to as described "in an annuity grant of the Albert Medical and Family Endowment Life Assurance Company." He must, therefore, be taken as founding his claim on this grant, and to have given his receipt in respect of it. No other grant can be produced than that made originally by the society. Why should he be led to suppose in thus acting that the new company from whom he received the money had treated this grant as one binding on all their own proper shareholders, and that they were not acting as agents for the society, the original grantors, making the payments out of the assets of the original concern, which, in truth, by the terms of that grant, formed the proper fund for that purpose? There would be nothing necessarily inconsistent with the union of the society and the company (the fact of which union the General admits he knew) that the company should keep the assets of the society distinct from their own, and should, as agents of the society, make out of such assets all the payments to which they were liable, and which might otherwise be provided for with regard to creditors, whatever the arrangement migl t be as to the balance, with which, of course, the creditors would have nothing to do. The General could not have sued the Albert shareholders, as he might, under the special Act, have sued and obtained judgment against the shareholders of the society to the extent of their calls, and he cannot be affected by the provisions of the deed between the companies to which he was no party, and of which provisions no knowledge can be imputed to him. It was said he might have obtained an injunction to prevent a transfer of the assets. But why should he do so, if he was satisfied with the liability of the proprietors for their calls? The union of two companies, formed originally under separate deeds, by which the proprietors respectively stipulate for a limited liability—viz, a liability to the extent of the assets and the calls due from themselves—is a very different thing from the admission of a new partner into an old-established firm, with all the usual consequences of such an admission; and the abandonment by a creditor of a written definite contract with one company for an unwritten engagement by the new company, to be arrived at through the medium of very special arrangements between the two companies, is a matter requiring far more cogent and precise proof than that of the assumption by a continuing customer of the liability of the firm with which he continues his dealing, in lieu of that of its predecessor. Here the Albert Company, who, by the stipulations of its agreement, might have made provision for substituting a new contract, continued to make payments and to take receipts on the footing of the original contract. It would much shake public confidence in dealing with insurance companies, and therefore be greatly to the detriment of such companies, no less than to that of their customers, if the court were to hold that a person having the security of the assets of one company should be deemed to have discharged those assets, and to have accepted the liability of another company, merely because the second company, possessing the assets of the first, pays to the creditor his growing annuity on the footing of his grant. Something more is required, as it seems to me, to bring home to the annuitant a knowledge that by such payment, which might well be made out of the transferred assets, the new company intends to enter into a new contract with him for payment of his annuity out of a totally different fund. I have assumed that all the proceedings between the society and the company were warranted by their respective deeds, and there is no necessity for me to raise any doubt upon that subject, for my decision is independent of that question; but one cannot help observing the great difference that exists between an ordinary succession in a partnership and a transaction of this nature. In order to prove the acquiescence of a creditor to the change of his debtor, he must be assumed to have satisfied himself that the substitution could legitimately be made—an assumption which is in the highest degree improbable. On the other hand, nothing could be more easy than for the new company, if it so intended, to have obtained a clear recognition of their contract by the General, or his equally clear rejection of it. I am of opinion, therefore, that the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor is correct, and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs to be paid by the appellants to General Pott.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—Two questions were argued and have to be decided in this case; one, whether the Family Endowment Society is within the operation of the Winding-up Act of 1862; the other, whether General Pott has continued or ceased to be a creditor of the society. It was argued that the Family Endowment Society was not within the operation of the Act of 1862, because it was an unregistered company; because it could not have been wound-up under any Act which existed previously to its dissolution, though liable to be made bankrupt—not a practical or effective remedy—and because it ceased to carry on business or have any place of business, and was dissolved and amalgamated, as it is termed, with the Albert Company, before Nov. 1862. In answer to the facts so alleged in argument it was said, and truly said, that a creditor of the society could and can sue under the society's private Act of Parliament, which gives remedies against its directors and shareholders, and that, amongst other Acts repealed by the Act of 1862, is that under which the society might have been made bankrupt, and observations were made on the Winding-up Act. The 205th and 207th sections of the Winding-up Act of 1862 are the repealing sections. The 2nd section of the Act enacts that the Act is not to come into operation until the 2nd Nov. 1862. The Act reciting that it is expedient that the laws relative to the incorporation, regulation, and winding-up of trading companies, and other associations, should be consolidated and amended, was passed on that foot ing and for that purpose, and the 199th section is as follows:—"Subject, as hereunder mentioned, any partnership, association, or company, except railway companies incorporated by Act of Parliament, consisting of more than seven members, and not registered under this Act, and hereinafter included under the term 'unregistered company,' may be wound-up under this Act, and all the provisions of this Act with respect to winding-up shall apply to such company, with the following exceptions and additions:—An unregistered company shall, for the purposes of determining the court having jurisdiction in the matter of the winding-up, be deemed to be registered in that part of the United Kingdom where its principal place of business is situate, or, if it has a principal place of business situate in more than one part of the United Kingdom, then in each part of the United Kingdom where it has a principal place of business." Then, the circumstances under which an unregistered company may be wound-up are as follows—that is to say, whenever the company is dissolved, or has ceased to carry on business, or is carrying on business only for the purpose of winding-up its affairs; whenever the company is unable to pay its debts; whenever the company is of opinion that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound-up. It is to be observed that the Act is a remedial Act; that it gives new remedies in respect of old existing rights, and that, as regards creditors generally, it takes away some of their remedies and gives them others and more effective ones. If, therefore, there be a society or association not registered under the Act consisting of more than seven members, and the petitioner is a creditor for more than 50*l.*, and the company, in the terms of the Act, "is dissolved, or has ceased to carry on business," there seems no reason why the creditor should not have his remedy under this Act, unless by its terms he is plainly excluded. That there is such a society or association in existence I can have no doubt; for whatever resolutions the shareholders may have passed inter se with reference to a dissolution, they have and had no power to extinguish, and could not and cannot extinguish, the society or association, or their liabilities as shareholders, as against any unsatisfied creditor. A society or association which is in a sense dissolved is expressly liable under the section. The only argument on the actual terms of the 199th section really was on the use of the present tense, and particularly the word "is." One finds a frequent repetition of this word—not, however, for the purpose of fixing any particular time at which the business must be or has been carried on, but for the purpose of fixing the domicile of the company, and I feel no difficulty in holding the meaning of the first part of the section to be, that an unregistered company shall be deemed to have been registered at its principal place or places of business. Where the dissolution of a company is referred to, "is" plainly means "has been," and I am further of opinion that the Albert Office might well, under the circumstances, be deemed to be the office of the society. There are, therefore, no grounds for holding that the Family Endowment Society is not within the operation of the Companies Act 1862.

The next question may be disposed of as readily as the first. General Pott paid the Endowment Society, before its dissolution or amalgamation, certain sums of money, in respect of, and in consideration for, which two annuities were granted to him. He neither paid any sum of money to, nor received any grant from, the Albert Company, nor was there any written contract of any kind between him and that company, or any communication from the company to him, or from him to the company, of any contract between him and them. The contracts between General Pott and the Endowment Society are contained in two written documents, each signed by three directors of the society, and each in the particulars material to this case substantially to the same effect.

The heading is as follows: "Empowered by Special Act of Parliament. The Family Endowment Life Assurance and Annuity Society. Indian branch," and then the amount of the annuity is stated. There is then a recital that "Stephen Pott hath proposed to contract with the Family Endowment Society for the purchase of an annuity of company's rupees 1,000, to commence at such time, to continue payable during such period, and to be paid in such manner as hereinafter stated; and hath delivered into the office of the said society a statement in writing dated the 26th Feb. 1849, containing the terms, and stating the facts and circumstances upon, and in reference to, which the said contract is proposed to be effected, and which statement he thereby agreed should be the basis of the contract with the said society;" and then it is witnessed that it is thereby declared on behalf of the said society by the three directors whose names are thereunto subscribed, that, in consideration of the sum paid, certain annual payments should be made at the times therein mentioned. Then there is a proviso that "in case any untrue or fraudulent allegation should be contained in the said statement so delivered into the office of the said society as aforesaid, then the contract should be void, and all moneys paid thereunder should be forfeited to the said society." There was a further proviso that the contract and the annuity thereby assured should be subject to the considerations thereupon indorsed, and a further proviso that the subscribed capital of 500,000*l.*, and other the stocks, funds, securities, and property of the said society, remaining at the time of any claim or demand made, unapplied and undisposed of in pursuance of the provisions and authorities contained in the said deed or deeds of settlement, should alone be liable to answer and make good all claims and demands upon the said society, and that no director or other proprietor of the said society, his heirs, executors, or administrators should, by reason of any contract, or of the whole of the contracts taken together, which any director had signed, or might sign, be in anywise individually subject or liable to any such claims or demands beyond the amount of the unpaid part of his share or shares in the said subscribed capital of 500,000*l.*; and it is provided, lastly, that the undersigned directors, or any of them, their heirs, executors, or administrators, should not demur for want of parties to any bill which might be filed against them in any court of equity respecting any claim upon that contract, nor take any formal or technical objection whereby a fair and just investigation of the merits of any question arising upon the validity of such claim might be prevented, or in any manner obstructed; and then the proviso is to be without prejudice to the limited responsibilities of the directors and proprietors of the society, established by the last proviso. It is needless to remark that this contract is of a special nature.

The dissolution of the Endowment Society and its amalgamation with the Albert Company took place early in 1861. General Pott was cross-examined. He admitted that he learnt of the dissolution of the Endowment Society from the newspapers; that he talked of the amalgamation with his friends; and that he applied to the Albert Society and received payment of his annuity from them, but not, he says, in pursuance of any written direction from the Albert.

The receipts given to the Albert are in evidence. The first of them is for the amount due on the 26th Aug. 1862, and they continue down to June 1869. They were accompanied with certificates. The receipts purport to be given to the Albert, or the directors of the Albert, in consideration of payment made by the Albert, or the directors of the Albert. One of the certificates is in the following form: "To the directors of the Albert Medical and Family Endowment Life Assurance Company.—I hereby certify that General S. Pott, described in an annuity grant of the Albert Medical and Family Endowment Life Assurance as of Melrose, and whose signature is affixed below, is now living at Melrose." One of the receipts is in this form: "Received of the directors of the Albert, &c., Company the sum of 50*l.*, being half year's annuity on the life of Stephen Pott, due on the 26th Feb. 1863, under the company's annuity policy grant No. 2." I take these as samples. They are receipts and certificates having reference to the subsisting grants; no new grant to, or contract with, General Pott is suggested. The terms of the arrangement between the Endowment Society and the Albert were not disclosed to General Pott; no assent to any new contract was asked for. The assets and share capital of the Endowment Society were made liable by the grants of annuities to General Pott, and could, as against General Pott, be dealt with only as being so liable. Nothing short of a new contract between him and the Albert in discharge of his rights against the Endowment Society could amount to an extinguishment of these rights. There was, it is true, direct contract as between the Endowment Society and the Albert, and the fifth term of the contract is this:—"All premiums and other sums of money after the 1st Jan. 1861, paid, or payable upon, or in respect of, policies of assurance, or upon, or in respect of endowments, grants, or engagements of the society, in force on that day, shall belong to, and be the property of the company, and all risks, engagements, and liabilities upon, or in respect of, all such policies, endowments, grants, or engagements, and also all charges and expenses connected therewith, shall be borne, and paid and satisfied by and out of the funds of the company." But General Pott was no party to this contract. And the sixth term is this:—"The society and the company shall respectively use their best endeavours to procure the several persons holding or entitled to policies, endowments, grants, deeds of covenant, or other engagements of the society, or of the said Empire Assurance Company, to accept in exchange or in renewal policies, endowments, grants, deeds of covenant, or engagements of the company; and the company will, at their own expense, on the application of the persons interested therein, respectively grant, execute, and deliver such substituted or renewed policies, endowments, grants, deeds of covenant or engagements to the several persons willing to accept the same." Either the society or the company might have taken action on this sixth term, but as regards General Pott neither of them did so. The actual contract between the society and the company might well have been very different to what it was. It was not incumbent on General Pott to make inquiries as to the terms of arrangement between the society and the company, nor can a knowledge of them be imputed to him. The arrangement might well have been, and in the absence of assents from General Pott to the contrary, ought to have been, that the assets and capital of the society should remain liable under the annuity grant. It was incumbent on those who desired that the old contracts should be superseded by a new one, to make proposals to that effect, or take steps for that purpose; but they forbore or neglected to do so. The whole question is one of fact, as is clear from the authorities, and on the facts I am of opinion that General Pott remained and continues to be a creditor of the Endowment Society, and never agreed to become a creditor of the Albert.

In the course of the argument the 122nd clause of the Endowment Society's deed of settlement was referred to. There were also suggestions that an action ought to be brought, and that there are equitable reasons why a winding-up order should not have been made. The 122nd clause assists the respondent rather than the appellants. General Pott's debt is clearly due from the society. He has entered into no new contract. He has done nothing to disentitle him to his plain rights, and there is every reason why a winding-up order should have been made. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

On the application of Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., their Lordships allowed to the appellants ten days to consider whether any arrangement could be made for paying the debt due to General Pott before drawing up the order.

Solicitors for the appellants, Maynard and Co.

Solicitors for the other parties, Clayton and Sons; Freshfields; Lewis, Munns, and Co.

Digitized by Google

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PEAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, Jan. 22.

Re HATTATT'S WILL.

Appointment of new trustees—Husband of lady interested in trust fund—Undertaking.

The husband of a lady having a life interest in a trust-fund, appointed one of two new trustees of the fund on his giving an undertaking that, in the event of his at any time becoming sole trustee, he would at once take all necessary steps for the appointment of some person to be his co-trustee.

This was a petition under the Trustee Acts for the appointment of new trustees of the will of one Hattatt. Of the two persons proposed to be appointed, one was the husband of a lady who had a life interest in the trust fund.

Speed appeared in support of the petition.

Lord ROMILLY, after expressing some doubt as to the desirability of appointing the husband of a lady interested in the fund, said that he would make the order on the husband giving an undertaking that, in the event of his at any time becoming sole trustee, he would at once take all necessary steps for the appointment of some person to be his co-trustee.

Solicitors: Taylor, Hoare, and Taylor.

Saturday, Jan. 29.

Re WINTLE.

Evidence—Date of birth—Registrar's certificate—6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 86, s. 38.

Where a birth is not registered till some days after the date of the birth, the registrar's certificate that the child was born on a certain day previous to the date of registration, is not evidence of the child having been born on such previous day.

This was a petition for payment of a fund in court to a person who became entitled to it on attaining the age of twenty-one. The registrar's certificate that the person entitled was born on the 23rd Jan. 1849, but that the birth was not registered till the 13th Feb. 1849, was the only evidence produced of the person having attained twenty-one.

Phear, in support of the petition, contended that the registrar's certificate was evidence of the date of the birth, by the 38th section of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 86, which provides that the Registrar-General shall cause to be made a seal of the said register office, and the Registrar-General shall cause to be sealed or stamped therewith all certified copies of entries given in the said office; and all certified copies of entries purporting to be sealed or stamped with the seal of the said register office, shall be received as evidence of the birth, death, or marriage to which the same relates, without any further or other proof of such entry; and no certified copy purporting to be given in the said office shall be of any force or effect, which is not sealed or stamped as aforesaid.

Hance appeared for the trustees.

Lord ROMILLY.—The registrar's certificate is only evidence that the child was living on the 13th Feb. 1849, and not that it was born on any previous day. I can, therefore, make no order on the petition until the 13th Feb. next, unless further evidence of the date of the petitioner's birth is produced.

Solicitor, C. Blake.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Jan. 20 and 21.

Re BELL'S ESTATE; FOSTER v. BELL.

Practice—Committal of receiver for contempt—Attachment—Cons. Ord. xxxv., r. 23.

A receiver who disregarded a four days' order for payment of a balance certified to be due from him, committed for contempt.

This was a motion for an order to commit a receiver for contempt, under these circumstances.

On the 6th Aug. 1869, the chief clerk having certified that a balance of 1138*l.* was due from the receiver in the cause, an order was made that he should pay the same into court on or before the 27th Aug. 1869. No payment having been made by the receiver in pursuance of this order, the defendant on the 17th Dec. obtained the usual four days' order against him. This order was also disregarded, and the defendant then applied under the 29th of the Consolidated Orders to the record and writ clerk's office for an attachment. The clerk of record and writs however objected to issue an attachment, as being contrary to modern practice, but advised the defendant to apply to the court for an order to commit. Hence this motion.

George Williamson in support of the motion.

W. W. Cooper, for the receiver, submitted that the proper course was to obtain an attachment. He referred to Daniell's Chanc. Pract. 1591, note (x), 4th edit;

Morgan's Chanc. Pract. 552;
Cons. Ord. xxxv. r. 23;
Whitehead v. Lynes, 34 Beav. 161; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 332.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR directed the motion to stand over until the following day, that it might be ascertained whether it was the practice to move to commit, or to proceed by way of attachment.

Jan. 21.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR, having communicated with the record and writ clerk, made an order to commit the receiver.

Solicitors for the defendant, Williamson, Hill, and Co.

Solicitors for the receiver, Scott and Co.

Thursday, Jan. 27.

BOURTON v. WILLIAMS.

Mortgagor and mortgagee—Payment of mortgage money into court under 7 Geo. 2, c. 20—Order of discharge necessary for release of mortgagor.

Payment by a mortgagor of the mortgage money into court, under 7 Geo. 2, c. 20, does not operate as a release of the debt without an order of discharge from the court.

A married woman prior to her marriage advanced 200l. on a mortgage security. The marriage settlement did not include the 200l. After the marriage the husband and wife separated, and shortly afterwards the husband brought an action in his own and his wife's name against the mortgagor to recover the 200l. The wife refused to consent to the action and claimed the money, and thereupon the mortgagor paid it into court under 7 Geo. 2, c. 20. Subsequently, by an arrangement between the husband and the mortgagor (to which the wife was not a party), the money was taken out of court and one half of it paid to the husband, and the other half, after deducting 17l. for certain costs, was handed to the mortgagor to be paid to the wife on her reconveying the mortgaged property; the wife, however, refused to accept less than 100l. or to execute a reconveyance.

The husband predeceased the wife; and on the death of the wife, soon afterwards, a suit was instituted by her legal personal representatives against the mortgagor for payment of the mortgage debt or so much of it as might be due, and in default for foreclosure:

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to a decree for the payment of the 100l., with interest at 5l. per cent. from the death of the husband.

This was a suit transferred to this court from the County Court of Oxfordshire. The facts were as follows:—

In 1858 the defendant Williams mortgaged certain freehold property to Alice Mathews (widow) to secure 200*l.* In Jan. 1860 Mrs. Mathews married James Carr, when a settlement was executed, which did not in terms include the 200*l.* In March 1860 Mr. and Mrs. Carr separated, and never afterwards lived together as husband and wife. Soon after the separation Mr. Carr brought an action in his own and his wife's name to recover the 200*l.* from Williams. The action, however, was not brought with Mrs. Carr's consent, and she gave Williams notice to that effect, and stated that the 200*l.* ought to have been included in the settlement, and that she would be no party to any reconveyance of the mortgaged property if Williams paid the money to her husband.

Under these circumstances Williams obtained a judge's order under 7 Geo. 2, c. 20, s. 1, that the money should be paid into court; that a reconveyance should be executed by Mr. and Mrs. Carr; that thereupon, but not before, the money should be paid out of court to them, and that if such reconveyance was not executed, the money should remain in court. Accordingly, on the 3rd July 1860, the 200*l.* was paid into court by Williams, but the order was in no other respect complied with.

Subsequently Carr and Williams, by a private arrangement, to which Mrs. Carr was not a party, took the 200*l.* out of court. Carr received the whole of it, but by agreement 100*l.* was handed over to Williams, to be held by him for Mrs. Carr, and to be paid by him to her on her executing the reconveyance. At the same time Mrs. Carr executed what purported to be a transfer of the mortgage, but which was in fact inoperative, to a Mr. Holmes, who had lent Williams the 200*l.* to pay into court, and delivered to Holmes the deeds relating to the property.

Before the 100*l.* was handed over to Williams for Mrs. Carr, Carr deducted from it 17*l.*, which he paid to his solicitor as costs for preparing the marriage settlement. The 83*l.* was then offered to Mrs. Carr as half of the mortgage money; but she refused to accept it, or to execute any reconveyance of the property until she was paid 100*l.* Thereupon the 83*l.* was paid to Mr. Holmes.

Mr. Holmes died in 1863, leaving his widow and executrix in possession of the title-deeds. Mrs. Holmes (who was one of the defendants) never disputed that she held the 83*l.*, less certain costs, as trustee for Mrs. Carr, but the latter always refused to take less than 100*l.*

Mr. Carr died in June 1866. Mrs. Carr died in July 1866, having by her will appointed the plaintiffs in this suit her executors, and devised to them her estates held on mortgage.

The plaint in the suit prayed for an order for payment by Williams and Mrs. Holmes, or one of them, to the plaintiffs, as representatives of Mrs. Carr, of the 200*l.*, or so much of it as might be due in respect of the mortgage debt, and in default of payment for the usual foreclosure decree.

Dickinson, Q. C. and Phear, for the plaintiffs, contended that there had been no effectual discharge of the debt. The order of the court necessary for the release of the debtor, had never been obtained; and the money had been disposed of under an arrangement to which Mrs. Carr was no party. The plaintiffs, therefore, as Mrs. Carr's representatives, were clearly entitled to the relief prayed. See

Ryland v. Smith, 1 My. & Cr. 53:
Burnham v. Bennett, 2 Col. C. C. 254;
Hanson v. Miller, 14 Sim. 22.

Fischer (with him Bristowe, Q. C.) for the defendants, submitted that the payment of the money into court, under the statute, was a satisfaction of the mortgage-debt, which now, therefore, had no existence; and that the plaintiffs had no claim in respect of it, as against the defendants or either of them.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—It is quite clear that the payment of the mortgage-money into court, under the 7 Geo. 2, c. 20, was a satisfaction of the debt, so far as regards the actual payment into court, but it was not in itself a release or discharge of the debtor without a further order of the same court to that effect. No such order has been made. The mortgagor, after paying the money into court, might have opposed the payment of it out of court until he had received a full discharge from his debt; but he took a different course, and consented to a complicated arrangement by which, so far as the plaintiffs' rights are concerned, they are not affected at all, being no parties to it. The money never reached the hands of Mrs. Carr, and the legal estate is vested in her representatives. It is impossible to say that she or the plaintiffs in her right have not a lien on the property to the extent of 100*l.*, and the plaintiffs therefore are not bound to reconvey the estate until that sum has been paid. It is a mistake to suppose that the attorney of Mr. Carr had any right to deduct 17*l.* for costs out of Mrs. Carr's moiety, as these costs ought to have been paid by her husband. The defendants' case has failed, and there will be a decree against them for payment of the 100*l.* and the costs of the suit; including the costs of the County Court. On payment of the money there must be a reconveyance of the estate by the plaintiffs to Mrs. Holmes, or as she shall direct, and the defendants must pay interest at 5 per cent. on the amount from the date of the death of Mr. Carr. The decree will be subject to the right of Williams to redeem Mrs. Holmes.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs Charles Mallam (for T. and G. Mallam, Oxford).

Solicitors for the defendant, Singleton and Tattershall (for J. N. Clayton, Oxford).

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., and HON. ROBERT BUTLER, Barristers-at-Law

Thursday, Dec. 9, 1869.

TRAPPES v. MEREDITH.

Bankruptcy—Annulment—Forfeiture.

An annuity out of a fund which was subject to life interest was appointed by will to A., with a proviso for cesser if he should become bankrupt.

After the death of the testatrix, but before the death of the tenant for life, A. was adjudged bankrupt. After the death of the tenant for life, but before the first payment of the annuity became due, the bankruptcy was annulled:

Held, that the annuity was not forfeited.

Mrs. Graham having a power of appointment

Digitized by Google

over certain property subject to the life interest of her mother, Mrs. Payne, therein, by her will, dated the 16th Feb. 1863, appointed it to trustees upon the following trust (amongst others), to pay to her husband, the defendant, H. C. T. Graham, an annuity of 100*l.* during his life, to be paid by equal half-yearly payments, the first of such payments to be made at the expiration of six calendar months after the decease of the survivor of her and her mother. And she declared that, subject to the trusts thereinbefore declared, the trustees should stand possessed of the trust premises and the income thereof, or so much thereof as should remain after answering the aforesaid purposes, in trust for such person or persons as her sister, Mrs. Trappes, should appoint; and in default of appointment, in trust to pay the income to Mrs. Trappes for life for her separate use, and after her decease in trust for the children of Mrs. Trappes.

The will then went on as follows:

Provided always, and I hereby declare, that if my said husband shall become bankrupt, or shall assign, charge, or encumber, or attempt or affect to assign, charge, or encumber, the said annuity of 100*l.* hereinbefore given to him, or do or suffer any act whereby the same annuity or any part thereof would, if belonging absolutely to him, become vested in any other person or persons, then and in such case the said annuity shall not be payable, or shall cease to be payable, as the case may require, in the same manner as if my said husband were dead.

By a codicil to her will dated the 24th May 1864, the annuity was increased to an annuity of 150*l.*, payable at the same time and in the same manner, and subject to the same provisoes as to cesser, as the annuity of 100*l.* given by her will.

Mrs. Graham died on the 21st June 1864. Mrs. Payne, the tenant for life, died on the 4th April 1868.

On the 16th Jan. 1868 the defendant Mr. Graham was adjudged a bankrupt on his own petition. But by an order of the Court of Bankruptcy dated the 21st July 1868 the adjudication was annulled.

The children of Mrs. Trappes were the plaintiffs in the present suit, and the bill prayed (inter alia) for a declaration that the annuity in favour of Mr. Graham ceased on his bankruptcy.

The trustees of Mrs. Graham's will stated in their answer that they had been informed and believed that on the 7th May 1861 Mr. Graham was upon his own petition adjudged a bankrupt under a Scotch sequestration, and that on the 29th August 1868 he was discharged of all debts and liabilities contracted by him or for which he was liable at the date of the sequestration (7th May 1861). But there was no mention of any Scotch sequestration in the bill.

Willcock, Q. C. and W. H. Townsend appeared for the plaintiffs.

Bristowe, Q. C. and C. C. Barker for the trustees.

Kay, Q. C. and Bradford, for the defendant Graham, contended that he was entitled to the annuity.

De Gex, Q. C. and C. Pontifex, for parties interested in remainder, contended that the annulment did not act retrospectively. The annuity was forfeited. The following cases were cited:

White v. Chitty, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 750; L. Rep. 1 Eq. 372;
Lloyd v. Lloyd, L. Rep. 2 Eq. 722;
Cox v. Fonblanque, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 482;
Smallcombe v. Olivier, 13 M. & W. 77;
Manning v. Chambers, 1 De G. & S. 282;
Seymour v. Lucas, 1 Dr. & Sm. 177;
Ex parte Leaverland, 1 Atk. 145;
Allen v. Coster, 1 Beav. 274.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I do not say a word about the Scotch sequestration, because I know nothing about that. But with regard to the case before me upon the effect of bankruptcy obtained on the annuitant's own petition, and annulled on the annuitant's own application, and with the consent of his creditors, I quite agree with Mr. De Gex that it is not right or becoming of the court to be hair-splitting with cases, or to endeavour to find minute points of difference between this case and the adjudged cases, and I mean to decide this case according to what I think the good sense and honesty of the cases requires me to do. Taking the whole of the cases together—the cases which establish forfeiture and those which establish that there was no forfeiture—all proceed upon this broad principle, that the general intent of a gift of this kind is that it is to be for the personal enjoyment of the legatee, and that if that personal enjoyment is not to be had by reason of bankruptcy, alienation, or any other act or omission by which the property would be vested in any person or persons, then the forfeiture takes effect, but if not, not. Now I apprehend in this case that the question to be tried is what was the position of things at the time in which the first payment of this annuity had become payable. This annuity, would not have become payable until the 4th April, 1869. The tenant for life died on the 4th April, 1868. At that time the annuitant was a bankrupt, adjudged bankrupt on his own petition; and if that state of things had continued then, although the words were words of futurity, the cases would have applied. It would have been said you are a bankrupt—you cannot receive this annuity; the right to receive it is vested in somebody else, and your right is gone. But I suppose it was the very fact of the tenant for life's death that induced the annuitant to be active. He finds the adjudication to be a very serious matter for him, and he sets himself to get rid of it. He does get rid of it absolutely as between the assignees and himself, and his creditors; and before any payment whatever had become due—before any part of the annuity is payable—he has ceased to be in that condition, which condition alone would be the cause of forfeiture. That being so, I am of opinion that the annulment of the bankruptcy in this case has this effect. Wood, V.C. in those cases mentioned it. You take the adjudication and the annulment together, and the result is this can be done without any prejudice to or affecting any of the rights which have arisen from the acts of the assignee; and that being so, the whole thing is to be restored to the state in which it was at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy. The man had therefore ceased to be a bankrupt within the meaning of this provision, and the forfeiture clause is not operative.

A discussion then arose as to the Scotch sequestration, and his Honour, after remarking that what he had said would be considered a determination upon the question of the English bankruptcy, ordered the cause to stand over, with liberty to amend and adduce evidence as to the alleged sequestration.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, R. Southee.

Solicitors for the defendants, Rooks, Kenrick, and Harston; and Meredith and Co.

Digitized by Google

Tuesday, Feb. 8.

BAYLEY v. MILES.

Practice—Special case—Parties out of jurisdiction.

The court directed a special case to be set down for hearing, on the application of the executrix, the first tenant for life and the trustees being defendants; the persons interested in remainder, who were absent in New Zealand, being omitted as parties.

This was a special case, presented with a view of obtaining the opinion of the court on the construction of a will, as to whether a certain fund was specifically bequeathed or passed as residue.

The plaintiff in the special case was the widow and executrix of the testator, and claimed the fund as specific legatee; and the defendants in the case were the trustees of the residue and the first tenant for life of the residue. The other tenants for life, and the persons entitled in remainder to the residue, were in New Zealand, and were not made parties to the case.

An application was now made for leave to set down the special case for hearing, without bringing the parties out of the jurisdiction before the court.

G. J. F. Cooke appeared in support of the application, and referred to 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35;
15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 51.

T. H. Haddan, who appeared for the trustees, did not oppose the application.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR ordered the case to be set down for hearing without making the absent persons parties to the case.

Solicitors: Young, Maples, Teesdale, and Nelson, agents for Isaac Cook and Sons, Bristol.

HENSHAW v. ANGELL.

Practice—Motion to vary chief clerk's certificate—Cons. Ord. xxxv. r. 52.

The service of notice of motion to vary the chief clerk's certificate is not an application within the meaning of Cons. Ord. xxxv. r. 52.

This was a motion to vary the chief clerk's certificate.

Under Cons. Ord. xxxv., r. 52, the time within which an application may be made, by summons or motion, to discharge or vary any certificate which has been signed and adopted by the judge in chambers, shall be eight clear days after the filing of such certificate. The certificate having been approved by the Vice-Chancellor was filed on the 12th Jan. Notice of motion to vary the certificate was served on the 19th Jan. for the 31st which was a seal day, the 20th being also a seal day.

A. G. Langley, in support of the motion, cited the case of Wycherley v. Barnard, Joh. 41; 28 L. J. 562, in which case Vice-Chancellor Wood (the present Lord Chancellor), considered that the words of the order were satisfied by an application for a summons being made before the expiration of eight days, and that the summons, having been obtained within that time, although not returnable until afterwards, was sufficient to suspend the confirmation of the certificate until the summons was disposed of.

N. Lindley, for the plaintiff, objected that the motion was not in time, and cited Cross v Maltby, 8 W. R. 646, where the court gave leave to move on a day not a seal day to save the eight days.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR observed that the applying for and issuing of a summons from a judge's chambers might be regarded as an application, which the service of notice of motion could not, he therefore made no order on the motion as not being in time.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Tatham and Son.

Solicitor for the defendant, Angell.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, Jan. 12.

JONES v. HILL.

Bankruptcy—Pleading—Form of plea where order of discharge is not obtained till after action brought—C. L. P. A. 1852, s. 68—B. A. 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134) ss. 161, 164, 170.

Where a bankrupt does not obtain his order of discharge till after action brought, though he has been adjudicated a bankrupt before action brought, the defence must be pleaded as one arising after the commencement of the action, in accordance with sect. 68 of the C. L. P. A. 1852; and the form of plea directed by sect. 161 of the B. A. 1861 is not applicable to such a case.

The word "thereafter" in sect. 161 of the B. A. 1861 means after the taking effect of the order of discharge.

Harris v. James, 9 East, 82, commented on and distinguished.

Declaration on a bill of exchange dated the 28th July 1868, at three months, accepted by the defendant and indorsed to the North and South Wales Banking Company, whose registered public officer was the plaintiff.

Plea (dated 15th Dec. 1868) that before the commencement of the suit the defendant became bankrupt within the true intent and meaning of the statute in force concerning bankrupts, and that the causes of action in the declaration mentioned accrued to the plaintiff before the defendant so became bankrupt.

Issue thereon.

At the trial, which took place before Brett J. at the Liverpool Spring Assizes 1869, it appeared that the defendant had been adjudicated a bankrupt on the 3rd Sept. 1868, the bill becoming due on the 28th Oct. 1868. The writ in the action issued on the 11th Nov. 1868, and the defendant did not obtain his order of discharge till the 27th Nov. 1868. The declaration was delivered on the 2nd Dec. and the plea of the defendant's bankruptcy was delivered on the 15th Dec. The order of discharge bore date the 28th Dec. 1868. The above facts having been proved, the learned judge directed the verdict to be entered for the plaintiff, on the ground that the plea was not proved, and declined to amend the plea except on payment of the plaintiff's costs, but gave the defendant leave to move to enter the verdict for him should the court be of opinion that the plea had been proved.

Hodgson, having obtained a rule nisi calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict should not be entered for the defendant,

R. G. Williams now showed cause against the rule. The defendant's plea was not proved as pleaded, seeing that he did not obtain his order of discharge till after action brought. The form of plea given in sect. 161 of the B. A. 1861 (24 & 25

Vict. c. 134) is not appropriate to such a case as the present. That section provides that "the order of discharge shall, upon taking effect, discharge the bankrupt from all debts, claims, or demands proveable under his bankruptcy save as herein otherwise provided; and if, thereafter, he shall be arrested, or any action shall be brought against him for any such debt, claim, or demand, he shall be discharged upon entering an appearance, and may plead in general that the cause of action accrued before he became bankrupt, and may give this Act and the special matter in evidence; and the order of discharge shall be sufficient evidence of the bankruptcy and the proceedings precedent to the order of discharge." It will be contended, on the other side, that the word "thereafter" in this section means after the adjudication of bankruptcy, but it is submitted it can only mean after the taking effect of the order of discharge. [HANNEN, J.—If it referred to the bankruptcy, and not to the order of discharge, the bankrupt would be entitled to be discharged from custody, though he had not obtained his order of discharge.] That absurd consequence would undoubtedly follow. The general understanding has certainly been that the form of plea given in the above section is only applicable to cases where the order of discharge has been obtained before the commencement of the action. Thus, in Bullen and Leake's Precedents, p. 507 (3rd edit.), it is laid down that "the general form of plea of the defendant's bankruptcy is given only in actions brought against the bankrupt after obtaining his order of discharge. The order, however, discharges the bankrupt from all debts and claims proveable under the bankruptcy. If the action is commenced before the order of discharge is obtained, the order, when obtained, may be pleaded as above; or if after plea pleaded, it must be pleaded puis darrein continuance." In the Bankruptcy Act of 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106) this was made to appear distinctly. Sect. 205 of that statute enacts "that any bankrupt who shall, after his certificate shall have been allowed, be arrested or have any action brought against him for any debt, claim, or demand proveable under his bankruptcy, shall be discharged upon entering an appearance, and may plead in general that the cause of action accrued before he became bankrupt, and may give this Act and the special matter in evidence." There can be no doubt that the words of that section do not apply to the case of an action brought before the certificate was allowed; and the Act of 1861 merely substitutes for the certificate the order of discharge, leaving the effect of the section in other respects the same. If the contention of the other side were correct, it would follow that although there was no defence to the action at its commencement, and the plaintiff was therefore justified in bringing it; still the order of discharge subsequently obtained would relate back, and have the effect of making the plaintiff pay the defendant's costs. [MELLOR, J.—And it might well seem that at the time of the commencement of the action the defendant might never get his order of discharge.] The reason why the words "after his certificate shall have been allowed" in sect. 205 of the Act of 1849, or similar words, are not repeated in the Act of 1861, is probably that the provisions as to the non-liability of the bankrupt upon any promise to pay any debt discharged by the certificate, and as to his freedom from arrest and defence to action are contained in two separate sections in the former Act, and therefore it was necessary to repeat the words in each section, whilst in the Act of 1861 they are both contained in the same section. If, then, the defence relied on by the defendant is one which arose after the commencement of the action, it should have been pleaded as such; for sect. 168 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 provides that "any defence arising after the commencement of the action shall be pleaded according to the fact, without any formal commencement or conclusion; and any plea which does not state whether the defence therein set up arose before or after action shall be deemed to be a plea of matter arising before action." Though the defendant obtained his order of discharge on Nov. 27, the order of discharge bore date Dec. 28; therefore the defendant was not in a position to plead it when the plea was delivered on Dec. 15; and the offer having been made to the defendant by the learned judge who presided at the trial to amend on payment of the plaintiff's costs, which was refused by the defendant, it is submitted that the defendant ought not now to be allowed to amend on any terms.

Hodgson, in support of the rule.—The plea is merely a formal one, stating that the plaintiff became bankrupt and that the cause of action accrued before the commencement of the action, which is true. Such a formal plea could not mislead anyone, what was intended by it being obvious, namely, that the defendant was released from the debt by means of the order of discharge. If the plea had been pleaded in the other form, the plaintiff would, by rr. 22 & 23 of Trinity Term 1853, be at liberty to confess the plea, and thereupon be entitled to the costs of the cause up to the time of pleading the plea, which in justice and right he would not be entitled to. On the matter of the date of the order of discharge, Ex parte Bell, 32 L. J. 50, Bank.; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 370, is an authority in the defendant's favour. There it was held that the words "order of discharge" denote two different things—(1) the order made by the court on the application of the bankrupt, and which is made and pronounced by the commissioner subject to appeal, and is recorded in the proceedings; and (2) that further document or certificate which is formally drawn up and handed over to the bankrupt after the time allowed for appealing has elapsed. Lord Westbury C. said, "The order of discharge takes effect from the time when it is granted by the commissioner; and that being the particular day when it is recorded, it is said with propriety that it shall take effect 'immediately from its date;' but inasmuch as a time is allowed during which it is competent to any party interested to apply to the court to review the order, when it may be annulled, suspended, or recalled, that condition is fulfilled by stating that it shall 'take effect' subject to that power of appeal; that is to say, the order of discharge shall take effect from the time when it is pronounced, provided it be not annulled, suspended, or recalled within the time allowed." And again, "It is impossible to hold that the order of discharge spoken of in the 161st section can be the order of discharge which is afterwards to be delivered to the bankrupt, because it is said that 'the order of discharge shall upon taking effect discharge the bankrupt,' &c. These words 'upon taking effect' were inserted to provide for the possibility of the order being suspended; because if the order be suspended by the commissioner the order can take effect only from the end of the period of suspension." Moreover, it was incumbent on the defendant in the present case to plead his order of discharge, otherwise he could not obtain the benefit of it or resist an execution: (Rossi v. Bailey, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 130; 37 L. J. 204, Q. B.) [COCKBURN, C. J.—This point need not be further argued. The court feels itself bound in this matter by the decision of the Lord Chancellor in Ex parte Bell.] The order of discharge was obtained on the 27th Nov., and all such matters are made known to the world by advertisement in the Gazette. Notwithstanding that, the plaintiff proceeds and delivers his declaration on the 2nd Dec.; the plaintiff has thus brought upon himself whatever hardship the plea inflicts, by delivering his declaration after he must have known that the defendant had obtained his order of discharge. The plaintiff might have appealed to the court for leave to discontinue, instead of joining issue on the plea; and it is laid down in Archbold's Practice, p. 1485, that "the terms upon which a party is allowed to discontinue are in the discretion of the court." [COCKBURN, C. J.—The whole strength of your argument consists in this, that though the plea relates not to the order of discharge but to the bankruptcy generally, yet it is perfectly well understood in the profession to relate to the order of discharge having been obtained, and therefore that when the plea was delivered to the plaintiff he should have known about it.] It is stated in Chitty on Contracts, p. 774 (7th edit.), that "if the order of discharge were obtained after declaration, but before plea, it would be sufficient to rely upon the general plea given by the statute without pleading the bankruptcy specially; that is without setting forth all the proceedings. And it would seem that since the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, ss. 51, 52, this form of plea will be sufficient, even where both the bankruptcy and the order of discharge are after action brought." [COCKBURN, C. J.—But it goes on: "but in such a case the plea should be pleaded puis darrein continuance."] But that is where both the bankruptcy and the order of discharge are after the commencement of the action; but in the present case the bankruptcy was before and only the order of discharge after the commencement of the action. It would be a great injustice to compel the defendant to pay the plaintiff's costs under the circumstances of this case; the adjudication of bankruptcy strips the defendant of all his property, and it would produce the most pernicious consequences to allow each creditor liberty to commence an action against him, to which he has no defence before obtaining his order of discharge, and to sign judgment and arrest him. In Simpson v. Maravita, 20 L. T. Rep. N.S. 275, where the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt by the Irish Court of Bankruptcy on Nov. 20, 1868, and the certificate was signed on Jan. 12, 1869, but detained in court for a month in order that any creditor might appeal against its being granted, it was held that the certificate operated from the date of its execution, notwithstanding its detention in court for a month subsequently, and that the certificate operated as a discharge from arrest for the costs of the action as well as for the amount of the debt, on the ground that the costs were accessory to the principal. [HANNEN, J.—It may be that you are discharged from the costs, but the question is whether you must not plead "according to the fact," as required by sect. 68 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852. The plaintiff's hypothesis at the time he commences the action is that you will never get your order of discharge.] The defence really arose before action brought, though not perfected till afterwards. In Harris v. James, 9 East, 82, it was held that the certificate of a bankrupt allowed, after filing of the plaintiff's bill, and before plea pleaded, was evidence to support the general plea in bar given by the stat. 5 Geo. 2, c. 30, s. 7, that before the exhibiting the plaintiff's bill the defendant became a bankrupt, and that the cause of action accrued before he became a bankrupt. "It was contended on the part of the plaintiff," said Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in delivering judgment, "that the matter of the defendant's discharge having arisen after the filing of the plaintiff's bill, should have been pleaded as a plea after the last continuance. To which it was, on the part of the defendant answered, that if even the matter of the discharge grew by the allowance of the certificate, and was not merely to be proved in evidence by it; yet that even so, and if the allowance of the certificate were specially pleaded, it could not be pleaded in terms as a plea after the last continuance, inasmuch as no continuance had in fact intervened between the time of the bill filed and of the plea pleaded. It was further argued, on the part of the plaintiff, that this plea, and the general bar arising out of it, was only given by the statute in favour of persons conforming to the direction of the statute, who should "afterwards" (i.e., after they had so conformed), "be arrested, prosecuted, or impleaded, for any debt due before such time as he, she, or they might become bankrupt," and it was contended that the word "afterwards," by reference to the antecedent matter, applied only to cases in which the action was commenced after the bankrupt had already conformed, and obtained his certificate in proof of such his conformity. But it appears to us, on reference to the different provisions of the Act, to have been the object of it that every bankrupt who had obtained his certificate of conformity, and which had been duly allowed, should be thereupon (i.e., upon pleading such plea and producing such his certificate) discharged from all his debts due or owing at the time that he did become bankrupt, for which he should have been impleaded after his bankruptcy; and that the discharge given him was meant to be a bar to all remedy by suit against him, commenced after his bankruptcy for debts due antecedent to his bankruptcy. . . . Another argument in favour of the defendant arises from the 13th section providing only for the relief of the bankrupt whose certificate shall be obtained after judgment; so that a bankrupt who shall obtain his certificate after action brought and before judgment, would have no advantage of such certificate if the construction contended for by the plaintiff's counsel were to prevail. But we cannot suppose that it was the intention of the Legislature that the certificate of a bankrupt should prevent his creditor recovering against him if his certificate were obtained before the commencement of the action, or having personal execution against him if obtained after the judgment; and that he should still remain liable to his debts if he obtained his certificate after the commencement of the action and before judgment." This reasoning is strictly applicable to the circumstances of the present case. [COCKBURN, C. J.—But does it meet the provisions of sect. 68 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852?] The defence is the whole proceedings in bankruptcy, culminating in the order of discharge.

Digitized by Google

R. G. Williams, in reply.—The language of 5 Geo. 2, c. 30, s. 7, on which the case of Harrison v. James was decided, differs from that of the subsequent Acts. Sect. 126 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 16 enacts "that any bankrupt who shall after his certificate shall have been allowed be arrested or have any action brought against him, &c., shall be discharged upon common bail, and may plead in general that the cause of action accrued before he became bankrupt," &c. This may be said to repeal the decision in Harris v. James, and the language of the other Bankruptcy Acts which succeeded is of a similar character.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think this rule must be discharged. If the language of the statute which we are now considering, and that of the statutes immediately preceding it, had been the same as that of the statute of Geo. 2, I should have felt myself bound to follow the decision of Lord Ellenborough in the case of Harris v. James which has been cited, saying at the same time that the judgment involves reasoning of a rather subtle character. However, notwithstanding that, I should have followed in the footsteps of my learned predecessor. If the Legislature had intended that the mere fact of adjudication of bankruptcy should have the effect of stopping all actions against the bankrupt, nothing could be more easy than for the Legislature to say so; and, looking at the matter only with reference to principle and policy, I regret that the Legislature has not thought proper to say so, for I think it most improper that actions should be maintained whilst proceedings in bankruptcy are pending, and it is probable that the bankrupt will get his order of discharge. During that time I think all proceedings, except those under the bankruptcy, should be suspended; for otherwise, in all probability, money is thrown away in useless expenses, and the estate of the bankrupt is lessened. But the Legislature has not thought fit to enact that. The language of the statute of Geo. 2 was certainly ambiguous, but I think that the language of the statutes relating to bankruptcy which have followed it are anything but ambiguous; for when the language is that the order of discharge "shall upon taking effect discharge the bankrupt from all debts, claims, or demands provable under the bankruptcy," I understand the meaning of the Legislature to be that it is the order of discharge and not the antecedent proceedings in bankruptcy which is to have that effect. And this is rendered clearer by the words which follow: "and if thereafter he shall be arrested, or any action shall be brought against him for any such debt, claim, or demand, he shall be discharged upon entering an appearance, and may plead in general that the cause of action accrued before he became bankrupt, and may give this Act and the special matter in evidence, and the order of discharge shall be sufficient evidence of the bankruptcy and the proceedings precedent to the order of discharge." I do not see how it is possible to doubt that by these words is meant that the immunity from legal proceedings is to arise from and out of the order of discharge, and does not attach to any of the proceedings anterior to the order of discharge, which are important only in so far as they lead to the order of discharge out of which the defence must arise. It seems to me, therefore, that the defence in the present case was a matter arising after action brought. I am the more confirmed in this view from the observations made by my brother Hannen in the progress of the argument, that this plea in the particular form in which it has been pleaded would be equally applicable to the case of an action brought before adjudication of bankruptcy where the adjudication was eventually followed by an order of discharge. To leave it in doubt to which of the two cases this plea was intended to refer was to produce the very evil which the 68th section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, was intended to prevent. In order to get rid of such formal pleas as the one in question, that section was made positive in its terms, and insists on the necessity in pleading of giving effect to the distinction between grounds of defence which arise before and those which arise after the commencement of the action. I think, for the reasons which I have given, that the defence relied on in the present case was matter arising after the commencement of the action, seeing that the simple adjudication would not be an answer to the action, but must be followed by the order of discharge, and Mr. Hodgson, having refused to amend on the terms proposed, must abide by the consequences. I think the plaintiff ought to have his costs, but he must not have his debt twice over. All we can do is to allow the plaintiff to issue execution for his costs; or perhaps a better way would be to allow the defendant to amend his plea and make it a good one on payment of the plaintiff's costs.

MELLOR, J.—I have come to the same conclusion. I entertained considerable doubt on the subject during the argument, and I should feel bound by the decision in Harris v. James, to which Mr. Hodgson referred, if I did not think that we were relieved from the effect of that decision by the subsequent legislation on the subject. Looking at the context of the 161st section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, which has reference to the order of discharge and the mode of obtaining it, and then reading the section itself which provides that "the order of discharge shall, upon taking effect, discharge the bankrupt from all debts, claims, or demands provable under his bankruptcy," and then subsequently enacts that "if thereafter he shall be arrested, or any action shall be brought against him for any such debt, claim, or demand, he shall be discharged upon entering an appearance, and may plead in general that the cause of action accrued before he became bankrupt, &c.," I come to the conclusion that the contention of Mr. Williams is well founded. If it had not been for the other sections which throw light upon the meaning of this, I might have felt myself bound by the reasoning of Lord Ellenborough; but looking at the words of this section, following as it does sections which have reference to the mode of obtaining the order of discharge, the effect of it is, I think, as my Lord has stated it. The following sections also, the 162nd and 163rd, relate to the order of discharge, the former relating to the release of the bankrupt when arrested after the order of discharge takes effect, the latter to the effect of the order in the case of partners of the bankrupt. Then the 164th section enacts that "after the order of discharge takes effect, the bankrupt shall not be liable to pay or satisfy any debt, claim, or demand provable under the bankruptcy, or any part thereof, on any contract, promise, or agreement, verbal or written, made after adjudication; and if he be sued on any such contract, promise, or agreement, he may plead in general that the cause of action accrued pending proceeedings in bankruptcy, and may give this Act and the special matter in evidence." When we look at all these sections together, it seems to me that we are relieved from the effect of the decision of Lord Ellenborough in Harris v. James, under the statute of Geo. 2, and that we are at liberty to construe the words of the 161st section of the Act of 1861, according to their natural meaning, and effect. That being so, the 68th section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 provides very distinctly with reference to pleading of this kind, that "any defence arising after the commencement of any action shall be pleaded according to the fact, without any formal commencement or conclusion; and any plea which does not state whether the defence therein set up arose before or after action shall be deemed to be a plea of matter arising before action." It appears, therefore, to me, that the plea pleaded to this declaration was not the right plea to raise the defence, and was not pleaded in such a manner that the plaintiff could have properly met it; and I have come to the same conclusion as my Lord, that the defendant should be allowed to amend the plea on the terms of paying the plaintiff's costs.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion; and I arrive at the conclusion in this way. I consider the 68th section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 to be explicit and applicable to a plea of this kind. It enacts that a defence arising after the commencement of an action shall be pleaded according to the fact, and that any plea, which does not state whether the defence therein set up arose before or after action, shall be deemed to be a plea of matter arising before action. The question might arise, What is the defence in the present case? If the defence be that the defendant became simpliciter a bankrupt, that is a defence which arose before action; but if bankruptcy simpliciter is not a defence to the action, but depends on whether the order of discharge is obtained, then since the order of discharge was not obtained till after the action was commenced, the defence relied on is one arising after action brought. This being so, the plea pleaded left it open to the plaintiff to say—"Since the defendant does not say that his defence arose after the commencement of the action, I suppose it arose before the action was commenced, and if he means to say that, I traverse the allegation, and will put him to proof of the fact." I do not think this view of the case is affected by the arguments as to liability to costs on the one side or the other; because if Mr. Hodgson is right in his view, as to which I say nothing, that the order of discharge operates as a discharge from the costs of the action as well as from the debt itself, then it would follow that if the defendant had pleaded according to the fact that the defence arose after action brought, namely, by his having become bankrupt and obtained his order of discharge, he would not be liable to pay the costs up to that time which under other circumstances he would be liable to pay. Whether that would be so or not, I arrive at the conclusion that the 68th section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 was intended to apply to cases of this kind, and to pleas which may be like formulæ simply, as Mr. Hodgson says this is, as well as to other pleas; and I think it was the duty of the defendant to make it clear by his plea, whether that which he relies on for an answer to the action arose before or after the action was commenced against him.

Defendant to be allowed to amend plea on payment of plaintiff's costs.

Attorneys for the plaintiff, Duncan, Squarey, and Co., Liverpool.

Attorney for the defendant, Stackpoole.

Friday, Jan. 28.

MARSHALL v. MARTIN.

Costs—Slanderous words—Effect of certificate of judge—21 Jac. 1, c. 21, s. 6; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24, s. 2; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 5.

Sect. 5 of the County Courts Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), which enacts that a plaintiff, who in an action of tort recovers less than 10*l.*, shall not be entitled to any costs of suit "unless the judge certify on the record that there was sufficient reason for bringing such action in the Superior Court, or unless the court or a judge at chambers shall by rule or order allow such costs," does not by implication repeal the enactment of the 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 6, which provides that in actions for slanderous words, if the plaintiff recovers less than 40*s. damages, he shall only recover the same amount of costs. Therefore,*

Where the plaintiff in an action for slanderous words recovered only 1*s. damages, though the judge who tried the action certified that the slanderous words were wilful and malicious, and also that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the Superior Court, it was* Held, that neither the court nor a judge at chambers had power to give the plaintiff more costs than damages.

In this case, which was action for certain words slanderous per se spoken by the defendant of the plaintiff, imputing felony to him, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, with one shilling damages. The learned judge who presided at the trial certified that the grievance in respect of which the action was brought was wilful and malicious, in accordance with 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24, s. 2; and also certified on the record that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the Superior Court, in accordance with 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 5. The master accordingly taxed the plaintiff his costs.

Hill, Q. C., obtained a rule nisi calling on the plaintiff to show cause why this allowance should not be set aside.

Sect. 6 of the 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, enacted:

That in all actions upon the case for slanderous words, to be tried or prosecuted by any person or persons in any of the courts of record at Westminster, or in any court whatsoever that hath power to hold plea of the same, after the end of this present session of Parliament, if the jury upon the trial of the issue in such action, or the jury that shall inquire of the damages, do find or assess the damages under 40s., then the plaintiff or plaintiffs in such action shall have and recover only so much costs or damages so given or assessed amount unto, without any further increase of the same; any law, statute, custom, or usage to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding.

3 & 4 Vict. c. 24, s. 2, provides—

That if the plaintiff in any action of trespass, or of trespass on the case brought, or to be brought, in any of Her Majesty's courts at Westminster, or in the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, or in the Court of Common Pleas at Durham, shall recover by the verdict of a jury less damages than 40s., such plaintiff shall not be entitled to recover or obtain from the defendant in respect of such verdict any costs whatever, whether it shall be given upon any issue or issues tried, or judgment shall have passed by default, unless the judge or presiding officer before whom such verdict shall be obtained shall immediately afterwards certify on the back of the record, or on the writ of trial, or writ of inquiry, that the action was really brought to try a right besides the mere right to recover damages for the trespass or grievance in respect of which the action was brought, or that the grievance or trespass was wilful and malicious.

30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 5, enacts that—

If in any action commenced after the passing of this Act in any of Her Majesty's Superior Courts of Record, the plaintiff shall recover a sum not exceeding 20*l.* if the action is founded on contract, or 10*l.* if founded on tort, whether by verdict, judgment by default or on demurrer, or otherwise, he shall not be entitled to any costs of suit unless the judge certify on the record that there was sufficient reason for bringing such action in such Superior Court, or unless the court or a judge at chambers shall by rule or order allow such costs.

Matthews, Q. C. now showed cause against the rule.—The judge who presided at the trial has given every form of certificate he could in favour of the plaintiff, and the court should hold the plaintiff entitled to his costs, unless the enactment in sect. 6 of the 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, precludes the court from doing so, which, it is submitted, it does not. It was no doubt held in Evans v. Rees, 9 C. B., N. S., 391, that the enactment in the stat. of James I. which provides that in actions for slanderous words, if the plaintiff recovers less than 40*s.* damages, he shall only recover the same amount of costs, was not repealed by the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24; but the same thing does not apply to the Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 5. The language of this latter section is very large, and seems to have been intended to give the court or a judge at chambers a general power to allow the plaintiff his costs where it seems to them proper that he should get them. The section, in providing that the plaintiff should not be entitled to any "costs of suit" unless the judge certify on the record that there was sufficient reason for bringing such action in such Superior Court, or unless the court or a judge at chambers shall by rule or order allow "such costs," appears to contemplate the exercise of a general discretion to allow the plaintiff his full "costs of suit" when he is considered deserving of them. [LUSH, J.—The 5th section of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142 does not repeal the enactment of Jac. 1. The whole of this section is negative; it does not say what costs the plaintiff shall get if the judge certifies, but leaves that to be determined by the general law on the subject already existing.] The words "or unless the court or a judge at chambers shall by rule or order allow such costs" are quite new; they are not found in previous Acts, and it is submitted that these words give the court power to dispense in its discretion with the operation of the provision in the Act of Jac. 1. In Gray v. West, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 222, this court distinguished between the power given by this section to the judge who presides at the trial, and the power given to the court or a judge at chambers, "The judge at the trial," said the court in their judgment, "is empowered to certify on a single point, namely, whether there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the Superior Court. The power given to the court or a judge at chambers is generally to allow the plaintiff his costs. . . . It appears to us that the certificate was intended to have the same meaning and application in the section now before us as a similar certificate had under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 12; and if this be so, it seems to give rise to much doubt whether sect. 5 of the late Act was really intended to have any application to cases in which the County Court had no jurisdiction. If, however, it was intended to apply to such cases, the general authority given to the court or a judge to allow the plaintiff his costs, would, at all events, enable them to do so in cases of this nature, where it appeared proper to make such allowance." Sampson v. Mackay, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 807, was also referred to. [COCKBURN, C. J.—If the Legislature meant to repeal the statute of James, it would have done so explicitly. MELLOR, J.—It surely was never intended to give this court or a judge power to overrule the Act of James; and the County Courts Act of 1867 was certainly not intended to encourage the bringing of actions of slander.]

Heywood (with whom was S. Hill, Q. C.) in support of the rule was not called on.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think we need not call on the other side in this case, and that the rule must be made absolute. I am of opinion that all that was intended by the latter part of sect. 5 of the County Courts Acts 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), was to put the court in a position to review the decision on the subject of costs, which the judge at Nisi Prius may have arrived at. But I do not think that the section was intended to repeal, or that it has the effect of repealing the enactment contained in section 6 of the statute of Jac. 1, with reference to the amount of costs to be obtained by the plaintiff in such cases as this. I am not prepared to say that the case of Evans v. Rees (ubi. sup.), which has been cited, was not rightly decided, though it seems rather strong to say that Lord Denman's Act was intended to apply only to cases where the statute of Jac. 1 was not incidentally or by implication repealed. It seems hardly worth while that the Legislature should intervene for the simple purpose of depriving the plaintiff of his costs where they do not exceed thirty-nine shillings. However that interpretation has been put upon the Act. The words "costs of suit," in sect. 5 of the Act of 1867 are substantially the same as the words contained in the other enactments; and we cannot hold that by any words of that section the statute of Jas. 1 is impliedly repealed.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I take the effect of the 5th section of the County Courts Act 1867 to be that, if the plaintiff recovers more than forty shillings damages, he may become entitled to his full costs if the judge who tries the case certifies on the record that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the Superior Court, or if the court or a judge at chambers shall, by rule or order, allow such costs. But, to entitle him to get his full costs in this manner, he must not recover less than forty shillings; if he does recover less, then neither the court or judge has power to allow him his costs.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The 5th section of the Act of 1867 is a disabling one, depriving of costs where they might previously have been obtained without a certificate of a judge or a rule or order of the court or judge at chambers. If he gets either of these, he is then in the same position as he would have been if the Act had not passed, but in no better.

Rule absolute.

Attorneys for plaintiff, Makinson and Carpenter, for Spilsbury, Stafford.

Attorney for defendant, W. Thistlethwaite.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by M. W. MCKELLAR, and H. H. HOCKING, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, Jan. 17.

EYTON v. JONES AND OTHERS.

Ejectment—Licence to assign—Forfeiture.

The predecessor in title of the plaintiff let about thirty three acres of land to one Bradburn, who covenanted amongst other things, that he, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or any of them, should not during the term demise, let, assign, make over, or part with the possession of the said lands (except to the extent of three acres therein described), without the licence and consent in writing of the lessor, his heirs or assigns. There was a proviso in the lease for re-entry upon breach of a covenant. After the passing of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, the lessor gave Bradburn a licence in writing to assign, transfer, and set over the premises to the defendant Jones, his executors, administrators, and assigns, upon condition that Jones would not at any time assign or transfer the premises without the consent of the lessor, his heirs or assigns. Jones assigned the three excepted acres to another defendant, Edge, for the remainder of the term, and let the rest of the premises by the year to another defendant, Jones; this Jones let the thirty acres to Edge by the year. There was no other licence by the lessor but that mentioned:

Held, in an action of ejectment to which the defendant Edge alone appeared and defended only as to the excepted three acres, that the words of the licence did not justify the letting of the thirty acres without a further licence; and that this breach of covenant created a forfeiture of the whole of the premises let under the original lease.

This was an action of ejectment brought to recover certain lands in the county of Salop. The cause came on to be tried by Keating, J., at the Spring Assizes 1868, held in and for the county of Salop, when, by consent of the parties, and without evidence, a verdict was entered for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon the following case:—

The writ in this action was dated the 19th June 1867, and the premises claimed therein consisted of two pieces of arable land in the parish of Shiffnal and county of Salop, containing in all 33a. 2r. 35p., more or less, and a line of rails or siding belonging thereto laid down by the Shrewsbury and Birmingham Railway Company. The defendant John Jones appeared, and by a notice in writing to the plaintiff and his attorneys, dated the 27th July 1867, duly signed and attested, confessed the action as to the whole of the property sought to be recovered. The defendants, James Edge, John Edge, and Joseph Edge, appeared, and by a notice in writing dated the 18th July 1867, limited their defence to a part of the lands claimed, namely, to about three acres thereof lying contiguous to the Shrewsbury and Birmingham Railway and a wharf or siding there.

The land claimed in the writ belonged to the late Robert Aglionby Slaney, Esq., and he, being seised of it in fee by an indenture dated the 27th April 1850, demised the whole of that land to William Bradburn for a term of 99 years from the 25th March 1850, at a yearly rent of 33*l.* The lease was executed by the lessor and lessee. It described the premises as two pieces of arable land, containing by estimation 33a. 2r. 35p., more or less, together with the use of the line of rails, or siding, belonging thereto, recently formed and laid down by the Shrewsbury and Birmingham Railway Company for the purpose of forming a wharf thereon for the use of the said Robert A. Slaney.

This lease contained a covenant by the lessee to expend 400*l.* during the first year of his term in erecting two substantial cottages, a warehouse, and other buildings, upon some part of the premises thereby demised, contiguous to the said siding.

This lease also contained the following covenant:

That he, the said William Bradburn, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or any of them, shall not nor will at any time during the said term hereby granted, demise, let, assign, make over or part with the possession of the said lands and premises hereby demised (except to the extent of three acres immediately adjoining the said line of railway and the said wharf or siding), without the licence or consent in writing of the said Robert Aglionby Slaney, his heirs or assigns, under his or their hand or hands for that purpose had and obtained.

The lease also contained a proviso that it should be lawful for the said Robert Aglionby Slaney, his heirs or assigns, at any time during the continuance of the term thereby granted, to determine and make void the same on giving six months' notice to the said William Bradburn, and upon payment to the said William Bradburn, his executors, administrators, or assigns, of the value of the lessee's interest in the said premises. In case of difference as to the value of the tenant's interest, the same to be referred to two arbitrators or their umpire.

The lease also contained the following proviso:

That if the said William Bradburn, his executors, administrators, or assigns shall at any time during the said term hereby granted, erect and build upon the said demised premises, or any part thereof, any dwelling-houses or buildings other than and except the said two cottages, warehouse, and buildings hereby covenanted to be built within one year from the commencement of the said term, of which said original buildings a map shall be made and certified by Mr. Richard Garbett, or other the agent for the time being of the said Robert Aglionby Slaney, then and in such case the said Robert Aglionby Slaney, his heirs and assigns, shall and will at the end of the said term hereby granted, well and truly pay unto the said William Bradburn, his executors, administrators, or assigns, two thirds of the then value of such additional houses and other buildings so to be erected as aforesaid, and in case the heirs or assigns of the said Robert Aglionby Slaney shall decline to purchase the same in manner as aforesaid, then the executors, administrators, or assigns of the said William Bradburn shall be at liberty to take down and remove such houses and buildings, on paying unto the heirs and assigns of the said Robert Aglionby Slaney one third of the then value of the same, such value in either case if the said parties shall differ thereabouts, to be ascertained by arbitration in the manner hereinbefore directed.

The lease also contained a proviso empowering the lessor, his heirs and assigns, in the event of a breach of any of the covenants to re-enter upon the demised premises, and to repossess the same as in his or their former estate, and to put out the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns.

The three acres mentioned in the above covenant against underletting are the three acres in respect of which the defendants, James Edge, John Edge, nd Joseph Edge defend this action.

The said William Bradburn entered upon the demised premises, and held the same under the said lease up to the year 1859, paying the rent to Mr. Slaney.

Bradburn had erected on the said three acres three dwelling houses, and also workshops, stables, and other buildings at a considerable cost, and he carried on in the said buildings the business of a bone and manure manufacturer, which was considered a nuisance both by Mr. Slaney and by the defendant John Jones, who was an adjoining landowner. The defendant Jones thereupon negotiated for an assignment to himself of Bradburn's lease, and this assignment was agreed upon, subject to the payment to Bradburn by defendant Jones of such a sum as should be fixed by an arbitrator; and the arbitrator awarded the sum of 2082*l.* to be paid by Jones to Bradburn, and which was duly paid.

On the 26th Aug. 1859 the following licence was given by the said Mr. Slaney for this assignment:

Whereas I, the undersigned, Robert Aglionby Slaney, of Walford Manor, in the county of Salop, Esquire, by an indenture bearing date on or about the 27th April 1850, demised and leased unto William Bradburn, then of Tong Park, in the parish of Tong, in the said county, farmer, all those two pieces of arable land adjoining each other, and called or known by the respective names of Far Lechmere and Bully Hill Field (as therein described), together with the appurtenances thereto belonging (except as in the said indenture is mentioned to be excepted), to hold the same (except as aforesaid) unto the said William Bradburn, his executors, administrators, and assigns, from the 25th March then last past for the term of ninety-nine years then next ensuing, under the yearly rent of 33*l.*, payable as therein mentioned, and under diver covenants, conditions, and agreements therein contained on the tenant's or lessee's part to be observed and performed, amongst which is a covenant by the said William Bradburn, that he the said William Bradburn, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or any of them should not nor would at any time during the said term thereby granted, demise, let, assign, make over, or part with the possession of the said lands and premises thereby demised, or any part thereof, (except to the extent of three acres immediately adjoining the said line of railway and the said wharf or siding) without licence and consent in writing of me, the said Robert Aglionby Slaney, my heirs or assigns, under my or their hands or hand for that purpose first had and obtained. And whereas sundry messuages or dwelling-houses and other buildings have since been erected by the said William Bradburn upon the said leasehold premises, or on some part or parts thereof. Now I, the said Robert Aglionby Slaney, do hereby give unto the said William Bradburn full power, licence, and authority, by any deed or deeds, to assign, transfer, and set over the said leasehold premises, with all erections and buildings thereon, and other appurtenances, for all or any part of the residue of the said term of ninety-nine years unto John Jones, of Ruckley, in the said county of Salop, Esquire, his executors, administrators, and assigns, upon condition, nevertheless, that he, the said John Jones, his executors or administrators, do not at any time hereafter assign or transfer the said premises, or any part thereof, to any person or persons whomsoever without the licence or consent of me, the said Robert Aglionby Slaney, my heirs or assigns, in writing first had and obtained, and so as the rent by the said lease reserved and made payable be well and truly paid pursuant to the true intent and meaning thereof, and so as the covenants, provisos, conditions, exceptions, and agreements in the said lease contained, on the tenant's or lessee's part to be observed and performed, be well and truly observed and performed, and not in anywise broken or infringed. In witness whereof I, the said Robert Aglionby Slaney, have hereunto set my hand this 26th Aug. 1859.

(Signed) ROBERT A. SLANEY.

Witness, David Hughes, butler to R. A. Slaney, Walford, Shropshire.

This licence was given after the passing of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35.

On the 29th Sept. 1859, pursuant to the above licence, the said William Bradburn duly assigned to the defendant, John Jones, by an indenture, executed by both Bradburn and Jones, the residue of the term created by the said indenture of lease of the 27th April 1850, subject to the payment of the rent and the performance of the covenants therein. The defendant Jones entered upon the whole of the demised premises under the above assignment, and held possession of them until the year 1866, paying to the lessor and his representatives the rent reserved in the lease of the 27th April 1850.

The said Robert Aglionby Slaney died on the 19th May 1862, seised of the reversion immediately expectant on the said term of ninety-nine years. By his will he duly devised the lands included in the lease unto and to the use of Robert Burton and the Rev. Charles Orlando Kenyon for a term of 500 years, with remainder unto and to the use of William Henry Slaney and the plaintiff, their heirs and assigns.

The bequest of the said term of 500 years was duly revoked by a codicil to this will executed by the said Robert Aglionby Slaney. The said William Henry Slaney died on the 26th Dec. 1862, leaving the plaintiff surviving him.

By an indenture dated 17th Nov. 1866, the said John Jones, in consideration of 500*l.* then paid to him, assigned to the defendants, John Edge and Joseph Edge, the said three acres before-mentioned, to hold the same to them, their executors, administrators, and assigns for the remainder of the term created by the said lease of the 27th April 1850. This assignment was made to John Edge and Joseph Edge, in trust for James Edge who is their father, and for the purpose of enabling him to carry on in the buildings erected on the said three acres, the business of a wire rope and chain manufacturer. In pursuance of this assignment the said defendants, John Edge and Joseph Edge entered upon the said three acres of land, and have since retained the possession thereof on behalf of the said James Edge, and the said John Jones has parted with such possession.

On the 1st Dec. 1866 the said defendant, John Jones, by an agreement of that date, between him of the first part, and Daniel Jones, son of the said John Jones, of the other part, demised and let to the said Daniel Jones about thirty acres of land, being the remainder of the 33a. 2r. 35p. included in the said lease of the 27th April 1850, for the term of one year from the 29th Sept. 1866, and so on from year to year, subject to the payment of the yearly rent of 30*l.* 10*s.* from the said Daniel Jones to the said John Jones, and to the payment of all taxes by the said Daniel Jones; the tenancy of the said Daniel Jones to be determinable by either party giving six months' notice to quit, expiring on the 25th March in any year of the said tenancy.

By virtue of this demise, the said Daniel Jones entered upon the demised premises included in this demise, and had the possession thereof from the said John Jones, who parted with the possession thereof from that time forward.

On the 3rd Dec. 1866, by an agreement in writing, between the said Daniel Jones of the one part and the defendant James Edge of the other part, the said Daniel Jones demised and let the said thirty acres of land hereinbefore mentioned, to the said James Edge for the term of one year from the 29th Sept. 1866, so on from year to year subject to the payment to the said Daniel Jones by the said James Edge of a yearly rent of 46*l.*, and to the payment of all taxes by the said James Edge. This tenancy was also determinable by either party giving six months' notice to quit, expiring on the 25th March in any year of the tenancy.

In pursuance and by virtue of this demise the said James Edge entered upon the said remainder of the said 33a. 2r. 35p. of land, and has since retained the possession and occupation thereof, and the defendant John Jones has parted with such possession. No licence or consent was had or given for the said assignment by John Jones to John Edge and Joseph Edge, or for the said demise and letting by John Jones to Daniel Jones, or by Daniel Jones to James Edge, or for the occupation and possession of the premises so assigned and let respectively by the said John Edge and Joseph Edge, or by the said Daniel Jones or the said James Edge, or for the said John Jones parting with the possession of any of the said lands.

On the 6th June 1867 possession of the lands claimed by the writ was demanded by the plaintiff of all the defendants, who were severally required to quit and deliver up possession thereof. This demand not having been complied with as to any part of the lands claimed, this action was brought by the plaintiff.

The defendant John Jones has paid to the plaintiff the rent reserved by the said lease of the 27th April 1850 up to the 25th March 1866; but no rent which has accrued due since that day has been received by the plaintiff, but the amount thereof has been duly tendered to his agent and receiver of his rents.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover the premises to which the said defendants, James Edge, John Edge, and Joseph Edge have confined their defence.

If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, the verdict for the plaintiff is to stand, and judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff, with costs of suit. If the court should be of opinion in the negative, the verdict for the plaintiff is to be set aside, and a verdict and judgment is to be entered for such of the defendants, James Edge, John Edge, and Joseph Edge, as the court shall think fit, with costs of defence.

Plaintiff's points of argument: First, the covenant against letting, assigning, or parting with the premises bound the assigns of the lessee Bradburn. Secondly, the licence granted by Mr. Slaney for the assignment by Bradburn to Jones could not control or vary the terms of that covenant. Thirdly, the demises by John Jones to Daniel Jones, and by Daniel Jones to James Edge, were breaches of the covenant against letting, assigning, or parting with the demised premises, and worked a forfeiture of the whole original leasehold interest. Fourthly, those demises, and the assignment by John Jones to John Edge and Joseph Edge are also contrary to the terms of the licence granted by Mr. Slaney for the assignment by Mr. Bradburn to John Jones. Fifthly, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the premises to which James Edge, John Edge, and Joseph Edge have confined their defence.

Defendants' points: First, the three acres in question in this action are expressly exempted from the condition in the lease against assignment without consent. Secondly, the consent stated in the case qualifies the said condition in the lease, and limits it to a future assignment or transfer. Thirdly, before the passing of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, such licence would have operated as a total waiver of the said condition, but being given after the passing of that statute, it operates according to its terms as a waiver or alteration of the condition as to future demises, lettings, makings over or parting with possession not amounting to an assignment or transfer. Fourthly, the matters mentioned in the latter part of the case do not amount to an assignment or transfer within the meaning of the said licence. Fifthly, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the premises in question upon the facts stated in the case.

Matthews, Q. C. for plaintiff.—The decision in Dumpor's case, 1 Sm. L. C. 30, that one licence put an end to a covenant not to assign without licence, was overruled by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, ss. 1, 2, 3; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, s. 6. It has been long decided that a covenant not to assign runs with the land;

Winter v. Dumerque, 12 Jur. N. S. 56, in C. P., confirmed in Ex. Ch. 726.;

Digitized by Google

Anon, Dyer, 152a ;
Williams v. Earle, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 739 ; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 238.

The question arises whether this licence did anything to vary the lease under the 1st section of the Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35. There is nothing in the words themselves to do so, and moreover, as the licence is not under seal, it cannot, even if the words were clearly intended to do so, alter a covenant in the original lease. If the breach of covenant be established, the right of entry will apply to the whole of the premises which were the subject of the original lease. "Entry for a condition defeats the estate to which the condition was annexed to all intents :"

Com. Dig. "Condition" O, 6 ;
Shep. Touch. 155.

Gray, Q. C. (with him J. O. Griffits) for defendants. Clearly the lessee of the three acres was at liberty to do whatever he pleased as to letting the premises he leased without the consent of the lessor. How can the lease of the thirty acres affect the tenure of the lessee of the three acres? Under circumstances of this kind the rent can be apportioned, as appears from

Stevenson v. Lambard, 2 East, 575 ;
Doe dem. Vaughan v. Meyler, 2 M. & S. 276 ;
Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, p. 362.

The exception of the three acres from the necessity for the lessor's licence is recited in the licence to Bradburn, therefore the licence is a confirmation of the exception of those acres from the lessor's right of re-entry. As to the licence itself, the statutes cited only do away with the effect of Dumpor's case when it does not otherwise appear by the licence. Here, although the lease is recited, and the words of the covenant are expressly stated in the licence, there is nothing in the condition of the licence to prevent the lessee from underletting. The case does not find that there has been any assignment or transfer of the lease ; and therefore there has been no breach of the covenant in the original lease as qualified by the licence.

Matthews, in reply, cited Viner's Abridgment "Condition," Pd. 18 : "Every limitation or consideration ought to defeat the entire estate, and not to defeat part and leave part not defeated, and it cannot make an estate to cease quoad unam personam, and not quoad alteram" : (Finch's case, 6 Co. Rep. 40.)

BOVILL, C. J.—The first question is, what is the effect of the original lease as to the covenant against assignment and the proviso thereto. The words are, "That he, the said Wm. Bradburn, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or any of them, shall not nor will at any time during the said term hereby granted, demise, let, assign, make over, or part with the possession of the said lands and premises hereby demised (except to the extent of three acres immediately adjoining the said line of railway and the said wharf or siding), without the licence and consent in writing of the said R. A. Slaney, his heirs or assigns, under his or their hand or hands, for that purpose first had and obtained." The lease created one entire interest in and provided for one entire rent of the whole premises ; there is a proviso for re-entry upon the breach of any covenant. Great hardship is often occasioned to under lessees by forfeiture on the breach of a covenant in which they are not concerned, but it is the same in all cases, and the consequence must follow according to the law unless some special provision is made for the under-lessee's benefit ; for instance, a forfeiture often takes place under building leases by reason of breaches for which the person who suffers is by no means responsible. Here the lessee of the three acres cannot complain because he is turned out of possession in accordance with the terms of his lease. As to the effect of the licence, it is true that according to Dumpor's case the first licence to assign would have terminated the condition not to assign without licence, but by sect. 1 of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35 every such licence shall, unless otherwise expressed, extend only to the permission actually given ; but not to prevent any proceedings for any subsequent breach unless otherwise specified in such licence. Therefore, if not otherwise determined by the licence, the covenants in the lease continue to be binding upon the defendants. In order that the defendants should not be bound by the covenants in the lease, it must so appear by express terms in the licence. It is said here, however, that it sufficiently appears from the lease and the licence that the assignee was at liberty to underlet the premises. Certainly there are no express terms to that effect in the licence, and I say that such an intention does not appear by any reasonable inference. The covenant was "not to demise, let, assign, make over, or part with the possession of the land ;" and the condition of the licence was "not at any time thereafter to assign or transfer the said premises, or any part thereof, to any person or persons whomsoever without the licence or consent of the lessor." There is nothing inconsistent in the two ; and it also appears subsequently in the licence that all the covenants in the lease are to be observed. I am at a loss to understand how these words can possibly be construed as a licence to underlet. This was, then, clearly a breach of covenant, and the plaintiff's power of re-entry, therefore, comes into operation.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff's right to thirty acres is admitted by the defendants ; they do not deny that the condition of re-entry entitles the plaintiff to re-enter as to them ; but it is contended that the provision does not extend to the three acres excepted from the covenant not to assign without licence. I understand the ground of contention to be that the particular breach of the covenant in this case does not create a forfeiture of the three acres in question. Mr. Gray says that under this particular form of covenant the defendants who have appeared are not concerned. It seems to me, however, that the exception does not take the three acres out of the original term, and that a forfeiture created by a breach of any covenant would involve the three acres as well as the thirty. The forfeiture here is caused by the clause providing power of re-entry upon the breach of any covenant contained in the lease ; the covenant upon which a breach is complained is not to assign or underlet, except three acres. What is there to prevent the operation of this particular covenant? The lessor must certainly have a right to re-enter the whole of the property upon a breach of the covenant. Mr. Gray then contends that by the terms of the licence Jones was at liberty to underlet without further consent of the lessor. I cannot read the licence in that way. It is merely a licence to Bradburn to assign, transfer, and set over the premises to Jones. The condition, which is added, that Jones should not assign or transfer without licence, may have been unnecessary, but so far from construing it as a permission to underlet, as Mr. Gray does, I should be inclined to think it meant rather to be a confirmation of the old covenant, although the words of that covenant are not to "demise, let, assign, make over, or part with the possession of" the premises. The omission in the condition of the licence of the words "demise, let, make over, or part with the possession of," cannot mean to limit the original covenant to assigning only. This being so, the original covenant must be observed and a forfeiture has been created. I think, therefore, with every endeavour to prevent a forfeiture on such a ground, we are bound to give judgment for the plaintiff.

BRETT, J.—I should be glad to decide in favour of the defendants, for I think that either this is an ejectment without sufficient reason, or an attempt to evade the trial of an indictment for nuisance. The covenant in the original lease is not to let without licence; this is expressed to relate to thirty acres only, but that does not confine the right of re-entry to the thirty acres on the breach of the condition as to the thirty acres. I think, too, the lease and licence construed as a whole do not give the tenant liberty to underlet, but expressly forbid it.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Attorneys for plaintiffs, Francis and Bosanquet.

Attorney for defendants, W. Potts, for Potts and Son, Broseley.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law

Nov. 17, 1869, and Jan. 29, 1870.

BOLTON v. BOLTON.

Will—Indefinite devise—Absence of words of limitation—Charge on property devised—Effect of words "property and estate"—Enlargemement of life estate into a fee—Construction—Rules of.

A testator having two sons, G., who was married and had no children, and W., who was married and had five children, by his will dated 7th Jan. 1834, devised (the words of gift used being "give, bequeath, and demise") to his son G. a dwelling-house and certain lands, without any words of limitation. He also gave to G. (using the same words of gift) "all the furniture, &c., upon the said premises, and all the farming implements, &c., for his full use and enjoyment, and also all the stock, &c., upon this my estate, he my said son G. paying out of this my personal property and estate, the sum of 100*l.*, and a second sum of 100*l. to be paid by my son W. hereinafter mentioned, as a joint payment, I entail upon my two sons, G. and W., equally." The testator then directed that if G. should die before his wife, then she "should have the enjoyment of all the above-mentioned property and estate for the term of her natural life." And then follow these words: "After whose decease I give, bequeath, and demise all the before-mentioned* property and estate to my five grandchildren, R., G., W., E., and A., lawful children begotten of my son W., equal share and share alike of the said property and estate," with benefit of survivorship amongst them as therein mentioned. He then devised (using the same words of gift) other lands to his son W., without any words of limitation, and with the following directions: "He my said son W. paying thereout 100*l.*, and another 100*l. paid by my son G. before mentioned, a joint payment I entail upon my two sons equally; that is, that they pay* 100*l. each* out of my personal property and estate bequeathed to them separately. This my said property and estate I give and bequeath to my two sons G. and W., they paying thereout 100*l. each as above expressed in this my will."*

Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C. B. and Channell, Pigott, and Cleasby, BB.), that, under the terms of the above will, G. and his wife took life estates in succession, and that the grandchildren took vested estates, as tenants in common in fee, in remainder expectant upon the determination of such life estates.

The rule that an indefinite devise may be enlarged into a fee, where there is a devise over on certain conditions, is not applicable in a case where the devise over is to another person for life, and the only condition is that that other person survives the first devisee; and more especially where there is a devise, after the death of that other person, of the whole estate in fee. Nor, in such a case, does the rule for enlarging the devise into an estate in fee, by reason of the direction of payment out of the property, apply.

The effect of the words "property and estate" to confer a fee may always be construed by the context, and where, in the early part of a will, there is a devise of lands, by their proper description, to persons in succession, the use of those words, in a subsequent part of the will, cannot destroy the devise in sucesssion, and convert the first devise into a devise in fee: (Willis v. Lucas, 1 P. Wms. 472; Doe d. Burdett v. Wrighte, 2 B. & Ald. 710).

This was an action of ejectment commenced on Dec. 30, 1868, by writ directed to the tenants in possession, and all other persons entitled to defend the possession of one undivided equal third part—the whole into three equal parts, to be divided—of and in all that messuage, tenement, or dwelling-house, with the barns, stable, and outbuildings thereto belonging, and also all those three pieces of land, or closes, called Home Close, Hill Leas, and Great Close, containing 25 acres or thereabouts, and also all those two newly-erected cottages or tenements standing and being adjacent to the above-described messuage, &c., all which said hereditaments and premises are situated in the parish of Yelvertoft, in the county of Northampton, to the possession whereof the plaintiff claims to have been on and since 21st Nov. 1865, entitled. Judgment was signed herein in default of appearance, and on 9th Jan. 1869, George Bolton, by leave of a judge, appeared to the said writ, and defended, as landlord of the said tenants, for the whole of the said undivided third part of the said premises; and on 19th Feb. 1869, his death, since his appearing to the said writ, was suggested by the plaintiff; and the present defendant, Matilda Bolton, the legal representative of the said George Bolton, appeared to the said writ, and defended for the whole of the said undivided third part, &c.

The cause came on for trial before Bovill, C.J., at the last Spring Assizes (1869) for the county of Northampton, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court of Exchequer upon the following

CASE.

1. George Bolton, the plaintiff's late grandfather, deceased, duly made his last will and testament in writing, dated the 7th Jan. 1834, by which will he gave and devised as follows:

First, at my decease I give, bequeath, and demise to my son George Bolton all my premises, containing dwelling-house, farm, stables, and outbuildings, situate in the parish of Yelvertoft in the county of Northampton. I also give, bequeath, and demise to my said Son George Bolton all the furniture, linen, and utensils of every kind that shall be upon these my premises at my decease, situate in the parish of Yelvertoft aforesaid. I further give, bequeath, and demise to the said my son George Bolton all the farming implements and utensils of every description for his full use and enjoyment. I also give, bequeath, and demise to the said my son George Bolton all those three pieces of land or closes called and known by the several names of the Home Close, the Hill Leas, and the Great Close, situate in the parish of Yelvertoft in the county of Northampton, and being contiguous to and joining these my premises aforesaid, and now in my own occupation. I also give, bequeath, and demise to my said son George Bolton all the stock that shall be upon this my estate, and whether it shall be of sheep, cattle, or horses, he my said son George Bolton paying out of this my personal property and estate the sum of 100*l.*, and a second sum of 100*l.* to be paid by my son William Bolton hereinafter mentioned, as a joint payment I entail upon my two sons, George and William Bolton, equally. And my further will is that, should it please God to call from this life my son George Bolton before his lawful wife, Elizabeth Bolton, that she, the said Elizabeth Bolton, shall have the full use and enjoyment of all the above, my property and estate for the term of her natural life; that is, that she retain, hold, and keep possession of the said premises, furniture, linen, stock, and all those three closes of land called and known by the several names of The Home Close, The Hill Leas and the Great Close, situate, &c., and containing, &c., after whose decease I give, bequeath, and demise all the before-mentioned property and estate to my five grandchildren, Robert, George, William, Elizabeth, and Anne Bolton, lawful children, begotten of my son, William Bolton, equal share and share alike of the said property and estate; but should any one or more of the said my grandchildren die before such of my property and estate becomes valid or vacant, then shall the surviving children take equal shares of such deceased child or children's share of the said property and estate. Also I give, bequeath, and demise to my son, William Bolton, all those three closes or pieces of land known by the several names of the Rawnspole, Stone Pits, and Crick Mere, except a part of the Crick Mere, containing about three acres, which is now sown with wheat, which my son George Bolton is to have the privilege of getting; therefore my son William Bolton shall not enter upon that said three acres till the crop be cleared off the ground (which last close or piece of land the Union Canal runs through), situate in the parish of Yelvertoft aforesaid, the whole containing twenty-five acres or thereabouts; he, my said son William Bolton, paying thereout 100*l.*, and another 100*l.* paid by my son George Bolton before-mentioned, a joint payment I entail upon my two sons equally; that is, that they pay 100*l. each out of my personal property and estate*, bequeathed to them separately. This my said property and estate I give and bequeath to my two sons George and William Bolton, they paying thereout 100*l.* each as above expressed in this my will. And lastly I do hereby nominate, constitute, and appoint my two sons, George Bolton and William Bolton, as executors of this my last will and testament contained in two sheets of paper.

2. The said testator's execution of the said will was attested by four persons, one of whom was the said testator's said son George Bolton, named in the said will.

3. The said testator died in the year 1834, and his said will was proved by his sons and executors, the said George and William Bolton, in the Archdeaconry Court of Northampton, on the 19th July 1834, and the said sums of 100*l.* each were, in the residuary account, stated to be cash charged on the real estate devised to George Bolton and William Bolton.

4. The said testator left the said George Bolton, his eldest son and heir-at-law, him surviving.

5. The said testator was, at the date of his said will, and thence up to and at his decease, seised, or well entitled in fee simple, of or to the closes and hereditaments in the said will mentioned.

6. The said testator was, at the date of his said will and of his death, indebted in a sum of 200*l.*, which debt was paid, in equal shares, by his said two sons. He left little personal property not specifically bequeathed by his said will.

7. The said testator's son, the said George Bolton, was, before the 7th Jan. 1834, married to Elizabeth, his wife, and they both survived the said testator.

The said testator's son George Bolton, after the death of the said testator, enjoyed during his life the said hereditaments so devised to him as aforesaid, and he survived his said wife Elizabeth Bolton, who died in the year 1836; and he died on the 20th Nov. 1865, without having had any children, and having devised all his real estate to his nephew George Bolton, the son of the said William Bolton, and one of the five grandchildren named in the before-mentioned will. A share of the hereditaments so devised by the will of 1834 to the said testator's eldest son George, and enjoyed by him during his life as aforesaid, is now the subject of this action of ejectment.

8. Robt. Bolton and Anne Bolton, mentioned in the will as two of the five grandchildren of the said testator respectively, died in the lifetime of the said testator's son, George Bolton.

9. The plaintiff, Wm. Bolton, is the said testator's grandson of that name, and is mentioned as one of the five grandchildren of the testator in his said will. The defendant is the widow and representative of the deceased grandson George Bolton, the devisee of his uncle George Bolton, the eldest son of the testator of the will of 1834.

10. The court is to be at liberty to draw any inference upon any facts which, in the opinion of the court, a jury ought to have drawn or found. Also to amend the writ and any subsequent proceedings as the court may think fit.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover any or what share of the lands and premises in the writ of ejectment mentioned.

If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is so entitled to recover, &c., then the verdict entered for the plaintiff shall stand for such share as the court shall think fit.

But if the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff has not established his case, then the verdict entered for him shall be set aside, and instead thereof a verdict be entered for the defendant.

The plaintiff's points for argument: First. By the will a life estate in the hereditaments in question was given to George Bolton the son; with remainder to his wife Elizabeth for life, with remainders to the grandchildren as tenants in common in fee, subject as to the original (but not as to any accruing) shares of those dying in the lifetime of the tenants for life, or of the survivor of them, to be devested in favour of the survivors. Secondly. The devises to George and his wife failed by reason of George having attested the will. Thirdly. The consequence was that the estate vested in George, as heir-at-law, until the determination of the life estate on the death of George the survivor. Fourthly. Two of the grandchildren having died during the lifetime of George, the remaining three became entitled in fee, and the plaintiff as one of them entitled to recover one undivided third part.

The defendant's points for argument: First. The will under which plaintiff claims is void. Secondly. If not, it was void so far as the bequest to George the attesting witness and his wife; and if so, the devise to the grandchildren, being contingent upon her surviving, there was consequently an intestacy as to that part which vested in George as heir. Thirdly. If the will be valid there is a clear intention shown to give George the fee simple. Fourthly. The charge of 100*l.* created thereby gave such fee by implication. Fifthly. If the will be valid but the devise to George void, the grandchildren's remainder, being accelerated, vested in possession either on the death of testator or of Elizabeth, wife of George, and that such interest is in either case barred by the statute. Sixthly. There being no words of inheritance in the devise to the grandchildren, their respective estates vested on decease in the heir-at-law. Seventhly. The limitation over, in the event of the death of any grandchild, extends only to original and not to accruing shares, and therefore the plaintiff is in any case only entitled to his one-fifth share, the fourth of that of Ann Bolton, and the third of that of Robert Bolton, who died as in the eighth paragraph of this case stated. Eighthly. No disclaimer by the tenants in possession of the plaintiff's title appearing, the plaintiff cannot recover in this action.

Keane, Q. C. (with him was A. Wills) for the plaintiffs. Assuming even, as is contended on the other side to be the case, that under the 25 Geo. 2, c. 6, s. 1, the devise to the eldest son George is void, by reason of his being a supernumerary and superfluous attesting witness to the will, the question would be to whom meantime would the property go? It is contended on the part of the plaintiff that it would vest meantime in George as heir-at-law of his father, until the happening of the event—namely, the death of the survivor of George Bolton and his wife Elizabeth, on which the gifts over to the testator's grandchildren then surviving would take effect, and there would be no acceleration of the grandchildren's estate and interest. The devise to George Bolton was a devise for life only, and is not enlarged into a fee by the charge to pay 100*l.*, for that is expressly directed to be paid by him out of the "personal property and estate" specifically bequeathed to him. Moreover the words of gift used, "give, bequeath, and demise," are not the language by which an estate in fee is given or would pass. The wife's estate was not to arise until her husband's death, and he survived her. Two of the grandchildren died in George's lifetime, and consequently, at his death, the three surviving grandchildren, of whom the plaintiff is one, became entitled to the property under the testator's will, under which they took vested estates in remainder expectant upon the determination of the previous life estates in George and Elizabeth Bolton. He cited and referred to

Doe dem. Child and wife v. Wright and others, 8 T. R. 64;
Denn ex dim. Gaskin v. Gaskin, 2 Cowp. 657;
Bolton v. Bolton, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 556 (before Stuart, V.C.)

Manisty, Q. C., (with whom was C. G. Merewether), for the defendant, contra. Before the Wills Act 1 Vict. c. 26, when this will was executed, where an estate was given to a person without words of limitation, but with a direction to pay debts, or with the payment of a sum of money charged on it, what would otherwise have been construed as an estate for life, was by such direction or charge enlarged into a fee. The amount is immaterial if, as in this case, there is an express direction to pay the money out of the estate. The words are "he paying out of this my personal property and estate the sum of 100*l.*," and again, "this, my real property and estate, I give and bequeath to my two sons, they paying thereout 100*l.* each as above expressed," &c. In construing a will, the court will take notice of the testator's intention, having regard to the state of the family. He, having two different properties and two sons, he gave one estate to the eldest, and the other to the younger son, but having probably an idea that the eldest son might die without issue (as the fact indeed turned out to be) he willed that if that should happen, leaving the wife, then the property which he intended to go to his eldest son in fee should go to his widow for her life, and at her death to the children of his younger son in fee. That would be a very reasonable will under the circumstances. But it could never be the testator's intention that, if his eldest son George survived his wife, and should happen to have a son by a second wife, that such son should be disinherited, and take nothing; yet that would be the result of the construction contended for by the plaintiff. There can be no doubt that William, the younger son, took an estate in fee in the property demised to him for there is a direction to pay 100*l.* out of the estate, and the devise to the eldest son is identical in terms —"he paying out of my personal property and estate;" and estate means real property: 2 Jarm. on Wills, 248, 3rd edit. [CLEASBY, B.—That may be admitted. But if, by implication or expressly by other parts of the will, it appears clear that the devise be for life or for an estate tail, then the rule would not apply.] The shifting the estate from the elder to the younger branch is strong to show that it was an executory devise to the grandchildren, grafted on the devise in fee to George. It is as though the testator had said, "Property A I give to George, and property B to William, and if George dies before his wife, without issue then I give A to William's children. [KELLY, C. B.—Is not the presumption of the fee being devised to George rebutted by the giving a life estate afterwards to another person? CLEASBY, B.—Your argument is, that what follows the devise to George is an executory devise and not a remainder?] Just so. [CLEASBY, B.—But is it not a well-settled rule, without exception, that where a devise is capable, according to the state of the objects at the death of the testator, of taking effect as a remainder, it shall not be construed to be an executory devise? (His Lordship here quoted Jarman on Wills, 9th edit. 820.)] The Lords Justices (W. Page Wood and Selwyn) when this very case was before them on appeal from Stuart, V. C., expressed an opinion against the plaintiff's construction of this will: (See Bolton v. Bolton, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 298.) But, secondly, the limitation in favour of the grandchildren, and the right of entry, vested on the death of the wife in 1836, and the Statute of Limitations was applicable, and a bar to the action, the remainder being accelerated by the death of George's wife in 1836.

Keane, Q. C., in reply, referred to 1 Jarman on Wills, 820.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 27.—Their Lordships having taken time to consider, the following written judgment of the court (Kelly, C. B., and Channell, Pigott, and Cleasby, BB.) was now delivered by CLEASBY, B.—The only question in this case is, what estate, if any, the claimant Wm. Bolton, took under the will of George Bolton, his grandfather. The particular share to which the claimant would become entitled, by reason of the death of a brother or sister, also named in the will, was disposed of in the course of the argument, and the only question is as to the proper construction of the will. It appears that the testator had two sons, George and William. At the time of the making of the will, which was before the 1st Jan. 1838, when the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26) came into operation, the son George was married, and had no children; William also was then married, and had five children. By his will, the testator devised (the words used being "give, bequeath, and demise") certain premises (houses, buildings, and closes of land) particularly described in the said will, to his son George, without any words of limitation. He then directs that, should it please God to call from this life his son George, before his wife Elizabeth Bolton, that she should have the full use and enjoyment of all the above (his the testator's) property and estate for the term of her natural life; and then follow these words, "after whose decease I give bequeath and demise all the before-mentioned property and estate to my five grandchildren, Robert, George, William, Elizabeth, and Anne Bolton, lawful children begotten of my son William Bolton, equal share and share alike of the said property and estate," with some benefit of survivorship between them as therein mentioned. He then devises (using the same before-mentioned words of gift) three closes of land to his son William, with the following directions: "He my said son William Bolton paying thereout 100*l.*, and another 100*l.* paid by my son George Bolton before mentioned, a joint payment I entail upon my two sons equally, that is, that they pay 100*l.* each out of my personal property and estate bequeathed to them separately. This, my said property and estate, I give and bequeath to my two sons George and William Bolton, they paying thereout 100*l.* each as above expressed in this my will." The testator then appointed his said two sons, George and William, the executors of his said will. In an earlier part of the will the testator had bequeathed, by the same words of gift, certain personal property to George, and directed him to pay the sum of 100*l.* out of it. In construing this will, it is necessary to bear in mind that it bears date previously to the 1st Jan. 1838, and therefore that the Wills Act of 1 Vict. c. 26, does not apply to it, and therefore that the old rule remains in full force, that a devise of messuages and lands (not using the word estate, or anything equivalent to it) to a person, without words of limitation, confers an estate for life only: (see 2 Jarman on Wills, 3rd edit. chap. 33. p. 247), and that to depart from it would (as Mr. Jarman observes) shake the title to many estates which are still held, and will long continue to be held, under such wills. It is plain, therefore, that, under the terms of the devise to George, an estate for life passed. This was hardly indeed disputed, but it was contended, first, that there was here such a conditional devise as, according to a well-established rule, enlarged what would otherwise have been an estate for life only into a fee; and, secondly, that there was such a direction for the devisee George to pay the sum of 100*l.* out of the estate as, by another well-known rule, had the same effect. As regards the first ground, nothing is clearer than that an indefinite devise may be enlarged into a fee, where there is a devise over upon certain conditions, as, for instance, where there is a demise to A., and in case A. should die under twenty-one years of age, then to B. in fee; in that case it is considered absurd to suppose that the case of A. happening to live beyond the age of twenty-one years is unprovided for by the testator; and it is therefore implied that he did provide for it in the only manner which can be suggested—namely, by giving the fee in that event to A. There are various other instances of the same construction prevailing, all which are collected in 2 Jarman on Wills, 3rd edit., chap. 38, sect. 3, p. 251. But the reasoning and the rule are wholly inapplicable to such a case as the present, where the devise was to another person for life, and the only condition is that that other person survives the first devisee, which in fact only expresses the necessary condition to the devise over taking effect, and leaves it still an estate for life in remainder; and more especially when there is a devise, after the death of that other person, of the whole estate in fee; for the devise to the grandchildren carries the fee, being a devise of "all the property and estate." An attempt was indeed made (not very properly) to induce the court to give a particular effect to the words introduced in the devise to the wife, by stating that she was in a failing state of health, unlikely to live, and therefore all that the testator intended to provide for was the particular case of her surviving her husband, and that the testator could not have intended, as was argued, to disinherit his eldest son's children, in case he had married again, and had had children. The answer was, first, that the construction of a will cannot depend upon the probability, which the testator might or might not suppose there was, of a devisee losing his wife and marrying again and having a family by his second wife; and, secondly, that there is not upon the case the least foundation for the statement of fact relied on. On the contrary, it does appear that the devisee's wife died, and that he remained a widower for the rest of his life, nearly thirty years; so that we are asked to collect, or rather to assume, that the testator contemplated that something would take place which in fact never did take place at all. It appears, from the facts stated in the case and upon the will, that the testator provided for all the members of his family existing at the time, and there is no reason whatever for supposing that he contemplated that there were any others to be provided for. The second ground relied upon was that the devise to "though in itself amounting to no more than an estate for life, was nevertheless en- an estate in fee by reason of his being directed to pay the sum of 100*l.* out of it. The general rule is well established, that where there is a devise of land to a man with no words of limitation, yet, if he is directed to pay a sum of money out of it, his estate is enlarged into an estate in fee; and the court, in construing this will, do not enter into the consideration of the smallness of the amount. And, therefore, in the present case, if there had only been the devise to George, and afterwards the direction to pay the 100*l.*, this, notwithstanding that he is in the first instance directed to pay it out of the personal estate bequeathed to him, and notwithstanding the obscure and incoherent language of the latter part of the will, might have had the effect of enlarging George's estate into an estate in fee. But the examination of the earlier part of the will has shown that the testator gives the property to George, and after his death to Elizabeth his wife (in case she survives him), and after her death absolutely to the grandchildren in fee. This is the same as giving to George, expressly and in words, an estate for life, and the rule for enlarging a devise of an estate for life to an estate in fee, by reason of the direction of a payment to be made out of the property, undoubtedly does not apply where there is an express estate for life devised (Willis v. Lucas, 1 P. Wms. 472; Doe d. Burdett v. Wrighte, 2 B. & A. 710). Another argument urged by the defendant remains to be noticed. It was said that though the words of the devise to George taken by themselves would only give an estate for life, yet, as in the subsequent part of the will the testator speaks of the "property and estate given to my said son George," that this had the same effect as if the words "property and estate" had occurred in the actual devise itself of the property, and so that the fee would pass. The clear answer to that is, that the effect of the words "property and estate" to confer an estate in fee, may always be construed by the context; and in the present case, there being, in the early part of the will, a devise of the lands by their proper description to persons in succession, the use of the words "property and estate," in a subsequent part of the will, cannot destroy the devise in succession, and convert the first devise into a devise in fee. It appears to us, therefore, that, by the will, the grandchildren took vested estates, as tenants in common in remainder, expectant upon the determination of life estates in George and his wife, and that the claimant, as one of such grandchildren, is entitled to recover his one-fifth share, and also what in addition has accrued to him by survivorship.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Attorneys for the plaintiff, Iliffe, Russell, and Iliffe, 2, Bedford-row, W.C.; agents for Edmund Harris, Rugby.

Attorneys for the defendant, Skilbeck, and Griffith, 34, Bedford-row, W.C.; agents for Watson, Son, and Baxter, Luttlerworth.

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Reported by JOHN THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, Jan. 29.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J., BYLES and KEATING, JJ., and PIGOTT and CLEASBY, BB.)

REG. v. JOHN MARSHALL.

Embezzlement—Clerk or servant—Commission.

The prisoner was employed by a coal merchant under an agreement "that he was to receive 1s. per ton procuration fee payable out of the first payment, 4 per cent. for collecting, and 3d. on the last payment. Collections to be paid on Friday evening before 5 p.m. or Saturday before 2 p.m." He received no salary, was not obliged to be at the office except on Friday or Saturday to account for what money he had received. He was at liberty to go where he pleased for orders:

Held, that the prisoner was not a clerk or servant within the statute relating to embezzlement.

Case reserved for the determination of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved by the assistant-judge at the Middlesex Sessions.

John Marshall was tried before me at the Middlesex Sessions holden on the 15th Nov. 1869, on an indictment which charged him with having feloniously embezzled several sums of money the property of George Tooley, by whom it was alleged he was employed as a clerk and servant.

The prisoner was employed by the prosecutor under an agreement dated 19th Aug. 1868, of which the following is a copy:

19th Aug. 1868.

To Mr. John Marshall, Wells-buildings, Oxford-street.

Terms of employment—Re John Marshall—1s. per ton procuration fee payable out of the first payment, 4 per cent. for collecting, and 3d. on the last payment. Collections to be paid in Friday evening before 5 p.m., or Saturday before 2 p.m. Cash orders 1s. 6d. per ton. G. Tooley.

At the trial three witnesses were called on behalf of the prosecution, who respectively proved that they had paid certain sums of money to the prisoner for and on account of goods supplied to them by the prosecutor, George Tooley, the orders for the said goods having been obtained by the prisoner.

In his examination in chief the prosecutor proved the above memorandum of agreement between the prisoner and himself and further proved that the prisoner had not accounted to him for either of the three several sums of money which had been paid to him as above stated.

In cross-examination by Mr. Collins, who appeared for the prisoner, the prosecutor gave the following evidence:

I paid the prisoner commission, but no salary. He was not obliged to be at my office at any particular time, excepting on Friday or Saturday, to account for what money he had received for me. I did not give the prisoner directions to go to any particular place for orders. He went where he pleased.

Upon this evidence I thought the prisoner was acting as a clerk and servant, and that the mode of remunerating him was immaterial; but my attention being called to the case of Reg. v. Bowers, L. Rep. 1 Cr. Cas. Res. 41; 10 Cox C. C. 250; 35 L. J. 206, M. C., I agreed to reserve the question.

I thereupon directed the jury to find the prisoner guilty, but respited the judgment until the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved should be pronounced upon the legal objection taken by the prisoner's counsel.

The question for the opinion of this honourable court is, whether the prisoner, under the circumstances herein stated, was a clerk or servant, so as to be liable to be convicted of the crime of embezzlement.

If the court should be of opinion that the prisoner was not a clerk or servant within the meaning of the statute, the conviction is to be reversed. If otherwise, the conviction is to be upheld. In the mean time the prisoner has been liberated on bail.

Wm. H. Bodkin, Assistant Judge,
Middlesex Sessions.

Collins for the prisoner.—The conviction cannot be sustained for the prisoner was not a clerk or servant, but an agent only. In Reg. v. Walker, 27 L. J. 207, M. C.; 8 Cox C. C. 1, Bramwell, B. said, "It seems to me that the difference between the relations of master and servant and of principal and agent is this: a principal has the right to direct what the agent has to do; but a master has not only that right, but also the right to say how it is to be done." In the present case the prosecutor had no power to compel the prisoner to go out for orders. So again in Reg. v. May, 8 Cox C. C. 421, where the prisoner who was employed on the terms that for all business he did he would be allowed a commission, was held not to be a clerk or servant. [Cockburn, C. J.—Can this case be distinguished from Reg. v. Bowers, which is in point.]

Metcalfe (M. Williams with him) for the prosecution.—It is stated in the case that the prisoner was employed by the prosecutor; that is evidence of the relationship of master and servant.

Cockburn, C. J.—That is too vague. The prosecutor had no power to say to the prisoner, "go out and get orders," but the agreement only amounts to this, "You shall be my agent to get me orders if you can, and if you do you shall have such a commission."

Cleasby, B.—The prisoner was not even bound to go and receive the money for the orders he got.

Byles, J.—In what part of the agreement is the obligation to serve to be found?

Cockburn, C. J.—The case is clearly within Reg. v. Bowers, and the conviction must be quashed.

Conviction quashed.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by Henry F. Purcell, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[Erratum.—At p. 765, at line 29, col. 2, a cypher dropped out. It should read "1000l.," not "100l."]

Jan. 18 and 25.

The Aztecs.

Salvage—Unperformed agreement—The Undaunted followed—The Edward Hawkins commented upon.

Where salvors enter into an agrement to take a disabled vessel into harbour for a specified sum, and do all in their power to perform their engagement; but, in consequence of an adverse change of wind, fail to fulfil it, they are nevertheless entitled to salvage reward.

This was an appeal from a decree of the judge of the City of London Court, dismissing the suit of the plaintiffs in a cause of salvage. The facts and arguments of counsel are fully stated in the judgment.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. and Edwyn Jones appeared for the plaintiffs.

Butt, Q. C. and Webster for the defendants.

The following cases were cited:
The Undaunted, 1 Lush. 90;
The E. U., 1 Spinks. 63;
The Bomarsund, 1 Lush. 77;
The Edward Hawkins, 1 Lush. 516.

Sir R. J. Phillimore.—This is an appeal from the City of London Court in a cause of salvage. As far as I can gather from the proceedings, the salvors were nonsuited in the court below, principally, if not entirely, because the assessors of the court were of opinion that the barque to which the alleged service was rendered was in no danger when the principal salvor boarded her, though it appears that the objection that the services of the salvors were unsuccessful was also taken on behalf of the owners. It is certainly a mistake as to the law of salvage to suppose that in order to constitute a salvage service a vessel must be in actual danger at the time when the services are rendered to her. The danger may be probable or imminent, which may warrant the court,

Digitized by Google

according to the varying circumstances of each case, in awarding a salvage remuneration. The facts of this case certainly bring it within this rule, and I was not surprised, therefore, that the counsel whose duty it was to sustain the judgment of the court below relied upon another and a different ground of defence. The facts of the case are shortly these: On the 28th Oct. last, between four and five o'clock in the morning, the wind being N.W., blowing at this time heavily according to the salvors, and a moderate breeze according to the owners, a smack, the Queen Victoria, of thirty tons, with a crew of five men, went out from Harwich, and on nearing the Gunfleet Sand found a vessel called the Aztecs riding at anchor in the Swim, between the Sunk and the Gunfleet Light; they were hailed by the captain; three of the salvors got into a boat and went on board, leaving two men on board the smack. It appears that on the 25th Oct. the Aztecs, which had just left Sunderland for a distant voyage, came into collision with a brig of Whitby, which had carried away her mizenmast, mizen-boom, maintopmast, and main-topsail yard, and smashed her wheel to pieces; but that at the time the salvors came on board almost all the wreck had been cleared away, and some steering apparatus had been rigged up; the captain resolved to put into the nearest port for repairs; on account of the weather, he had not been able to attempt the Humber; and, after encountering severe gales on the 26th and 27th, had come to an anchor in the place which I have mentioned, early in the morning of the 28th. He had rather more than his full crew on board, but the men had been extremely hard-worked, two or three of them were sick, and their berths were so wet that they could not sleep in them. The captain says in answer to the question, "You were rather exhausted yourself?" "I think I was. I never had my clothes off from Sunderland to Gravesend, and had not a bed to lie down upon, but still I was on deck all the time." The salvors were employed partly in removing some of the remaining wreck, partly in going aloft, and appear to have generally assisted the crew. The captain of the Aztecs was desirous of being taken into Harwich, and the following agreement was drawn up between the parties:—"Hook, off Gunfleet, Oct. 27, 1869.—It is this day mutually agreed between S. Varey, master of the Aztecs, and William Young on the other part, that he take the said bark Aztecs into Harwich harbour, and place her in a proper berth to repair damage, and find steam to take her in, this 27th Oct., weather permitting, for the sum of 30*l.*" Upon this agreement the case of the respondents before me was almost exclusively rested. Every effort was made by the salvors to get the vessel into Harwich, and there is no doubt these efforts would have been successful but for a sudden change of the wind to N.E., which it is admitted rendered the arrival at Harwich impossible. The salvors brought back the vessel to an anchorage not far from that in which they had originally found her. The weather became very tempestuous, and it blew a hard gale from N.N.W. The salvors remained on board during the night, and the smack remained in attendance. The next morning, the 29th, they assisted the crew in heaving up the anchor; it broke, however, and the chain came up without it. About 10·30 the smack went away, the principal salvor remaining on board, having failed to come to any arrangement with the captain in respect to his services; the bark proceeded to Gravesend, and, the weather moderating, arrived there at 5 o'clock on the same evening. It has not been contended before me, as I have already observed, that no salvage service was performed by the smacksmen; but that, inasmuch as the conditions of the agreement had not been fulfilled, they were disentitled to all salvage remuneration. It was also, however, argued, though I think with less confidence, that the salvors were disentitled to reward because their efforts had been unsuccessful, and the case of the Edward Hawkins (1 Lush, 517) was mainly relied upon, as I am informed it was, in the court below, in support of this latter proposition. The circumstances of that case, however, when it comes to be examined, were really wholly different, and in my judgment afford no precedent whatever for the present case. The main facts of that case were that the salvors left the vessel "in a position of extreme peril," from which she was saved by her own exertions; in this case it is admitted that the salvors did their utmost, and did not leave the ship in a position of peril without the consent of her master, or without having rendered certain services. It remains to consider that which has been mainly argued before me, the question as to the effect of this agreement. It is admittd that there was no want of exertion or skill on the part of the salvors in endeavouring to fulfil the conditions of it; but the fulfilment was rendered impossible by a sudden change of the weather—that is, was prevented by the act of God. I know no authority, and I should be very sorry if there were one, for the proposition that such an agreement as this in such circumstances could disentitle salvors to any remuneration at all. The principle upon which my learned predecessor decided the Undaunted (Lush, 92) is directly the other way. "The engagement to render assistance to a vessel in distress, and the performance of that engagement, as far as necessary, or so far as possible, establishes a title to salvage reward." It is to be observed also that there are other services which by no construction could be covered by the agreement; nor is the attendance of the smack upon a ship in this condition during the whole of that tempestuous night, in the neighbourhood of dangerous sands, by any means to be laid out of consideration. The services in this case were not of a high order, but they were unquestionably salvage services, and were as such entitled, in my judgment, to a reasonable remuneration. The agreed value of ship, freight, and cargo is 4271*l.* 3*s.* I shall fix the amount of remuneration at 40*l.*, with costs, both in this court and in the court below. I regret that no reasonable legal tender was made, which might have saved the expense of all these proceedings, and which I should certainly have been inclined to uphold.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lowless and Nelson.

Proctors for the defendants, Dyke and Stokes.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT OF WISCONSIN—IN ADMIRALTY.

Dec. 1869.

THE SCHOONER MAITLAND.

Material men—Materials and supplies at foreign port—Necessaries—Lien.

Where material men are desired by the master or owner of a vessel to furnish materials and supplies at a foreign port, they will have no claim upon the vessel unless they ascertained at the time that the master or owner was unable to pay for them, and that a necessity existed for a credit upon the vessel.

Where, therefore, it appeared that the owner at the time of entering into the contract with the libellants had money to pay for the repairs and supplies, and that the repairs were not absolutely essential for rendering her seaworthy:

Held, that the libellants had no lien upon the ship so as to entitle them to institute a suit in rem in a Court of Admiralty.

Digitized by Google

To create such a lien it must appear that the supplies could only be procured on the credit of the vessel.

The Sophie (1 W. Rob. 309) followed.

MILLER, J.—Libel for repairs. The vessel's home port was Buffalo. It is propounded in the libel that the vessel, on the 15th Feb. 1869, while at the port of Milwaukee, her owner or agent represented to libellants that she stood in need of repairs in order to render her seaworthy, and competent to proceed on her intended voyage, and requested said libellants to furnish said materials and supplies. That they were supplied by libellants on the credit of the vessel, the said owner or agent thereof not having either money or credit to purchase said materials and supplies, and which were suitable, proper, and necessary for the purpose of enabling the vessel to depart in safety on her intended voyage; and the value thereof is, by maritime law, a lien upon said vessel, her boats, tackle, apparel, and furniture, and that a balance of 1474 dols. 71 cents remains unpaid, although these libellants have often requested the said owner or agent to pay the same. John H. Moore, of Buffalo, claims that he is the owner of the vessel, subject to a mortgage of 10,000 dols, and the mortgagee has power to take possession of her at any time. The claimant alleges that before the time the repairs were done by libellants the vessel had been stripped and was laid up in winter quarters, in the port of Milwaukee, without any intention or possibility of her being employed until navigation should open in the ensuing spring. After the close of navigation in the fall of 1868, and after the vessel was laid up in winter quarters, claimant, believing that certain repairs would improve her condition for the next season of navigation and raise her rate, entered into correspondence with libellants as to the price of such repairs, and in Jan. 1869 he received from libellants a proposition in writing to make such repairs. The proposal was required to be accepted by claimant within ten days. Claimant answered in writing—"I accept your offer, and will give 550 dollars to do the following work on barque Maitland" (describing the work to be done, &c.) Claimant denies that the repairs were made on the credit of the vessel alone as propounded in the libel; and he alleges that said repairs were furnished by libellants on his own credit, and that he had money and credit to procure the same. He denies that the repairs were necessary to enable the vessel to depart in safety upon her intended voyage, and alleges that she could have been employed in navigation with safety during the ensuing season without the repairs, and that such repairs were made, not for the purpose of rendering the vessel seaworthy or safe for navigation, but to put her in better condition and in a higher class. As the issue here raised is one of admiralty jurisdiction, I omit all reference to the portions of the answer and evidence which relate to the amount of the bill of repairs and the manner of the work. Further correspondence took place between these parties in the month of Jan. 1869, respecting additional repairs to the vessel. In a letter of Jan. 23, claimant wrote to libellants, "inclosed please find my acceptance of your proposition. I understand you make no objection to my former terms, and suppose you accept them as you say nothing to the contrary. But I do not expect to keep you out of the pay any longer than you wish to. I will not be able to go up now, and will depend on your doing me a good job. I shall ask Mr. Vance to step around and consult when you get the deck off. Please take care of the ropes in the hold. The other work to be done may remain until the captain goes up, except such of the beams as needs repairing." In a letter dated Buffalo, July 16, 1869, claimant wrote to libellants: "Your valued favour of 13th inst. is received, which is accepted." He then directs as to the work, and then proceeds: "You will have to take acceptances, or some way, wait for pay until the vessel makes one trip, unless I can conveniently pay you. I have money that is promised, ample, but I may be disappointed; yet I hope not, but I will strain every point to pay you when you want it. But should I not be able to collect, then I will want the time." Libellants then did the work on the vessel in the port of Milwaukee. By rule No. 12 of practice in admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, it is provided that, "in all suits by material men, for supplies or repairs, or other necessaries for a foreign ship or a ship in a foreign port, the libellants may proceed against the ship and freight in rem, or against the master or owner alone in personam." The home port of this vessel being Buffalo, s he was foreign, in the sense of this rule, to the port of Milwaukee. The season of navigation being ended, the vessel was laid up at Milwaukee for the winter. The repairs may have been necessary for putting the vessel in a seaworthy condition as a grain-bearing vessel for the ensuing season. The vessel was not then on a voyage, bearing a cargo, or intending at the time to proceed on a voyage or trip from Milwaukee to Buffalo or any other port. There was no intention of putting her in employment before the opening of navigation the ensuing spring. Present necessity for the repairs did not exist when ordered or when made. The master did not order the repairs from pressing necessity, nor did he order them at all, but the owner, and that too, at a time when the vessel was not actually in employment. She might probably as well have been returned to her home port and have been repaired there as in the port of Milwaukee. The rule of the Admiralty is of ancient date, that a master of a vessel has power to create a lien for repairs and supplies obtained in a foreign port in a case of necessity. The case of Thomas v. Osborne, 19 How. 22, and the cases cited in the opinion conclusively establish this rule without farther references. And this power of the master extends to a case where he is chartered and special owner pro hac vice. Here the master is entirely unknown so the libellants as such. The whole negotiation and contracts were between the owner and the libellants. The master had returned to his home in Buffalo before the repairs were contracted for or performed. In the case of Pratt v. Reed, 19 Howard 359, the steamboat Sultana was owned in Buffalo and employed in trade between that port and other ports of the upper lakes. She was supplied with coal from time to time at the port of Erie, her owner being the master and present; and of such ownership Reed, the libellant, had knowledge when he supplied the coal. There was no representation of the necessity of the supplies other than that they were directed by the master at the times when furnished. When the owner was not present the coal was furnished at the request of the person in command. The bill rendered by libellant contained a running account of debit and credit through a period of nearly two years, and there did not appear to be any doubt of the necessity of the supplies when furnished. The court considered it essential for libellant to prove not merely a necessity for the supplies, but also a necessity at the time of procuring them, for a credit upon the vessel. This proof is as essential as that of the necessity of the article itself. The court says, "The supplies having been furnished at a fixed place according to the account current, and apparently under some general understanding and arrangement, the presumption is that there could be no necessity for the implied hypothecation of the vessel; there could be no unexpected or unforeseen exigency to require it. For aught that appears the supplies could have been procured on the personal credit of the master, and in this more especially as he was the owner. We do not say that the mere fact of the master being owner, of itself excludes the possibility of a case of necessity, that would justify an implied hypothecation; but it is undoubtedly a circumstance that should be attended to in in ascertaining whether any such necessity existed in the particular case: (The Sophie, 1 Wm. Robinson 309.) It must appear that the supplies could only be procured on the credit of the vessel. The same position is reiterated by Justice Nelson, who wrote the opinion in one of the above cases and approved the other, in the James Guy, 5 Blatchford's, C. C. Rep. 496, where it is decided "to sustain a libel in rem against a vessel owned in New York for repairs upon her at Baltimore, at the instance of the master, the necessity of the repairs, and for a lien upon the vessel to enable the master to procure them must be shown. And the court says, "that the necessity for the repairs and for the lien must depend upon the facts and circumstances of the case." In the case of the Neversink, 5 Blatchford, C. C. Rep. 539, the court again declares that in the cases of Thomas v. Osborn, 19 Howard 22, and Pratt v. Reed, Ibid. 359, the rule which requires evidence of an apparent necessity existing at the time for supplying on the credit of a vessel, supplies furnished to her in a foreign port in order to create a lien upon her in favour of a material man was not extended beyond its ancient strictness as to the degree of proof required. And in that case it is decided that, where the master of the steamer has no funds to pay for coal, and her charterers who owned her pro hac vice resided in a foreign jurisdiction, and the coal was a necessary supply, and it was obtained by the master, and credit was in fact given to the vessel and her charterers; it was held that a lien was given on the vessel. It was also held that, when the material man resided at the home port of the vessel and furnished coal at a foreign port, through an agent there, the supplies were considered as furnished by the agent at the foreign port, the same as if the principal resided there. It evidently is the duty of material men, furnishing supplies at foreign ports to vessels, at the instance of the master, who is agent of the owner, to ascertain the necessity of the supplies and also of the inability of the master or owners of the vessel to pay for them before the vessel can be subjected to a maritime lien. Such also is the duty of material men in dealing directly with the owners of a vessel, as in this case. It does not appear that libellants required direct hypothecation of the vessel, or that such was agreed upon or promised by the owner. Nor does it appear that libellants made inquiry into incumbrances on the vessel, or questioned the pecuniary ability of the owner. The supplies were furnished at the instance and on the credit of the owner, without the aid of any facts upon which a presumption can arise of a legal hypothecation of the vessel. In the case of the steamer St. Lawrence, 1 Bl. 522, the evidence showed that the supplies being furnished, the amount and value being ascertained to the satisfaction of claimant's proctor, the owner of the vessel at the time gave his notes for the amount of the libellant's demand under the express stipulation between him and libellants that their lien against the vessel should not be discharged or released unless the notes were paid. The notes were afterwards surrendered. It was held that the lien was not waived by the acceptance of the notes. That was an express hypothecation of the vessel. In the case in hand the owner accepts the proposal of libellants to furnish supplies, and promised individually to pay a certain price, and again he agrees personally for additional repairs, libellants not at any time claiming a lien upon the vessel, even after notice from claimant that they might not be paid when the repairs were completed, but at a subsequent time. It is contended that this libel should be sustained by reason of remarks of the Justice in delivering the opinion in the case of the Belfast, 7 Wallace, p. 543, that "material men who furnish materials or supplies for a vessel in a foreign port, or in a port other than in the state where the vessel belongs, have a maritime lien on the vessel, or a security for the payment of the price of all such materials and supplies. They were such a lien because upon the principles of the maritime law, such materials and supplies are presumed to be furnished on the credit of the vessel," referring to cases anterior to those cited above. This remark of the judge in an opinion in a case involving the question of exclusive jurisdiction of the district courts of libels on contracts of affreightment, and not in any manner touching the lien of material men for supplies, cannot be taken to overrule the cases of Thomas v. Osborn, and Pratt v. Reed. The court cannot step aside from the contract between the parties because it appears in the answer of the claimant, that the vessel is encumbered with a mortgage to the amount of 10,000 dols. The claimant, for aught we know, may be abundantly able to pay all that the libellants can or may recover, irrespective of his interest in the vessel. The fact of the mortgage is no evidence of his inability to pay this debt. Libellants should have satisfied themselves of claimant's pecuniary circumstances before furnishing the supplies and making the repairs, and if they had doubts of his ability to meet his contract, they should have required a lien upon the vessel, or notified him that the supplies would only be furnished on the credit of the vessel. I am satisfied that libellants have no maritime lien on the vessel, and that the libel must be dismissed.

Nov. 1869.

THE MILWAUKEE BELLE.

Deck cargo—Perils of the sea—Jettison.

A schooner laden with wheat took on board a deck cargo of divers pigs of lead. They were applied for by the master to trim his vessel, and by the bill of lading they were to be delivered in as good order as shipped, "dangers of navigation excepted." They were jettisoned in the course of the voyage:

Held, that in the absence of proof of a custom to ship lead on deck, the owners of the cargo, and not the vessel, must bear the loss.

MILLER, J.—Libellants shipped on board this schooner at the port of Racine, in the State of Wisconsin, divers pigs of lead to be transported to the port of Buffalo, in the State of New York. By the bill of lading the pigs of lead were shipped on deck in good condition to be delivered in like good order, the dangers of navigation excepted. The schooner was laden with wheat in bulk. It is alleged in the libel that at the time the lead was received on board the vessel was so badly stevedored, that she was not in a proper condition to safely take it on deck, or to safely transport it according to the tenor or effect of the bill of lading, or to safely and securely hold and carry the under-deck cargo. And that the vessel being in an unseaworthy condition, set sail on her intended voyage with the lead on board. And by reason of the vessel not being well trimmed, and not in condition to resist the ordinary perils of the sea by reason of said improper trimming, and not by any embarrassment or danger caused by the lead being on deck, the officers and crew of the vessel jettisoned the lead from off the deck into the waters of Lake Michigan, whereby the lead became wholly lost, and was not delivered according to the tenor and effect of the bill of lading. Libellants demand strict proof whether the jettison was made necessary by a peril of the sea, or by the improper storage of the under-deck cargo. And if jettison were made necessary by a peril of the sea, then, by the custom and course of the admiralty and maritime laws, the loss is a case of general average loss. Claimants in their answer confess the shipment of the lead, and they urge that the vessel being tight, staunch and strong, and well manned and equipped, and having a cargo of 14,700 bushels of wheat in her hold, sufficiently and properly stowed and secured, and forty tons of pig lead shipped on deck, pursuant to the bill of lading, left the port of Racine, bound for the port of Buffalo, and while on her voyage on Lake Michigan she encountered a severe gale, laboured hard, shipping much water on deck, filling herself, and rendering it necessary to knock away the bulwarks to free her, and the gale increasing, it became necessary for the preservation of the vessel, and of the lives of the officers and crew, and for the safety of the whole, the officers, on consultation, determined to jettison a portion of the lead, and thereupon they jettisoned about 838 pigs, and on arriving at Buffalo the whole cargo was delivered except the pigs of lead jettisoned. It is also averred that the cargo under deck was not a full cargo, and was so known to the agent of the shippers, and the lead was shipped on deck at the request of said agent. The answer further alleges that the loss so occurred by a peril of the sea, is not a general average loss, nor is the same to be contributed for in general average. It is agreed between the advocates of the parties, that the storm was of force and violence sufficient to render the jettison necessary. The proof sustains the allegation that the master solicited the lead for the purpose of trimming his vessel. The proof does not establish a custom to ship lead on deck. Such has been done in several instances for the purpose of trimming grain bearing vessels. To establish a custom derogating from the general law, it is not enough to prove that the act has been frequently done. It must be proven to be so generally known and recognised, that a fair presumption arises that the parties in entering into their engagement do it with a silent reference to the custom; and tacitly agree that their rights and responsibilities shall be determined by it (a). This case does not rest on custom, there being an express agreement between the freighter and the master of the vessel, that the lead should be stowed on deck. The question presented for the consideration of the court is, is the loss of the lead by the jettison a general average loss? The general cargo having been delivered at the port of destination, upon payment of the freight, the demand is against the vessel alone for her proportional contribution. Under the view taken of the point presented, I will not consider whether this libel can be maintained against this vessel after delivery of the cargo. It appears that the master having ascertained his vessel was not trimmed, applied to the agent of the owner of the lead, to ship it on deck, for the purpose of trimming the vessel for the voyage, and thereby rendering her seaworthy. From this fact negligence is not chargeable to the master, in respect to putting the vessel in trim. The jettison was rendered necessary by a peril of the sea, for the safety of the vessel and cargo, and was a loss by the peril of the sea. It is a general and an ancient rule of the law of shipping, that goods shall not be carried on deck. Reasons for this rule are, that goods placed on deck are more liable to be lost by being swept overboard, and to damage by water, and endanger both ship and cargo, as the weight is put far from the hull, and thereby makes the vessel less stable, and less manageable, and to labour in a heavy sea. And it encumbers the deck and embarrasses the crew in working a sail vessel, and perhaps the common safety sometimes may not require jettison, if lading were not on deck to bring the dangers on the vessel, or contribute to enhance them. The rule is also a general rule, that goods laden on deck and jettisoned are not contributed for, and such is particularly the rule when goods are laden on deck by consent of the shipper. I have had this matter under consideration in former cases, and must dispense with reference to the very numerous cases affirming this rule. Maritime orders and rules, both ancient and modern, recognise the distinction between cargoes placed on deck with consent of the freighter, and cargoes under deck. They do not give a recourse against the master, the vessel, or the owner. The admiralty courts of England and America have almost uniformly treated the owner of goods on deck with his consent, as not having a claim on the master, in case of jettison, although bound to contribute. This being a proceeding against a sail vessel, I shall not enter upon the consideration of some modern judgments against vessels propelled by steam. The case of Lawrence v. Minturn, 17 How. 100 is referred to as a leading case of binding authority. The ship Hornet was libelled for the non-delivery of two steam boilers and chimneys shipped at New York, on deck by special agreement, and consigned to libellant in San Francisco. It being discovered on the voyage that the ship could not be navigated with safety in a storm, the deck load was thrown overboard. The facts in the case show that the jettison was justifiable, and the loss occasioned by a peril of the sea. The court say, "This bill of lading declares that the property is to go on deck. It excepts perils of the sea. The exception must be construed with reference to the particular adventure, which the contract of the affreightment shows was contemplated by the parties under this bill of lading. The question is not, what in other circumstances could be deemed a peril of the sea, but what is to be deemed such when operating on this vessel with this deck load. If a very burdensome cargo like iron is taken on board, and heavy weather met with, and jettison made, it would not be a ground of claim against the owner that the weather encountered would not have been sufficient to justify a jettison, if the cargo had been cotton. And when this freighter consented to place on the deck of this ship his boilers and chimneys, weighing upwards of thirty tons, not distributed about the deck, but lying in a small space, must he not be taken to have known that their necessary effect might be to embarrass the sailing of the ship in a gale of wind, and cause her to labour in a heavy sea?" The libel was dismissed. In this case, libellants having shipped on deck 1160 pigs of lead, weighing about forty tons, they consented that the vessel might thereby be rendered less manageable, and more liable to labour in a storm, and they, and not the vessel, must bear the loss of a portion of the deck load by the necessary jettison. It is contended that in equity the vessel should contribute for the loss, as the deck load was used in putting her in trim for sea. That is begging the question. I cannot enter into the consideration of the inducement to the contract of the parties. The libel will be dismissed.

Digitized by Google

(a) Miller v. Tetherington, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 893, is a case in which a custom of this kind was held to be proved.

Digitized by Google

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Reported by A. A DORIA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Feb. 1.

(Before Mr. Registrar ROCHE)

ANONYMOUS.

Petition for adjudication—Hearing of—Creditor not attending—Dismissal of petition.

Where, upon the day appointed for hearing a petition, neither the petitioning creditor nor any one on his behalf attends, the court will, upon the application of the debtor, dismiss the petition, with costs.

On the 7th Jan. 1870, a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy was filed against the debtor, and, on the following day, an order for substituted service was made by the registrar, and the notice prescribed by the 61st General Order was directed to be inserted in the Gazette. The copy, petition, and orders were left at the residence of the debtor, who was then absent. On the 1st Feb., the day appointed for the hearing of the petition, the debtor and his solicitor attended the court at the time appointed, but neither the petitioning creditor nor his solicitor appeared to support the petition. Under these circumstances

Treherne (solicitor) applied, on behalf of his client, for an order to dismiss the petition, which was ordered accordingly, with costs.

Treherne and Wolferstan, solicitors for the debtor.

Monday, Feb. 7.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Ex parte GRAHAM; Re JOB.

12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 141—Damages in tort recovered by bankrupt—Assignees not entitled.

The assignees of a bankrupt are not entitled under the 141*st section of the Consolidation Act* 1849, to the damages recovered by the bankrupt in an action of tort brought by him after adjudication.

This was a motion on behalf of Mr. Graham, the official assignee, for an order that John Ladd, the defendant in an action brought by the bankrupt, should pay to him as assignee the amount of the damages recovered in the action, upon the ground that Job was, at the date of the action, a bankrupt, and had not yet obtained an order of discharge. The bankrupt was adjudicated upon his own petition on the 17th Dec. 1867, and Mr. Graham was appointed the official assignee, and remained sole assignee, no creditors' assignee having been chosen. On the 19th Dec. 1868 the bankrupt came up for his last examination, but the sitting was adjourned sine die, and no further proceedings have been taken in the matter of the bankruptcy.

On the 6th July 1869 the bankrupt commenced an action of trespass in the Court of Queen's Bench against John Ladd for damages, and for breaking and entering into his dwelling house, removing and carrying away the fixtures and the goods therein, disposing of the same to his own use, and expelling the plaintiff from possession of the house, whereby he incurred great loss.

On the 14th Jan. 1870 the bankrupt obtained a verdict, and damages were awarded amounting to 37*l.* 10*s.* On the 22nd Jan. notice of the bankruptcy of the plaintiff in the action was given on behalf of Mr. Graham, an assignee to the attorneys of John Ladd, and that Mr. Graham claimed to be entitled to the damages recovered. An interpleader summons was thereupon issued at the instance of Ladd, which was heard before M Smith, J. on the 1st Feb. His Lordship expressed his opinion that the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, and adjourned the the official assignee should make an application to summons until the 9th for that purpose.

Aldridge (solicitor) asked that under the 141st section of the Consolidation Act 1849, the official assignee might be declared entitled to the damages so recovered. He contended that inasmuch as the bankrupt had not obtained his order of discharge his creditors were entitled to all moneys that might come to him between the date of his adjudication and of his order of discharge.

Warrington (solicitor) on behalf of the bankrupt, contended that, inasmuch as the damages were given in respect of a trespass against the person of the bankrupt, and as the cause of action being personal did not pass to the assignees in bankruptcy, the official assignee was not entitled to the damages the result of the action. He cited in support

Rogers v. Spence, 12 M. & W. 571; on app., 12 Cl. & Fin. 701;

Brewer v. Dew, 11 M. & W. 625.

It was stated, in answer to the Chief Judge, that the defendant had interpleaded for his own protection.

Head (solicitor) appeared for Mr. Ladd.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—I cannot see how the official assignee can sustain this claim. It appears that if the plaintiff had omitted all claims in respect of damage against his property, the jury might have awarded the same amount for personal damages, as they did, 37*l.* 10*s.* altogether. I cannot give the bankrupt any costs, as he appears to have been in default, his examination having been adjourned sine die. Motion refused.

Solicitor for the official assignee, W. W. Aldridge.

Solicitors for Ladd, Head and Cook.

Solicitor for the bankrupt, G. S. Warrington.

Tuesday, Feb. 8.

Re A DEBTOR'S SUMMONS.

Affidavit Form No. 2 in schedule to General Orders Jan. 1, 1870—Need not be made by creditor himself—Particulars of demand should be served and demand made since Jan. 1, 1870.

It is not imperative that the affidavit prescribed in Form No. 2 in the schedule annexed to the General Orders of Jan. 1, 1870, should be made by the creditor suing out a debtor-summons under the 17*th General Order, where the creditor carries on business through an authorised agent. The agent, if properly authorised, can make a sufficient affidavit in support.*

It is necessary that the demand mentioned in the affidavit Form No. 2 should be made, and the particulars of demand also there mentioned should be served since Jan. 1, 1870.

This was an ex parte application made to the Chief Judge, by leave of the registrar, who had refused to issue a debtor-summons under the 17th General Order of the 1st Jan. 1870, upon the ground that the affidavit tendered in support was insufficient, and also because the applications for payment deposed to in the affidavit were not made since the 1st Jan. 1870, the day when the Bankruptcy Act 1869 came into operation. The affidavit in support of the application was made jointly by the creditor and his son, who was described as foreman and manager to his father, and was substantially in the form No. 2 in the schedule to the General Orders. The two first paragraphs of the affidavit were deposed to by the creditor and the two last paragraphs by his son; but it appeared from the affidavit that the account in writing of the particulars of demand was delivered in December 1869, and that personal application for payment had also been made in December. The registrar was of opinion that the third paragraph of the affidavit, form No. 2, must be deposed to by the creditor himself, and could not be made by another person, and that application for payment should have been made since 1st Jan. 1870. In answer to this second objection, it appeared that a writ in an action at common law had been served upon the debtor since the 1st Jan. 1870.

The following is the form of affidavit in the schedule:

1. That A. B. is justly and truly indebted to me in the sum of £ , &c., &c.
2. That the said A. B. resides at, &c., and carries on trade, &c.
3. That an account in writing of the particulars of my demand was, on or about the day of , sent by post to the said A. B., and that payment of the same has been on more than one occasion required to be made of the said A. B.
4. That I did on the day of apply (or cause application to be made) to the said A. B. personally for payment of the said debt.

NOTE.—If the application was made by any other person than the creditor, it must be deposed to by such person.

Sternberg (solicitor) appeared for the summoning creditor.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—I see nothing in the first objection. The affidavit of the son would be sufficient to obtain a debtor summons if it contained a statement that he was duly authorised to make the demand on behalf and with the authority of his father, and that he had made demand in writing for the debt to be paid to his father. As to the second objection, I think that the demand in writing should have been made since the 1st Jan. 1870, and also that particulars in writing should have also been delivered since that date. I do not think that the service of the writ was a sufficient demand.

Solicitor for applicant, Sternburg.

NISI PRIUS.

Reported by JOHN ROSE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Monday, Jan. 17.

(Before BLACKBURN, J.)

HENNEQUIN v. O'DOWD.

In an action to obtain payment of a school bill, evidence of a collateral breach of agreement on the part of the schoolmaster cannot be given by the defendant in order to reduce the amount of the bill, such a collateral breach being the subject of cross-action, and not of set-off.

Francis for plaintiff.

Robinson, Serjt., for defendant.

Action to recover the balance of a school bill for the board, lodging, and education of defendant's son.

While at the plaintiff's school the son of the defendant met with an accident through his own fault. Medical attendance was given him, but the defendant said that it was insufficient in kind. There was a plea upon the record alleging want of care in this respect, and at the trial the defendant offered evidence in support of it.

BLACKBURN, J.—I should think that such a matter would be the subject of cross-action, and not of set-off. It used to be exceedingly doubtful whether you would reduce the price of a carriage or other article as not being sufficiently made to order, but it is quite new to me to hear that where there is a contract with a schoolmaster for the education, &c., of a boy, you can cut off a portion of his bill for any collateral breach of contract. It is trite law that when an attorney brings his bill you cannot set up anything else except that he totally failed in performing the work, and here if they had actually killed the boy it might be otherwise.

Verdict for plaintiff for full amount.

Attorneys for plaintiff, Few and Co., 2, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden.

Attorney for defendant, W. and W. A. Waller, 27, King-street, Cheapside.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Tuesday, Jan. 25.

(Before KEATING, J.)

MCGREGOR v. HIGH AND ANOTHER.

Fixtures—Conversion of—Measure of damages.

Under a count for conversion of fixtures by severing and removing them, the value of the fixtures in their severed state can only be recovered, and not the value of them, when annexed to the freehold.

This was an action for excessive distress. The declaration also contained a count in trover, but none in trespass.

A landlord distraining for rent in arrear, severed and removed the counter and beer-engine in a beer-house.

It appeared from the evidence that no sale of the articles had been made, and the count for excessive distress could not therefore be supported. A question arose as to the measure of damages recoverable upon the count for conversion. It was proved that the value of the articles when annexed to the freehold was considerably more than their value when detached. The counter was affixed to the freehold by screws, and the beer-engine had pipes connected with it leading down through a floor into casks in the cellar beneath.

The counter had been unscrewed in order to remove it, and the beer-engine had been severed by cutting through the pipes above the floor.

Kemp and Edwyn Thomas, for plaintiff.

C. H. Anderson and Lucas for defendant.

KEATING, J., to jury.—If you are of opinion that these were not fixtures, then they would be distrainable, and the defendant would be entitled to your verdict; if otherwise, if you think that they were affixed to the freehold, so that they could not be removed without injury and in a state that they could not be restored, then find for the plaintiff. As to the damages, they would be the value of the counter and beer engine in the severed state. The plaintiff cannot under the count for conversion recover the value of the things affixed in an affixed state, as their value would be estimated between an incoming and an outgoing tenant. But, on the other hand, I do not think he is confined to recovering only what would be the value at a broker's sale as has been suggested: for if the defendant took them without right he is a wrongdoer, and you have a right to estimate them at a fair value.

Verdict for the defendant.

Attorney for plaintiff, G. O. Rush.

Attorney for defendant, W. W. Brown, 22, Basinghall-street.

Digitized by Google

House of Lords.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 25, 28 and July 3, 1869.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley), Lord CHELMSFORD, and Lord COLONSAY.)

RICHARD JOHN FOREMAN (app.) v. THE FREE FISHERS AND DREDGERS OF WHITSTABLE (resps.).

Anchorage dues—Consideration to public for—Port—Proof of existence of—Immemorial payment.

The plaintiffs, the owners in fee of the manor of Whitstable, in an action for anchorage dues, claimed in respect of a vessel casting anchor on a certain anchorage-ground situate within the sea below low water mark, adduced evidence that the tolls had been taken from time immemorial; that they kept buoys, beacons, and lights to mark the bounds between the oyster beds and the anchorage ground; that Whitstable, before and since the time of legal memory, had been mentioned in official documents as a port; and that in ancient times there was a place within the manor for the unlading of merchandise.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber), that the anchorage dues had a legal origin, the existence of a port being established. However commodious a place may be for vessels, it will not therefore become a port, the establishment of which must be by authority of the Crown; but evidence of traffic in respect of tolls of merchandise being taken, of a place being mentioned as a port in early documents, and of natural configuration favourable to the formation of a port, justify an inference of fact that a port did exist.

And such an inference will be readily drawn where an immemorial payment has been proved, because it is the duty of the courts to find, if possible, a legal origin for a right so long enjoyed.

The case of Gann v. Free Fishers of Whitstable, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 150, explained and distinguished.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, on a special case.

The respondents, the owners in fee of the manor of Whitstable, which includes oyster fisheries, and an anchorage ground, claimed a right to demand a toll of 1*s.* from every ship anchoring upon their anchorage ground.

In support of this claim evidence was adduced that the respondents, and those under whom they enjoy possession, had taken these tolls from time immemorial; that the respondents now keep buoys, beacons, and lights to mark the bounds between their oyster beds and the anchorage-ground; that these buoys, beacons, and lights had been kept up at various times, and at intervals during a long period, but there was no proof of their continued existence from the commencement of the custom to take tolls; that before and since the time of legal memory, Whitstable had been mentioned in official and private documents as a port; that in ancient times there was a place within the manor for the unloading of merchandise; and that the rigtht to take tolls had been expressed to be conveyed to the respondents with the possession of the ground.

The Court of Common Pleas held that the maintenance of the buoys, beacons, and lights, and the advantages which the public derive therefrom, taken in connection with the ownership of the soil of the anchorage ground, were a sufficient consideration to support the legality of the respondents' claim; that the payment of toll having been made from time immemorial, it ought to be referred to a legal origin, if there be anything to support it; that very slight evidence was necessary to support a right which had been uninterruptedly enjoyed from time immemorial, the legality of which the court is almost bound to presume; and that therefore the circumstances of this case were sufficient to make the claim of toll good, according to the rule laid down in the House of Lords in Gann v. The Free Fishers of Whitstable, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 150. See 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 747. That judgment was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 735). This was the subject of the present appeal.

The special case was of great length; the material facts are fully stated in the report of the case in the Common Pleas (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 747).

Prentice, Q. C. (F. M. White with him) for the appellant. The right to the payment of these anchorage tolls can arise, neither from the Crown grant, nor from prescription. The Crown grant must have been subject to the right of the public to free navigation, of which the right of anchorage is an incident. Some consideration in the nature of a benefit to the public and to navigation, must be shown. (See Gann v. Free Fishers of Whitstable, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 150; 11 H. of L. Cas. 192.) Further, the consideration must be for the benefit of those who are charged with these anchorage tolls. A benefit to others would not be sufficient. See per Lord Tenterden in

Brett v. Beales, 10 B. & C. 510;
Hill v. Smith, 4 Taunt. 520;
Warren v. Prideaux, 1 Mod. 104;
James v. Johnson, 2 Mod. 143;
Com. Dig. "Toll."

No such consideration has been shown here. The buoys, beacons, &c., were not for the benefit of those anchoring on the ground, but were for the benefit of the respondents, the owners of the fishery, and were intended to mark out the boundaries of, and to protect the oyster-grounds. In Lord Falmouth v. George, 5 Bing. 286, it was held that the keeping a capstan and rope in a cove, to assist boats in landing, and without which they could not safely land in bad weather, was a good consideration for a reasonable toll on all boats frequenting the cove, whether they used the capstan or not. In that case the benefit was to those who used or might sometimes be obliged to use the capstan, and who were subject to the toll. But it is not so in the present case. Whitstable was not a port at all, or, if so, it was only as a member of the port of Sandwich. It is not named in the list given by Lord Hale (De Port. Mar. c. 2; Harg. Law Tracts, p. 48), nor in Jeakes's History of the Cinque Ports. They also referred to

Bac. Abr. "Customs;"
Chitty on Prerogative, 145;
Mayor of Colchester v. Brooke, 7 Q. B. 339;
Heddy v. Wheelhouse, Cro. Eliz. 558;
Vinkinstone v. Ebden, Carth. 357;
Mayor, &c., of Nottingham v. Lambert, Willes, 111.

Mellish, Q. C., Denman, Q. C., and Raymond for the respondents.—The consideration which is necessary to support such a claim as the present, according to the decision in Gann v. Free Fishers of Whitstable (ubi sup.) here exists. The evidence shows that there was a grant of the soil of the anchorage ground to the lord of the manor of Whitstable before the time of legal memory, and that this ground was anciently part of a port or haven within the manor. The consideration for the tolls was the surrender by the lord of the manor of the soil, that it might be used for the landing or unlading of goods from vessels by persons frequenting the port, and the maintenance of the buoys and beacons for the purpose of guiding vessels to a safe anchorage. Doubtless the buoys and beacons were also for the protection of the oyster beds, but that is immaterial. They commented on the cases cited above, and further referred to

Jenkins v. Harvey, Gale, 23;
Henley v. Mayor of Lyme Regis, 5 Bing. 91; 1 Bing. N. C. 222;
Duke of Somerset v. Fogwell, 5 B. & C. 875;
Mayor of Exeter v. Warren, 5 Q. B. 773;
Lawrence v. Hitch, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 483; L. Rep. 3 Q. B, 521;
Bryant v. Foot, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 578; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 497;
3 Hallam's Middle Ages, c. 9, pt. 2;
Mayor of Colchester v. Brooke, 7 Q. B. 339.

Prentice in reply.

After the arguments of counsel, the House proposed the following question to the judges:—Whether, under the circumstances stated in the special case, a toll is payable in respect of a vessel brought up and anchoring in the same manner as the Sancho Panza (the vessel in respect of which the tolls were claimed)?

The judges delivered a unanimous answer that they were satisfied that there was evidence of the existence of a port, and so answered the question in the affirmative.

The Lord CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, I should propose to your Lordships in this case, in conformity with the opinion of Her Majesty's judges (to whose assistance we are much indebted) to affirm the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, and to dismiss the appeal with costs. The case is reduced to a very narrow compass, owing to the investigation that it has received in the previous stages of the present litigation, and in the appeal of Gann v. The Free Fishers of Whitstable, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 151; 11 H. L. Ca. 192, heard by your Lordships in the year 1864. In the present, as in the previous case, the respondents brought an action for the recovery of the dues at the rate of 1*s.* per vessel in respect of anchorage, the vessel being brought up and anchored at Whitstable. In the former case the demand was supported by proof of payments made to the respondents from the year 1775 downwards in respect of every vessel casting anchor within a part of the manor of Whitstable, of which the plaintiffs there were owners, but they claimed this payment solely as a customary payment for the use of the soil. The House determined that such a claim could not be sustained. Their Lordships, who were then present, were of opinion that such a claim, however ancient the actual receipt may have been, could not be sustained, founded as it was solely on the ownership of the soil. For the right of free passage and the user of the sea as a highway, including the right of anchorage, could not be interfered with either by the Crown, as owner of a manor, or by a subject to whom such ownership has been transferred. It was held, to use the words of the then Lord Chancellor, Lord Westbury, "that some facts must be shown, which either prove, or from it can be inferred, that the soil claimed by the respondents was originally within the precincts of a port or harbour; or that some service of aid to navigation was rendered to the public, in respect of which the alleged grant was made. The other Lords present, including one of your Lordships, concurred in this view; Lord Wensleydale expressing his regret that the case was left bare of evidence as to whether or not the place of anchorage was a port. My noble and learned friend now present (Lord Chelmsford) admitted that every intendment should be made in favour of a payment uninterruptedly received time out of mind, if it was capable presumably of a lawful origin, but added that none had been presented in evidence there. In the case now before us the facts are much more fully disclosed by the special case in which judgment has been given for the respondents. The 6th paragraph of that case states the immemorial receipt of the toll claimed from every vessel casting anchor within the limits of the anchorage-ground in possession of the respondents, whether the anchoring was voluntary or of necessity. Is there, then, also a legal origin disclosed for it in the case, from the statements contained in which we are at liberty to draw inferences of fact? Two suggestions have been made of such legal origin: the one a supply of buoys and beacons by the respondent; the other, the fact of the locus in quo being part of a port. The authority of Lord Hale in his treatise (De Port. Mar. c. 6; Harg. Law Tracts, p. 74), as cited in the former and in the present case, is, I think, sufficient to establish the conclusion of law, that if the locus in quo is part of a port, a presumably legal origin for the toll is established. The duty of anchorage is stated by him to be "almost incident to every ownership of a port." He adds that this primâ facie arises from the property in the soil, but not necessarily, and may be the consequence of the franchise. If, then, we find the soil, which is in the respondents, to be part of a port, the immemorial payment may be referred to the ownership of the franchise, independently of the period at which they may have acquired the ownership of the soil. I pass by the question of the buoys and beacons, and I proceed to consider what evidence it contained in the special case of the existence of a port. It was said that there are no artificial works, but that the natural configuration of the place alone forms the port, if such port can be said to exist. I do not think that this would have any effect as regards the law. However commodious a place may be for vessels, it will not, therefore, become a port, the establishment of which must be by the Crown. But if the Crown do so establish a port with a suitable landing-place, whether the port be naturally or artificially formed, and if vessels avail themselves of that port to cast anchor there, I apprehend a sufficient consideration for the anchorage dues arises. Now it appears by the 23rd and 24th paragraphs of the special case, that in the twenty-first year of the reign of Edward I., Alexander Baliol, then lord of the manor, claimed to have, and the jury found that he and his ancestors, from time whereof memory is not, had, amongst other things, "wreck of the sea and toll with merchandise at Le Craston in the same manor." This toll was not an anchorage toll, but it tends to show that merchandise was at that early period landed within the limits of the manor. In 19 Edw. 2, a commission was issued for making search as to letters from foreign ports supposed to be brought by persons landing between Reculver, Greystone, and Whitstable; and search was directed in all places where ships ply by the coast between the said vills. In the 20 Edw. 2, a proclamation was issued, addressed to the warden of the Cinque Ports, against certain merchants coming with treasonable letters under colour of grants of safe conduct, and he was directed to prohibit such a practice in all the ports aforesaid, and other places where vessels arrive, and to make search in the aforesaid ports and places. A writ was then directed to the commissioners searching along the coast between Reculver, Greystone, and Whitstable, who were not to cease their search on account of any letters of safe conduct. In 9 Eliz. a special commission was issued to inquire into the port of Sandwich, and the creeks belonging to the same. Amongst the creeks of the port, in the certificate of the commission, is mentioned Whitstable as "a small creek having no officer, but only at Margate, and he a searcher's deputy." All, or nearly all, the grants of the manor contain a reference to "tolls" in the general words, as well as to wreck of the sea. The payment is found to be immemorial. There is evidence of traffic in respect of tolls of merchandise being taken; there is evidence of the spot being being treated as a creek of the Cinque Ports, the ground itself in its configuration is favourable to the formation of a port, and I conceive that your Lordships are justified in drawing the inference of fact that a port did exist, and therefore that the toll had a legal origin, and that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber is correct.

Digitized by Google

Lord CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, in considering this case, it is necessary in the outset to distinguish it from the decision of this House in the case of Gann v. The Free Fishers of Whitstable (ubi sup.). In that case the anchorage toll in question was claimed upon the ground of the defendant's vessel having cast anchor within the limits of the plaintiffs' free fishery in Whitstable Bay. In the plaintiffs' documents of title to the anchorage toll, it was described as "a customary payment usually and of right made to the lord of the manor of Whitstable for or on account of the anchorage of any ship or vessel within the said manor." The jury found that from 1775 downwards the plaintiffs, and those under whom they derived title, had, from time to time, claimed as of right to take, and had taken, the sum of 1*s.* from vessels casting anchor within that portion of the manor on which the defendant's vessel had cast anchor, and that they claimed to take it as a customary payment for such use of the soil. From the receipt of the toll from a period beyond the time of living memory, the jury might have been directed to presume that it had been immemorially taken; but their finding was limited to the actual taking of the toll from the year 1775 down to the time of their verdict. Upon the argument of the appeal however, it was admitted by the appellant that the anchorage toll had been paid to the lords of the manor of Whitstable from time immemorial; and in delivering my opinion to the House (as mentioned by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack) I stated "that every intendment ought to be made in favour of a payment which has been uninterruptedly received time out of mind, supposing itpresumably capable of a lawful origin." But all presumption was excluded in that case by the express statement of the nature of the plaintiffs' claim, which was of an anchorage toll payable to the lord of the manor for the anchorage of any ship or vessel within the manor, and (as the jury found) "as a customary payment for the use of the soil." Now, the right of the public freely to navigate the high seas is a paramount right, to which the right of the Crown in the soil is necessarily subservient; and, therefore, as the right of navigation must include the right of anchoring, the House held that the Crown, or its grantee, could not impose a toll upon this use of their soil without some additional consideration; and upon this state of the facts decided against the claim of the plaintiffs to take the anchorage toll. In the present case, the facts and circumstances are more fully stated, and the title to the anchorage toll is carried back to a very remote period. The right to recover this toll is not placed upon any particular ground, but depends upon all the statements in the special case from which your Lordships are ready to draw any inferences of fact. It is stated in the special case that "the plaintiffs, and those under whom they claim, have, from time immemorial, continually, down to the present time, taken the sum of 1*s.* from every vessel casting anchor within the limits of the anchorage ground now in their possession, whether the anchoring were voluntary or from necessity." Under these circumstances, as suggested by Lord Wensleydale in the case of Gann v. The Free Fishers of Whitstable, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 152, "it will be our duty, if the case admits of it, to find a legal origin for a right so long enjoyed." The right of anchorage is usually, if not universally, incident to the proprietorship of a port. Hale, (De Port. Mar. c. 6; Harg. Law Tracts, p. 74), in describing the several port duties which arise from the jus dominii of property or franchise in port, says, "These are of two kinds;" and as to the former, viz., "such as are common and ordinary, and so almost incident to every ownership of a port," he mentions, first, "anchorage, or a prestation, or toll for every anchor cast there, and sometimes though there be no anchor;" and he adds, "This doth in truth properly and primâ facie arise from or in respect of the propriety of the soil, and is an evidence of it. But yet it is not so always, but grows due in respect of the franchise." Now if the existence of a port is necessary to render an anchorage toll legal, and as Lord Hale says, "common and ordinary tolls" (of which he states anchorage to be one) "are almost incident to every ownership of a port," ought we not, from the immemorial taking of the anchorage toll of Whitstable, to presume that the lords of the manor had a port there, even if there were no fact in the case to prove the actual existence of one. It is admitted by the learned counsel for the appellant that a port of a certain kind existed at Whitstable from an early period, but that it was merely a port for the lading and unlading of goods and merchandise, which he contended would not give any right to an anchorage toll. The existence of this description of port he considers to be proved by the finding of the jury upon the quo warranto against Alexander Baliol in 21 Edw. 1, that amongst the liberties which he had in the manor of Whitstable was "toll with merchandise." But he argued that this was not such a port as would give a right to an anchorage toll. If this is correct, then, as anchorage toll was at this very time, and had for many years before, been paid to the lords of the manor of Whitstable, we must presume a legal origin for the payment arising from the existence of some other port, which would carry the anchorage toll with it as its incident. But I entertain no doubt that the Crown might have created a port for the lading and unlading of goods, for which it would be necessary that the grantee should erect wharves and landing places, and in respect thereof might have granted toll, not only upon goods brought into the port, but also for anchorage upon vessels casting anchor within the port. I find nothing in the authorities to warrant the argument of the learned counsel that the benefit conferred by the owner of the port must be precisely that in respect of which the toll is demanded. On the contrary, it appears from Lord Hale (De Port. Mar. c. 6; Harg. Law Tracts, 73), that, "though A. may have the propriety of a creek, or harbour, or navigable river, yet the king may grant there the liberty of a port to B., and so the interest of property, and the interest of franchise, be several and divided." And he afterwards mentions anchorage as a toll arising from the jus dominii or franchise of a port. In this case it is clear that the anchorage toll would not be payable in respect of any benefit which the anchoring vessel derived from the owner of the franchise. It was also argued for the appellant that toll could not be demandable for the use of the port of Whitstable as a place of anchorage, because it was not artificially formed, but was a natural roadstead, and therefore no obligation was laid upon the owner of the port to repair it and keep it accessible, so as to form a consideration as to the anchorage toll. This is only another form of the argument that an anchorage toll can only be due in respect of the specific benefit to vessels which the name imports. But that the repair of a port is not the necessary consideration for an anchorage toll appears from what has been already cited from Lord Hale, that the franchise of a port may be in one person, and the ownership of the soil within the limits of the port in another. In truth, the port which is admitted to have existed at Whitstable comes precisely within the definition of a port given by Lord Hale—viz., "a place for the arriving and unlading of ships or vessels," erected by charter of the King or a lawful prescription. And he says (De Port Mar. C. 2; Harg. Law Tracts, p. 46), "A port is quid aggregatum, consisting of somewhat that is natural, viz., an access of the sea, whereby ships may conveniently come, safe situation against winds where they may safely lie, and a good shore where they may well unlade; something that is artificial, as quays and wharfs, and cranes and warehouses, and houses of common receipt; and something that is civil, viz., privileges and franchises, viz., jus applicandi, jus mercati, and divers other additaments given to it by civil authority." That both a toll upon merchandise, and also an anchorage toll, were taken by the lords of the manor of Whitstable, is clear when we come to modern times. In the deeds of conveyance of the Fishery, and also in the Act for Incorporating the Free Fishers, the payment and dues for the anchorage of any ships or vessels (in the Act the words are, "for or on account of any ship or vessel") are distinguished from the payments or dues for the landing of any goods or merchandise, showing that these two descriptions of toll belonged, separately and distinctly, to the lord of the manor. With respect to the anchorage toll, it was observed that the deputation of Lord Bolingbroke to his water bailiff in 1775 was to receive 1*s.* tonnage for every vessel under 100 tons, and after that rate for every vessel of a larger burden, which is inconsistent with the claim now made of 1*s.* for every vessel. But it must be remembered that this is an authority to collect a toll which has been paid from time immemorial. And if there was any mistake in the description of the toll to be demanded, it is an admitted fact that the sum of 1*s.* from every vessel was always the amount received. The whole case really turns upon the fact stated in the special case, "that the plaintiffs and those under whom they claim have from time immemorial, continually, down to the present time, taken the sum of 1*s.* from every vessel casting anchor within the limits of the anchorage ground now in their possession, whether the anchoring were voluntary or from necessity." Unless anything appears to the contrary, we are bound to presume that this immemorial payment had a lawful commencement. There is nothing in this case of Gann v. The Free Fishers of Whitstable (ubi sup.) to compel us to assign a different foundation for the anchorage toll than the existence of a port in respect of which the toll was demanded and paid. If the documents do not prove the existence of a port, they are at least not inconsistent with one, and even without the liberty given to the judges in the Exchequer Chamber to draw any inference of fact from the statements in the special case, I think, from the immemorial payment of the anchorage toll, they were bound to presume that the lords of the manor of Whitstable were the owners of a port to which such a toll would be lawfully incident. I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer ought to be affirmed.

Digitized by Google

Lord COLONSAY.—My Lords, I entirely concur in the judgment proposed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack. I do not consider that the present judgment at all differs from that which was given in the case of Gann v. The Free Fishers of Whitstable; the claim in that case was put upon a totally different ground.

Judgment affirmed.

Attorneys for the plaintiff in error, Mercer and Mercer, for Towne, Margate.

Attorneys for defendants in error, Nethersole and Speechley.

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, Dec. 2, 1869.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re BARNED'S BANKING COMPANY (LIMITED); COUPLAND'S CLAIM.

Company—Winding-up—Creditor holding collateral security—Proof of claim—Letter of credit—Construction.

Messrs. C. drew two sets of bills of exchange on the B. Company under the authority of two letters of credit of that company, against two cargoes of cotton. The first letter of credit stated that the bills, drawn in pursuance of it, were to be accompanied by corresponding bills of lading for cotton to be given up to the B. Company on their acceptance of the bills of exchange. The other letter of credit was in a similar form. The first set of bills were accepted, but not paid by the B. Company, and the second set were not accepted, as the B. Company had stopped payment before those bills were presented for acceptance. A claim was made by Messrs. C. in the winding-up of the B. Company to prove for the whole amount of the bills (which had been taken up by Messrs. C.) without deducting the proceeds of the cotton, which had been sold, and the price received by Messrs. C.

Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls, though on different grounds), that on the true construction of the letter of credit, the B. Company were only liable for the difference between the amount of the bills and the sum realised by the sale of the cotton.

Distinction between the case and Kellock's case, 18 L. T Rep. N. S. 671; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 769.

This was an appeal by Messrs. Coupland from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, which is reported 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. p. 286. The facts are there so fully stated that it is only necessary now to mention that Messrs. Coupland were creditors of Barned's Banking Company, in respect of certain bills of exchange drawn by them upon the company under the authority of two letters of credit issued by the company. The first letter of credit stated that the bills to be drawn in pursuance of it were to be accompanied by corresponding bills of lading of cotton to be given up to the company on their acceptance of their bills of exchange. The other letter of credit was in an equivalent form. Neither of the sets of bills having been paid by the company the question was whether Messrs. Coupland were entitled to prove against the estate of the company for the full amount of the bills, or only for the difference between that amount and the sum realised by the sale of the cotton. The latter sum had been received by Messrs. Coupland. The Master of the Rolls decided that Messrs. Coupland were only entitled to prove for the difference, and from this decision Messrs. Coupland appealed.

Jessel, Q. C. and Westlake on behalf of the appellants.—It is said on the other side that the bills of lading were only for the security of Barned's Banking Company, because they were to have the custody of them. But we say that the bills of exchange being drawn against the cotton, the cotton was to be a security to Messrs. Coupland as well as to the company. [GIFFARD, L.J.—How is that consistent with the provision as to six months' sight contained in the letter of credit?] That was only to give time for the cotton to be realised. As between the persons for whom the cotton was purchased of Messrs. Coupland, the cotton was a security for the bills. [GIFFARD, L.J.—Does it not come to this, that Barned's Banking Company would have a right to an indemnity out of the proceeds of the cotton?] Only in this sense, that the bills were secured by the cotton. Messrs. Coupland were to have the security of the cotton and of the guarantee of Barned's Banking Company. [GIFFARD, L.J.—The fact is Barned's Banking Company were bound to apply the proceeds of the cotton in payment of the bills. It is not Kellock's case (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 671; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 769) at all.] That was not the view taken in the court below. Except inferentially, there is no agreement that Barned's Banking Company shall be indemnified by means of the proceeds of the cotton. The case is like an agreement to guarantee the payment of a debt only if it is also secured by a mortgage to a trustee to be named by the guarantor. The mortgagee would then be entitled to payment and to the benefit of the security. The surety's right to the mortgage securities does not arise until he has paid the bills.

Without calling upon Sir R. Baggallay, Q. C. and Kekewich, who appeared for the official liquidators, Lord Justice GIFFARD said that this was a very clear case. It was not Kellock's case at all. Kellock's case was one in which the company in liquidation had no interest in the security except in the character of mortgagors. But here, in truth, the company were mortgagees. To take, for instance, the case of the transaction with Messrs. Daunt, the company gave the letters of credit under the authority of which the bills were to be drawn, but when drawn they were to be accompanied by corresponding bills of lading of cotton, which were to be given up to the company on their acceptance of the bills. Clearly the company were only liable for the difference between the proceeds of the cotton and the amount of the bills. The letter of credit in Wilson's case was substantially the same. The company being thus entitled to an indemnity out of the proceeds of the cotton, Kellock's case had no application, and the appeal motion must be refussed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Elmslie, Forsyth, and Sedgwick.

Solicitors for the official liquidators, Freshfields.

Dec. 11 and 18, 1869.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re SPENCER.

Solicitor—Negligence—Liability—Money standing in court—Petition for payment out to a wrong person—Order made accordingly—Alleged mistake in the title of the account—Petition of re-hearing—Solicitor ordered to refund—Costs.

If a person, without any fraudulent intent, either makes or adopts a representation, which, if he had exercised reasonable care, he must have known to be untrue, and upon the footing of the truth of that representation an order is made by the court for payment of a sum of money to a person who is not really entitled to it, the person so making or adopting the untrue representation, is bound to make to the party injured by the making of the wrong order, a full indemnity, including the full costs of all proceedings necessary to correct the error.

A sum of money was paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act to an account entitled, "In the matter of the trusts of the will of M. S. deceased." This payment was made by the trustees of her will. Part of the sum so paid in was afterwards paid out to the persons entitled, and the residue remained in court to await the attainment of twenty-one by D., who, if he had attained twenty-one, would have been absolutely entitled to that residue. If he did not attain twenty-one, his surviving brother and sisters would then become entitled to that residue. D. died under twenty-one, and it was then found that the fund in court had already been paid out of court to persons who had no right to it. The persons to whom the fund was thus wrongly paid claimed to be entitled thereto in consequence of the death of a person also named M. S., a lunatic, who was a different person from M. S. (the testatrix). The wrong order was made upon a petition presented in the matter of the lunacy of M. S. (the lunatic). There were standing in court a fund to the credit of the lunacy of M. S. (the lunatic), and a fund to the credit of the estate of S. S., a sister of M. S. (the lunatic.)

The estate of S. S. was being administered in the Court of Chancery, and under her will M. S. (the lunatic) was entitled for her life to the residue of the estate, subject to which life estate the residue went to H. Before the death of M. S. (the lunatic), an application was made on behalf of the committee of her estate at the office of the Accountant-General for certificates of the different funds in court in which she was interested, and by mistake a certificate of the fund which stood to the credit of the trusts of the will of M. S. (the testatrix) was handed out with the other certificates to the solicitor who made the application. The result of this mistake was that the fund which stood to the credit of the trusts of the will of M. S. (the testatrix) was included in the account of the property of M. S. (the lunatic) which was filed at the Lunacy Office by the committee. Between the delivering out of the certificates and the passing of the account the commissioner changed his solicitor. M. S. (the lunatic) having died, another application was made at the Accountant-General's office by the new solicitor of the committee for certificates of the property in which she was interested, and the former mistake was repeated. The result of this was that a petition to the Lords Justices was presented by the solicitor of the committee on his behalf, and on behalf of the administrator and heir-at-law of M. S. (the lunatic), which was served only on H., and which alleged that the fund which stood to the credit of the trusts of M. S. (the testatrix) had been placed to that account by mistake, and that the fund really formed part of the residue of the estate of S. S., the sister of M. S. (the lunatic). Upon their petition an order was made by the Lords Justices for payment of the capital of that fund to H., and for carrying over some cash which had arisen from dividend upon it, in the matter of the lunacy of M. S. (the lunatic). Upon the subsequent discovery of the mistake a petition of rehearing was presented by the persons who were really entitled to the fund:

Held, that the committee, the administrator, and heir-at-law, H., the solicitors who presented the petition, and the solicitor who represented H. upon the hearing of the petition, as well as their London agents, were jointly and severally liable to make good to the persons really entitled the sums thus paid to the wrong persons, with interest thereon, and with costs, charges, and expenses as between solicitor and client.

The solicitor who presented the petition which contained an allegation that the fund had been carried to a wrong account, was bound to make every reasonable inquiry before inserting such an allegation, and if he had made proper inquiry he must have discovered that the fund was paid into court upon an affidavit under the Trustee Relief Act; and if he had looked into that affidavit he would have found that no mistake had been made in the title of the account. For his negligence in not making these inquires, the court held him liable in the manner already mentioned.

The court held that the solicitors who acted for the respondent to the petition were equally liable for their negligence in accepting the truth of such an allegation without making any inquiry.

This was a petition for the re-hearing of a petition in lunacy, in the matter of Mary Spencer, a lunatic, upon which an order was made on 31st May, 1867, by the then Lords Justices (Sir G. J. Turner and Lord Cairns). At that time, Mary Spencer (the lunatic) had recently died, and the order which was made on the petition (inter alia) directed that a sum of 331*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* Consols, standing in court, should be transferred to a Mr. Daniel Halestrap, the sole respondent to the petition, and that a sum of 38*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* cash, also in court, which had arisen from dividends upon the Consols, should be carried over to the credit of the lunacy of Mary Spencer (the lunatic). It was afterwards discovered that neither Daniel Halestrap nor Mary Spencer (the lunatic) had any interest whatever in the sums thus dealt with, and the object of the petition of rehearing, which was presented by the persons who were really entitled, was to obtain the refunding of the moneys thus wrongly parted with.

The sum of 331*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* formed part of a larger sum which was before the year 1865 transferred into court under the Trustee Relief Act, by the trustees of the will of Mary Spencer, deceased, who was a different person from Mary Spencer (the lunatic), and it stood to the credit of an account entitled "In the matter of the trusts of the will of Mary Spencer, deceased." Under her will Richard John Dodwell, an infant, would, if he had attained twenty-one, have become absolutely entitled to this fund, which remained in court until it should be ascertained whether he lived to that age or not. He died on the 4th July 1867, under twenty-one, and thereupon his surviving brother and sisters became entitled to the fund. With the view of getting possession of it, application was made on their behalf at the office of the Accountant-General, and it was then discovered that the account had been closed in his books, and that the fund had been paid away in the way already mentioned.

The mistake arose under the following circumstances: Mary Spencer (the lunatic) possessed property of her own, part of which was in court to the credit of the lunacy. She had a sister, named Sarah Spencer, who had also been a lunatic. She had died, and under her will Mary Spencer (the lunatic) was entitled for her life to the income of her residuary estate, which estate, after her death, was to go to Daniel Halestrap. The estate of Sarah Spencer was being administered in the Court of Chancery, in a suit entitled Re Sarah Spencer's Estate; Spencer v. Halestrap, and in that suit certain funds were paid into court. The committee of the estate of Mary Spencer (the lunatic) was Matthew Quinton Fleming. He being, in Jan. 1865, about to carry into the office of the Master in Lunacy his accounts of the estate of the lunatic, his solicitors, for the purpose of completing the accounts, applied at the office of the Accountant-General for certificates of the funds then in court in which Mary Spencer (the lunatic) was entitled. The then solicitors of Mr. Fleming were Messrs. George Gayton and Thomas Mott, of Much Hadham, in Hertfordshire; their London agents being Messrs. Hawkins, Bloxam, and Co.

The application at the Accountant-General's office was made by a clerk of Hawkins, Bloxam, and Co., and among the certificates given out to him was one of the above sum of 331*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* Consols, which stood to the credit of the account, "In the matter of the trusts of the will of Mary Spencer, deceased." This certificate was with the others sent by the London agents to Messrs. Gayton and Mott, and it appears to have been assumed that the sum of Consols really formed part of the estate of Sarah Spencer (the lunatic), and that the name "Mary" in the title of the account had been by a mistake in the Accountant-General's office inserted instead of "Sarah." At any rate, the sum of 331*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* was inserted in the draft account of the committee as being property in which Mary Spencer (the lunatic) had an interest, as she would have had if the fund had belonged to her sister Sarah Spencer. About this time, or a few months afterwards, Mr. Fleming changed his solicitors, and appointed as his solicitor in the matter of the lunacy Mr. George William Crook, a London solicitor. The committee's accounts had not been examined by Mr. Fleming before this change of solicitors, but soon afterwards he did examine them, and they were then sworn to by him and filed in the office of the Master in Lunacy, and as sworn to they included the above sum of 331*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* Consols, as being a fund in which Mary Spencer (the lunatic) was interested, and stated that that sum was part of the residue of the estate of Sarah Spencer. Mary Spencer (the lunatic) died in 1866, and on the 8th Feb. 1867, the petition, which it was now sought to have reheard, so far as it dealt with the 331*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* and 38*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* cash, was presented to the Lords Justices in Lunacy. That petition was presented by Mr. Crook, as the solicitor of Mr. Fleming, the committee, and of Mr. William Ingold, the administrator and heir-at-law of Mary Spencer (the lunatic), they being the petitioners. The only person served with the petition was Daniel Halestrap. Mr. John Mott Richardson acted as his solicitor in the matter, and employed as his London agents Messrs. Charles Thomas Jenkinson and Arthur Cooper Jenkinson. This petition contained an allegation that the sum of 331*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* Consols, and the sum of 38*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, which then respectively stood in court to the credit of the account entitled "In the matter of the trusts of the will of Mary Spencer, deceased," had been by mistake placed to that account, and that they really formed part of the residue of the estate of Sarah Spencer, the sister of the lunatic. The petition prayed (inter alia) that the sum of 38*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* cash might be carried over to the credit of the lunacy of Mary Spencer (the lunatic), and that the 331*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* Consols, and any dividends to accrue thereon, might be respectively transferred and paid to Daniel Halestrap, as being entitled thereto under Sarah Spencer's will. On the 31st May 1867 an order according to this prayer was made by the Lords Justices, and the cash and Consols were soon afterwards carried over and transferred accordingly, and a dividend of 4*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.*, which accrued due on the Consols before the actual transfer, was also paid to Daniel Halestrap.

The petition of rehearing was entered in the following manner:—

In Lunacy.—In the matter of Mary Spencer, late a person of unsound mind (deceased).
In the matter of Sarah Spencer (deceased), a person of unsound mind.
In Chancery.—In the matter of the estate of the said Sarah Spencer (deceased).
Between the said Mary Spencer (since deceased) and others, plaintiffs, and Daniel Halestrap, defendant.
In the matter of the Trustee Relief Act.
And in the matter of the trusts of the will of Mary Spencer (deceased).
And in the matter of George Williams Crook, Charles Thomas Jenkinson, Arthur Cooper Jenkinson, John Mott Richardson, William Benjamin Paterson, Robert Power, George Gayton, and Thomas Mott, solicitors of the court.

Messrs. Paterson and Power had been members of the firm of Hawkins, Bloxam, and Co. when the certificate of the 331*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* Consols was delivered out in January 1865, from the Accountant-General's office to the clerk of that firm. The other three members of that firm had since left it, and were no longer on the roll of solicitors of the court.

The petition of rehearing was served on Mr. Fleming, Mr. Ingold, and Mr. Halestrap; on a Mr. Monck, whose interest was the same as that of the petitioners; on the representatives of the trustees of the will of Mary Spencer (the testatrix); and on all the solicitors named in the title of the petition.

The petition charged that all those solicitors had been guilty of gross and culpable negligence, and it prayed that the petition presented on the 8th Feb. 1867 might be reheard, and that the order of the 8th May 1867 might be reversed, or varied so far as it dealt with the sum of 88*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* cash, and the sum of 331*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* Consols, and the dividends thereon; and that the respondents, except Monck and the representatives of the trustees of Mary Spencer (the testatrix), might be declared jointly and severally liable to replace the Consols, and to repay the cash and dividends, with interest thereon, and to pay the costs, charges, and expenses of the petitioners properly incurred in the matter as between solicitor and client.

By the evidence of Mr. Crook it appeared that before he presented the petition in Feb. 1867, he went to the office of the Accountant-General for certificates of the funds then standing in court in which Mary Spencer (the lunatic) had an interest, and that the mistake originally made in 1865 was repeated, a certificate of the 331*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* Consols standing to the account entitled "In the matter of the trusts of the will of Mary Spencer, deceased," was given to him with others.

Mr. Crook deposed that he asked for an explanation of this certificate, and that he was told by one of the clerks in the Accountant-General's office that their attention had already been called to the matter, and that the fund had been wrongly entered; and Mr. Crook went on to say that the clerk wrote in pencil on the certificate the words "should be Sarah." With reference to this point, however, Mr. Hart, one of the solicitors of the persons who presented the petition of rehearing, deposed that he had made inquiries at the Accountant-General's office, and that he had been informed there that the pencil note upon the certificate was not in the handwriting of any of the clerks belonging to the office.

Charles Hall and M. Ingle Joyce for the petitioners.

Wickens, for Messrs. Paterson, Power, Gayton, and Mott.

Bagshawe, for Messrs. Fleming and Ingold, and for Mr. Crook.

Lindley, for Mr. Halestrap and for Messrs. Jenkinson, and Mr. Richardson.

W. Pearson, for the representatives of the trustees of Mary Spencer, the testatrix.

The counsel for the respondents all admitted that the petitioners must have their money refunded, and that they were entitled to an indemnity against costs. The arguments were directed to the question who must be taken to be responsible for the error which had been committed.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said, that though the case was one of a kind which rarely occurred, there was no difficulty in saying what ought to be done. There was no question that the present petitioners were entitled to this money, and there could be no question that a very wrong order was made on the former petition. There was no imputation of fraud upon any one, but the mistake which was committed arose from very gross negligence. The evidence showed that the commissioner's accounts were not examined by Mr. Fleming till near the time when change of solicitors took place, and, therefore, what took place before that change could not be said to have been the proximate cause, the causa causans, of the wrong order ultimately made, and consequently Messrs. Paterson, Power, Gayton, and Mott would not have to pay any costs, though they could not receive any. With regard to all the other solicitors who were respondents on the present occasion, and with regard to Messrs. Fleming, Ingold, and Halestrap, the principle which ought to be acted upon in every case of this description was this—if a person chooses either to make or to adopt a representation which he ought to have known to be untrue, and must have known to be untrue if he had exercised reasonable care, and upon the footing of the truth of that representation obtained a wrong order from the court, he was bound fully to indemnify the persons injured by that order from all the consequences. Now in the present case Mr. Crook presented a petition which contained a distinct allegation that the 331*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* and the cash, which stood in court to the account of the trusts of the will of Mary Spencer, deceased, had been carried to that account by mistake, as it really formed part of the residue of the estate of Sarah Spencer, and upon the footing of the truth of that allegation the cash was carried over to the credit of the lunacy of Mary Spencer (the lunatic) and Mr. Crook's client got the benefit of it. Now that fund must have been originally paid into court either under an order of the court, or upon an affidavit under the Trustee Relief Act. Anyone who had made proper inquiry at the Accountant-General's office, would have found that the fund was in fact paid into court upon an affidavit under the Trustee Relief Act, and if he had looked at that affidavit he would have seen under what circumstances the money was paid into court, and that no mistake had been made in the title of the account. There this untrue representation was, without any inquiry, adopted by the solicitors of Mr. Halestrap, and on the footing of its being true, the Consols were transferred to Mr. Halestrap; consequently he and his solicitors were bound to indemnify the present petitioners; therefore there would be no order against Mr. Wickens' clients, and the petitioners must pay the costs of the representatives of the trustees of Mary Spencer (the testatrix), but would be entitled to have them over from the other respondents. Then there would be a declaration made that Messrs. Fleming, Ingold, and Halestrap, and all the other solicitors who were bound as respondents were jointly and severally liable to make good to the petitioners the funds which had been wrongly parted with, with interest thereon; and were also jointly and severally liable to pay the costs, charges, and expenses of the petitioners as between solicitor and client. An order would be made for payment by the persons who were respectively primarily liable, Mr. Crook being primarily liable to pay the costs, charges, and expenses, Mr. Ingold to repay the cash, and Mr. Halestrap to replace the Consols and the dividends thereon. Liberty would be reserved to the other persons to apply to the court, in case the persons who were primarily liable, failed to discharge their obligations. There would be of course a taxation of costs, and a month from the date of the taxing master's certificate might be allowed to Mr. Crook for payment, and Mr. Halestrap might also be allowed a month for the purpose of replacing the Consols.

Solicitors for the petitioners, Chilton, Burton, Yeates, and Hart.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PEAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Jan. 11.

HEALEY v. THE CHICHESTER AND MIDHURST RAILWAY COMPANY.

Judgment-creditor of railway company—Execution against shareholder whose shares are not fully paid-up—Form of order—8 & 9 Vict. c. 16, s. 36.

On a motion under the 36th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act by an unpaid vendor, who had obtained judgment against the company, for leave to issue execution against a shareholder of the company whose shares were not fully paid-up:

Held, that execution should issue against the shareholder on a certain day unless he showed cause on or before that day why execution should not issue.

The plaintiff had filed a bill for specific performance against the company, and on further consideration the defendants had been ordered to pay the plaintiff the sum of 23,500*l.* together with interest and the costs of the suit. The plaintiff issued a writ of fi. fa., and by the sheriff's return the total amount of goods of the defendants in his bailiwick appeared not to exceed the sum of 86*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* after payment of expenses. The plaintiff then issued a writ of elegit, and recovered lands of the yearly value of 27*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*

The plaintiff now moved under the 36th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act for leave to issue execution against the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, who were shareholders to a large extent in the defendant company, to the extent of what remained unpaid on their shares.

The 36th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16) is in the following words:

If any execution, either at law or in equity, shall have been issued against the property or effects of the company, and if there cannot be found sufficient whereupon to levy such execution, then such execution may be issued against any of the shareholders to the extent of their shares respectively in the capital of the company not then paid-up: Provided always that no such execution shall issue against any shareholder except upon an order of the court in which the action suit or other proceeding shall have been brought or instituted, made upon motion in open court, after sufficient notice in writing to the persons sought to be charged; and upon such motion such court may order execution to issue accordingly; and for the purpose of ascertaining the names of the shareholders, and the amount of capital remaining to be paid upon their respective shares, it shall be lawful for any person entitled to any such execution, at all reasonable times, to inspect the register of shareholders without fee.

Eddis, Q. C. and Jason Smith, in support of the motion, cited

Ex parte The Warkworth Dock Company, Re Phillips, 18 Beav. 629;

The Ilfracombe Railway Company v. Lord Poltimore, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 85; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 288.

Fry, Q. C., for the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company, contended that they were entitled to the same rights as at law; the common law courts always required a scire facias to be issued, and they were entitled to something of the same kind in equity, something in the nature of a trial before an order was made. He cited Hitchins v. The Kilkenny and Great Southern and Western Railway Company; Re Emery, 10 C. B. 160.

Lord ROMILLY.—I will give the Brighton Company till the second seal after term to show cause why execution should not be issued. The order will be that the plaintiff have leave to issue execution against the Brighton Company to the extent of the balance remaining unpaid upon their shares, unless they show cause on or before the second seal after term why such execution should not issue. The costs of the motion will abide the event.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, E. Fuller.

Solicitors for the Brighton Railway Company, Baxter, Rose, Norton, and Co.

Jan. 15 and 17.

Re THE NORWEGIAN CHARCOAL IRON COMPANY. MITCHELL'S CASE.

Winding-up—Contributory—Transfer to infant to escape liability—Secret trust.

In August 1865, M., the registered holder of shares in a company, transferred them for a nominal consideration to V., an infant, for the purpose of escaping liabilities in respect of the shares, and V. accepted the transfer on the understanding that the shares would soon be removed out of his name.

About a year afterwards V. attained twenty-one, but he took no steps to repudiate the shares, which in June 1868 were forfeited for nonpayment of calls. In July 1868 the company was ordered to be wound-up, and V.'s name was placed on the list of contributories.

On summonses by V. and the official liquidator to have the executors of M. (who had died in the mean time) settled on the list instead of V:

Held, that V., having for two years after he attained twenty-one taken no steps to repudiate the shares, could not now be relieved from them, whatever right of indemnity he might have against M.'s estate; and that the company having accepted V. as a shareholder, could not now claim to have M.'s executors as contributories.

Adjourned summonses.

The Norwegian Charcoal Iron Company was registered as a limited company in 1862.

On the 16th Aug. 1865, James Mitchell, being the registered holder of 100 partly paid-up shares in the company, and wishing to get rid of part of his liabilities in respect of the shares, transferred eighty of them for a nominal consideration into the name of one Frederick H. Vandyke, who was at that time an infant, and a clerk in the office of Mitchell's brokers.

Vandyke deposed that the shares were transferred into his name for the purpose of enabling Mitchell to escape part of his liability, and that he had accepted the transfer only on the understanding that the shares would soon be taken out of his name.

Mitchell died on the 29th May 1866, and in the following September Vandyke attained his majority, but he took no steps to repudiate the shares; he, however, applied to Mitchell's executors for some compensation for the risk he ran by having the shares in his name, and received a small sum from them.

Frequent applications were made to Vandyke for payment of calls, but he took no notice of them, and the shares standing in his name were, on the 22nd June 1866, forfeited for nonpayment of calls.

In July 1868, the company was ordered to be wound-up, and Vandyke's name was placed on the list of contributories.

A list of contributories liable as past members was now being prepared, and two summonses were taken out, one by Vandyke, and the other by the official liquidator, for the purpose of having Mitchell's executors settled on the list in respect of the 80 shares instead of Vandyke's. The summonses were adjourned into court.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., and Ferrers, in support of the summons, contended that Vandyke never having ratified the contract since he attained his majority, could now repudiate it, and that the transfer having been made on a secret trust, and with the express purpose of escaping liability, could not stand. They cited

Re The Mexican and South American Mining Company, Costello's case, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 421; 2 De G. F. & J. 302;

Re Cameron's Coalbrook Company, Hunt's case, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 377; 32 Beav. 387.

Jessel, Q. C. and Oswald, for Mitchell's executors, contended that Vandyke could not now repudiate the shares, as more than two years had elapsed since he had attained his majority. They cited

Re The Blakeley Ordnance Company, Lumsden's case, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 437; L. Rep. 4 Ch. 31;

The Dublin and Wicklow Railway Company v. Black, 8 Ex. 821;

Re Constantinople and Alexandria Hotels Company, Ebbett's case, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 574.

Sir Richard Baggallay was heard in reply.

Jan. 17.—Lord ROMILLY.—I am of opinion that the contention of the official liquidator fails in this case. The company accepted Vandyke as a shareholder, though they knew or might have known, that he was an infant at the date of the transfer. Vandyke having attained twenty-one, nearly two years before the commencement of the winding-up and having done nothing in the mean time to repudiate the shares, cannot now be removed from the list of contributories on the ground that he was an infant at the date of the transfer. Mitchell was perfectly at liberty to transfer his shares into the name of a trustee for himself, and the company having accepted the trustee as a shareholder, cannot now claim to have the cestui que trust as a contributory. Vandyke as trustee stands in two sets of relations, one as between himself and his cestui que trust, and another as between himself and the company. As between himself and Mitchell, the estate of the latter is no doubt liable to indemnify him against calls, but as between himself and the company he is personally liable. The result is that I must keep him on the list of contributories. Both summonses must therefore be dismissed, but all parties will have their costs out of the estate.

Solicitors for the summonses, Hollingsworth, Tyerman, and Green.

Solicitors for Mitchell's executors, Johnson and Weatheralls.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dec. 2, 3, 4, 10, and 11, 1869, and Jan. 31, 1870.

Re THE BANK OF HINDUSTAN, CHINA AND JAPAN; MITCHELL AND ASPINALL'S CASE.

Bankruptcy—Contributory—Deed of inspectorship—Future calls—Order for payment of—Process to enforce—Bankruptcy Act 1861, ss. 197, 198.

The Court of Bankruptcy has the exclusive right of deciding how far a deed of inspectorship is a protection to a debtor against his creditors.

Where, therefore, after the order for winding-up a company certain contributories executed a registered deed of inspectorship, and the liquidators applied to the court for an order for payment of calls found to be due subsequently to the execution of the deed;

Held, that the order must be made, and that the liquidators would then have to apply to the Court of Bankruptcy for leave to issue process according to the course of the court of equity.

This was a summons by the liquidators of the above banking company now in the course of liquidation, for an order for payment of certain calls from Messrs. Mitchell and Aspinall, who were on the list of contributories.

The question in dispute turned upon the jurisdiction of the courts of equity and bankruptcy in deeds of inspectorship.

The facts were shortly these:—

Messrs. Mitchell and Aspinall, who were in partnership, held fifty shares in the Bank of Hindustan, China, and Japan. In Dec. 1866, the bank was ordered to be wound-up under the supervision of the court. On the 4th June 1867, Messrs. Mitchell and Aspinall executed a deed of inspectorship, whereby after undertaking to get in and convert all their joint and separate estate for the benefit of all persons, companies and partnership firms who were, or who would be, entitled to prove under an adjudication in bankruptcy against the said debtors had such been made, they gave up all their said estate to the inspectors of the deed for the benefit of their creditors.

The separate estate of Mitchell amounted to 992*l.*, and that of Aspinall to 103*l.* There were no separate debts owing by either of them at the time of the execution of the deed.

The deed, although not in the precise form given in schedule D of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, was duly registered under the provisions of that Act. The names of the liquidators of the bank were inserted in the schedule of the deed as creditors, for some arrears due at the date of the execution of the deed, but not for any amount in respect of future calls.

In July 1868 there was a call made upon Messrs. Mitchell and Aspinall, and on the 9th Dec. 1868 a second call. Neither of these calls were paid. In Dec. 1868 the inspectors of the deed issued the usual advertisements, calling upon all persons having claims against the joint and separate estate of Messrs. Mitchell and Aspinall to come in and prove for the amount before the 21st Dec. 1868; and the liquidators having made no claim up to that time, the separate estates were carried over to the credit of the joint estate, and in the month of January following a dividend was declared on the joint estate.

In July 1869 the liquidators made a third call, and they then took out a summons in chambers for enforcing payment of the three calls, amounting together to 517*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*

This summons was now adjourned into court at the instance of Messrs. Mitchell and Aspinall.

Karslake, Q. C., and Willis for the contributories, contended that the court had no jurisdiction to deal with the question; it was exclusively one for the Court of Bankruptcy.

Bell v. Bird, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 635; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 99;

Riches v. Owen, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 821;

Martin v. Powning, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 356; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 133.

The deed was properly registered under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and acted as a protection to the contributories against the claim of the liquidators. The liquidators ought to have proved in bankruptcy for the estimated amount of the calls at the time of the execution of the deed. All future calls could have been taken into account under it. The 75th section of the Companies' Act

1862 enacted that the liability of a person to contribute to the assets of a company under the list, in the event of the same being wound-up, was deemed to create a debt accruing from such person at the time when his liability commenced, but payable at the time or respective times when calls were made for enforcing such liability. And the section concluded by stating that it should be "lawful," in the case of the bankruptcy of any contributory, to prove against his estate the estimated value of his liability to future calls as well as calls already made. The rule equally applied to all cases of deeds within the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, for by the 197th section of that Act it was provided that the Court of Bankruptcy should determine all questions arising under such deeds, according to the law and pract e in bankruptcy, so far as they might be applicable, and that the court should have power to make all such orders as it would be authorised to do if the debtor in such deeds had been adjudged bankrupt, and his estate was being administered in bankruptcy. The deed, therefore, being within the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy, there could be no proceedings against the contributories without the leave of that court, for by the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 it was provided that after notice of the filing and registration of such deeds had been given, no execution, sequestration, or other proceeding against the debtor's property in respect of any debt, "and no proceedings against his person" in respect of any debt other than such process by writ or warrant as might be had against a debtor about to depart out of England, should be available to any creditor or claimant without leave of the court. Further, if the order asked for by the liquidators were made the Court of Bankruptcy had no power to give any protection against the process of this court for contempt. They also referred to

The Richmond Hotel Company, Ex parte King, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 10; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 188;
The Financial Corporation v. Lawrence, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 731;
Re Duckworth, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 578; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 580;
Hastie's case, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 3, and 4 Ch. App. 274; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 93;
Re Price's Trust Deed, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 460; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 113;
Oxford and Canterbury Music Hall Company, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 696;
Griffith and Holmes on Bankruptcy,
Bankruptcy Act 1861, ss. 134, 192, 197, and 198, and Companies' Act 1862, ss. 74, 75, and 77.

Greene, Q. C. and Landley, for the liquidators, submitted that the deed was not a good deed. It was not in the form given in schedule D of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and was not distinguishable from that in the Richmond Hotel Company, ex parte King (sup.). Messrs. Mitchell and Aspinall had made no attempt to have their names struck out from the list of contributories, and they have no grounds now for resisting the order asked. (They were stopped by the court.)

Karslake, Q. C. in reply.

Jan. 31.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The balance due from Mitchell and Aspinall, as contributories to the company is found to be 517*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* An order is now applied for by the liquidator for the payment of that sum. The application is resisted on the ground that soon after the order for winding-up, and before the call was made, these contributories executed a deed of inspectorship, which was duly registered under the Bankruptcy Act. The order for winding-up was made in Dec. 1866. The deed of inspectorship is dated on the 4th June 1867, and registered in the Court of Bankruptcy on the 21st June 1867. In July 1868 the first call was made. In Dec. 1868 the second call. These were not paid, and in July 1869, the call for 517*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* was made, for the payment of which the order is now asked. On a careful perusal of the 197th and 198th sections of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, under which this deed of inspectorship has been registered, I can see no reason to doubt that it is for the Court of Bankruptcy to say whether process for the sum of 517*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, or any part of it, should issue against those contributories. The amount due from them as contributories has been duly ascertained in this court. It is for this court to make an order for the payment of what is found to be due. When the order for payment is made the Act of Parliament makes it the duty of the liquidator to apply to the Court of Bankruptcy under the 198th section for leave to issue process for the payment. All questions as to the deed of inspectorship are, by the 197th section, expressly committed to the Court of Bankruptcy. These contributories have now asked this court to decide the question as to the deed of inspectorship, and as to their right to protection under the Bankruptcy Act. But it seems to me that Parliament has committed that question to the Court of Bankruptcy in very clear terms. It is said that the 198th section gives to the Bankruptcy Court no right to give any protection against the process of this court for contempt. On that point the language of the Act seems to me to leave no doubt. All process of every kind, whether against the estate or the person of the bankrupt, is within the language of the section. Process of this court for contempt is process against the person, and as such is certainly within the words. The section says, "No execution, sequestration, or other process against the debtor's property in respect of any debt, and no process against his person in respect of any debt, &c., shall be available to any creditor or claimant without the leave of the court"—that is, the Court of Bankruptcy. Can there be any doubt that, the order now asked is an order for payment of a debt? Can there be any doubt that the process of this court, by which the order for payment is to be enforced, is "process against the person in respect of a debt?" No doubt would have occurred to my mind as to the construction of the statute were it not for the case of the Richmond Hotel Company (sup.) before Wood, V. C., and on appeal before Lord Cairns, as Lord Justice, who altered the order of the Vice-Chancellor, and the case of the Financial Corporation v. Lawrence (sup.). In these cases the matters were brought before the court in such a way as called for a decision on the validity and scope of the deed registered in bankruptcy. The order ultimately made in the Richmond Hotel case under the winding-up was made for the amount which the court, on the effect and construction of the deed in bankruptcy, held not to be provable under that deed. But from the way in which the question was presented to the court, and the course which the argument took, and the judgment of the court on that argument, the language of the Act of Parliament seems in no degree to have attracted the attention of the court, nor is there any reason stated for the construction which it may be guessed was assumed to be the proper construction. One of the counsel indeed, argued that process for contempt from this court for enforcing its order for payment was not within the 198th section. It is to be inferred from the beginning of the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, that he approved of that among other arguments in the general approbation of the arguments of the same learned counsel, and although he never expressly notices the argument as to process for contempt, or the proposition which it went to establish, yet his judgment, as well as that of Lord Cairns, seems to be based on the assumption that process of this court for contempt is not within the enactment. As to the case of the Financial Corporation v. Lawrence, the only question which counsel agreed to submit to the Court of Common Pleas was the validity of the deed and the extent of its operation, so that the question of jurisdiction was kept out of view. In the present case it has been argued that the liquidators should have proved in bankruptcy for the estimated amount of the call. But according to the 77th section of the Companies Act, it does not seem that they were bound to do this. The enactment is permissive, and having a discretion they had a right to exercise it in the way which seemed to them most for the benefit of the company. According to the words of the 197th section of the Bankruptcy Act it is for the Court of Bankruptcy to determine all questions arising under the deed according to the law and practice of bankruptcy, so far as they may be applicable. And the 198th section prohibits any execution against the property or person of the bankrupt without the leave of the Court of Bankruptcy. This leaves the question of protection, and the extent to which the protection is to be given, exclusively to the Court of Bankruptcy in which the deed is registered. If this court, disregarding the Act of Parliament, were now to entertain the question of protection, and to decide how far the deed is a protection, or whether it is a protection at all, it would create a great confusion and interfere for no useful purpose with the statutory jurisdiction in bankruptcy. Entertaining as I do these opinions as to the construction of the statute, and considering that the authority of the Act of Parliament is the highest authority, the order must now be made for payment of the ascertained balance. The duty of the liquidators will be to apply to the Court of Bankruptcy for leave to issue process according to the course of this court.

Solicitor for Messrs. Mitchell and Aspinall, Joseph Harwood.

Solicitors for the liquidator, Ashurst, Morris, and Co.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ERRATUM.—Poupard v. Fardell.—In this case, reported ante page 696, the solicitors for the plaintiff were Marriott, Jordan, and Cooper, and for the defendant C White, and not as printed.

Thursday, Feb. 10.

CAMPBELL v. MAYOR, &c., OF LIVERPOOL.

Dedication of burial ground—Reverter of fee-simple—Lands Clauses Act—Notice to treat—Admission of title.

By an Act of Will. 3 a piece of land was inclosed and dedicated as a churchyard or burial ground for the inhabitants of the parish of Liverpool, and under the sentence of consecration the corporation of Liverpool renounced all right to the ground. In 1854, under an Order in Council, the churchyard was closed against burials. Under the Liverpool Improvement Act 1864, the corporation served on the incumbent, ordinary, and patron of the parish a notice to treat for the purchase of a part of the churchyard for the purposes of the Special Act. The question of compensation was referred to arbitration, and a sum awarded, but eventually the corporation refused to pay any compensation, on the ground that the churchyard, on being closed against burials, reverted to them in fee:

Held, that, as the corporation had by the sentence of consecration renounced all right to the ground, there was no reverter to them of the fee-simple, and that, if necessary, the court would have presumed a conveyance.

A notice to treat and proceeding to arbitration under the Lands Clauses Act do not constitute an admission of title.

By an Act of 10 & 11 Will. 3, it was enacted that the town and township and liberties of Liverpool should for ever be a distinct parish of itself, and be called by the name of the parish of Liverpool; and that it should be lawful for the inhabitants of the said town and liberty of Liverpool to erect and build a new church, and to provide and inclose a cemetery, churchyard, or burying place about the same. And it was enacted that the said church, and the ground thereunto belonging to be inclosed and used for a cemetery or churchyard, should be the parish church and churchyard of the said parish of Liverpool; and the same was thereby enacted and declared to be for ever separated and dedicated to the service of God, and to be applied to the use and behoof of the inhabitants of the said town and liberty. Such new church was accordingly shortly afterwards built, and a cemetery or churchyard provided and inclosed.

In 1704 the church was consecrated under the name of St. Peter's church, and by the sentence of consecration the corporation renounced all right and title to the churchyard, which was thenceforth used as a burial ground, until, by an Order in Council of the 7th April 1854, it was closed as a burial place.

By the Liverpool Improvement Act 1864 (incorporating the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts Amendment Act 1860), the corporation of Liverpool were authorised to take, among other pieces of land, a part of St. Peter's Churchyard for the formation of a street, and accordingly, on the 10th Feb. 1866, they served on the plaintiff, who was then the incumbent of the church, and on the ordinary and patron, the usual notice to treat. The plaintiff then gave notice to the corporation that he was seised, as the rector of the parish of Liverpool, of the piece of land proposed to be taken, and made a claim for compensation accordingly. By agreement the question of compensation was referred to Mr. Manisty as arbitrator, who awarded the sum of 5550*l.* less a sum of 350*l.*, the cost of new church gates and rails which were to be put up by the corporation. The corporation, however, refused to pay the compensation money on the ground that on the making of the order in council prohibiting further burials there was a reverter to them of the churchyard. The plaintiff then instituted this suit for the completion of the purchase and for the payment into court of the purchase-money and the costs of the arbitration.

Cotton, Q. C., Wickens, and C. Stewart, for the plaintiff, contended that the effect of the Act of Will. 3, was to preclude the corporation from claiming any right to the churchyard. The sentence of consecration, by which they distinctly renounced all right and title to the ground, was equivalent to a grant in fee; and by the notice to treat and the proceeding to arbitration they admitted the plaintiff's title. They referred to

Re St. Pancras Burial Board, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 173;
Champneys v. Arrowsmith, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 602;
L. Rep. 3 C. P. 107; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 589.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C. and Freeling, for the corporation, argued that a common notice to treat under the Lands Clauses Act does not constitute an admission of title; it is simply addressed to such persons as may claim any title or interest, and leaves the question of title open. Neither does the proceeding to arbitration have any such effect. In this case the corporation granted the ground for sacred uses, and when these sacred uses were discharged the land reverted to its original use. The right of the rector under the grant was merely to receive the burial fees, the fee-simple remaining in the corporation; when, therefore, the order in council was made forbidding the burials, these fees became no longer payable, and consequently there was no subject for compensation. They referred to

East and West India Docks and Birmingham Railway Company v. Gattke, 3 M. & G. 155;
Re North London Railway Company, ex parte Cooper, 2 Dr. & Sm. 312; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 661;
Burgess v. Wheate, 1 Wm. Black. 123.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that the Act of Will. 3 authorised this piece of ground to be inclosed as a cemetery or burial ground, and declared that it should be for ever separated and dedicated to the service of God. By the sentence of consecration the corporation absolutely renounced their right of ownership in the land. It had been contended that there was no ground for holding that the land had ever passed from the corporation; that there had been no conveyance by them of the fee simple, and therefore that the fee remained in them, though the land was dedicated to the purpose of a burial ground so long as it might be required. They further contended that the purpose for which the land was required having ceased, there was a reverter to them of the fee simple. He did not accede to this proposition, for, as the corporation had renounced possession of the ground, and it had been dedicated to the purpose of a cemetery, he would have been bound, if necessary, to presume that a conveyance of the legal estate had been executed; but such a presumption was unnecessary, for the renunciation of the land by the corporation had operated as a release, and precluded all claim by them to the land. So the matter remained until the year 1854, when, in pursuance of an order in council, the ground was closed against interments, and it then ceased to be used as a burial ground, but it still remained as a repository for the bodies interred there, and was, therefore, still a burial ground. The bodies might have remained for ever in the ground, or circumstances might have so changed as to require the ground to be again used for burial purposes. Therefore, from the year 1854 until the passing of the Act of 1864, authorising the construction or widening of the street, the land was still a burial ground. Then the Act of 1864 gave power to the corporation to take certain pieces of land, and particularly this burial ground, for the formation of a street, and accordingly a notice to treat was served on the patron, ordinary, and incumbent. It was contended that this was an admission of title, and at first he was inclined in favour of that view, but he now thought that it was only a precautionary measure, the object simply being to include in the notice everyone who might be considered as claiming any interest in the ground, and therefore that the notice left the question of compensation open. This bill was then filed to ascertain whether the plaintiff had a title to sell the ground or not. On the whole case, he was of opinion that the renunciation by the corporation was complete, and that the ground was vested, as in the St. Pancras case, in the parish; that the corporation had no right or claim whatever to the ground, and must be dealt with as strangers. There was, however, another question, a difficult one, namely, what was to be done with the money? That question was not now raised, and all he could decide was that there was no right of reverter in the corporation, and the land must be treated like any other land taken for the purposes of the Liverpool Improvement Act 1864. The 5550*l.*, less the sum paid for church gates and rails, must, therefore, be paid into court, together with the costs of the arbitration and of these proceedings.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Field, Roscoe, Field, and Francis, agents for Eden, Stanistreet, Pears, and Logan, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Torr, Janeway, and Tagart.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., and Hon. ROBERT BUTLER, Barristers-at-Law

Wednesday, Dec 8, 1869.

GLOVER v. MOORE.

Assignment of proceeds of future sale of commission—Priority—Notice.

By an agreement in writing, dated 20th Aug. 1866, L., an officer in the army, promised to make over to the plaintiffs the proceeds of the sale of his commission for the benefit of his creditors, and wrote a letter to Messrs. C., the army agents, requesting them to pay the proceeds to the plaintiffs. In July 1867 the plaintiffs sent this letter to Messrs. C. In Aug. 1867 L. became bankrupt, and the defendant was appointed his assignee. On the 15*th Oct. his commission was sold, and on the* 4*th Nov.* 1867 Messrs. C. paid the proceeds to the defendant:

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to priority over the defendant.

By an agreement in writing, dated 20th Aug. 1866, Mr. C. L. Lane, then a lieutenant in the 7th Fusiliers, at Quebec, promised to make over and secure to the plaintiffs, merchants and traders at Quebec, for the benefit of his creditors, the proceeds of his commission as a lieutenant.

On the 20th Dec., 1866, Mr. Lane wrote and delivered to the plaintiffs the following letter, addressed to Messrs. Cox and Co., the army agents:—

GENTLEMEN,—Intending to request permission to retire from Her Majesty's service by the sale of my commission as Lieutenant 7th Royal Fusiliers, I have the honour to request that, in the event of my application being granted, you will please pay to Mr. Thomas Glover and Mr. John Darlington the proceeds of my commission, or any other moneys that you have now or that may come into your hands to the extent of 1000*l.* sterling. . . .
Quebec, Dec. 20, 1866.

In July 1867 the plaintiffs sent the letter to Messrs. Cox, who stated, in reply, that Mr. Lane's commission had not been sold, and that they had no money of his in their hands.

In Aug. 1867 Mr. Lane became bankrupt in England, and the defendant was appointed his assignee in bankruptcy.

On the 15th Oct. 1867 Mr. Lane's commission was sold for 570*l.*, which sum was paid by Messrs. Cox to the defendant on the 4th Nov. following.

On the 25th Nov. 1867, the solicitors of the plaintiffs wrote to the solicitors of the defendant, giving them notice not to part with the 570*l.*, as the plaintiffs had a claim on it, and that in the event of his doing so they should file a bill. On the 23rd Jan. 1868, the solicitors of the plaintiff wrote to the defendant requesting payment of the 570*l.* The defendant claimed to retain the same as assignee in bankruptcy.

The plaintiffs filed their bill on the 29th Jan. 1869, praying for a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to the 570*l.* as trustees of the agreement of the 20th Aug 1866, for the payment of the sum to them, and for other incidental relief.

Amphlett Q. C., and Caldecott, for the plaintiffs, contended that there had been a good equitable assignment of the proceeds of the commission to them. A notice of it to the army agent before the sale of the commission would have been a nullity. This was decided in Buller v. Plunkett, 1 G. & H. 441; Webster v. Webster, 31 Beav. 393; Somerset v. Cox, 33 Beav. 634. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—If the notice had no effect, then it must have been in the order and disposition of the bankrupt.] But with the consent of the true owner: Bartlett v. Bartlett, 1 De G. & J. 127. The plaintiffs did all they could to perfect the assignment.

Digitized by Google

O. Morgan, Q. C., and Jemmett, for the defendants, referred to

Sect 141 of the Bankruptcy Consolidation Act 1849;

Ryall v. Rowles, 1 Ves. 248; 1 W. & T. Leading Cas. 615 (2nd edit).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (without calling for a reply).—This seems to me a clear case, when one comes to understand the facts of it. It is quite clear, according to the authorities, that this sort of expectancy, or whatever it may be called, was capable of being bound by an assignment, or by covenant, or by a contract for a valuable consideration. The owner of the commission had said that when his commission was sold the proceeds should go in a certain way. That amounted to an equitable assignment of the proceeds, if and when the proceeds came into existence. In the mean time, before the actual sale, he becomes bankrupt. The assignees in bankruptcy could take nothing but what the man had, that is to say, equitably and beneficially; they could not take anything which somebody else had a prior right to. He could not defeat the right of the plaintiffs by becoming bankrupt. Of course, there is then the order and disposition clause to be considered, but upon that clause it is quite manifest that the order and disposition clearly only applies to those things which are in the ordinary disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner. It is in truth a punishment of the true owner for his laches or complicity in allowing the bankrupt to obtain a false credit. That is the principle upon which that statutory provision was made. If the true owner did not consent to it, then it appears to me that the true owner has not lost his right. In this case the true owner did all he possibly could. The true owner gave notice to the only person whom he thought was likely to know anything about it. It has been alleged that that notice is a nullity. But the fact that the notice was a nullity does not make it less clear that the true owner did all he possibly could to prevent its getting into anybody else's hands, and to prevent the bankrupt obtaining a false credit. That being so, it appears to me that the plaintiff is entitled to the declaration which is asked, namely, that the plaintiff is entitled to the priority.

Declaration as prayed. Order defendant to repay the plaintiff the sum of money with interest at 4 per cent. within fourteen days after service of the decree. Defendant to pay the costs of the suit.

Solicitors: Harcourt and Macarthur; R. S. Taylor and Son.

Friday Dec. 10, 1869.

EADE v. MORGAN.

Practice—Dismissal of Bill—Subpœna to hear judgment.

Where the plaintiff by setting down a cause on bill and answer, and stating that he should serve a subpœna to hear judgment, prevented a defendant from moving to dismiss, and, shortly before the cause came into the paper, gave notice that he did not intend to proceed further:

Held, that the defendant was entitled at the hearing (the plaintiff not appearing) to an order dismissing the bill with costs, on production of an affidavit of the notice by the plaintiff to set down the cause on bill and answer.

The bill in this cause was filed on the 30th April 1868. The last of the answers, that of the defendant, Edwin Morgan, was filed on the 31st Dec. 1868.

On the 18th March 1869, the solicitors of the defendant Edwin Morgan received a letter from the solicitor of the plaintiff dated the preceding day, stating that he had set down the cause on bill and answer, and that he should serve subpœna to hear judgment. No subpœna was served, and in a letter dated the 20th Nov. 1869, the plaintiff's solicitor wrote to the solicitors of the defendant, stating that he did not intend to proceed further in the cause, and that he gave this notice in order that they might avoid any further costs by appearing on the hearing of the cause, and stated that the cause on being called on would be struck out for want of appearance by the plaintiff.

Caldecott now applied on behalf of the defendant Edwin Morgan (the cause being in the paper for hearing), that the bill might be dismissed with costs. By setting down the cause for hearing on bill and answer, the plaintiff had prevented the defendant from moving to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution (Ord. xxxiii. r. 10), and the defendant could only get his costs at the hearing.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the defendant was entitled to an order dismissing the bill, with costs, on production of an affidavit of the notice by the plaintiff to the defendant of having set down the cause on bill and answer.

Solicitors: Frederick Bradley, Edwards, and Mayhew; Baker and Key.

Friday, Dec. 17, 1869.

FREEMAN v. POPE.

Voluntary settlement—Validity of as against subsequent creditor—Stat. 13 Eliz. c. 5.

A. executed on the 3rd March 1863 three instruments, one a voluntary settlement in favour of his godddaughter P. of a policy of insurance on his own life for 1000*l.*, the second a bill of sale of his furniture and effects to secure the sum of 350*l. advanced to him by W., and the third a surrender of copyhold premises to the said W. for valuable consideration. At the time of executing these instruments A. was in solvent circumstances. Subsequently, however, A. became embarrassed, and at the time of his death, which occurred in* 1868, was largely in debt; but with few exceptions all the debts were incurred subsequently to the deed of 1863. A. died intestate, and left no assets. The plaintiff was a creditor subsequent to the voluntary deed of 1863:

Held (following the decisions in Jenkyn v. Vaughan and Spirett v. Willows), that the settlement was fraudulent and void as against creditors.

Digitized by Google

This suit was instituted by a creditor, for the purpose of administering the estate of the Rev. John Custance, and for setting aside a deed of settlement as being fraudulent and void as against creditors. The following are the facts:—

By a deed of settlement dated the 3rd March 1863, and made between the above-named John Custance of the one part, and the defendant, George Pope, and William Rushmore and Ellen Elizabeth Walpole (hereinafter called the trustees), of the other part, after reciting that John Custance was possessed of a policy of assurance on his own life in the Pelican Life Assurance Company for the sum of 1000*l.*, and reciting that J. Custance was desirous of settling the said policy in manner thereinafter mentioned, as a return for the kindness and attention he had experienced at the hands of Julia Thrift, the wife of William James Thrift, it was witnessed that, in consideration of the premises and of the sum of 5*s.* paid to him by the trustees on the execution thereof, he, the said J. Custance, did thereby assign unto the above-named trustees, their executors, administrators, and assigns, all the aforesaid policy of assurance, whereby the sum of 1000*l.* was expressed to be assured by the above-mentioned company upon the life of the said John Custance in consideration of the annual premium of 63*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.*, upon trust for such persons as the said Julia Thrift should by deed or will direct or bequeath; and by the same deed John Custance covenanted to pay the annual premium on the policy.

At the time of executing the above deed, John Custance was indebted to Ellen Elizabeth Walpole, the mother of Julia Thrift, to the amount of 850*l.*, and on the day of the date of the above-mentioned deed John Custance executed a bill of sale of all his household furniture and other effects to Ellen Elizabeth Walpole, as a security for her debt. On the 20th Jan. 1868 Ellen Elizabeth Walpole obtained a judgment against John Custance in respect of her debt of 850*l.* and interest for the sum of 437*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.*, and shortly afterwards a writ of sequestration was issued at her suit against the livings of Blickling and Erpingham, of which livings John Custance was the incumbent. In Feb. 1868 Ellen Elizabeth Walpole, in order to facilitate a loan of 600*l.*, agreed at the request of John Custance, to postpone her bill of sale to a bill of sale then executed by John Custance of all his furniture and effects to a Mrs. Howes to secure payment of the sum of 600*l.* At the date of the deed of settlement of the policy, John Custance was indebted to Messrs. Gurneys and Co., bankers, in the sum of 489*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.*, of which amount the sum of 111*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.* was still owing. He was also indebted at the same period to James Bresse, of Aylesham, in the sum of 7*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*, and since then there was a further sum due to Bresse. There were several other creditors of John Custance whose debts were contracted prior to the month of March 1863, who were not fully paid.

The bill alleged that John Custance was, prior to the month of March 1863, in insolvent circumstances, and continued so up to the time of his death, which took place on the 21st April 1868. He left no will, and letters of administration were granted to the defendant Alexander Robert Chamberlain, a creditor of the intestate, who is now the sole legal personal representative of the intestate. At the time of his death John Custance was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of 62*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.*, being an account for provisions supplied subsequently to the deed of settlement. The plaintiff applied to Chamberlain for payment of the above sum, but he refused to pay the same, on the ground that he had no assets in his hands. Shortly after John Custance's death, all his furniture and other effects were sold by Mrs. Howes under her bill of sale, and the proceeds of such sale were not sufficient to satisfy the amount due on such bill of sale, and there was still due thereon the sum of 70*l.* The sum of 437*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.*, with subsequent interest, was still due to Ellen Elizabeth Walpole. The defendant Pope alleged that John Custance was, at and before the date of the hereinbefore mentioned deed of settlement, seised or entitled to a copyhold cottage and premises at Catten, and that he was possessed of, or entitled to certain dock shares of the value of 1500*l.* and upwards. The plaintiff insists that the dock shares were, in 1861, transferred by John Custance to the above-mentioned Ellen Elizabeth Walpole; and that by a surrender, dated the 3rd March 1863, in consideration of the sum of 50*l.* expressed to be paid to the said John Custance, by the said Ellen Elizabeth Walpole, the said John Custance did absolutely surrender the said copyhold cottage and premises at Catten, to the use of the said Ellen Elizabeth Walpole, who was shortly afterwards admitted as tenant thereof.

The bill alleged that the effect of the hereinbefore-mentioned deed of settlement, bills of sale and surrender (all of which were executed on the same day), was to divest John Custance, who was then utterly insolvent, of all his available property applicable to the payment of his debts. William James Thrift died some years ago, and his widow has since married the defendant, George Pope. On the 8th May 1868 the plaintiff's solicitors gave to the directors of the Pelican Life Assurance Company notice that this suit was going to be instituted, and that they should not pay over the sum of 1000*l.* due on the policy, or any part of it, to Mrs. Pope, or to any other person, until a decree had been obtained from the Court of Chancery. By a deed poll dated the 3rd June 1868 Julia Pope, in exercise of her power of appointment, appointed the policy of assurance to her husband, the defendant George Pope. The defendant Tucker, as secretary of the Pelican Life Insurance Company, paid into court the sum of 981*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*, being the amount assured by the policy after deducting his costs.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and H. H. Cozens-Hardy were for the plaintiff.

Osborne Morgan, Q. C. and H. A. Giffard were for the defendants.

H. Fellows appeared for the defendant Chamberlin.

The following cases were cited by counsel:

Adams v. Hallett, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 468; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 789;
Ware v. Gardner, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 317; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 71;
Jenkyn v. Vaughan, 3 Dr. 419;
Taylor v. Jones, 2 Atk. 600;
Richardson v. Smallwood, Jac. 552.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Were the case absolutely free from authority, I should have thought that the question I had to put to myself under the statute was, in the words of the statute, "whether there was actually any intention by this settlement on the part of the settlor to defeat, hinder, or delay his creditors." If I were a special juryman to whom such a question were put by a judge, I should, upon the facts of this case, come to the conclusion that this gentleman had no such intention whatever. I am satisfied that he had not any idea whatever of defrauding or cheating his creditors by making that settlement in favour of his god-daughter of the policy of insurance which he had made several years before in her favour, when there was no pretence for supposing that he was in embarrassed circumstances at all. But I am bound, as it seems to me, sitting here as Vice-Chancellor, by two decisions, one of Lord Westbury, L. C., and another by Kindersley, V. C. The decision of Kindersley, V. C. is, that if there be a creditor subsequent to the deed, and there be also at that time an unpaid creditor prior to the deed the subsequent creditor has exactly the same right to file a bill as the prior creditor had, that is to say, I am to try the case at the suit of the present creditor, Mr. Freeman, as if the bankers were the plaintiffs and not Mr. Freeman. Then assuming it to be the suit of the bankers, it appears to me that I am equally bound by the decision of Lord Westbury in the case of Spirett v. Willows. I confess I cannot follow the reasoning. He says, "The plaintiff sues as a creditor to set aside a voluntary settlement or deed of gift made by the defendant his debtor. The plaintiff's debt was contracted before the time of making the settlement. He has since recovered judgment at law, and the debtor has become bankrupt. The plaintiff complains, in the words of the statute of Eliz., that his judgment and execution are hindered, delayed, and defrauded by the conveyance of the goods and chattels of his debtor made by his voluntary settlement. The defence is, that at the time of making the settlement, the debtor reserved, and had property enough to pay the plaintiff, and all his other creditors in full, and that the settlement, therefore, is not fraudulent because the debtor remained solvent after he had made it. There is some inconsistency in the decided cases on the subject of conveyances in fraud of creditors, but I think the following conclusions are well founded. If the debt of the creditor by whom the voluntary settlement is impeached existed at the date of the settlement, and it is shown that the remedy of the creditor is defeated or delayed by the existence of the settlement, it is immaterial whether the debtor was or was not solvent after making the settlement." That is to say, it is immaterial whether the debtor had any intention whatever of defeating his creditors, but if in the result, from some accident, the debt remained unpaid for some years by reason of a voluntary settlement or a subsequent declaration of the debtor during his lifetime the creditor was absolutely delayed in the payment of the debt, that then, however honest the settlement was, however solvent the man was at the time, if at the time he had 100,000*l.* and put 100*l.* in the settlement and then the creditor for 100*l.* happened to be unpaid in consequence of the man losing his money in the interval, that that would be quite sufficient to set aside the voluntary settlement. That is the decision of Westbury, L. C. I am bound by that decision; and therefore, although I desire to express my opinion that this gentleman having regard to his income and his means had no intention whatever to cheat his creditors at that time, I must declare this settlement to be fraudulent and void as against his creditors. I do it in deference to that decision. The costs must follow the result.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Sole, Turner, and Turner, agents for Miller and Son, Norwich.

Solicitors for the defendants, Hawkins, Patterson Snow, and Burney, agents for John Perks, Burton-on-Trent.

Saturday, Jan 29.

Re North Wales Slate Supply Company.

Practice—Winding-up—Petition dismissed—Rehearing.

The court has no jurisdiction to make an order on a petition to wind-up a company which had been dismissed with costs, otherwise than on an appeal or rehearing.

This was a petition to obtain an order to wind-up the North Wales Slate Company, under the following circumstances:—

A similar petition had been previously presented, but, being opposed by the company, was dismissed with costs on the 4th Dec. 1869.

Since that time the company, finding themselves in very embarrassed circumstances, intimated their willingness to the petitioner to obtain a winding-up order; and for this purpose the petitioner obtained leave for the petition, which had been already dismissed on the 4th Dec. 1869, to be put in the paper for hearing.

W. F. Robinson, in support of the petition, now applied for a winding-up order.

E. A. Hadley, who appeared for the company, did not oppose.

The Vice-Chancellor said he would make no order on the application, as having made an order dismissing the petition he had no jurisdiction to discharge it. The right course would have been to have presented a petition for re-hearing.

Solicitors: Tyrrell; W. Smith.

Saturday, Feb. 19.

Re Nicholl's Settlement.

Practice—Trustees refusing to transfer funds—Co-trustee lunatic—13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, s. 24.

Two executors of a sole trustee refused to transfer a fund; the third executor was a lunatic:

Held, that the court could not make an order under the 24th section of the Trustee Act 1850.

This was a petition for an order to vest certain shares in the Oxford Canal Company in the beneficiaries under a settlement. The surviving trustee had died, having appointed three executors, one of whom had become lunatic, and the other two had refused for twenty-eight days to transfer the property. The application was made under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, s. 24, which enacts that where anyone of the trustees of any stock or chose in action shall neglect or refuse to transfer such stock, or to receive the dividends or income thereof, or to sue for or to recover such chose in action according to the directions of the person absolutely entitled thereto, for the space of twenty-eight days next after a request in writing for that purpose shall have been made to him, or her, by such person, it shall be lawful for the Court of Chancery to make an order vesting the right to transfer such stock, or to receive the dividends or income thereof, or to sue for and recover such chose in action, in the other trustee or trustees of the said stock or chose in action, or in any person or persons whom the said court may appoint jointly with such other trustee or trustees.

The Vice-Chancellor intimated that the petition should have been entitled in lunacy.

Edward Cutler, for the petitioners, submitted that it was not necessary that the petition should be entitled in lunacy, as the refusal of two of the executors to transfer the stock brought the case within the meaning of the above section.

The Vice-Chancellor refused to make the order, and said that although it was true that one or more of several executors could deal with the fund for the purposes of administration, yet here they must be taken to be mere trustees, and he could not deal with the interest vested in the lunatic. The Vice-Chancellor suggested that the matter should be mentioned to the Lord Justice.

Solicitors: J. and R. Gole.

Digitized by Google

Wednesday, Feb. 16.

ALI v. FORRESTER.

Practice—Trust fund 500l.—Costs.

When a trust fund is reduced to 500l. before the filing of the bill, the court will only allow costs according to the County Court scale.

This was a suit instituted by Jane Ali against the trustees of a will, under which she claimed the moiety of a legacy of 200*l.* The facts were these: Ursilla Cook by her will, dated 22nd Feb. 1841, gave all her property, amounting to 716*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.*, to trustees upon certain trusts, among others, to pay to Frances Benton the sum of 200*l.* During the lifetime of Frances Benton, the interest on the 200*l.* was paid to her by the trustees of Miss Cook's will.

Frances Benton made her will on the 10th Nov. 1864, and died shortly after. By her will she bequeathed to her two daughters, the plaintiff and Harriet Mohammed, in equal portions the 200*l.* bequeathed to her by Ursilla Cook.

On the 19th Oct. 1865 the defendants sold out a sum of 216*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.*, part of the estate of Miss Cook, thereby reducing the estate to 500*l.* The bill then prayed that the amount due to the plaintiff by the defendants should be paid to her.

B. B. Rogers was for the plaintiff.

J. T. Crossley, J. Finlaison, and Marcy appeared for the several defendants.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR made a decree in favour of the plaintiff according to the prayer of the bill with costs.

J. Finlaison contended that the costs should be according to the scale of the County Courts, the legacy being 200*l.*, and the whole trust fund only 500*l.*

B. B. Rogers submitted that the original trust fund being over 500*l.*, the suit was rightly instituted in this court.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion that the costs should be according to the County Courts scale the bill being filed in respect of the moiety of a legacy for 200*l.*, and the trust fund at the commencement of the suit not exceeding 500*l.*

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Harrison and Gregory.

Solicitors for the defendants, S. B. Robertson and W. J. Myatt.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, Jan. 18.

SMITH v. BUCKINGHAM.

Patent—Sale of—Warranty—Plea.

By an agreement reciting that the plaintiff "had lately invented an approved composition or material to be employed in waterproofing, or rendering woven fabrics impervious to moisture, for which he has duly obtained provisional protection under the Patent Law Amendment Act 1852, and obtained a certificate of allowance of the provisional protection," the defendant contracted with the plaintiff for the sale to the defendant "of the said invention, and all benefit and advantage to be derived therefrom and from the letters patent which may hereafter be granted therefor," for a certain sum to be paid in different portions. In an action on this agreement, for the nonpayment of a portion of the money, the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff "had not invented an improved or any composition or material which could be employed in rendering woven fabrics impervious to moisture:"

Held, on demurrer, that the plea was bad.

This was a demurrer to a plea.

Declaration:

For that an agreement, bearing date the 18th Nov. 1865, was made between the plaintiff and defendant, in the words and figures following, that is to say: "This agreement, made and entered into this 18th Nov. 1865, between Henry Francis Smith, of Winchester, in the county of Lancaster, india-rubber and gutta percha manufacturer, of the one part, and James Buckingham, of Walworth Common, in the county of Surrey, manufacturer, of the other part. Whereas the said Henry Francis Smith hath lately invented an approved composition or material to be employed in waterproofing, or rendering woven fabrics impervious to moisture, for which he has duly obtained provisional protection under the Patent Law Amendment Act 1852, and obtained a certificate of allowance of the provisional protection dated the 6th Oct. last; and whereas the said Henry Francis Smith hath contracted with the said James Buckingham for the sale to him of the said invention, and all benefit and advantage to be derived therefrom, and from the letters patent which may hereafter be granted therefor, for the sum of 510l., subject to the terms and conditions hereinafter mentioned. Now it is therefore agreed by and between the said parties hereto that in consideration of the sum of 160l. paid by the said James Buckingham to the said Henry Francis Smith on or before the 1st Dec. next, and of the further sum of 350l. to be paid on the completion of the necessary specification and grant of the letters patent, he the said Henry Francis Smith doth hereby agree to transfer and make over to the said James Buckingham, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all his interest in the said invention or improvement thereof, and all benefit to be derived from the said provisional protection, or from any letters patent to be hereafter granted for the said invention, and to execute a proper assignment thereof to the said James Buckingham, his executors, administrators, and assigns, whenever called upon to do so, and receiving the said sum of 350l., the balance of the said purchase money; and it is further agreed between the said parties that he, the said James Buckingham, shall employ the said H. Francis Smith in the manufacture and selling of the goods to which the said invention shall be applied, for the term of fourteen years and shall pay him the sum of 4l. per week from the 1st Dec. next, so long as the amount of fabrics manufactured and sold by the said James Buckingham, and to which the said invention shall be applied, shall not exceed 1000 yards per week. But when the average amount of any three months shall exceed that quantity, then and in such case the said James Buckingham shall at all times thereafter pay to the said H. Francis Smith the sum of 1d. per yard upon the whole amount manufactured and sold in lieu and stead of the said weekly sum of 4l.; and it is further agreed that the said H. Francis Smith shall, during the said term of fourteen years, if he shall not be prevented by sickness or ill health, duly and properly attend to and superintend the manufacture of the said Francis, and the application of the said invention thereto, or the sale and disposal thereof in the best manner that he is able, and shall not during the said term, either alone or in partnership with any other person, be directly or indirectly connected in any other business or manufacture of a similar or a like nature; and that he shall in due time make the proper and sufficient specification, and take the proper steps for obtaining the letters patent for the said invention, the expense whereof shall be borne by the said James Buckingham. And further, that he or they at all times have free access to the books in which the accounts relating to the manufacturing and selling the goods in question are kept, for the purpose of ascertaining the quantity per week manufactured and sold. And it is further agreed that the said James Buckingham, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall continue to manufacture and sell the said goods for the said term of fourteen years, and to supply sufficient skill and capital for the due and proper manufacturing thereof, and to pay the said H. Francis Smith, his executors, and administrators such weekly or other sums as aforesaid, or in default therefor, it shall be lawful for the said H. Francis Smith, his executors, or administrators, to manufacture such goods, and apply and use such invention on his or their own account as if the agreement had not been entered into. In witness, the hands of the parties the day and year aforesaid.—JAMES BUCKINGHAM; H. FRANCIS SMITH."—And the defendant paid the said sum of 160l. to the plaintiff, and the necessary specification in the said agreement mentioned was completed, and the said letters patent granted, and the plaintiff has always been and is now ready to transfer and make over to the defendant, his executors administrators, and assigns, all his interest in the said invention, and to execute a proper assignment thereof according to the said agreement, and tendered and offered a sufficient assignment to the defendant of the said premises, which the defendant always refused to accept, and the plaintiff entered into the service of the defendant in the capacity and upon the conditions stated in the above-mentioned agreement, and so continued therein until the breach of the said agreement (hereinafter alleged), and was always ready and willing to continue in the said service, and to serve the defendant during the remainder of the said term, and all conditions were performed and all things happened, and all times elapsed, necessary to entitle the plaintiff to receive the said sum of 350l. from the defendant, and to be retained by the defendant in his said service in the capacity and on the terms aforesaid, yet the defendant did not pay the said sum of 350l. to the plaintiff; and the defendant, before the expiration of the said term of fourteen years, as in the said agreement mentioned, dismissed the plaintiff from the said service, and refused to retain the plaintiff therein for the remainder of the said term, whereby the plaintiff was deprived of the wages and profits which he would have derived from being retained in the said service, and remained for a long time unemployed and lost the full benefit of divers expenses which the plaintiff necessarily incurred in and about entering into and performing the said agreement on his, the plaintiff's part; and that defendant also then broke the said agreement in this, that although whilst he was in the plaintiff's service the amount of fabrics manufactured and sold by the defendant, and to which the said invention was applied, did not exceed 1000 yards per week, for divers weeks the defendant did not during the said weeks pay the plaintiff the said sum of 4l. per week during the said weeks, &c.

The declaration also contained the ordinary money counts.

Plea (No. 2) to the first count in the declaration: The defendant says that the plaintiff had not invented an improved or any composition or material which could be employed in rendering woven fabrics impervious to moisture.

Demurrer to this plea, and joinder in demurrer.

Macnamara, in support of the demurrer.—The only ground on which the plea could be supported is, that it showed a total failure of consideration; but this plea does not show that: for it appears in the pleadings that the invention had been provisionally registered, and that the statutory protection had been obtained until the letters patent should be granted. There is no allegation of fraud on the part of the plaintiff; and there is clearly no express warranty on his part. Is there then an implied warranty? It has been held that there is no implied warranty in such a case. In Hall v. Conder, 2 C. B., N. S., 22, the declaration set out an agreement which recited that the plaintiff had invented a method for the prevention of boiler explosions, and had obtained a patent for the use of the same in the United Kingdom, and was desirous of taking out patents in foreign countries, and that the plaintiff "agreed to make over and transfer, and did thereby accordingly make over and transfer to the defendants, one-half of the said foreign patents when the same should be obtained, and one-half of the English patent." A plea that the invention was wholly worthless, and of no public utility, and was not new as to the public use thereof in England, and that the plaintiff was not the true and first inventor thereof, was held bad on the ground that in the absence of any allegation of fraud, it must be assumed that the plaintiff was an inventor, and there was no warranty, express or implied, either that he was the true and first inventor within the meaning of the statute of James, or that the invention was useful or new, but that the contract was for the sale of the patent such as it was, each party having equal means of ascertaining its value, and each acting on his own judgment. The court, in delivering judgment, say (p. 41), "Did the plaintiff profess to sell, and the defendant to buy, a good and indefeasible patent right? or was the contract merely to place the defendant in the same situation as the plaintiff was in with reference to the alleged patent? in which case his position would be similar to that of the plaintiff in Kintrea v. Perston, 1 H. & N. 357. The plaintiff professed to have invented a method for the prevention of boiler explosions. It is not alleged that he was guilty of any fraud. He must therefore have been an inventor: for if he was not, he must have known it, and would have been guilty of fraud in pretending to have invented. Whether he was the true and first inventor within the meaning of the statute of James is another question. The first material allegation in the plea is that the alleged invention was wholly worthless, and of no utility to the public. Now that was a matter as much within the knowledge of the defendants as of the plaintiff. The next allegation, viz., that it was not new as to the public use thereof in England, and that the plaintiff was not the first and true inventor, was also a matter as much within the knowledge of the defendants as of the plaintiff. Why, therefore, should we assume that the plaintiff meant to assert that the patent was indefeasible, and that the defendant purchased on that understanding, rather than that each knowing what the invention was, and having equal means of ascertaining its value, they contracted for the patent, such as it was, each acting on his own judgment? We think that the latter was the true nature of the contract, and that there was no warranty, express orimplied." Crossley v. Dixon, 10 H. of L. Cas. 293, was also referred to, in which it was held that while a person is using, under a licence, a patent machine, and paying a royalty for its use, or the use of its principles embodied in any other machine, he cannot, in a proceeding against him for nonpayment of royalties in respect of the use of another machine, alleged to embody the principle of the patent invention, set up a defence that the patent is not valid.

Brown, Q.C. (with whom was Gibbons) in support of the plea. The sale was of an invention supposed to have been made by the plaintiff, and if it turns out that no such invention was made by the plaintiff, the subject-matter of the sale did not exist at the time the contract was made, and the case falls within the principle that where the subject-matter of the contract is non-existent at the time it is entered into, the contract falls to the ground. In the case of Hall v. Conder (ubi sup.) cited in support of the demurrer, a patent had been already obtained by the plaintiff, in which respect that case differs from the present, no patent having been obtained by the present plaintiff at the time the agreement was made. If a patent had existed at the time, it would be no answer to allege by plea that the patent was bad, in the absence of express warranty; but it is submitted the case is different where no patent existed at the time the contract was entered into. Both parties, it is to be taken on the pleadings, in the absence of any allegation of fraud, contemplated at the time of the contract, the existence of an actual invention made by the plaintiff, and in view of that entered into the contract. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Both parties believed the plaintiff had invented something for which he would get letters patent. Does not the defendant, then, take his chance in the matter? And the invention being provisionally registered is substantially the same as if a patent had been obtained] In Hall v. Conder, the agreement was to sell the patent such as it was. [COCKBURN, C. J.—And the present case only throws the matter one step backwards. The plaintiff sells an invention which he has provisionally registered, and the defendant buys it, such as it is, without waiting till after the letters patent have been obtained.] It is submitted the present case is not that of the sale of an invention such as it is, but the sale of a real invention. [HANNEN, J.—The plaintiff may well be an inventor in some sense, though he has not invented what is sufficient to accomplish the purposes intended.] In such a case, he has really invented nothing, and the plea alleges that the plaintiff had not invented an improved "or any" composition or material which would accomplish the purposes intended. The plea in Hall v. Conder alleged that the plaintiff was not "the true and first inventor" of the method in question, which is a different thing from saying that he had not invented it at all. [LUSH, J.—The first part of the plea in that case is substantially the same as the present.] The substratum of the whole agreement is the supposed existing invention, and if that does not really exist, the contract is at an end. In Benjamin's Treatise on the Sale of Personal Property, p. 57, the law is thus stated: "As there can be no sale without a thing transferred to the purchaser in consideration of the price received, it follows that if at the time of the contract the thing has ceased to exist, the sale is void." After referring to the case of Strickland v. Turner, 7 Ex. 208, and Hastie v. Couturier, 9 Ex. 102; 5 H. L. Cas. 673, he says, "These cases are sometimes treated in the decisions as dependent on an implied warranty by the vendor of the existence of the thing sold; sometimes on the want of consideration for the purchaser's agreement to pay the price. Another, and perhaps the true ground, is rather that there has been no contract at all, for the assent of the parties being founded on a mutual mistake of fact, was really no assent, there was no subject-matter for a contract and the contract was therefore never completed. Pothier says, "There must be a thing sold which forms the subject of the contract. If then, ignorant of the death of my horse, I sell it, there is no sale for want of a thing sold. For the same reason, if, when we are together in Paris, I sell you my house at Orleans, both being ignorant that it has been wholly, or in great part burnt down, the contract is null, because the house, which was the subject of it, did not exist; the site and what is left of the house are not the subject of our bargain, but only the remainder of it."[MELLOR, J.—Here whatever existed at the time still continued to exist.] The plea denies the existence of everything alleged to have existed. [LUSH, J.—No, you do not say that the plaintiff had not invented anything at all, but anything "which could be employed in rendering woven fabrics impervious to moisture."] That was the only thing in negotiation between the parties. In Chanter v. Leese, 4 M. & W. 295, to an action on an agreement for the sole use of a patent obtained by the plaintiff for an improvement in furnaces, the plea setting out the plaintiff's patent, and pleading that it was not at the time of the grant a new invention as to the public use thereof in England, whereby the grant was void, which the plaintiff at the time of the making of the agreement well knew, was held on demurrer a bar to the action. "If," said Lord Abinger, C. B., "a man contract to pay a sum of money in consideration that another has contracted to do certain things on his part, and it should turn out before anything is done under it that the latter was incapable of doing what he engaged to do, the contract is at an end. The party contracting to pay his money is under no obligation to pay for a less consideration than that for which he has stipulated;" remarks which apply in principle to the circumstances of the present case.

Digitized by Google

Macnamara, in reply.—Chanter v. Leese was cited in Hall v. Conder, and distinguished on the ground, as stated in the judgment of the court, that "there the plaintiff contracted that the defendants should have the exclusive right to sell certain things for which patents had been obtained. There was no doubt as to what the parties contracted for; and as the plaintiff, if one of the patents was invalid, could not confer the privilege which he agreed to confer, and for which the defendant contracted to pay, the consideration for the defendant's promise failed, and, to use the language of Lord Abinger, "the whole resting in contract, and nothing having been done under it, the contract was at an end. Here the plaintiff was capable of fulfilling all that he contracted to do. He had already done it in equity. The defendants might have had all that they contracted to receive, and were therefore bound to pay." Besides, the plea in Chanter v. Leese stated that the plaintiff well knew, at the time of making the contract, that the patent was void. The plaintiff in the present case must, on the pleadings, be taken to have supposed that he had made a discovery which would be practically useful; otherwise he would not have gone to the expense of provisional registration. Certain inchoate rights are given by the Patent Law Amendment Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 83) in such cases, and there is therefore no total failure of consideration. Sect. 8 provides that after the certificate of allowance has been obtained, "the invention therein referred to may, during the term of six months from the date of the application for the letters patent for the said invention, be used and published without prejudice to any letters patent to be granted for the same, and such protection from the consequences of use and publication is hereinafter referred to as provisional protection." Chanter v. Hopkins, 4 M. & W, 399, was also referred to.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I confess that I have had very great doubt about this matter, not with reference to the law governing such a contract, but with reference to the character of the plea which has been demurred to. I quite agree that where a man supposes himself to have invented something which may have been the subject of a patent, and another man under the same belief, and himself a seller, buys that invention, such a contract may well be, and the buyer takes his chance of its being a patented invention, and if it turns out that the invention does not prove to be new, then it won't do for the buyer to turn round and say, "I won't buy because it is no invention at all." It is a very different thing for a man, believing himself to have discovered some process whereby a given result may be obtained, but which fails, more or less, to sell it to another, where he is conscientious in believing—this is very different from the case of a man selling as an invention to another that which in point of fact, existed only in his own imagination, and had no result. I cannot help saying that in such a case the maker of such an agreement would not be bound by his bargain. There must be some industry used, some novelty produced, and then the man who buys it must take it such as it is. I can distinguish the case supposed from the case of an invention which has some foundation and effect, but which does not achieve the whole object for which it was devised. In the case where there is some invention, but its efficacy is only partial, a contract may take place, and the persons contracting will be bound by their contract. But where the invention has no foundation and effect I think it will not do, and the difficulty here is, to determine whether this plea amounts to a denial of the existence of any invention at all, or is merely intended to have the effect and has the effect of denying the efficacy of the invention to any extent at all. I think, however, after having discussed the matter with my learned brothers, that this plea does not deny that there has been any invention at all, but only denies that the invention is such as will fully accomplish the purpose for which the invention was patented. I think upon the whole, looking at the declaration which states the subject-matter of a contract, we cannot hold good a plea which negatives only some matter of contract.

Digitized by Google

In that point of view I think the plea is bad; for if a man believes honestly that he has made some discovery by which a given thing may be accomplished, and represents that to another man who believes the representation, and the other man so believing enters into an agreement to purchase the invention, and that a patent shall be taken out, it is not because it turns out incomplete that the man can get rid of his bargain; and on that account I think the plea does not deny the fact of some invention having been made by the plaintiff, and that it is therefore bad.

MELLOR, J.—I think, having reference to the nature of the contract between the parties, that the plea does not show a total failure of consideration. What appears to me to be the bargain is this: One says, "I have invented a process which will have the effect of waterproofing cloth," and the other man believes that. The declaration states that the plaintiff "lately invented an improved composition or material to be employed in waterproofing or rendering woven fabrics impervious to moisture, for which he has duly obtained provisional protection under the Patent Law Amendment Act 1852, and obtained a certificate of allowance of the provisional protection, &c.," and then states that he has contracted with the defendant "for the sale to him of the said invention, and all benefit and advantage to be derived therefrom, and from the letters patent which may hereafter be granted therefor," on consideration of the payment of a certain sum of money by the defendant. That is the state of things on which the bargain proceeds. The one says, "I believe I have invented a process of this description. I have methods to suit it, and have filed a provisional specification." The other buys that invention wishing to derive profit from the transaction. There is no implied or express warranty. The defendant has got what he bargained for, and therefore I think the plea is no answer to this declaration.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the plea fails to show that the defendant did not get what he bargained to get. The declaration setting out the agreement for the sale and purchase of the plaintiff's invention for waterproofing cloth, the plea simply alleges "that the plaintiff had not invented an improved or any composition or material which could be employed in rendering woven fabrics impervious to moisture." The plea contains no averment that the defendant knew that his invention would not answer the purpose. That brings me back to the question what was agreed to between the parties. Did the plaintiff mean to sell merely the result of his labour? It appears clear that the agreement was for the sale of that which both parties supposed the plaintiff had invented. But there is no warranty of title nor any allegation of it at all. There is nothing to show that it was not the defendant's intention to put himself simply in the plaintiff's place, and to purchase what he supposed he had invented.

HANNEN, J. concurred.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Attorney for the plaintiff, Chipperfield.

Attorney for the defendant, Champion.

Friday, Jan. 21.

NORTH OF ENGLAND IRON STEAMSHIP INSURANCE ASSOCIATION v. ARMSTRONG AND OTHERS.

Marine insurance—Valued policy—Ship valued at less than actual value—Subrogation—Right of underwriters to damages recovered by shipowner.

In a valued policy of insurance, the parties are bound by the value therein named in respect of all rights and obligations which spring out of it.

A valued policy of insurance for 6000l. on one of the defendants' vessels was underwritten by the plaintiffs, the real value of the vessel being 9000l., and no other insurance being effected on it. The vessel having been run down and sunk by another vessel, pending the risk, the plaintiffs paid to the defendants the 6000l., and afterwards recovered by proceedings instituted in the defendants' name against the owners of the ship which caused the damage the sum of 5683l. 11s. 7d.:

Held, that the plaintiffs (the underwriters) were entitled to the whole of the amount so recovered (after deducting the amount payable to the owners of the cargo and freight), and that the defendants were not entitled to any part of it on the ground that the vessel insured was of greater value than that named in the policy.

This was an action brought for the recovery of 4948l. 18s. under the circumstances set forth in the following special case, by consent of the parties stated for the opinion of the court.

The defendants by and under the name and firm of the Hetton Coal Company, by a policy of insurance caused themselves to be insured, lost or not lost, from the 20th Feb. 1866, at noon, until the 20th Feb. 1867, at noon, upon the body, machinery, tackle, apparel, boats, and other furniture, of and in the steamship called the Hetton, of which they were owners, beginning the adventure upon the said steamship, with all her machinery, ordnance, tackle, apparel, &c., whatsoever, from the day and date above mentioned, at noon, until the 20th Feb. 1867, at noon, against perils of the seas, and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said steamship, machinery, and premises, or any part thereof, including damage done to the said steamship; and it was by the same policy provided that in case of any loss or misfortune it should be lawful for the plaintiffs to sue, labour, and travel for, in, and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said steamship, machinery, and premises, or any part thereof, without prejudice to that insurance. And by the said policy it was stipulated that the said steamship, machinery, tackle, apparel, boats, and other furniture, for so much as concerned the defendants, by agreement between them and the assurers, the plaintiffs, in and by the said policy, were and should be valued at 6000l.

Before the plaintiffs subscribed the said policy they had received from the defendants a written request of which the following is a copy, namely:—

To the Directors of the North of England Iron Steamship Association.

Be good enough to insure in your association the undermentioned steamers for the sums placed opposite their respective names, from the 20th Feb. 1866 to the 20th Feb. 1867, at noon inclusive, subject to your rules.

Owner's name or Policy.	Steamer's name.	....	Value.		Sums to be insured.
			Hull.	Machinery
Hetton Coal Co.	Hetton.	....	60 00l.		6000l.
Ditto.	Cochrane.		60 00l.		6000l.

(Accepted) JOHN ORMSTON, WM. D. STEPHENS, } Directors.

(Signed) ROBERT SHARP, for the Owners.

Digitized by Google

The plaintiffs for a consideration in that behalf subscribed the said policy for 6000*l.* and became insurers thereon to the defendants for that amount on the said steamship, machinery, tackle, apparel, boats, and other furniture.

The defendants at the time of the making of the policy and thence until and at the time of the loss hereinafter mentioned, were interested in the said steamship and premises to the amount of all the moneys by them insured therein.

In Dec. 1866 the said steamship Hetton was run down and sunk by a steamship called the Uhlenhorst and was thereby (being one of the perils insured against) totally lost.

The plaintiffs thereupon, under the said policy paid to the defendants the said 6000*l.* for such loss.

Proceedings were afterwards instituted by Messrs. Dyke and Stokes, under instruction from the plaintiffs in the High Court of Admiralty in the names of the defendants against the owners of the latter vessel for the recovery of damages and compensation for the loss of the Hetton and her cargo, and the injuries to her master and crew occasioned by the same being run down by the said Uhlenhorst, and eventually on an appeal from the judgment of that court, the Privy Council gave judgment in that suit against the owners of the Uhlenhorst for the sum of 5683*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*

About three months after such proceedings being taken by Messrs. Dyke and Stokes as aforesaid in the High Court of Admiralty, the following notice was served by Messrs. Shum and Crossman, acting on behalf of the owners of the Hetton upon Messrs. Dyke and Stokes, and received by them.

In the High Court of Admiralty in England.

THE UHLENHORST.

As the attorneys and agents for and on behalf of Sir William Armstrong, &c., the owners of the Hetton, and the plaintiffs in this suit, we hereby give you notice, and require you not to part with any moneys received, or that may be received by you from the owners of the Uhlenhorst, or otherwise in this suit, except to us the undersigned, or to the above-named, the owners of the Hetton. And we further give you notice that should you part with such moneys after the receipt of this notice, except to us or the above-named, the owners of the Hetton, we shall hold you responsible for the same. Dated the 28th day of March 1868.—Yours, &c.,

SHUM and CROSSMAN.

After the service of the aforesaid notice, and during the proceedings in the High Court of Admiralty, various negotiations took place between the parties interested relative to the course to be adopted, and ultimately it was agreed between them as follows:

Memorandum of agreement between the owners of the Hetton, her cargo, master and crew, of the one part, and the North of England Iron Steamship Insurance Association of the other part, whereby (the Hetton having been run down by the Uhlenhorst, and the Uhlenhorst having to pay 5600*l.* or thereabouts and interest and costs) it is agreed that the said sum of 5600*l.*, or as much as may be paid by the owners of the Uhlenhorst, and interest, shall be received by H. Graham Stokes as solicitor for the insurance association, the Hetton having been insured therein, and Wm. Crossman as solicitor for the owners of the Hetton, and held by them until the rights of the parties to the said sum of 5600*l.*, or thereabouts, and interest shall be agreed to or determined.

Dated 16th July 1868.

For the North of England Iron Steamship Insurance Company, JOS. E. MILLER, Sec.

For the Owner of the Hetton Steamship, G. H. COCHRANE, Chairman.

The sum of 5683*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.* has been paid by the said owners of the Uhlenhorst, and 5495*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, part thereof, is at present deposited, pursuant to the agreement in the last paragraph set forth, in the London and Westminster Bank pending the decision of the court in this case. The residue of the said sum of 5683*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, namely 187*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*, has been paid to the master and crew of the Hetton, who were entitled to it.

A portion of the said sum of 5495*l.* 18*s.* is payable to the owners of freight, and of the cargo on board the Hetton up to the time of the loss. The residue is payable for the loss of the Hetton and its machinery, tackle, apparel, boats, and other furniture.

The value of the said Hetton, and the machinery, tackle, apparel, boats, and other furniture of and in it, was before and at the time of the effecting of the said insurance, declared as aforesaid by the defendants to be the sum of 6000*l.*

That was the only insurance effected on the Hetton.

The plaintiffs claim the whole of the said 5495*l.* 18*s.* to be paid to them, after deducting the amount payable to the owners of the cargo and freight. On the other hand, the defendants allege that the value of the Hetton at the time she was lost was 9000*l.*, and, notwithstanding its value is declared in the policy to be 6000*l.*, and that sum has been paid by the plaintiffs as above stated, the defendants claim to be entitled to participate in the said sum of 5495*l.* 18*s.*, after such deduction as aforesaid.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether or not the plaintiffs (assuming the Hetton at the time of the loss to have been of the value of 9000*l.*) are entitled to have payment made to them of the whole, or, if not of the whole, of any and what part, of the said 5495*l.* 18*s.*, after deducting the amount payable to the owners of the cargo and freight as aforesaid.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiffs pursuant to an agreement entered into by the parties hereto, in accordance with the Common Law Procedure Act 1852.

But if the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment shall be entered up for the defendants pursuant to the said agreement in accordance with the said Act.

Plaintiffs' points: First. That they are entitled to have the whole of the 5495*l.* 18*s.*, after deducting the amount payable to the owners of the cargo and freight. Secondly. That as the value of the ship is declared in the policy to be 6000*l.*, that must for all purposes as between the assurers and the assured be taken to be the value, notwithstanding the actual value may have been more at the time of the loss.

Defendants' points: First. That the defendants, under the circumstances stated, were entitled to be indemnified by the owners of the Uhlenhorst. Secondly. That under the circumstances set forth in the special case, the value stated in the policy of insurance is in no way binding upon the defendants. Thirdly. That inasmuch as the defendants have only received 6000*l.* on account of their vessel, which at the time of her loss was worth 9000*l.*, they are entitled to receive, out of the 5495*l.* 18*s.* received from the owners of the Uhlenhorst, the sum of 3000*l.*, so as to make up the said sum of 9000*l.*

Honyman, Q. C. (with him Udall), for the plaintiffs.—The underwriter is subrogated to the assured, and stands exactly in his position; he has a right to bring an action in the name of the assured against the owners of the vessel in default, and to keep whatever amount he recovers in that action. The general principle is established by a variety of decisions beginning with Randal v. Cockran, 1 Ves. Sen. 98, in which it was held that an insurer, after satisfaction, stands in place of the assured as to the goods, salvage, and restitution in proportion for what he paid. So it was held in Mason v. Sainsbury, 3 Doug. 61, that where insurers had paid the amount of the loss occasioned by the demolition of a house by rioters, they might maintain an action in the name of the assured against the hundred, under the statute 1 Geo. 1, c. 5, s. 6. In Yates v. Whyte, 4 Bing. N. C. 272, the plaintiff sued the defendants for damaging his ship by collision, and it was held that the defendants were not entitled to deduct from the amount of damages to be paid by them, a sum of money paid to the plaintiff by insurers in respect of such damage. Tindal, C. J. said, "I think this case is decided in principle by that of Mason v. Sainsbury. There a party, whose property had been burnt by a mob, was allowed, after receiving the amount of his loss from an insurance office, to sue the hundred on the statute of Geo. 1, for the benefit of the insurers. The only distinction between that case and the present is, that there the action for the wrong was brought at the instance of the insurance office, which is not the case here. But it establishes that a recovery upon a contract with the insurers is no bar to a claim for damages against the wrongdoer." In the Quebec Fire Insurance Company v. St. Louis, 7 Moo. P. C. 286, where the parish church of Boucherville, in Lower Canada, having been in great part destroyed by fire, which was occasioned by the negligence of the respondents' servants, and being at the time insured by a policy effected by the curé upon the church and sacristy, the curé and one of the marguilliers-en-charge, by a notarial instrument, transferred to the appellants (who had granted the policy), in consideration of the payment by them of part of the amount of the damage sustained by the fire, the right to sue and claim from the respondents the amount so paid, and it was held that this constituted a valid subrogation of the debt due to the insurers in right of the fabrique, according to the French law prevailing in Lower Canada. At p. 316 Parke, B. says, "The learned counsel contended that an assuree by a policy against either maritime or terrestrial risks is clearly within the equity of the rules, and has a similar right to require a subrogation at the time of the payment of loss. The authorities cited in support of that position seem to us to establish that the assurees have that right; they are, Alauzel on Assurance, p. 384, s. 477; Pardessus, Cours de Droit Commercial, 595; Quinault, p. 248; Toullier, tit. 4, sec. 14, pp. 329–336; and Pothier on Assurance, p. 248, who lays it down that in the case of a general average, the assurer, after having indemnified the assured against the losses sustained for the common benefit, ought to be subrogated to the rights of the assured, to the contribution which in such case must be made. These authorities are so consistent with justice, and founded upon so equitable a principle, that we have no difficulty in adopting them; and we do not think that any of these are shown to have been derived, as was suggested in argument, from the Code Napoleon, which is not in force in Canada." An authority to the same effect is Dickinson v. Jardine, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 639; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 717, where A. insured goods at Canton by a policy which included jettison among the perils insured against, and the goods having been jettisoned under circumstances which entitled A. to a general average contribution from the owners of the ship and of the rest of the cargo, which arrived safely in London, the port of discharge, A. sued the underwriters for the whole amount insured, without having first collected the contributions to which he was entitled from the other owners of the ship and cargo; and it was held that he was entitled to recover, and that the underwriters, having paid him, would then be entitled to stand in his place with respect to the general average contribution. "The result is," (said Willes, J.) "that the owner has two remedies, one for the whole value of the goods against the underwriters, the other for a contribution in case the vessel arrives safely in port; and he may avail himself of which he pleases, though he cannot retain the proceeds of both, so as to be repaid the value of his loss twice over. This is the usual case where here is an insurance, and a loss following therefrom within its terms, which would be total but for he liability of a third person." It may be said that all this holds only in cases where the assured has received the whole value of the vessel insured, and that, as in the present case, he got only 6000*l.* instead of 9000*l.*, the value of the vessel at the time of the loss, the rule does not apply to him. But it is submitted that this view is founded on a misconception of the nature of the policy, which in the present case is a valued one. And it has been held that, in the absence of fraud, the valuation in the policy is conclusive as between the assured and the underwriters. In Phillips on Insurance, sect. 1183, the law as to this is thus stated: "If the valuation is neither intended as a cover for a wager by both parties, nor fraudulently made, it is binding on the parties, in case it can be carried into effect, and will, as between them, determine the value of the property, and the circumstance of the property being valued very high has not in itself been held to be a sufficient proof of a wager, or of a fraudulent intention on the part of the assured;" and it is submitted that this applies not only to cases of an action on the policy itself, but also to all actions arising out of the policy. Suppose the vessel had been sunk, and the hull were afterwards raised, the underwriter would be entitled to it as salvage. "In cases of abandonment," says Arnold, Maritime Insurance p. 1002 "the assured is entitled to the whole amount of the insurance, and the underwriter on payment of such amount is entitled to the net proceeds of whatever may be saved, in other words, to the salvage, after deducting the expense of saving and recovering it. We have also seen that even where no abandonment has been made, he is equally, on payment of a total loss, entitled to the net salvage that may ultimately come to hand." At page 1004 he says, "If after payment of a total loss, the salvage or proceeds of its sale be withheld from the underwriter, he may bring an action for money received against the assured, and recover unless by his own act at the time of settling loss (as by paying less than the whole amount of insurance in full of all demand) he have waived his claim to the salvage," for which he cites Brooks v. McDonnell 1 Y. & Coll. 500. In that case an insurance had been effected on goods on board a ship consigned to Buenos Ayres, which was captured by the Brazilian government, and condemmed for an attempted breach of blockade. Notice of the capture having been given by the insured to the underwriters, and an offer made by the insured to abandon, the underwriters declined the offer of abandonment, and after some negotiation, it was arranged that on payment by the underwriters of 35*l.* per cent. on the sum insured, the policy should be delivered up to be cancelled, which was accordingly done. Some years afterwards, in pursuance of a convention between Great Britain and Brazil, the goods having been ordered by the latter government to be restored to the owner, and compensation to be made, a claim was made by the underwriters to the whole or a part of the sum awarded for compensation; but it was held, that having declined the offer of abandonment, the payment of the 35*l.* per cent. was a compromise of their liability under the policy, and that they were not entitled to any portion of the sum awarded for compensation. "I do not, in any manner," said the Lord Chief Baron in delivering judgment, "dispute any of the general principles laid down in the course of the argument on the part of the defendants in this case. A policy of assurance is clearly only an instrument of indemnity. As a general rule it cannot be carried further. . . . Looking at the facts stated on both sides, I can feel no doubt that the assured were entitled to some compensation. No doubt is suggested as to their right to bring an action immediately after the loss was ascertained; but whether they should at that time bring an action or wait the possible restoration of the goods seems to have been a matter of doubt. It has been contended on the one side, that I should treat this as a case of a total loss, and that the 35*l.* per cent. paid by the underwriters must be considered as a payment by them in respect of a composition, i.e., as if they had paid 100*l.* per cent. The necessary consequence of this would be that the underwriters would be entitled to the whole of the money, deducting the expenses of recovering it." And the law is thus broadly stated in Arnold's Marine Insurance, p. 867 (last edit.), "The effect of a valid abandonment is to transfer the whole interest in what remains of the thing insured, so far as it is covered by the policy, together with all the rights and liabilities arising out of its ownership from the assured to the underwriters, in proportion to the amount of their several subscriptions. And this transfer, according to what seems to be the true principle, is retrospective, operating from the moment of the casualty which gave the right to abandon. . . . The effect of abandonment is not only to transfer the remains of the abandoned property, but also to clothe the underwriter from the moment of loss with all the rights and all the responsibility of ownership." [LUSH, J.—If it is conceded that the payment to the assured by the underwriter of the actual value of the vessel, would give him all the rights of the assured, the question here is merely whether the payment of the agreed value has not the same effect?] "The payment of a total loss by the insurers," says Phillips, sect. 1707, "or their liability to pay such a loss in consequence of an abandonment, gives them an equitable right to the property, or what remains of it, so far as it was covered by the policy, including the spes recuperandi, and the rights identified with the insurable interest or depending upon the possession of it." And sect. 1711, "All claims against third parties on account of negligence or agency occasioning the damage to the subject, or destruction of it, by a peril insured against, are assigned to the underwriter by an abandonment, so far as the subject is covered by the policy, as a claim against the owners of another vessel for damage by collision with the one insured;" and in sect. 1723 the same writer says, "A mere payment of a loss, whether partial or total, gives the insurers an equitable title to what may be afterwards recovered from other parties on account of the loss. The effect of the payment of a loss is equivalent, in this respect, to that of an abandonment." In Irving v. Richardson, 1 M. & Rob. 153, it was argued, on the authority of Bousfield v. Barnes, 4 Camp. 228, that the defendant was not bound by the sum mentioned in the policy as the value of his vessel; but Lord Tenterden, C. J., said, "I was prepared to give my opinion in point of law, if it had been necessary, that this case is not governed by that cited. There the sum mentioned as the value was different in the two instances; here it was the same. I am of opinion that where a person effects two insurances, declaring the same value in each, he is bound by that sum, and cannot receive beyond that extent." Bruce v. Jones, 1 H. & Colt. 769, was also referred to. The defendants are estopped from saying that the value of the Hetton was more than 6000*l.*, and they are not entitled to recover from the plaintiffs anything more than what has already been paid.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

A. L. Smith (with whom was Watkin Williams) for the defendants.—The real point in this case is whether the amount mentioned in the policy as the value of the Hetton is conclusive upon the parties under all circumstances whatever; and it is submitted that the amount is absolutely conclusive only in case of an action on the policy itself, which is not the present case. The doctrine of estoppel between the parties has never been held to apply except in the case of an action on the policy itself, and it would be a great extension of the doctrine to apply it to such a case as the present. No case has been cited in which the assured had not first been fully indemnified before the underwriter was held entitled to stand in his place, and to exercise all his rights; and this has not been done here, as the real value of the vessel at the time of the loss was 9000*l.* If the doctrine contended for by the other side is correct, the owners of the vessel could never after effecting this insurance have underwritten an increased risk, though the value of the vessel might have been subsequently greatly increased by the addition of new machinery, &c. In Randal v. Cockran (ubi sup.) the decision was that the insurer "after satisfaction," i.e., after fully indemnifying the assured, stands in his place. So in Yates v. Whyte (ubi sup.), Wilde, Serjt. says arguendo, "They (the defendants) could not call on the underwriters to indemnify the plaintiff, in order to induce him to renounce the action against the defendants, while on the other hand, if the plaintiff recovered against the defendants, he would hold the sum recovered as trustee for the underwriters, since all he can claim against them is indemnity for actual loss," a view which is adopted by Lord Tenterden in his judgment. The necessity of the assured being first fully indemnified is also alluded to by Park, J. in the same case:—"This point has been decided ever since the time of Lord Hardwicke; so much so that it has been laid down in text writers that where the assured who has been indemnified for a wrong, recovers from the wrongdoer, the insurers may recover the amount from the assured;" and the same remark applies to the other cases which have been cited. [LUSH, J.—Suppose the vessel were now raised, to whom would she belong?] No doubt to the underwriter. [LUSH, J.—And that, no matter what her value might be—even though it exceeded 9000*l.*] That would be a case of salvage. The question here is whether the underwriter is entitled to be subrogated to the assured, so as to bring an action against the wrongdoer until the assured has been first indemnified. In Bousfield v. Barnes, 4 Camp. 229, Lord Ellenborough, C. J. said, "I think the valuation in this policy is only conclusive in settling a loss upon it between the assured and the underwriters, who have subscribed it, without taking into consideration what has been transacted between the assured and third persons. If a total loss happens, these underwriters shall not pay more than the amount of the valuation; and if there be a partial loss, the valuation regulates the amount of the average contribution. I will likewise take care that the assured do not recover upon the whole more than the real value of the subject-matter insured. But I think it is not enough for the underwriters, on a particular policy, to show that the assured has received from another quarter the amount of the valuation in that policy, unless this amounts in point of fact to a complete indemnity. In the present case the ship insured is proved to have been worth above 8000*l.* The plaintiff has received only 6000*l.* from the London Assurance. He has, therefore, an interest of 2000*l.* to which he may apply the policy on which the action is brought." The rule of law deduced from this case is thus stated in Arnould's Marine Insurance, p. 860 (edit. of 1857), "It must carefully be borne in mind that as a general rule the valuation is only conclusive between the parties to the same policy; and if the assured has sought to protect a portion of his interest in any subject of insurance by one valued policy, and afterwards another portion of his interest in the same subject, by a second valued policy, the valuation in the one policy on which he has recovered does not limit him as to the sum he may recover on the other; provided the value of his interest in the subject insured exceeds the amount in the policy on which he has recovered." The necessity of previously indemnifying the insured is also alluded to by Blackburn, J. in delivering the judgment of this court in Stringer v. English and Scottish Marine Insurance Company, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 692. He says, "It is clear, as a matter of fact, that they (the insured) elected to come upon the insurers for an indemnity for a total loss, and that by so doing, the insurers, when they have indemnified them, will be entitled to be subrogated for them, and get what they can out of the hands of the Americans for their own benefit." So that it comes back to the question whether the defendants have been indemnified, and it is submitted that they have not, unless they are held to be estopped by the value of the vessel lost, which is stated in the valued policy.

Sir G. Honyman, Q. C. was not called on to reply.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think we need not further trouble Sir George Honyman. We are satisfied that our judgment must be in favour of the plaintiff; and I ground my judgment in the matter upon the general proposition that where the value of a vessel insured is stated in the policy in a manner to be conclusive between the two parties, the insurer and the insured, as regards the whole value of the thing insured, then, in respect of all rights and obligations which arise upon the policy of insurance, the parties are estopped between themselves from disputing the value of the thing insured as stated in the policy. I take it, then, to be clearly established that it is one of the rights of the underwriter in the case of a total loss, that whatever remains of the vessel in the shape of salvage, and whatever rights accrue to the owner of the thing insured and lost, pass to the underwriter the moment he is called upon to satisfy the exigency of the policy, and he does so satisfy it. It is admitted here that if this ship had been recovered from the bottom of the sea by being brought up by any of those contrivances which modern skill and science have occasionally made available for that purpose, the body of the vessel would have passed to the underwriters. If, on the other hand, her value had proved to be more than the estimated value in the policy, the underwriter would have been entitled to the vessel so recovered. But I think it is clear also, where we have, instead of the vessel, the supposed value of the vessel, or so much of it as the delinquent vessel was called upon to contribute for the loss, that so much of that as is recovered must be taken to be recovered in respect of the lost ship and to represent it; and then, just as the underwriter would be entitled to the ship if it could have been bodily got back, so he is entitled to that which is the representative of the vessel in the shape of damages to be paid by the owners of the vessel which caused the collision. It seems to me further, to be altogether monstrous to say that where there is a case of a valued policy and an open policy, it is to depend upon the question of which party is first sued, whether the underwriter shall or shall not be bound to pay more than the value of the policy. It is conceded by Mr. Smith that if there were a valued policy and an open policy, and the assured was first to sue upon his open policy and recover his 3000*l.*, taking the figures he has put of 6000*l.* and 3000*l.*—that he would not be entitled to recover on the valued policy the whole amount of that policy, but only so much as constituted the difference between the amount in the open policy and the amount of the estimated value in the valued policy. So, again, it must be conceded, that if this sum had been recovered first from the owners of the vessel that caused the damage, the underwriter upon the valued policy could not have been compelled to pay the whole of that valued policy, because the value of the vessel as between them must always be taken to be the amount at which it is stated in the policy. Though the proposition certainly startles one a little, that the underwriter who has only paid 6000*l.*, the estimated value as stated in the policy and agreed upon between the parties, shall, if the vessel should prove to be equal in value to that amount or worth more than it, get all that can be recovered in respect of the loss of the vessel—still, that is an incident that arises upon this novel form of policy, in which the value of the vessel is taken at a fixed sum agreed upon between the parties. If parties will enter into such policies they must take the consequences, and I do not think we can bend the old rules which exist in respect of marine policies and wrest them from that which was their original position, for the purpose of adapting them to these new-fangled forms of insurance. It has always been considered as a settled rule in insurance law, as I started with observing, that where there is a total loss, the underwriter who pays upon a total loss, whether it is an actual or a constructive total loss, is entitled to anything that remains of the vessel, and to anything which would otherwise have accrued to the owner of the vessel by reason of his ownership. Where the policy is an open policy and simply a policy of indemnity, as to the actual value of the vessel no difficulty would arise in such a case. It is only because we have here a valued policy that these difficulties present themselves. I think we must still apply the old rules, and not make new ones; and if a party chooses to have his vessel or his goods, as the case may be, taken at a fixed value, instead of the contract being one similar to what it is in an ordinary policy, which is simply one of indemnity to the extent of the real value, and any benefit thereby accrues to the underwriter, the underwriter must be held entitled to it. I think, therefore, on the whole of this case, that our judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Smith says that the question which determines the matter in the present case is, what is the effect of the agreement as to the value of the vessel, and I agree with him that that is so. The basis of the contract is the agreed value of the vessel, and when, to avoid all questions as to the real value, the parties come to an agreement as to the value, which is to be the basis of the contract, it appears to me to follow as a matter of course that all those rights that spring out of such a transaction as the present, must apply to the actual agreed value which is the basis upon which the parties contracted. It appears to me then, without saying more, that that is the determining point of the case; and I really cannot see if the parties do for the sake of avoiding all those questions which would otherwise arise, agree to a particular value, why they should not be held to agree to it for all purposes which spring out of the policy.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. A person effecting an insurance may either agree with the insurer as to the amount which is to be considered as the sum forming a complete indemnity, or he may leave it open. If he fixes the amount which he is to be paid in the case of a total loss, and the underwriter accepts that amount, that amount must be binding upon both parties. If each of the parties agrees that a certain sum shall be deemed to be the value of the thing insured, the underwriter in the case of a total loss is not to be at liberty to say that the thing is not worth so much; he is bound to the amount fixed upon, whether it is the amount or not. And, on the other hand, insuring is not at liberty to say that the thing is worth more; he is also bound by the amount agreed upon. It is for the purpose of avoiding all question about the value that the parties have agreed to fix the amount, and therefore for all purposes as to the adjustment of the value under that policy, both the parties are bound by the amount so agreed upon. Mr. Smith admits that the underwriter in the present case, having paid the full amount agreed upon in the policy as the value of the thing insured, would be entitled to the wreck if he could get it. Now, if the underwriter here got the wreck up, and if he procured the wrongdoer to repair the vessel, the vessel so repaired would still belong to the underwriter. What difference can it make whether the wrongdoer repairs the thing in specie, or pays in money the amount that it would take to repair it? In either case the vessel so insured becomes the property of the underwriter, by reason of his having paid that which both parties agree shall be deemed to be the full value of the property. It follows, therefore, that the underwriter is entitled to our judgment.

Digitized by Google

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Attorneys for the plaintiff, Williamson, Hill, and Co.

Attorneys for the defendant, Shum and Crossman.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by M. W. McKELLAR, and H. H. HOCKING, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Feb. 4, and May 6.

CALLAGHAN (app.) v. DOLWIN (resp.)

Friendly society—Reference to justices—Right of appeal—20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 s. 2—21 & 22 Vict. c. 101 s. 5.

The decisions of justices on disputes between members of friendly societies referred to them under the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101 s. 5, are final and cannot be reviewed by a Superior Court on a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. Watts v. The Justices of Kent, 14 L.T. Rep. N.S. 448 (Reported nom Reg. v. Lambarde, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 388), overruled.

This was a case stated for the opinion of the court by a justice of the peace, pursuant to the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The judgment of the court having turned upon their jurisdiction to review the decision of the justice on a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 it is only necessary to give a summary of the facts stated in the case.

The complaint was preferred by the respondent against the appellant, who was the secretary of the Royal King's Lodge Benefit Society, and charged that the appellant, on the 25th April 1868, unlawfully refused to pay the respondent, he being a free member of the society, and having complied with the regulations thereof, the sum of 10*l.*, being the sum allowed by the third rule of the society for the funeral of the wife of a free member thereof.

The rules of the society were certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies; and by rule 36 disputes under the rules between members and the trustees, treasurer, or other officers, were to be referred to justices pursuant to the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101, s. 5, under which this complaint was made.

The dispute between the parties turned upon the construction of two of the rules, and the question for the opinion of the court was whether the magistrate's construction of rule 14 was correct in point of law.

Lister (T. Atkinson, Serjt., with him), for the appellant, contended that the magistrate's construction of the rule was incorrect.

Warton, for the respondent, contended that the magistrate was in the position of an arbitrator, and that his decision was final. He referred to the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 40, s. 7, by which provision was made for referring disputes between members of friendly societies to justices. By the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, s. 40, it was enacted that disputes should be decided according to the rules, and that such decision should be binding and conclusive without appeal. That section contained a proviso that where by the repealed Acts disputes were to be referred to justices they should be referred to the County Court judges, and that proviso was repealed by the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101, s. 5, which again substituted justices for the County Court judges, but did not affect the earlier part of the section. He cited

Crisp v. Banbury, 8 Bing, 394;
Kelsall v. Tyler, 25 L. J. 153, Ex.;
Dwarris on Statutes 668, 2nd edit.;
Conservators of the Thames v. Hall, L. Rep 3 C. P. 415,; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 361;

[KEATING, J. referred to Reg. v. Evans, 23 L. J. 100, M. C.; 18 L. T. Rep. 361.]

Evans (amicus curiæ) cited
Reg. v. Lambarde and others, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 388 (reported nom Watts v. Justices of Kent, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 448); where Shee, J. in the Bail Court, decided that a dispute referred to justices under the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101, s. 5, was within the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, and that the justices were bound to state a case.

Warton contended that as that was a decision of a single judge, and no reasons were given, it was not binding on this court.

Lister, in reply, contended that the magistrate heard the case as a justice of the peace, and not as an arbitrator, that a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, was not an appeal, and that the question was already decided in Reg. v. Lambarde.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 6.—M. SMITH, J., now delivered the judgment of the court (Byles, Keating, and Montague Smith, JJ.)—A dispute between a member of the Royal King's Lodge Friendly Society, and one of the officers of the society, was decided by a magistrate; but, at the instance of the officer of the society, the magistrate stated a case for the opinion of this court under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2. Upon the case coming on to be heard before us, it was objected by the respondent that there was no power in the magistrate to state the case, on the ground that he acted as a referee, and that his decision was without appeal. By the 36th rule of the society, it is provided that disputes arising between members and any officers of the society shall be referred to justices, pursuant to 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101, s. 5. Upon consideration of the Friendly Societies Acts, we think no appeal lies. The 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, s. 40, enacts that every dispute between a member and officers of the society shall be decided in the manner directed by the rules of such society, and expressly enacts that "the decision so made shall be binding and conclusive on all parties, without appeal." Then a proviso is added, that where the rules of any society shall have directed disputes to be referred to justices, such disputes shall be referred to and decided by the County Court as thereinafter mentioned. The 41st section then provides for the settlement of other disputes, besides those by the rules referred to justices, by the County Court, and declares that its decisions shall not be subject to appeal. The County Court was thus by the proviso of the 40th section of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, substituted for the justices; but their decision was without appeal. The substitution, however, did not long continue to exist, for by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101, s. 5, the proviso of the 40th section of 18 & 19 Vict. was repealed, and "in lieu thereof," it was enacted that, where the rules of any society shall direct disputes to be referred to justices, then a justice, upon complaint made by any member, &c., may summon the persons against whom complaint is made at a time and place mentioned, and any two justices then present, "shall proceed to hear and determine the said complaint, which complaint shall be heard and determined in manner directed by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43; and such justices may make such order thereupon, either for payment of money or otherwise, together with costs not exceeding 10*s*, as they shall think fit." Now this Act which repealed the proviso of the 40th section of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, left unrepealed the body of that section, which enacted that every dispute should be decided in manner directed by the rules of the society, and that the decision so made should be "binding and conclusive on all parties without appeal." The Act of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, empowering justices to state a case for the opinion of the court, had passed in the interval between the above two Friendly Societies Acts. It was contended by the appellant, that, as the complaint is by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101, directed to be heard and determined by justices in manner directed by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, they hear and determine it as justices: and that the power to state a case under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 arises, as in other complaints heard and determined by them. This contention of the appellant amounts to an assertion that there is an implied repeal of the 40th section of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, and it appears to us, on an examination of the statute, that such an implication cannot be made. It was further contended that the power to state a case was for the assistance of the magistrates, and was not an appeal. But an examination of the provisions of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, does not support that contention. No doubt the proceeding on a case is only upon a determination erroneous in point of law; but in form and substance it is an appeal from the magistrate. It is given, after the determination, to the dissatisfied party, who is called "the appellant," and the proceeding "an appeal." Further, the effect of the 4th and 5th sections is that the justices are bound to state a case, unless the application be frivolous; and if they refuse the Court of Queen's Bench may compel them to do so. Then, by sect. 6, the court to which a case is transmitted may not only reverse, affirm, or amend, but may make such other order in relation to the matter as they may think fit. It seems clear, therefore, that the proceeding by way of case is an appeal from the determination of the justices, and that such a proceeding is opposed to the enactment of sect. 40 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, that "the decision" (when made in manner directed by the rules) "shall be binding and conclusive on all parties without appeal." The 5th section of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101, appears to us to do no more than prescribe what the mode of procedure before the justices shall be according to 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43; and that it was not meant to take from them the character of referees, viz., persons so elected by the society to decide upon their disputes. The limitation of costs to 10*s*. shows also that the Legislature meant the proceeding to be inexpensive. If we were to hold that this appeal lies, we should attribute to the Legislature an intention opposed to the whole policy upon which, in this respect, the Friendly Societies Acts are founded. Throughout the series of statutes on the subject, it has been provided that disputes between members and the society are to be decided by arbitration only; and the courts have given effect to this policy by holding that the jurisdiction of the Superior Courts in such cases was ousted, although not taken away by express words. See the cases at law of Crisp v. Bunbury, 8 Bing. 394; Ex parte Payne, 5 D. & L. 679; and Reeves v. White, 17 Q. B. 995. In the last-mentioned case Lord Campbell, C. J. in delivering the judgment of the court, says:—"In Ex parte Payne, 5 D. & L. 679, Erle, J. after full argument and great deliberation, put this construction on the 27th section of 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, considering it to be the expressed intention of the Legislature to protect societies and their members, who are generally persons in an inferior rank of life, with small means, from the vexation and ruin which might be brought upon them by litigation in courts of law, and to provide for them a domestic tribunal by which all their differences might be speedily decided, and at very small expense." The courts of equity have given the same construction to the Acts. In Armitage v. Walker, 2 K. & J. 211, where a question arose under the Benefit Building Societies Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32), Wood, V.C., says, "The Legislature intended carefully to provide that these societies should not be dragged before courts of law or equity, if it could possibly be avoided, and has taken care to enact that the whole discussion of these affairs shall be disposed of in a cheap and summary manner, by the decision of an arbitrator or justice, as the parties shall choose; and, when they have once made their selection, the power of the justices or of the arbitrator, acting always within the rules of the society, is complete, and is not subject to revision by any court of law or equity. That is the primary matter to which attention must be drawn; and it is necessary to be extremely careful that the jurisdiction of the court shall not be set up to control the arbitrators so selected, except upon a very clear and distinct case being made out, of the abuse of their office." The gist of these decisions is, that the persons selected by the rules to settle disputes are, whether justices or other referees, to be regarded as arbitrators; and the exception in Wood, V.C.'s judgment refers to the well-known equitable relief afforded in the cases where arbitrators have misconducted themselves, and abused their powers. There is no authority to be found for the view of the appellant, except a decision of Shee, J., in the Bail Court, where that learned judge held that the justices were bound to grant a case under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43; Reg. v. Lambarde, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 388. But in the reports of that case it does not appear that sect. 40 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63 was brought to the attention of the learned judge, nor that the earlier statutes and the decisions upon them were referred to. With every respect, therefore, for the learned judge, we cannot consider that decision binding upon a question of such great practical importance. In the result, we come to the conclusion that the magistrate, in hearing this dispute, acted in the character of an arbitrator under the rules of the society, and consequently that his decision cannot be reviewed by this court upon the case stated, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Attorneys for appellant, Godfrey and Herbert.

Attorney for respondent, H. T. Roberts.

Digitized by Google

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law

Friday, Jan. 21.

REG. v. EAVES.

Excise—Appeal—Notice of appeal—Notice of hearing—Adverse party—7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, s. 83—4 Vict. c. 20, s. 30.

The appellant in an appeal against a conviction under the Excise Acts by two of the justices of Liverpool, served notice of hearing of the appeal by leaving notices with clerks at the respective places of business of the two magistrates in Liverpool, and also by leaving a notice with a clerk at the excise office in Liverpool. The person on whose information the conviction was obtained was one B. E., an officer of excise at Liverpool:

Held, that no sufficient notice of hearing had been given within the 83rd section of 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, and 4 Vict. c. 20, s. 30, the first of which, besides notice to the justices, requires notice of hearing to be given to the "adverse party," and the second of which requires it to be given to or left at the place of abode of the respondent.

The appellant in the same appeal gave a written notice of appeal to the clerk to the justices in court immediately after the conviction, the two justices being then present:

Held, a sufficient service of the notice of appeal upon the justices within 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, s. 83.

Case stated by the Recorder of Liverpool for the opinion and direction of the Court of Exchequer under 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, s. 84, the facts of which were, so far as material, as follows:—

This was an appeal by David Eaves to the Midsummer Quarter Sessions for the borough of Liverpool, holden on the 13th July 1869, from the judgment of two justices of the borough in the matter of an information exhibited by Benjamin Evans, an officer of excise.

The appellant was, on the 15th June 1869, convicted by the said justices in a penalty of 100*l.*, for being concerned in the removal, deposit, and concealment of a quantity of exciseable goods contrary to the provisions of the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53. The information on which the said conviction was obtained was laid by the said Benjamin Evans, who was an officer of excise, then and still acting and residing in Liverpool.

Immediately on the conviction being pronounced, the appellant's counsel stated verbally in court that his client would appeal against the said conviction. About the same time the attorney for the appellant served on the clerk of the magistrates of the borough of Liverpool a notice of appeal, the said two magistrates and the said clerk then being in court.

Such attorney at the same time handed a copy of such notice to Mr. William Tyndall, the attorney who represented the said Benjamin Evans on the hearing of the said information, the said Benjamin Evans being present at such hearing. Mr. Tyndall at once handed it back, stating that he declined to accept it, and that the appellant's attorney had better look at the Act of Parliament, because the legal preliminaries to an appeal being heard were numerous and intricate. Mr. Lynch, the appellant's attorney, insisted that the service on Mr. Tyndall was a sufficient notice.

The following is a copy of the notice before mentioned:

To John Torr and Alfred Turner, Esqrs., and to the Commissioners of Excise.

I hereby give you notice that I intend to appeal against the decision this day made against me.

Dated the 15th June 1869.

DAVID EAVES, per TERBAY and LYNCH,
Attorneys for the said David Eaves.

On the 17th June, about mid-day, the appellant's attorney caused another notice to be served on the head officer of excise at Liverpool; on the same day at three, a copy of such notice was personally served on each of the justices; and a copy was in like manner served on a clerk in the office of the clerk of the peace. This notice was addressed to Evans and the two justices, and set forth appellant's intention of appealing, and the grounds on which he intended to rely. On the 5th July the appellant's attorney caused to be served a notice of hearing of the appeal on clerks of, and at the places of business of each of, the convicting magistrates. On the same day a like notice was left at the excise office, in the borough of Liverpool, with a clerk there. This notice was addressed to the commissioners of excise, Benjamin Evans, and the two justices. The question for the court was, whether the appellant had given the notices, and complied with the preliminaries necessary to entitle him to have the said appeal heard.

The 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 53, s. 83, enacts that—

No such appeal as aforesaid shall be allowed unless the party or parties appellant shall, at, and immediately upon the giving of the judgment appealed against, give notice in writing of such appeal to the commissioners of excise or the justices of the peace respectively, from whose judgment such appeal shall be made; and also to the adverse party or parties in such appeal, and shall lodge such notice at the office, or with the registrar of the commissioners of appeal, or with the clerk of the peace for the justices of the peace at such general quarter sessions as aforesaid respectively, by and before whom such appeal is to be finally adjudged and determined, and no such appeal as aforesaid shall be heard, unless the party or parties appellant on such appeal shall within one week at least before such appeal is to be finally adjudged and determined, give notice in writing to the adverse party or parties on such appeal of the time and place when such appeal is to be heard.

It is also enacted by 4 Vict. c. 20, s. 30, that

The notice of the time and place when and where any appeal to the Barons of Her Majesty's Court of Exchequer, or to the justices assembled at the quarter sessions of the peace is to be heard, shall be given on the part of the appellant to or left at the place of abode of the respondent seven clear days at least before such appeal is to be heard and determined.

L. Temple for the appellant.—It will be contended that personal service of notice of appeal on the magistrates was necessary, and that there was none here. I contend that the notice here given was sufficient, being given to the clerk of the peace, their officer, in their presence. The service also on the adverse party was sufficient. The more substantial difficulty arises out of the mode in which notice of hearing was given; it will be urged that Benjamin Evans was the adverse party within the meaning of the statute. The notice was certainly neither given to him personally nor left at his place of abode; but it is submitted that substantially the excise authorities were the adverse parties, and the notice was left at the excise office.

C. Russell (with him the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, and Locke, Q. C.) for the Crown.—In the absence of any statutory provision for substituted service, a notice must be served personally. The notice to the justices was given to the clerk of the peace, and was therefore insufficiently served. Then the point as to the notice of hearing is clearly fatal. The adverse party is the person on whose information the conviction is obtained, not those under whose orders he may be acting. He is the person who legally represents the prosecution, and the notice must be given to him.

The COURT (Kelly, C.B., and Martin and Pigott, BB.) were of opinion that the notice of appeal to the justices was sufficient, but, being of opinion that no sufficient notice of hearing had been given, gave judgment for the Crown.

Judgment for the Crown.

Attorneys: Vizard and Co.; Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Digitized by Google

Jan. 29 and 31.

PREHN AND OTHERS v. THE ROYAL BANK OF LIVERPOOL.

Letter of credit—Agreement by bank to accept and pay plaintiffs' bills—Breach of contract to pay—Action against defendants for breach—Tort or contract—Damages—Measure of—Nominal or substantial.

The plaintiffs, a firm of merchants carrying on business at Alexandria, and having a branch firm at Liverpool, being desirous of purchasing grain at Alexandria and shipping it to England for sale, obtained from the defendants a letter of credit authorising the Alexandria firm to draw bills upon the defendants' bank against grain so sent forward to England; the defendants thereby agreeing to accept the said bills, and to pay them at maturity, the plaintiffs also undertaking to provide, by bills of lading for the grain shipped to England, for the bills to be drawn, so that the defendants should be placed in funds while the bills were running, by the proceeds of the sales of the grain to enable them to meet and pay the said bills at maturity, and so to be kept out of cash advances; for which accommodation the defendants were to receive a commission of one-half per cent. Under that arrangement bills to the amount of 21,928l. were drawn by the plaintiffs at Alexandria upon, and were accepted by, the defendants, and funds exceeding that amount were duly paid into the bank by the plaintiffs before the bills became due. Shortly, however, before the maturity of the bills the bank suspended payment, and gave notice to the plaintiffs that the moneys lodged by the plaintiffs against the bank's acceptances of the plaintiffs' bills could not, under present circumstances, be so applied. Thereupon the plaintiffs at once borrowed the necessary amount, at a commission of 2½ per cent., from financial agents in Liverpool. This commission, amounting to 548l. 11s. 4d., together with 44l. 13s. 4d., the expenses of noting and protesting, and 97l. 4s. 3d., the costs of telegraphic messages to and from Alexandria and Liverpool, for the purpose of giving and receiving information on the subject, to and from the holders of the bills, and ascertaining the best means of protecting the plaintiffs' credit, was paid by the plaintiffs, amounting, in the whole, to 690l. 8s. 11d.; and in an action to recover back that amount from the defendants, as damages sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the breach of contract, it was Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Martin, Channell, and Pigott, BB.), that the plaintiffs were entitled, in an action on special contract, to recover the above mentioned several sums from the defendants, as damages naturally and proximately flowing and resulting from the latter's breach of contract to accept and pay the said bills; and that, by their notice to the plaintiffs of their inability to meet the bills at maturity, the defendants must be taken to have given an implied sanction to the plaintiffs' incurring such expenses under the circumstances.

This was an action by the plaintiffs, as drawers of certain bills of exchange, to recover damages from the defendants for a breach of their contract to accept and pay the said bills when the same became due; and by their declaration the plaintiffs stated that the plaintiffs' Alexandria firm being about to purchase and ship to England for sale cotton and grain, it was thereupon agreed by and between the plaintiffs and the defendants for commission and reward to the defendants in that behalf, that the defendants should accept drafts drawn by the plaintiffs' said Alexandria firm upon the defendants, for the payment of the price of the said cotton and grain, and that the plaintiffs should, from time to time, pay over to the defendants the proceeds of the sales of the said cotton and grain, to be appropriated by the defendants to meet and pay, and that thereout they should meet and pay, the said drafts so to be accepted by them as aforesaid, as and when the same should become due and payable. And that, under and in pursuance of the said agreement, certain drafts were drawn by their said Alexandria firm upon and accepted by the defendants, amounting together to wit to the sum of 21,928l. 12s. 1d., and before the said drafts or any of them became due, the plaintiffs from time to time paid to the defendants, to be appropriated to and for the purpose of meeting and paying the said drafts, moneys in the whole exceeding the said sum of 21,928l. 12s. 1d., and more than sufficient to meet and pay the said drafts; and the defendants, before and at the time of the breaches of agreement hereinafter mentioned, had in their hands, under and in pursuance of the said agreements, moneys for the purpose of and appropriated to meeting and paying the said drafts, as and when the same became due, exceeding the said sum of 21,928l. 12s. 1d., and more than sufficient to meet and pay the said drafts; and all things were done, &c., to entitle the plaintiffs to a performance by the defendants of the said agreement, and to maintain this action for the breaches thereof hereinafter mentioned; yet the defendants, before the said drafts or any of them became due and payable, gave notice to the plaintiffs that they would not meet or pay the same when the same became due and payable, and wholly refused and declined to carry out the said agreement on their part, and thereupon the plaintiffs were forced and obliged, at great expense, to make other arrangements for meeting and paying the said drafts, and for providing the funds necessary for that purpose; and afterwards to meet and pay the said drafts, and were put to great costs, charges, and expenses in and about noting and protesting the said drafts, and in and about protecting their credit, and the credit of their Alexandria firm.

Plea.—Payment into court of 44l. 13s. 4d. as enough to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim.

Replication.—Denying the sufficiency of the sum paid into court to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim, and issue thereon.

The following particulars of the plaintiffs' claim were delivered pursuant to the order of Bramwell, B., dated 20th July 1869.

	£	s.	d.
The costs, charges, and expenses of noting and protesting, in Alexandria and Liverpool, twenty-three bills of exchange for want of better security, and of noting acceptance by Messrs. Marriott and Co. supra protest for the honour of the drawers at 1l. 18s. 6d. each	44	5	6
Postage	0	7	10
	£44	13	4

"The costs, charges, and expenses, to which the plaintiffs were put in and about protecting their credit, consisted of the sum of 548l. 11s. 4d. paid by the plaintiffs to Messrs. Marriott and Co., of Liverpool, to provide for the plaintiffs' drafts at maturity, being a commission at the rate of 2½ per cent. on the sum of 21,928l. 12s. 1d., the amount of such drafts; and also consisted of the sum of 97l. 4s. 3d. paid and expended in transmitting telegrams from Liverpool to Alexandria, and from Alexandria to Liverpool, such last-mentioned costs, charges, and expenses being incurred at divers times and on divers days between the said 23rd Oct. and the 20th Dec."

At the trial of the above action, at Liverpool, at the last summer assizes, before Hayes, J. and a special jury, the following appeared from the evidence, oral and documentary, to be the facts of the case.

The plaintiffs in the year 1867 were merchants carrying on business at Alexandria, and having also a branch house of business at Liverpool, of which one of the partners in the firm, Mr. W. C. R.

Quentrell, was the resident manager and head. In the autumn of that year (1867), the plaintiffs' Alexandria firm were desirous of purchasing cotton and grain at Alexandria for shipment to England, and of drawing against cotton and grain so sent forward to England. Accordingly the plaintiffs, by Mr. Quentrell their resident Liverpool partner, arranged with the then manager of the defendants' bank (Mr. Withers), that the drafts of the Alexandria firm, in payment for such cotton and grain, should be accepted by the bank, upon the understanding that the proceeds of such cotton and grain should be specifically appropriated for the payment of such drafts at maturity, and should be carried to a special and separate account opened for that purpose; and, in conformity with that arrangement, the plaintiffs obtained from the defendants a letter of credit by which the plaintiffs' Alexandria firm were authorised to draw upon the defendants' bank, and by which the defendants agreed to accept the said bills or drafts; the plaintiffs undertaking to provide by bills of lading for goods to be shipped to England for the bills so to be drawn, so that the defendants should be placed in funds, while the bills were running, by the proceeds of their sales of cotton and grain, to enable them to pay the said bills at maturity, and so to be kept out of cash advances, for which accommodation the defendants were to receive a commission of one-half per cent. This arrangement was made by correspondence between the parties, of which the following are the material parts:—

The plaintiffs to the defendants.

Liverpool, 8th Aug., 1867.

DEAR SIR,—With reference to our conversation of this morning in regard to a credit for our Alexandria firm, to be used for transactions in grain, we beg now to state the nature of the business. The grain, to be shipped by our friends, is sold in Liverpool or in London before shipment, and the terms of sale are cash, against delivery of documents within seven days after receipt. Our friends would draw on your bank at the time of shipment and remit to you, either simultaneously, or within very short time, as soon as the shipment is completed, the shipping documents. We would then collect the amount, and pay it over to you, such collections to be considered as in trust, and especially to be applied towards the payment or covering of the drafts of our friends. As the Alexandrian drafts on your bank would be at three months date, you would be covered in cash over two months before maturity. We shall be very glad if you will grant our friends this facility, as we see the probability of doing a considerable and safe business just now; and we are prepared to pay you your usual commission of half per cent. on such transactions. Awaiting your reply, &c., &c.

WM. QUENTRELL and Co.

H. H. Withers, Esq., Manager Royal Bank of Liverpool.

The reply of the defendants to the above letter.

The Royal Bank of Liverpool,
Liverpool, 9th Aug. 1867.

Messrs. Wm. Quentrell and Co.

DEAR SIR,—I beg to inform you, in reply to your note of yesterday, that your firm in Alexandria is at liberty to draw on the company to the extent of 20,000*l.* in furtherance of grain shipments on the conditions stated.—I am, &c., &c.,

H. H. WITHERS, Manager.

In pursuance of and accordance with the above arrangement, the plaintiffs' firm in Alexandria, in the months of Aug. and Sept. 1867, made various shipments of grain to England and drew on the bank, in respect thereof, several bills (twenty-three in number) amounting in the aggregate to 21,928*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.*, and which bills would severally reach maturity on different days in the months of Nov. and Dec. 1867 respectively. The plaintiffs also, pursuant to their engagement, caused the proceeds of the various shipments, as they came forward, to be paid into the bank to meet the said bills at maturity, so that on the 21st Oct. 1867, and at the time when the bank stopped payment, there was a sum of 22,000*l.* and upwards in the bank applicable to that purpose.

The bank suspended payment on the 21st or 22nd Dec. 1867; and immediately on hearing a rumour of that event, the plaintiffs, by their Liverpool partner, wrote the following letter to the defendants:

Royal Bank of Liverpool. Liverpool, Oct. 22, 1867.

Gentlemen,—We request you to let us know immediately who are the holders of the drafts of Wm. Prehn and Co., in Alexandria, to the amount of 13,300*l.* drawn upon you, and which were presented yesterday. It is of the greatest importance to us to know, as we have to provide for them at once. We are, &c., WM. QUENTRELL and Co.

We shall thank you to refer the holders of any drafts presented to us.

The reply of the defendants to the above letter:—

The Royal Bank of Liverpool,
Liverpool, Oct. 23, 1867.

Messrs. Wm. Quentrell and Co.

Dear Sirs,—Your favour of yesterday has been under consideration, and I regret now to have to inform you I am advised that the moneys lodged by you against this bank's acceptances to your firm's drafts, cannot, under present circumstances be so applied. I am, &c.,

H. H. WITHERS, Manager.

The plaintiffs to the defendants:—

The Royal Bank of Liverpool, Liverpool, Oct. 25, 1867.

Gentlemen,—Having specially provided you with the moneys to take up the bills mentioned in the memorandum overleaf, we presume that, notwithstanding the stoppage of the present business of the bank, you will apply those moneys according to their special destination, and pay the bills at maturity. We shall be glad of your reply. We are, &c., WM. QUENTRELL and Co.

The bank, however, still declined to pay the drafts.

Immediately on the stoppage of the bank, and their refusal to meet the plaintiffs' drafts, the plaintiffs (Mr. Quentrell) telegraphed to the Alexandria firm informing them thereof, and desiring them to refer all holders or buyers of the plaintiffs' drafts on the bank to the plaintiffs at Liverpool. The Alexandria firm telegraphed back to Liverpool that holders of bills would not be satisfied with the plaintiffs' acceptance merely, but that they considered the substitution of some other bank absolutely necessary. Several telegrams passed to and from Liverpool and Alexandria on the subject, with a view to making arrangements for the preservation of the credit of the plaintiffs' firm, and preventing the bills from going back dishonoured to Alexandria. Application was made by Mr. Quentrell to various financial houses in Liverpool for assistance, but without success, by some of whom even he was advised that the plaintiffs should themselves suspend payment. Ultimately, however, he succeeded in obtaining the requisite amount from Messrs. Marriott and Co., who agreed to make the advance on receiving a commission of 2½ per cent. on the amount (21,928*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.*), which commission, amounting to 548*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.*, together with 97*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.* telegraph expenses, and 44*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* notarial and protest expenses, making a total of 680*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.*, was paid by the plaintiffs.

It was proved by Mr. Quentrell that the course adopted by him was a usual and proper one under the circumstances, and was necessary to protect the honour and credit of the firm; and that, had he not done so, the bills would have gone back to Alexandria dishonoured, the expenses attending which course would have considerably exceeded those incurred by the steps which he took to get the money.

The defendants at the trial contended that the notarial expenses were all that the defendants were liable to pay.

A verdict was found for the plaintiffs for 645*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.*, in addition to the 44*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* paid into court, and leave was reserved to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit or a verdict, or to reduce the damages.

In pursuance of that leave, a rule nisi was subsequently obtained, in Michaelmas Term last, by Quain, Q.C., on the part of the defendants, to set aside the plaintiffs' verdict and to enter a verdict for the defendants, or a nonsuit, on the ground that the sum for which the verdict was returned was not recoverable as damages in this action. Against that rule

Milward, Q.C. and R. G. Williams for the plaintiffs, now showed cause. This was an action on a special contract which was set out in the declaration. No doubt the holders of the bills might have sent the bills back to Alexandria and fixed the drawers with the whole expenses occasioned by the defendants' breach and default. The cases showed that the damages found by the jury here were recoverable in such an action as the present, and that, being founded on an express contract, the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover nominal damages, even though no actual damage were proved. Thus, in Marzetti v. Williams and others, 1 B. & Ad. 415; 9 L. J. 42, K. B., where a banker had refused payment of a customer's cheque, having sufficient funds of the customer in his hands, it was held that the latter might maintain an action of tort against the banker for such refusal, though he had sustained no actual damage and that it was immaterial in such a case whether the action, in form, were in tort or in assumpsit; as though in form founded in tort, it was in substance founded on a contract. And in Rolin and another v. Steward (P. O.), 14 C. B. 595, 23 L. J. 148, C. P., which was an action against a banker for dishonouring an acceptance and cheque of a customer, there being sufficient assets in his hands to meet them, and in which no special damage was proved, Lord Campbell, C. J., directed the jury that they ought to give neither nominal nor excessive, but such reasonable and temperate damages as they should consider to be a compensation for the injury sustained by the plaintiffs from the dishonouring of their cheques; and that direction was afterwards approved and upheld in banco, as above, by the Court of Common Pleas, Cresswell, J., in his judgment there, saying that Marzetti v. Williams (ubi sup.) went the full length of justifying that direction. It is clear, therefore, that substantial damages may be given in such a case, even without proof of any actual damage. The case in the American Court of Riggs v. Lindsey, 7 Cranch 500 (cited in a note to Story on Bills, 4th edit., sect. 398), is also an authority that these damages are recoverable. [They were here stopped by the court, who called on]

Quain, Q. C. and D. Fletcher for the defendants, to support their rule. An extremely important point, with regard to the law of damages, was involved in this case. It is contended for the defendants that the damages found by this verdict are not legally recoverable. Had the plaintiffs had funds of their own with which to meet the bills, there would have been no damage except the costs of protest. The damages claimed arise from the fact of the plaintiffs having had to borrow the needful funds. But the defendants are not liable for that. It might be that the plaintiffs might have had to mortgage an estate, or to dispose of a quantity of cotton in a falling market in order to raise the money, but would that have been recoverable in damages? It is submitted that it clearly would not. [MARTIN, B.—The plaintiffs have bills coming due, and they go to the bank and say, "You pay these bills for us, and we will allow you ½ per cent." Is not that notice to the bank that they wanted this accommodation?] The arrangement was, in fact, a letter of credit. The foreign dealers will have the security of a bank. The plaintiffs might be the richest house in Liverpool, yet the course would be just the same; the bank get a commission of ½ per cent. for lending their names. That gave no indication to the bank that Prehn and Co. could not take up the bills. It is said by the other side that the defendants are to be liable for all possible expenses which the plaintiffs might be put to to raise the money. Yet the plaintiffs might have had to pay 40 or 50 per cent. for it, and are defendants to be liable, having no knowledge of the plaintiffs' circumstances, and never having guaranteed? For such a small commission it is not to be supposed that the bank would undertake such a responsibility as the plaintiffs seek to cast on them. The cases cited contra of bankers dishonouring customers' cheques were distinguishable. Such refusal amounted to slander. There, too, the banks were solvent. Here the bank was notoriously insolvent, and no discredit or slur, therefore, was cast on the plaintiffs by the refusal to pay, and so no damage arose. The plaintiffs are drawers, and the declaration is on a promise that the defendants would accept and pay the bills on presentation. The breach is that they did not pay. It is like the drawer of a bill suing the acceptor, in which case it is clear that these expenses would not be recoverable. See Byles on Bills, 9th edit., p. 402, where it is laid down that "the drawer of a bill is liable to the re-exchange, though the bill be returned through never so many hands, but the acceptor is not liable to the re-exchange." In support of that proposition, the learned author cities, amongst other cases, that of Woolsey v. Crawford, 2 Campb. 445, where it was sought to make the acceptor of a foreign bill answerable for all the damage suffered by the plaintiff, the payee, and indorser, from the dishonour of the bill, including 10 per cent. paid by him to the indorsee as re-exchange, and 6*l.* per cent. interest, and other charges, upon which Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said, "You may as well state that, by reason of the bill not being being paid, the plaintiff was obliged to raise money by mortgage. The acceptor's contract cannot be carried further than to pay the sum specified in the bill, and interest according to the legal rate." [MARTIN, B.—This is damage flowing directly from a breach of contract on the part of the acceptor. R. G. Williams (contra) referred to Story on Bills, par. 398, p. 489, 4th edit., and Francis v. Rucker, Ambl. Rep. 672, as authorities that the acceptor is liable to the drawer for re-exchange. KELLY, C. B.—This is not an action on a bill, but on a special contract. But whatever may be the law of America, or however great the authority of the American judge, I cannot think that the law and practice of America in such a case can be a precedent for the law as administered in England.] The contract is to accept and pay. They do accept, and the breach is for nonpayment. It is precisely as if they had been simply sued on a bill for nonpayment. In each case, the promise and the breach are identical, and there is no difference, as regards the measure of damages, between the two; and except the cases of banker and customer, which have been cited, there is no authority for saying that more damages can be recovered in the one case than in the other. The pleader here has evidently sought to avoid the difficulty, of which he was aware, by suing, not on the bill, but on the letter of credit; but it is submitted that he has not succeeded. Again, what was in the contemplation of the parties at the time when the contract was made must be looked at, according to the authority of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Ex. 241; 23 L. J. 171, Ex.; and it is contended that the defendants receiving only ½ per cent. could not have contemplated this responsibility. [KELLY, C.B.—They must have known that the plaintiffs, or any other merchant in Liverpool, under the circumstances, would, if they could, obtain money at 2½ per cent. to prevent the expense, inconvenience, and discredit of the bills being sent back dishonoured to Alexandria.] The damages are too remote. The principle governing such a case is laid down in Sedgwick on Damages, ch. 8, p. 263, sect. 233, 4th edit. It is there said "In actions on promise to pay a liquidated sum, as on promissory notes or bills, the rule of damages is a fixed and arbitrary one. It is identical with the rate of legal interest. The actual damage may have been much greater; the non-performing of the obligation may have caused the greatest distress, nay even extreme positive loss; it may have produced actual insolvency. These remote results the law, however, does not investigate."

KELLY, C. B.—There is no doubt whatever that as a general rule, in actions on bills of exchange, neither general nor special damages are recoverable by reason of the simple nonpayment of the bill. But the case now before us for our decision is not an action simply on a bill of exchange at all. It is an action on a special contract entered into by the defendants with the plaintiffs, that they would do certain things; and the action is against them upon their liability under that special contract. Now undoubtedly, as was observed by Mr. Quain in the course of his argument, the question involved in the case is one of very great importance, and the learned counsel on either side have failed to discover any case applicable to or bearing upon the particular point, except the two English cases of Marzetti v. Williams, in the Queen's Bench, and Rolin v. Steward, in the Common Pleas, and the American case of Riggs v. Lindsey. Now the general principle is, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover compensation for whatever damages naturally and directly flow from the breach by the defendant of the contract which has been made between them. Let us then see what the contract was in this case, and what are the damages naturally and directly resulting or flowing from the breach of it, and what also, in the language of the decision in Hadley v. Baxendale (ubi. sup.), "may be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties at the time when the contract was entered into between them, as the probable result of the breach of it." The contract here, as set out in the declaration, was this:—The plaintiffs' firm, at Alexandria, desiring to purchase and ship to England for sale cargoes of grain, it was agreed between them and the defendants that, for commission and reward to be paid to the defendants in that behalf, the defendants should accept bills drawn by the plaintiffs in Alexandria for the payment of the purchase-money of the said grain, and that the plaintiffs should, from time to time, pay over to the defendants the proceeds of the said sales, for the purpose of the same being specially appropriated by the defendants to the payment of the said bills at maturity, so that the defendants might be placed in funds by the plaintiffs whilst the bills were running, and be kept out of cash advances on account of them; that under that contract the plaintiffs' firm at Alexandria drew bills to the amount of 21,928*l.* upon the defendants, and which bills were accepted by the defendants. It is stated, too, that the plaintiffs performed their part of the contract by supplying the plaintiffs before the stipulated time with sufficient funds for the purpose of their meeting and paying the said bills. And then it is alleged, as a breach of contract on the defendants' part, that the defendants, before the said bills became due and payable, refused and declined to carry out the said agreement on their part, whereupon the plaintiffs were obliged, at great expense, to make other arrangements for meeting and paying the said bills, and incurred great expenses in protecting their credit by reason of the defendants' breach of contract. Now it seems that, upon learning that the defendants refused to meet the bills, the plaintiffs, for their credit's sake, and in order to avoid the expense and discredit which would have attached to the bills being sent back dishonoured to Alexandria, applied to, and succeeded in borrowing from, Messrs. Marriott and Co., financial agents at Liverpool, the requisite amount (21,928*l.*) wherewith to meet and take up the bills in question; and for that accommodation they had to pay Messrs. Marriott the sum of 548*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.*, being their commission at 2½ per cent. on the sum so borrowed, to enable them to take up their bills. As soon also as the plaintiffs became aware that the defendants would not take up the bills, they telegraphed to the firm at Alexandria, informing them of the state of the case, and various telegraphic messages passed to and from Liverpool and Alexandria between the plaintiffs in England, and their partners at Alexandria, relative to the proceedings necessary to be taken under the circumstances, with a view to meeting the difficulty and saving the credit of the plaintiffs' firm in the best possible and least expensive way. By the course which was adopted the money was obtained and the bills were taken up. Was this then, I will say, not so much a reasonable and prudent course of conduct on the part of the plaintiffs, but was it not such conduct as any other merchant in Liverpool would have resorted to under the circumstances? I think it was; and I think, moreover, that it was exactly the course which the defendants themselves must have expected the plaintiffs would adopt when they gave notice to the plaintiffs of their intention not to pay the bills, with the view, it must be supposed, that the latter would take means to protect themselves in the best way they could. And what do the plaintiffs thereupon? Why, not having funds of their own at their disposal at the moment applicable to the purpose, they borrowed the amount at what cannot but be said to be a very reasonable rate of commission, of Messrs. Marriott and Co., and therewith took up these bills, amounting altogether to the large sum of 21,928*l.*, and so preserved the honour and credit of their firm which had been so seriously imperilled by the defendants breach of contract with them. Surely this was a most reasonable and natural course for the plaintiffs to adopt, and one by which I think the defendants, by their notice to the plaintiffs of their inability to meet the bills when they should fall due, must be taken to have given their implied sanction. But further, if these bills had not been taken up they would have been sent back to Alexandria dishonoured. What, in addition to the slur and discredit thereby cast on the plaintiffs' mercantile reputation, would have been the expense of that step, depends of course materially upon the rate of exchange between England and Egypt at the time; but it was proved in evidence that the expense attending the returning of the bills to Alexandria would have been greater than the expense of borrowing the money in Liverpool wherewith to take them up. I think that all these damages were such as necessarily resulted and naturally flowed from the defendants' breach of contract, and the state of things occasioned thereby. In my judgment, therefore, the defendants' rule must be discharged, the ground on which I hold the plaintiffs entitled to recover being, that all this is general damage resulting from the breach of their contract by the defendants. This decision is in strict conformity with the justice of the case, which, in my opinion, no other decision would meet.

MARTIN, B.—I also am of opinion that this rule must be discharged; but I think these damages are special, and not general damages. Mr. Fletcher, in his argument, referred us to the very excellent and well-known treatise of Mr. Sedgwick, an American lawyer of great repute, upon the subject of damages, but the passage which he cited from that work has really in fact no application to a case of the kind like the present, but rather to a case between an ordinary debtor and creditor. This is not that case at all. It arises on a contract contained in two letters. On the 8th Aug. the plaintiffs write to the defendants as follows: "With reference to our conversation in regard to a credit for our Alexandria firm, to be used for transactions in grain, we beg now to state the nature of the business. The grain to be shipped by our friends is to be sold in Liverpool or London before shipment, and the terms of sale are cash against delivery of documents within seven days after receipt. Our friends would draw on your bank at the time of shipment, and remit to you, either simultaneously or within very short time, as soon as the shipment is completed, the shipping documents. We would then collect the amount and pay it over to you; such collection to be considered as in trust, and especially to be applied towards the payment or covering the drafts of our friends. As the Alexandria drafts on your bank would be at three months' date, you would be covered in cash over two months before maturity. We are prepared to pay you your usual commission of ½ per cent. on such transactions." To this letter the defendants, by their manager, send the following reply to the plaintiffs on the 9th Aug.: "I beg to inform you, in reply to your note of yesterday, that your firm in Alexandria is at liberty to draw on this company to the extent of 20,000*l.*, in furtherance of grain shipments, on the conditions stated." That then is the contract between the parties. In pursuance of it bills are drawn by the plaintiffs and accepted by the defendants. The Alexandria firm punctually complied with the terms of the contract on their part, and on or before the 21st Oct. had paid in to the defendants' bank a sum of over 22,000*l.*, being considerably more than enough to meet and pay the bills then coming due. The defendants, however, having that sum of money in their hands decline to, and do not, take the bills up. No doubt the bank may have meant to deal fairly and properly, as they thought, under the circumstances attending their suspension and stoppage at that moment, and to avoid any charge of undue preference, and so they kept this money to themselves for the general body of their creditors instead of applying it to discharge the plaintiff's drafts. That may be so, but it was, I must think, a very hard case upon the plaintiffs. Now there are three descriptions of damages in actions on special contract. First, there are nominal damages; a case may easily be conceived in which a judge would be well justified in telling the jury only to give nominal damages, as, for instance, in the case of a contract for sale and purchase of goods, where the purchaser fails to perform his agreement, and there is a rise in the market in the price of the particular goods. In that case the seller would not be a loser by the breach of contract, though the defendant would be liable, for his breach of contract, to nominal damages. Secondly, there are general damages, or such reasonable and moderate, but substantial, damages as are pointed out by Cresswell, J. in his judgment in the case of Rolin v. Steward (ubi sup.). And thirdly, there are special damages, such as naturally and reasonably flow from the breach of the defendant's contract, and of that kind, I think, are the damages in the present case. Mr. Quain said, indeed, that the damages sought to be recovered in an action for breach of contract should be such as the court and jury consider to have been in the contemplation of the parties at the time when the contract between them was entered into. Now for myself I do not believe that that is a true test, for I do not believe that the parties to a contract ever do at the time, contemplate, or turn over in their minds, all the possible contingencies that may happen at some future time; and in the present case one can hardly suppose that the failure of the bank before the maturity of these bills could have been thought to be a likely or possible event, and one can imagine the indignation of the bank at the bare suggestion. But, if it had been contemplated, the bank would probably have said, "There are plenty of financial houses in Liverpool who will in that event supply you with any amount of money on easy terms." A more reasonable and natural course of conduct than the plaintiffs pursued, and damages more naturally and proximately flowing from a given cause than do these damages from the breach of contract on the defendant's part, complained of in the present action, I cannot conceive, and I think that any judge who had directed the jury to give nominal damages only in such a case would have grossly misdirected them.

Pigott, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and look at the matter as my brother Martin does, as a question of special damages.

Rule discharged.

Attorneys for the plaintiffs, Allen and Co., 20, Bedford-row, W.C., agents for Simpson and North, Liverpool.

Attorneys for the defendants, Field, Roscoe, Field, and Francis, 36, Lincoln's-inn-fields, W.C., agents for Lowndes, Thorneley, and Archer, Liverpool.

COURT OF PROBATE.

Reported by W. Leycester, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, Feb. 2.

(Before Lord Penzance.)

In the goods of Harrow.

Lunatic—Administration—Penalties—Residue.

The husband of the sole next of kin of a deceased lunatic administered to the estate after her death. The estate was considerable, and the applicant being in humble circumstances was unable to find the requisite sureties. The court allowed the applicant himself to give a bond for the full amount of the usual penalties, and ordered him to find sureties in 100l.

John Jones died 23rd April 1869, a lunatic. His only next of kin was his sister, who died without having taken out letters of administration to her brother's estate, which now amounted to considerably over 4000*l.*

Bayford now applied, on behalf of the sister's husband, for a grant of administration, and also that the ordinary penalties of the administration bond should be dimished. The money standing to the account of the accountant-general the penalty would be nearly 10,000*l.* It was out of all question that the applicant, who was a ribbon weaver at Coventry, could furnish security to that amount. There were no debts, and, on the authority of In the goods of Grant (1 S. & T. 54), he moved that the penalty be reduced to 100*l.*

Lord Penzance.—I think the court must relieve you. But the better way will be that the party himself should give a bond in the full amount, and he can find sureties in 100*l.*

Digitized by Google

MUMFORD AND BRETT v. SHUFFLEBOTHAM.

Testamentary suit—Jury discharged—New trial—Motion to try at assizes refused.

In a testamentary suit, touching the validity of a will, the jury was discharged without agreeing to a verdict. A rule absolute for a new trial was granted, but on motion by the plaintiff, at whose instance the first trial was had in this court, the court refused to change the venue to Stafford Assizes.

The plaintiffs propounded a will of which they were executors, and the defendant pleaded in opposition undue influence and incapacity. The case was tried in the sittings after Michaelmas Term, before the court and a special jury, and the jury was discharged without agreeing to a verdict. A rule absolute for a new trial was obtained, and Huddlestone (Dr. Swabey with him), on behalf of the plaintiff (at whose instance the case had originally been fixed to be tried in this court), applied that the new trial might be heard at the next Stafford Assizes.

Stavely Hill, Q. C. (Bayford with him) contra.—As the jury were discharged, the first trial could not be said to be finished. Moreover, of the three counsel retained for the defendant, two did not belong to the Oxford Circuit.

Lord PENZANCE.—It would be much more agreeable to the court if the case could be sent down to be tried at Stafford, but the court cannot study its own inclination at the cost of injustice to either side. There is a time for everything. A system which has some merit, obtains in this court and in no other, though it is a change which has been recommended for general adoption—that the court intimates, when issues of fact are joined, how and before what tribunal they should be tried. A regular motion is made in this court for that purpose. It fell to the plaintiff's lot to make the application, and he voluntarily selected that it should be tried here in the Court of Probate. Had he desired to have had it tried at Stafford, and if he could have shown that the witnesses all reside in the neighbourhood of Stafford, he would have obtained his wish, for these are applications to which the court almost universally accedes. It would have been open to him to urge that economy would be achieved by trying on the spot, though I may observe that it is a disputed point whether that is always the result in such cases of removal; however, he did not make any such application. He asked that it should be tried here, and accordingly it was tried here, and the jury was discharged. Now he wants to retrace his steps—he wants to rescind the order made at his own desire, and to have the case tried at Stafford. If I could see my way to making the change without inflicting hardship on either side I might do it, but I am afraid it would. For it is truly said by the defendants that out of three counsel instructed by them, who have already had their briefs, and are thoroughly up in the facts, two do not go that circuit. I must therefore refuse the application.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Eyre.

Solicitor for the defendant, Ayrton.

NISI PRIUS.

Reported by JOHN ROSE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Monday, Feb. 7.

(Before BLACKBURN, J.)

WARBURTON v. THE MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway—Negligence—Door unfastened.

A railway company ought to take reasonable care to see that the handles of the carriage doors are fastened, and if they neglect that they are guilty of negligence. But if a passenger lean too heavily upon a door and meet with an accident by its opening, he would be guilty of contributory negligence.

Action for negligence.

The negligence alleged was the leaving of a railway carriage door unfastened, in consequence of which the plaintiff fell out of a train and was injured.

The plaintiff in her evidence said, "I placed my right elbow on the window of the carriage, and my left hand on the door. I was seated on the edge of the seat. I looked out very earnestly at some passing object, then felt a most tremendous shock, and remember no more." She, in fact fell out of the train as it was in motion. There was conflict of testimony as to whether the door was or was not fastened.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think a railway company ought to take reasonable care to see that the handles of the carriage doors are fastened, and if they neglect that they are guilty of negligence. But I think that a passenger ought not to lean upon the door too much.—doors are not meant to be leant upon. It is for the jury to say whether the plaintiff leant too heavily upon the door; if so, she might be guilty of contributory negligence which would disentitle her to recover.

Verdict for plaintiff, 500l.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Tuesday, Feb. 8.

(Before KEATING, J.)

SCHOLES v. THE NORTH LONDON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Damage—Wrongful acts of third parties.

A railway engine fell over from the defendants' line into the garden of the plaintiff. This happened through the negligence of the company's servants. Damage was done to flowers in the garden by a crowd that assembled there. In an action against the company, brought by the occupier of the garden,

Held, that the damage done by the crowd was too remote.

Action for negligence.

An engine upon the defendants' railway ran off their line through the admitted negligence of their servants. It fell into the plaintiff's flower garden. Considerable damage was done to the flowers both by the engine and those who assisted to remove it, and also by a crowd of spectators who assembled at the scene of the accident and trampled over the garden.

The plaintiff sought to recover from the company for the whole damage done to his garden.

Cole, Q. C. and Pinder for plaintiff.

F. M. White for defendant.

KEATING, J.—Is there any authority to show that

Digitized by Google

the defendants are liable for the acts of those independent trespassers?

Pinder, for the plaintiff, cited
R. v. Moore, 3 B. & Ad. 184

KEATING, J.—But that was a case of an indictment for a public nuisance.

Pinder.—The defendants have admitted that the engine came into the garden by their negligence, and the probable cause of that negligence would be to draw people to see it. The defendants are therefore responsible for those people as for their own servants.

KEATING, J.—What number of persons do you say they are responsible for? Would it not be making the defendants liable for the wrongful act of other persons? In the case where a servant was wrongfully discharged on account of a libel, that damage was held too remote in an action against the libeller.

Pinder intimated that he would confine his claim to the damage done by the persons employed in getting the engine away.

KEATING, J.—I think that very wise. Everything done about getting it out causing injury to the garden may be the subject of damages, but I think it would be dangerous for you to take damages for what was done by independent trespassers.

Verdict for plaintiff, 15*l.*

Attorney for the plaintiff, J. W. Harling.

Attorneys for the defendant. Paine and Co.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Tuesday, Feb. 1.

(Before BRAMWELL, B.)

PLANT v. THE MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway—Negligence—Train over-shooting platform.

The carriage of a train in which the plaintiff travelled overshot the platform of the station at which it stopped. The name of the station was called out. The train was not backed. The plaintiff descended from the carriage in a dark place, and alighting on rough ground, sprained his foot. He had not been requested to alight there. In an action against the company for negligence:

Held, that on the facts stated, the company were not liable. Harrold v. The Great Western Railway Company, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 440; and Siner and Wife v. The Great Western Railway Company, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S, 114; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 117, followed.

Action for negligence.

A train in which the plaintiff was a passenger arrived at Market Harborough station, and the carriage occupied by the plaintiff overshot the platform. "Market Harborough" was called out. The train was not backed. The plaintiff knew the station. He descended from the carriage in a dark place, and alighting on some rough ground, sprained his foot. He had not been requested to get out there.

This action was brought to recover compensation for the injury sustained.

At the close of the plaintiff's case,

Overend, Q. C. (with him A. Wills), for the defendants, submitted that there was no case to go to the jury, citing

Harrold v. The Great Western Railway Company, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 440; and Siner and Wife v. The Great Western Railway Company, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 114; L. Rep. 4, Ex. 117.

O'Brien, Serjt. (with him J. O. Griffits), contra, cited Foy v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S., 606; 18 C. B., N. S., 225. Although that case may be distinguished because there there was an ex-express request to the passengers that they should alight, yet all these cases depend on shades of difference. Here the train having shot beyond the platform, there is evidence of negligence, and its remaining there without any effort being made to back it is literally an invitation to the passengers to alight, and an announcement that the place is fit and proper for the purpose. The doctrine now certainly seems to be that a passenger must sit still until the door is opened for him; but the contract was to carry the plaintiff to Market Harborough and afford him facilities for descending. Then was he to wait and be taken on to Leicester, and be left to bring his action?

BRAMWELL, J.—I am quite prepared to act on the cases cited for the defendants. I think there is here no evidence of a cause of action. It is manifest that this plaintiff did not hurt himself by reason of the want of sufficient accommodation, but by reason of the want of ordinary caution on his own part. He said in his evidence, "I knocked at the door, and no one came; I opened it and got out. I had passed the platform—that I knew and I had passed the station wall—that I also knew." The truth is he got out without looking. He must be taught to take care of himself. Let him e nonsuited.

Nonsuit.

Attorneys for the plaintiff, Torr, Janeway, and Co., 38, Bedford-row, Holborn.

Attorneys for the defendant, Beale, Marigold, and Co., Birmingham.

END OF VOLUME XXI.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google